MOVING joyously among the tables in her father's inn, Charmen stops to whisper to Richard, who declares that he will ask her father for her hand tonight. However, some of the drunken habitues of the inn discuss the fact that the haughty Charmen has finally given herself to a man, and her father hearing, leaps at them. Richard is beaten up and left in the streets and Charmen, terrified by her father's wrath flees and finds refuge aboard a channel boat. She is discovered and shaken harshly until Edith Chevalier, a lovely English woman intercedes in the girl's behalf and pays her passage across.

Edith, while out with Mr. Robertson, an ardent admirer, has fallen in love with Pierre Chevalier, a handsome young singer and at a subsequent meeting, when they had both heen swept away by their love, they eloped to France. For idyllic months they had been together, and when Pierre had left for a concert engagement so that he could properly provide for their coming heir, he had heen killed in a train smashup. Edith, appalled by the blow was returning to England and her own people.

Although Edith offers Charmen employment, soon the girl is afraid her benefactress will discover her shame and she leaves. Edith, finding Charmen unwilling to reveal her cause for leaving, tells her that her position will always be open to her if she cares to return. Charmen's child is born at the home of the kindly Davises who promise to take care of the little girl while Charmen, having begged them to see that her daughter wear always the other half of a medal, returns to claim her position from Edith Chevalier. But that day in the garden, Robertson, in a jealous fury has murdered Edith and madly promised to kill her son when he reaches manhood. Charmen, appalled at the discovery of Edith lying in a pool of blood screams, and unable to satisfactorily prove her presence there, is convicted for the murder and sentenced to twenty years of penal servitude.

Time passes. Charmen is freed at long last and discovering only that the Davises have gone to London, she ekes out a living selling flowers. Meanwhile her daughter sent to college by her kindly foster parents has met and fallen in love with the youthful doctor Pierre Chevalier. Once coming from the theater, Pierre buys flowers for his loved one at the door, but Charmen stares at the flower seller and later, trembling, tells Pierre that there was a remarkahle resemblance between herself and the woman who has vanished. Pierre reassures her, but Charmen drops her eyes and explains that for a few days now she has known that she is not the daughter of the Davises and has never had a father. Pierre is shocked, but he quickly tells her that his love is unabated, and since, as she says her mother is dead, the flower seller could scarcely be she. However, a few days later, Pierre on a visit of the charity wards sees the same flower seller who has dropped from hunger and exposure and when he discovers she wears the other half to the medal his Charmen has, he removes her to his home. There, however, she tells him her story and he learns that Charmen's mother is the accused murderer of his own mother. However, when the wretched Rohertson comes to kill Pierre, his hand shakes and a victim of one of his recurrent hallucinations, kills himself helieving that Edith's ghost has protected her son. Before he dies, he confesses his earlier guilt. The newspaper story leads Richard at last to the end of his search and happiness comes for the four.

LITTLE WOMAN

Eva M. Bruce Drama File No. 10002

THE boss of Union mine looked troubled as he called at the tiny station for the mail and express. It didn't seem right to him, he said, that an old man like Elliot should be the only protection for the mine payroll. Nora Elliot tried to appear taller than her four foot eleven as she explained that for forty years her father had heen operator and he had never lost a package. Besides, more softly, in a few weeks he would pensioned and he couldn't quit now. Shaking his head, Steve Henley climbed into the wagon driven by one of his men and motioned to the driver to go on. As soon as they were out of sight, Nora darted into the hack room and making the old man comfortable explained that everything was all right. Feebly he told her they ought to get someone to help, it wasn't safe just her handling the mail, but Nora, in a voice that persisted in quavering, insisted that she was fully capable. An instant later, she screamed softly as a mouse scurried across the porch.

In the shadows of a mesquite hush, Bill impatiently waited for the passing of the through passenger train to Elton. Shrinking back as the train slowed down, he saw cursing trainmen put off a "bum" and as Bill recognized the tramp, an old pal, he whistled low. Bill explained that he had expected to undertake this job alone but he was willing to take Nick in with him. He had found out that the operator at Union was sick and only his timid girl was there to guard the payroll for the mines. Bill had watched her when he drove the boss in, and he knew this was a cinch. He had shaven his beard so she couldn't possibly recognize him. All they had to do would be to grab the mail and run.

The train came in fifteen minutes late. Anxious to make up time, it halted just long enough to throw off the mail and hand Nora the express and payroll for the mine. Nervously clutching the packages she hurried into the depot. As she neared the door, Bill laid his hand on the package. Terrified, she wheeled and before he could anticipate her move she sprang inside and slammed the door in his face. With an oath he lunged forward and found the door locked. Pounding hard, he was joined by Nick and the two men raced to the window and with sneers ordered, "Open the door or we'll bust the window and come in." "Nora knew then if she moved toward the telegraph instrument or refused to open the door they would break the window and overpower her. In a flash she caught sight of a pair of shears in the open drawer of the filing cabinet. With lightning speed her fingers closed over the steel and she commanded, "Leave that window or I'll shoot you both." Taken by surprise they turned and ran while she pounded out her warning on the telegraph keys and then, but not until then, fainted. When Steve Henley arrived from the mine he was prepared to mutter, "I told you so," but seeing the lovely white face he leaned over her hastily bringing her to. Her detailed description of the robbers identified one of them positively as Steve's driver who had resigned that week, and looking tenderly at the little woman, Steve whispered, "You need someone to protect you." And Nora, woman-like, dropped her eyes.

THE GALLANT DEFENSE

Vincent Markaity Drama File No. 9966

DESPERATELY in need of cash to tide him over his business difficulties, A. S. Bently appeals to David Jarvis, banker, for aid. Jarvis coolly watches the agony of the older man and says he could help if Bently would induce his daughter, Jerry to regard him more favorably. Choking at the thought, Bently returns to his office and commits suicide. Jerry is comforted by her fiance George, her younger brother Allen and her married sister, Mrs. Spencer, and when the estate is settled and they discover that Bently has left nothing, the Spencers invite Jerry and Allen to live with them.

Mrs. Spencer's besetting vice is gambling. At a bridge, she loses heavily to Jarvis, who gallantly waves away her indebtedness. Grateful for the respite until she shall receive her allowance, Mrs. Spencer gives Jarvis an I. O. U. Meanwhile, Jerry has been vainly trying to get a position and when she finds the only available position one as secretary to David Jarvis she accepts despite the warning of Allen who does not want his sister to work for a man of Jarvis' bad reputation, Jerry, however, insists that Jarvis means only business, and even quarrels with George when he protests that Jarvis is recognized as a cad. Then, one night, when she accepts an invitation to dinner with Jarvis who has kept her working late, Jerry is upset by the scene her brother makes when he finds them dancing together at the club. Some time later, Mrs. Spencer receives a note from Jarvis reminding her of how her debts have accumulated. Afraid to risk a quarrel with her husband, the unhappy woman visits Jarvis to ask him to wait a few days. Jerry is amazed and eavesdropping, hears her employer threaten to turn the notes over to Spencer unless Jerry's sister come to his apartment that night. Jerry finds her sister frightened but ready to go that night, and rather than see the marriage broken up, Jerry goes herself to try to get the notes back. Allen follows and would have killed Jarvis had not Jerry told him she had just accepted Jarvis' repeated offer of marriage. Stunned Allen withdraws, and when George hears from Jerry's own lips she is going to marry Jarvis, he goes on a drinking tear. Mrs. Spencer tells Jerry she will not have the sacrifice, hut Allen, hearing all, rushes out to kill Jarvis. Jerry follows hysterically and arriving at the apartment she sees her brother standing over the dead body. Quickly she seizes the gun, screams, and to save Allen she confesses the murder. Allen protests her innocence and tries to convince Jerry that he too is innocent, but fearing her brother will be hanged, Jerry will not listen to George even, when he, aroused from his drunken stupor, comes to assure her that Allen isn't the murderer. When the jury returns a verdict of "Not Guilty!" the judge protests against the great miscarriage of justice and one of the jurors rises dramatically and explains Jerry is not guilty for he was the murderer,—of his wife's betrayer.

LOVE IS SUFFICIENT

Elzear Vian Drama File No. 9988

RAISED in the back room of the saloon her father keeps for the river drivers, Alma grows into young womanhood with a loathing for the only men she has ever seen. Instinctively she knows better than to let any of her father's gruff customers see her but one day when her father is drunk, he makes her come out and proudly shows her loveliness to one Dave Legrand, humpbacked river driver who immediately wants the girl as his own. When Alma realizes that her father is virtually selling her, she rushes from the house and tripping and stumbling tries to get away. As she nears the river she falls, twisting her ankle and at the sound of footsteps approaching she cowers, dreading the approach of the heavy boots. To her astonishment, however, the man does not seize her and when she dares to open her eyes, she looks into the first young face she has ever seen. "What in the world is a girl like you doing here?" he asks and as she trembles he assures her he isn't going to hurt her. Seeing that her ankle is swelling, he deftly binds it for her and he tells her that his name is Dan. He had gotten bored with city life and thought he could find adventure in a lumber camp. Alma shudders and he marvels again that a girl like her should live here. Before they have parted, Alma finds herself guilessly begging Dan to take her away from here, and he tells her seriously that he will have to go to camp with the timber but in three days he will return for her. Neither suspects that the humpbacked Dave has been watching them, but when the river men have gone, Alma's father beats her for not having been more sociable to Dave. The three days seem a century but although Alma waits all night by the river, Dan does not return and as she slowly returns to her room, Alma calls herself a fool for believing a man like Dan would be interested in her. Dave demands that Alma marry him immediately, and although her father urges her to yield she makes excuses, hoping against hope that Dan will return.

Months later the river men return. There is a great storm up and as they pound on the door, Alma's father opens the door and gives them the drinks they demand. Dave, eyes drink-inflamed, seizes old Jim by the throat and demands that he get his daughter but Alma, realizing that she can no longer put Dave off has fled into the woods. The brambles tear at her dress and hair and once dazed, she thinks she hears Dan's voice calling through the storm, but ascribing it to feverish hallucinations, she presses on, fearful that Dave will get her.

Meanwhile, Dave, drunkenly climbing to Alma's room after her, finds she has eluded him, and in his fury he stumbles against her lamp and sets the house afire. Alma, seeing the flames mount to the sky, remembers her father lying unconscious in his saloon and her breath comes in sobs as she races back to rescue him from the inferno. She finds his body but cannot pull him out and as she sinks unconscious, Dan leaps through the smoke and rescues first Alma and then her father. Only Dave dies in the fire and Dan explains to the wide-eyed Alma that Dave had hit him over the head with a log and he had been unconscious for months. Too weak to move, he had learned that Dave was coming back for Alma and against his doctor's orders he had come tonight to save her. As Alma's lips meet Dan's her father begs them to forgive him for being an old fool.

THE HEIR OF THE MANSION

Will Robindu Drama File No. 10003

TO the quiet village in Holland the renewed activity in the mansion formerly occupied hy the Baron Reingold is an event. But the occupation of Herr Bronkorst brings with it Herman Van Zanden son of the coachman and the lad proves a terror to all the youngsters. Particularly does he antagonize young Don Klaaver who has dared to quarrel with Herman for tormenting Hilda Housman whom Donald loves. Therefore when Herman discovers that Don lives with his Aunt Hannah he makes nasty insinuations about Don's mother and father, and little Don defends his name with his fists. Bruised and swollen, Don presents a sorry spectaole and his aunt informs him that his mother still lives, somewhere in America. She had been the most beautiful girl in town and pursued by three wealthy suitors, whose identity Aunt Hannah is not at liberty to reveal to Don until he is twenty-one, Rose had chosen one and married him secretly. Her bridegroom had gone away but when he had not returned, Rose had changed. Hardened, she had deserted her baby and gone to America.

In his jealousy of Don's love for Hilda, Herman forges Mr. Housman's name and causes his disgrace so that Hilda's father leaves with his family for the States. Don works valiantly to establish Housman's innocence but as he is leaving to search for Hilda, he sees Bronkhorst slip through the ice. Risking his own life, Don rescues the wealthy man and, himself, half-dead, is carried into the mansion. Aunt Hannah is sent for to help care for him and during the weeks of Don's convalescence Don learns that Bronkhorst's son, Allen, was one of his mother's suitors. The other two being the Baron's son and Hilda's uncle.

In America Don conducts a long search for Hilda only to lose her when she believes that Don's young and painted mother is his wife. Meanwhile Don has been trying tin vain to break the shell of hardness his mother has adopted since losing faith in her husband, whose identity she will not divulge to her son. It is Hilda, however, who, while comforting a victim of the machinery in her father's engineering plant, learns through his delirium that he has come from the same part of Holland and is indeed Allen Bronkhorst. She sends for Don in the hope that he may know something of this Rose for whom Allen calls unceasingly. Trembling, Don begs his mother to come, but because she has steeled herself to hate the man who deserted her, she will not yield. At last, however, Don plays the violin and Rose sings an old Dutch song that won Allen's heart and he ceases his moaning and with a little ory drops off into an untroubled sleep. Tears dart to Rose's eyes as she confesses Allen is Don's father.

Accompanied by the invalid Baron Reingold, whom they save from the hlackmailing schemes of Herman, and by the re-married Rose and Allen, Don and Hilda return to Holland for a reunion at the mansion whose succession the Baron has already arranged to have fall to Don and Hilda.

CONFESSION

Jack Colbert Drama File No. 9958

IN the Clydeville High School, two young couples are making a name for themselves—Dick Halstead, Jr. the son of the town bank president, Rose Murray, the daughter of Mother Murray, a kindly widow, owner of a modest bakery, and Dick's sister June, who is in love with Rose's brother Gregory. Despite the difference in social positions, the four youngsters are strongly devoted and the hatred of Oliver Brown Jr. whose father is the stern District Attorney of the country cannot mar their affection for each other. Oliver, in love with the charming June, attempts to have the two hoy chums arrested for abusing him, but his plan is a failure. Burning with animosity, he spies through the window of the Halstead home, to watch "Greg" making love to June, and slips away when Dick, returning from a rendezvous with Rose, catches sight of him.

The next morning June is found murdered, the only clue being a blood stained figurine belonging to Oliver. Charged with murder the frightened boy denies his guilt, but when Dick states that he had seen Oliver prowling around the house, Oliver is placed under arrest and his conviction seems certain. Meanwhile, Greg, who, upon hearing of the murder had suffered a severe mental shook, recovers and electrifies the Chief of Police with a confession of his guilt. Having left a hook at the Halstead home that evening, he had returned, lost control of his feelings for his sweetheart, and when, in a struggle with her, she repulsed him, her head struck the figurine and she was accidentally killed. Vengeful, the irate District Attorney Oliver Brown, Sr. poured out a burning denunciation of Greg, demanding a life for a life, but Greg, who desired death, was given a fifteen year sentence, and was taken away, moaning, "Yes, a life for a life!"

At Rockingham prison, the newly arrived Chaplain, young Clinton Fehan, learns of the harsh discipline of Warden Galvin, and finding that he can do nothing to prevent it, he determines to win the confidence of the prisoners, including a notorious ruffian, Tom Quinn. Two years later, Greg, sent to the prison as hopelessly insane, seems cured hy an all night vigil with the Father, and is made Fehan's private secretary. Fehan finally wins the grudging admiration of Quinn, by overpowering him in a fist fight, and then presents to Galvin the prisoners' petition for longer rest periods and digestible food. Refused hy Galvin, there is a prison break courageously terminated by the Father's intervention after the death of Tom Quinn and two hundred others, and the result of a state investigation leads to the appointment of a just Warden, Arthur Prentice.

Meanwhile, Rose Murray Halstead, wife of Halstead, now Governor, unsuccessful in pleading with her husband to pardon Greg, induces the Prison Commission to recommend pardon, but Murray refuses, feeling that he should give a life for a life, and revealing, that through the tutorship of the valiant Father he is preparing to enter a Monastery, at the expiration of his term. He serves his full sentence, and then, with a joyous heart reaches Monastery Mater Dolorosa, where he is cloistered as Brother Juno. And that evening, as he says his rosary with the beads given to him by June on his eighteenth birthday, the Vision of June, which had come to him every night in prison, smiles upon him tenderly, as he gives—a life for a life!

THIS NOBILITY

Ella Elizabeth Reichmann Drama File No. 10038

IT was spring festival time, and at the castle of Count Zehlendorf, all was in readiness for the fete. The shocked Countess rushed in to tell her husband that Rudi, the Count's younger brother was having an affair with the village school teacher's daughter. Even Anna, the cook, knew of the romance but the Count had remained in ignorance. Furious with his young brother for his indiscretion, the Count, by virtue of being the head of the family, ordered Rudi from the castle, and dedicating his life to one of solitude, young Zehlendorf went to a neighboring duchy, settling there as a recluse.

Twenty years later, George Zehlendorf, unaware of his uncle's experience, was going through the same trouble. His love for Erika Hagan, an orphan and companion of the countess, caused his father to disinherit him. When Erika disappeared, leaving with old Anna, the cook, a note that she could never marry him, George went to search for her. With no clue, he traveled to the far corners of the earth as Werner Roland, meeting Otto Dietrich, whose life he saved from Chinese bandits. Otto, resident of the duchy next to Zehlendorf, persuaded Werner to come home with him. There Werner settled, with old Anna, in a deserted mansion, and even the curious pryings of the tradesmen could not fathom his melancholy. Although the town whispered about the stranger who wandered so sorrowfully along the winding paths of his estate, the minister put an end to all gossip by simply stating that Mr. Roland was not to be disturbed in his sorrow.

Roland, still hoping to find Erika, often told Otto his story, but not the girl's name, so that when Otto spoke of a young nurse and her son hoarding with him, neither knew it was Erika. Meanwhile, at the Dietrich home, Erika, celebrating her birthday, impulsively told Mrs. Dietrich her tragio romance her sympathetic listener not realizing Count Zehlendorf was Werner.

As Erika counted the twenty-five candles on her cake, the orphanage where she was raised, as per instructions from Erika's mother, inserted an advertisement for the girl, stating that they held certain documents for her. Roland, discovering under the loosened hoards of the mansion floor a paper naming Erika as Rudi's daughter, heard the whole story from Anna, and realized that his mansion had been his uncle's hermitage. Rushing wildly from the house to reach Otto, he was struck by an auto, and taken to Erika's hospital, where the happy girl tenderly nursed him back to health. Upon his recovery, a reunion at the Dietrich house, and the opening of the orphanage's papers disclosed that Erika, taken to the home upon the death of her mother, had been hired by the Count who did not know of the birth of his brother's child. . . . Again it was spring festival time, but this time joy ruled the hearts of the Zehlendorfs.

NAME THE PLACE

M. M. D. Comedy Drama File No. 9989

IT was one thirty A. M., and Mary Louise Morgan had just seen her brother David off on a business trip. At the station she had met Mazie, one of the town's newcomers, who, laughingly insinuated that she was going to marry Judge Powers some day. Francis D. Powers was Hemming's most eligible bachelor, and Mary Louise, who had been his childhood friend, had never loved any other man. As a young girl she had comforted him when Irene Bradley, whom Francis adored, had eloped with his rival, a young attorney. Perhaps it had been this disappointment that spurred Francis on to work harder than any one in the county, and now, at thirty-five, he was a Judge.

Her eyes blinded with tears, because of Mazie's supposed triumph, Mary Louise dragged her feet homeward, and when a soft, persuasive voice said to her, "Name the place, sister," Mary hardly realizing that the words hinted she was a lady of easy virtue, replied, with the thought that was nearest her heart, "The Marriage License Bureau." She turned to find the amused Judge Powers looking down at her, and although she pretended to be indignant, Fran assured her that he would be there to keep the appointment, a week from that evening.

For two days Mary went about her business of raising prize leghorns, scrupulously avoiding the judge, and furious that he should have been so nonchalant and insincere. The news that he had been seen everywhere with Mazie enraged her, and she told Susan, her maid who had a staunch ally and informer in Joseph Fran's valet, that she never wanted to see Fran again. Glaring headlines the next day screamed out that the Judge had disappeared, and Mazie with him! Mary, in a moment of weakness, told her brother, who seemed much amused, of her early morning encounter, and then added that she would do anything to withdraw her words, since Fran must have a low opinion of her. Malicious gossip flew thick and fast around Hemming concerning the Judge's affair, and when Mary received a letter from Fran with a thousand dollar check and instruction to proceed to New York and buy her trousseau, Mary was dazed. Determined to see the thing through, although she was completely mystified, Mary and Susan went on to the city, stopping at Father Kelly's house. Mary completed all her shopping, but the day of the supposed wedding, she was still in the dark, despite Joseph's frequent assertions that his master would turn up. Jerry, a curious reporter friend of Mary's, burst in upon the disconsolate girl, frantically waving a paper, telling that Judge Powers, by a clever ruse, had finally succeeded in cornering a group of jewel thieves, of which Mazie was the feminine influence. Upon Jerry's heels came the Judge and rushing off Father Kelly the whole party went to the Marriage License Bureau where Mary, still thinking she was dreaming, heard Fran whisper softly, "Darling, I'm so glad you named this place. When Irene Bradley laughed at my proposal, I swore never to marry unless the girl asked me!

IN FULL PAYMENT

Steve Martin Drama File No. 9990

WHEN twin boys, John and Lew, were born to Mrs. Petansky, she and her husband Stepan felt that at last some real happiness had come into their sombre lives. The Petanskies lived in a large steel town, the mill and the homes owned by Frederick Ballinger, and all the townspeople were in the employ of Ballinger who had gained his wealth through his ruthless business negotiations. When the children were fourteen, Stepan was killed in a mill accident, and Mrs. Petansky, grief-stricken appealed to Ballinger for the financial aid that was rightly hers. He met her plea with deaf ears, and John and Lew, who had been selling papers to help support their mother, urged her to bring the case to court. John and Lew engaged a lawyer who knew the futility of suing the all powerful Ballinger, and as the Petansky's lawyer had feared, the lawyer for the mill and the judge, ignoring the evidence, threw the case out of court. From this time on John and Lew were filled with a desire to avenge their father's tragic death, and when John was run over and fatally injured by Ballinger's son Ted, Lew swore revenge. Disconsolate he sought solace in drink, and noticing the enormous profits of the saloon-keeper, he decided to make whiskey.

The two years that elapsed saw Lew at the head of a fleet of trucks, that, under the guise of delivering ice, carried liquor to some of the wealthiest homes and night clubs. Lew, who had tried to have Ted Ballinger prosecuted, discovered that Ted's father had threatened to evict the witnesses who spoke against Ted, and so the case was hopeless. Prosperous, Lew felt that at last he was ready to carry out his revenge. At a night club Lew bribed the owner to introduce him to the Ballingers as Mr. Petan, and putting through a fake phone call asking the father and son to return home immediately, Lew trailed them in his car, over the tortuous curves of the state highway. Challenging them to go faster, he drove them over the edge of an embankment, and the Ballingers perished as John Petansky had, while Lew's guilt remained undetected.

Still vengeful, Lew's next victims were the lawyer and judge who had blocked the true course of justice. Visiting the lawyer's office late at night before he was leaving, he demanded to see him alone. Knowing Lew for a wealthy man, the attorney dismissed his force, and listened to Lew tell that he had killed a man in self-defense. When asked by the lawyer how the crime was committed he borrowed the attorney's gun, pointed it at him, killed him, and once again escaped. The judge was shoved off the road, as the Ballingers had been, and Lew took the last step in his plan by wooing and marrying Clarice Ballinger, who knew nothing of his true identity. But Lew had not reckoned on love, and despite his hardened feelings, he knew he could never harm Clarice, and hurried with her to Paris, when informed that the police had caught his men. Trapped in Paris, he revealed the truth to his horror-stricken wife, and then, refusing capture shot himself, learning too late that revenge always turns against the revenger

BEYOND THIS PAIN

Joel H. Jackson Drama File No. 9964

IN a humble Carolina cottage, Amanda Lee, watching Noel, Jr. playing in the yard, reads to her husband of the wonderful child welfare work of Dr. Everett of Columbia, S. C. The arrival of Tom, the trusted negro assistant of the overworked Noel, curtails their conversation, Noel leaving for the fields. At supper, Noel complains of the scarcity of rain, but when, during the night a violent storm arises, Noel, trying to save his farm from being flooded, catches a severe cold, and already weakened by strenuous labor, contracts pneumonia and dies. Alone and helpless, Amanda and little Noel journey to Columbia, leaving the farm in Tom's care. Aboard the train, Amanda tells a curious passenger, Ernest Hawkins, that Noel is her cousin.

Knowing she cannot support the child, she leaves him on the doorstep of Dr. Everett, who, despite his heartless wife's objections adopts the baby. A position found, Amanda is buoyed by the hope of earning enough to recover Noel, and duped by Hawkins' supposed sympathy, Amanda tells him her story. He, thinking Noel the doctor's illegitimate son, leaves immediately, and is arrested for a blackmail job, by detectives who tell him that his friend, Clark of New York, has squealed.

Amanda, now holding a splendid position, has met Dr. Everett, and has watched Noel grow into a fine young man. He leaves for college, where his belief in divine faith and immortality of the soul is destroyed. The failure of Mrs. Everett to attend his graduation, and the accidental discovery that the Everetts are not his parents fills Noel with deep-rooted disgust, and he leaves for New York falling in with a low class of society. The love of Frances, a lovely young woman, leads to his last card game. During the game he is threatened by one of the players, and in self-defense fires two shots, one missing and one hitting Clark's abdomen. He flees in a cab when told Clark has died, but Frances is sure that a stranger, who has disappeared from the cafe, has fired the shot.

Noel seeks refuge in an opium den, where Hawkins recognizing him, inflames the half-drunken youth by telling him that his mother, a street woman, was Dr. Everett's mistress. Utterly disillusioned, Noel rushes back to Frances, his one ideal, and is caught by the police.

Back in Columbia, Mrs. Everett has left the doctor and has died from the consequences of her dissipations. Amanda, back from a New York trip, tells the doctor the truth, and he, reading of Noel's arrest, hurries to the jail. Noel meets him with sneers, refusing any explanation, and taunting his father with Hawkins' story. In court, Hawkins, Frances, Amanda and the Doctor looking on, Noel states that since Clark was shot through the heart, he did not kill him. Frances recognizes Hawkins as the stranger at the cafe, and screams, "There's the man you want!" His rush from the court blocked by Amanda and the doctor, Hawkins confesses that in revenge he fired at Clark just as Noel did, the shot unnoticed. At last Amanda tells her penitent son the true story, and a few months later the reunited mother and son are partners in a double wedding at Amanda's Southern home, with Tom, who has become a leader of his people, looking on proudly.

THE COCKNEY EMIGRANT

Frank Barringham Drama File No. 9932

SON of an Anglican minister, Francis Barnett shocks his people by his desire to migrate to the Canadian Northwest in search of adventure. Holding him close, his mother shudders as she pictures her son fighting with Indians but Francis reassures her and goes.

Hired on a survey, Francis amuses the brawny workers by his cockney accent and sent with Monty on a pack trip, Francis soon discovers that the hard-drinking, cursing, head packer can handle his mongrel ponies in an astounding manner. Breaking into snatches of song, the picturesque Monty soon finds a warm place in Francis' heart. Once two riders come up to the general store and Francis stares long at Cougar Ben Watson and his lovely black haired daughter Win. As they ride away Monty mentions off handedly that Ben is a Squaw Man. "You mean that girl is a half-breed?" Francis asks incredulously but try as he will he can't forget her. Back at the survey party, Francis sits around the fire with the other men and the cook's flunky switches the conversation to women. Francis says nothing until the mean faced fellow starts talking about Ben's Siwash, Win. Springing up Francis orders him to take that back and the two men grapple desperately. Tearing hands claw at Francis' cheeks and he falls as his opponent uses his spurred boots to gain the advantage but after several minutes Francis knocks the fellow out and notices a long gashed scar through his torn shirt. Several days later, while in town he reads the descriptions tacked at the outpost of men wanted by the law and recognizes that his enemy is alias Con Leslie upon whose head there is a thousand dollar reward. When he gets back to camp he finds Con has drawn his salary and disappeared. Monty pats his shoulder and advises him to forget it and forget Win, he's too good for a half breed.

On a lone ride in the mountains, Francis is suddenly ambushed and as Con's knife catches him between the ribs he hurls himself upon the former cook and the two men finish their fight. Alone, unwatched, they toss and roll over each other, Con trying desperately to bury his knife in the weakened Francis but at last his weapon finds its mark in his own body and as Con falls over unconscious, Francis' strength gives out. Hours later, Win, who has been expecting him finds him and her father brings the boy home. Their skillful first aid and the remedy of Eagle Eyes, Ben's squaw save Francis' life. Recovering, Francis' love triumphs over his prejudice and he asks Win to marry him. Only then does Ben tell him his story.

Years before, Ben had been in love with his wife Win, and leaving her to take in his traps had found a cougar caught by the leg in one of his traps. Intending to take the animal without ruining its coat by shooting, Ben had lost his footing and fallen too close to the animal which had clawed him, torn itself from the trap and disappeared. Ben was found half dead by Indians and when he had regained his senses he had sobbed at the realization that he had not returned to his wife when she needed him most. His grief had been overwhelming when he discovered his wife had died in childbirth and it had taken him years to trace his daughter Win who had been brought up by the Indian Squaw Eagle Eyes.

For the capture of Con Leslie, Francis is given the reward and a place in the Northwest Mounted police, and his father-in-law buys for him Big Boy, the pony Francis has wanted ever since the first time he had been permitted to ride it. With his bride, the soft-eyed Win, Francis finds the adventure he has sought.

CRIMSON LOTUS

Mary Louise Rodgers Drama File No. 9978

EXPELLED from college for an escapade, Byron Darcy informs his sweetheart, Elsie Gray that he is leaving for the Orient. She begs him to look up her missionary aunt and uncle, but Byron smiles. Aboard the boat the Chinese cook, Wu Pie Fu keeps a Gila Monster which he believes to be the reincarnated soul of his wife, as a pet. The first mate, taking a violent dislike to the creature, hurls it into the ocean. Wu springs in after his pet and is drowning when Byron leaps in and brings the Chinaman, still holding his pet's cage, to safety.

Months later, in Shanghai, the Chinaman recognizes his young benefactor and brings him to his opium den. Soon the boy becomes addicted and Wu's fortunes increase from his drug traffic. Once, when Byron, hungry for the drug that alleviates his craving, waits outside the wooden door of Wu Pie Fu's home, his strained ears catch the sound of voices. He hears Crimson Lotus, a Chinese girl tell her mother that Wu Pie Fu will not marry her because he fears to take her into his home lest the jealousy of the Gila monster he aroused. The mother advises the girl to steal Wu's silver from the room where the Gila keeps guard. Wu comes but the Chinaman's eyes are fastened upon the vanishing figure of Crimson Lotus and he takes no heed of Byron's warning. Again Bryon plucks his sleeves and Wu motions him into an inner room and gives him a jade stemmed opium pipe. Byron signals he wants less since he is determined to break himself of the habit, but Wu smiles enigmatically and leaves his friend to the splendors of his opium dream. When Byron awakens he slips from the room but pauses at sight of Crimson Lotus stooping over the kang, feasting her eyes upon the silver ingots that are Wu's fortune. Greedily she snatches as much as she can carry but as she turns, she stumbles over a dropped ingot and her arm goes through the bars of the Gila's cage. The deadly fangs strike the soft flesh and Byron pityingly pulls her inert body out of the monster's reach. Wu, entering, thinks that the white man has despoiled his woman. Impassively he lifts the bars of the Gila's cage but the monster turns first upon his master. Unresponsive to Wu's signal, the Gila raises itself to strike. Byron crashes a silver ingot on the ugly head and the monster drops. Dazedly, Wu looks upon the bodies of the two creatures who had betrayed him and were now dead.

Meanwhile, Elsie, having heard nothing from Byron has come to Shanghai, presumably to visit her aunt and uncle. Her search is unremitting and seeing, one day, a crowd of orientals about a white man, directs his being carried into her house. Then does she recognize Byron and after a long struggle to break his opium addiction, Elsie tenderly nurses Byron back to health. Soon there is a quiet ceremony and the two lovers return to the States and a new life.

PLEASURE FIRST

T. J. Eldredge Comedy Drama File No. 9894

WOMAN-HATER that he is, Sheriff John Payne hesitates to deal directly with Nellie Gray who is selling mining stock. When, however, Colonel Brady, himself a fake operator, afraid that Miss Gray's stock is cutting into his own profits, insists that her activities he curtailed, John sends Flim Morrow his handsome young deputy to investigate. From the moment Flim enters he is overwhelmed by the beauty of Miss Gray and before she has finished with him he has signed for five hundred shares of the stock and returns to the sheriff to say he could see nothing wrong with the mine. Again Colonel Brady lodges a complaint and hesitating, Sheriff Payne goes himself only to capitulate utterly to the charming young lady. Like Flim he lets her talk him into buying the stock and the infuriated Brady decides to investigate for himself. When the promoter discovers that the stock really is valuable, however, he decides to defraud the girl of her holdings. Pretending that he is in love with her, he reluctantly parts with a few dollars and sends Nellie flowers which, however, she wears when she goes out with Flim. Meanwhile, Sheriff Payne, in love with Nellie discovers that the Colonel is on the point of swindling her through offering to consolidate her mines with his. At the cost of his own position which the Colonel controls through hribery of higher officials, the sheriff exposes the wealthy Colonel and saves Nellie from signing over her stocks. However, as he is on the point of declaring his love for the girl, she thanks him for his aid and tells him shly that she feels she needs a protector. Screwing up his courage, the sheriff is about to speak, but she continues, "And I have promised to marry Flim Morrow." Realizing that Flim is younger and handsomer, John says nothing, but unable to hear the thought of seeing Nellie married to another, he leaves town and goes to South America. There, working day and night on a rubber plantation in which he invests his money, John soon sees his fortunes multiply. However, he is not happy for he still loves Nellie.

Meanwhile Nellie's mines have yielded rich returns and Flim, unaccustomed to so much affluence, has let the money go to his head. He buys a huge car but one night when he is about to take another woman out in it, he gets drunk and crashes over an embankment. Although Nellie knows that her husband has been deceiving her she keeps up the pretense that her husband was all that he should have been for the sake of their child.

Some months later, in an obscure corner of South America, John reads of the death of Flim Morrow and immediately returns to find Nellie. He arrives just as she is in despair since her husband's debts have assimilated her entire fortune, and taking her in his arms, John tells her he has never ceased loving her. With John, Nellie and her child find happiness.

THE FIRST CHANCE

Frank Nemchak Jr. Drama File No. 10018

OVERCOAT pulled high over his cheeks, Bob Fairbanks walked against the brisk March wind. At sight of his painfully swollen face reflected in a shop window he groaned and at last turned in a door marked dentist. The pretty nurse took his case history and noticed when he said his occupation was that of a singer, that he dug his hands deeply into his pockets. On the dentist's chair Bob learned that fixing his front tooth would be an expensive process but that the infection could he halted by an extraction. For one long minute he hesitated, then as the doctor impersonally reminded him that his appearance would of course suffer if he had the tooth removed, Bob nodded. Bob leaned back in the chair, but the dentist explained, "You can thank Miss Maine." Puzzled, Bob looked into the blushing face of the pretty nurse and as he walked outside, she explained that she knew his career would suffer if he had his tooth removed. Bob objected to the idea of her footing his bills, but she persuaded him that he could pay her back and that it was nothing to her. Deftly turning the subject she asked him about his work and learned that he got odd jobs singing but had given his last salary to pay his back rent. He was hoping to get a radio audition. Something in Betty's lovely sympathetic eyes made Bob lean forward and kiss her swiftly and for one moment she returned the pressure than whispered, "Oh!" That night Betty's mother smiled at her daughter's excited confidences about Bob as she said happily he was going to call for her Saturday. But on Saturday Betty could see Bob was trying to hide something from her and at last he confessed he had lost his position. Two days later, Bob called for her and his voice ringing explained that he had received an audition and was going on the air for the first time tonight at ten. In the dark, Betty's hand crept into his happily. Suddenly a hulk of a man loomed before them, and pointing a gun at them searched Bob's empty pockets and with a curse demanded that Betty jump into his car the motor of which was running. Bob pushed Betty behind him and the man growled and reached for a blackjack. With one hand still pointing the gun, he advanced upon Bob. Desperately Bob leaped forward, brushed the gun to the ground and delivered a powerful punch at the same time falling back as the gun exploded. Police whistles blew, a crowd gathered, and Bob was carried unconscious to the hospital. Wet-eyed, Betty begged to see him, but she was informed that the bullet had pierced his leg and he was in a grave condition. Headlines that night told how Bob Fairbanks had risked his life to protect Betty from a fiend and at the list of attacks to the record of the madman, Betty shuddered. But there was a reward of five thousand and Betty's explanation to the radio station brought another opportunity to the rapidly recovering Bob who found Betty willing to be the wife of a a man who was going to make his name in radio.

GOLD FEVER

Ann Grande Drama File No. 9857

WHEN she learns that her father is determined to go to Alaska in the wake of the gold rush, Alice exhausts herself trying to dissuade him. Then, seeing that his mind is made up she announces tht she is coming with him. The same arguments that she has used upon him, he now turns upon her, but at last they both leave. The trains up are crowded with men whose glittering eyes reflect the gold fever, and shivering under the eyes of her fellow passengers, Alice pins her hair severely back and eshews all makeup. Like many of the others, her father is already planning what he is going to do with all the gold they are going to find lying about.

Arrived in Nome, the mad search begins. Hastily gathered equipment slung over their shoulders, the prospectors rush to begin their gold digging. Although the placers on Avil are rich and the Bering Sea beach yields returns, many of the enthusiasts lose heart and realizing that it will be hard work getting gold return home in disgust. Others prefer murdering and stealing from those who have struck it, and still others, fast as they accumulate some few dollars worth of the precious metal, rush to the dance halls and squander huge sums on liquor and painted women. Disorders rules. The day that Alice's father, Benton discovers a small fortune in gold on his stake, the pair fling their arms about each other and thank heaven. Alice insists that they return to the states, but the gold fever has gotten old Benton and he insists on getting more and yet more. Then they will be millionaires and have everything they want. That night a crowd of drunken hrutes break into their hut and demand the gold. Benton refuses to give it up and one of the roughest, Hasely knocks the old man down. Alice springs upon him and futilely beats him with her fists but he laughs and bends her to him while he presses a loathsome kiss on her trembling mouth. Hair loose, Alice fights against his embraces when suddenly Steve, a husky young passer-by, attracted hy the noise sees what is going on and delivers one powerful blow to Hasely's jaw. "You'll be all right now, miss, he assures but the villians have fled with the money and Benton is a long time coming to. The old man moans as his fortune is lost to him but he is determined to go on. Steve tells Alice it is dangerous for her here and adds that if at any time she requires protection she can call upon him for help. Days later, starving, Alice is seen by Hasely who pulls her into the saloon and tells everybody she is his prize. Meanwhile, Steve, discouraged by his failure to make good, has come to the saloon to get drunk. A terrific fight ensues and Steve triumphing, takes Alice out. If he had anything to offer her, he says, he would ask her to marry him, It is then that Alice gets an idea. Gold is worth nothing unless it can purchase things. If they open a general store they can soon get better returns than from digging. Whereupon on a small scale they start their business. The miners are prodigal and soon, wealthy, Mr. and Mrs. Steve aided by old Benton are among the wealthiest and most influential people in town, and the bank that they open becomes the center of the town's activities.

UNWILLING VIRGIN'S CHILDREN

Wilfred J. Angers Melodrama File No. 10050

A FLOOD of sympathy and understanding swept the country a few years ago, when the author of the Well of Loneliness first taught the world the torture and travail that assails the unfortunate victims of duosexuality in a conventional society. Here is a book that treats this theme with startling candour, and is unusually pure and scientific in its approach. We are introduced to the conventional life of Beverly, well brought up daughter of well-to-do and respectable suburban dwellers. Beverly would have married Fred Gray, if it had not been for the stain on her life caused by a criminal, who entered her room at night, chloroformed the beautiful girl, and robbed her of her virginity. Here is where the mischief starts.

Beverly's parents seek to relieve the girl's mental agony by sending her away to school, but she soon discovers that she is bearing the child of this mad man, who has in the meantime been executed. Unwilling to inform her parents of her misfortune, she finds some excuse to leave the school and remain, where her baby is delivered. She is told it is a boy, but that it must be kept in an incubator. She returns home, refusing to see it, and announcing her willingness for it to be adopted elsewhere. But through her having left her school pin at the home, it is revealed to her father what had taken place, and he pays the home a visit. There he learns the painful news that his daughter's baby is not a boy, but a hermaphrodite. With the calm wisdom of maturity, he takes the matter carefully in hand, without telling Beverly.

The unfortunate child is adopted and brought up as a girl. Naturally Beverly does not suspect it is her own ohild, since she believed hers to be a boy. But little Ray feels a strange fascination for Beverly, the love of a daughter, intermingled with the love of male for female. A scene occurs when Ray is in her early adolescence which finally makes it clear to Beverly that something is wrong with this adopted younger "sister," whom she has loved so innocently. Beverly's father then admits to both of them why the child was adopted, and Beverly's reaction reflects the cruel, stupid attitude of society toward this type of individual. She is instantly repelled, regarding Ray as a true daughter of a criminal, and the product of a vicious crime, refusing to show any charitahle or natural feeling toward her.

Ray's first period of ineffable misery is replaced by a new decision, after a wise discussion with her grandfather. She determines to try to suhlimate her tendencies in a career; she would be a great woman physician. With her father's guidance, and monetary assistance, and her own excellent qualifications, she does indeed hecome the famed and much sought-after Doctor Norris. All would have gone well with her in this capacity, but nature's trick on the hermaphrodite does not end with birth and physical development. There are emotions to be accounted for. Ray finds as she grows up, that she is tortured by desires; not the desire of a man for a woman, or the passive, gentle longing of a woman for a man, but an intense, self-consuming, burning need of sexual expression which is the sum total of both the female and the male desires. With this extreme need, her torment is augmented by the fact that she cannot find natural satisfaction, not knowing where or how to direct her sexual energy. Although she has been hrought up as a girl, she has long since discovered that there is more male than female in her makeup, and she longs to doff her feminine raiment and change to masculine clothes. But the well known Dr. Norris dare not change.

After much difficulty, and frustration, her passion finds expression in the person of one Milly Gordon, a young girl with a beautiful body, and a most unusually ardent nature, but possessing very little refinement or intelligence. So great is Ray's need, that the failings in her little friend are eagerly overlooked, in their relationship. She would have been happy, yielding thus completely to her desire, strenuous and enervating though it was proving, but for the interference of Ralph Graves, the handsome, philanderer who was responsible for Milly's first fall. Milly is torn between her devotion to the one and the other, and Ralph is finally the means of her death. Ray plans to kill this man, secretly teaching him the dope habit, which she has herself become a mild victim of, and at the same time she befriends an unfortunate girl who was impregnated by a man who loved her, and could not control his emotions. Mary Angel is not capable of giving of herself as Milly was, but while Ray takes care of her, mothers and protects her, she finds this some slight satisfaction. She restores self respect to the man that Mary Angel once loved, and the two are married, when Mary's baby is born. Something is wrong with the child, but Ray keeps them in ignorance of this—that Mary has borne an idict, while she herself seeks solace with none other than the dope-crazed Ralph Graves. For the first time, she finds her feminine nature rising in supremacy, in her new interest in Ralph. Ralph is surprised into a spirit of decency, beoause of Ray's sudden need.

By the influence of powerful potions, Ray and Ralp Graves begin a new life of the utmost degeneracy from which neither can recover. Ray is called upon to operate on her mother, because no other specialist feels capable of undertaking this difficult performance. She succeeds where others have failed, but takes from Beverly another infant baby whom she perceives to be a victim of her own fate. Beverly seems doomed to give birth to these unfortunate children. With a last recurrence of passionate energy, Ray manages to kill both the baby and herself, to relieve the world of the presence of these tortured souls, children of an unwilling virgin.

RETURN ENGAGEMENT

Vivian Slingerland Drama File No. 10031

LAWYER MARK GREEN greets his nephew Andy Turner enthusiastically and as they exchange sallies, Mark eyes his golf bag ruefully and explains that he is missing the beginning of a grand week-end party because of a client. What's more, he adds, he would give anything in the world if he didn't have to tell the poor kid that her father has flatly refused to give the money that she and her mother have petitioned for. Andy learning something of the details advises his uncle to go on, he'll deliver the message to the girl. However, when Andy catches a glimpse of Marcia Anderson, whom Mark has told him to expect as a gawky freckle-faced kid grown up, he drops weakly into a chair, for the girl is the loveliest he has ever seen. When he tells her of her father's denial, Maroia thanks him and turns to go. Touched by her spirit, Andy gives her his card and urges her to call upon him if there is anything he can do for her.

Returning home, Marcia tells her mother of her failure, Mrs. Anderson suffers a fit of coughing and shortly afterwards when she dies, Marcia blames her father for with the money she could have taken her mother to a dryer climate and saved her life. Embittered, Marcia plans to ruin her father who had, years before, divorced her mother to marry a younger woman. Appealing to Andy to launch her in society as his cousin, she does not reveal her intention of vamping her father. Beautiful, young, clever, Marcia soon succeeds in turning Peter Anderson's head and winning him from his wife. While Andy, who has been for many years in love with Jane an invalid, is summoned to Jane's bedside, Marcia plays her last card and tells Peter that he cannot have her without marriage. Peter agrees to divorce his wife and when Andy returns, pale from his ordeal at the side of Jane, he is appalled at the realization that Marcia has led a married man to his ruin. He turns upon Marcia for using him as an accomplice, and Marcia does not reveal to him that Peter is her own father. Andy is the more bitter because he knows now that he loves and has loved Marcia all the while he was faithful to Jane.

A few days before Peter's decree is final, he begs Marcia for a kiss but she holds him off inquiring about his first wife and his child who Peter explains has always hated him. Unable to contain herself, Marcia shouts, "I am your daughter!" and explains to her anguished father that she has avenged her mother's death. In her own room Marcia weeps hysterically.

Meanwhile Mark finds his nephew bitter and unhappy and learning that Marcia's coming marriage to Peter Anderson is the cause, explains that Peter was Marcia's father. Understanding now, Andy rushes to Marcia, and takes her, still dewy-eyed into his arms. Together they forget the past.

ROARING WATERS

Emma Matsen Drama File No. 9945

WITH swift steps the graceful Indian maiden moved among the trees and near the waterfall she stopped, fitted an arrow to her bow and laughed joyously as it quivered in the tree trunk where the names White Fawn—Red Eagle had been cut. An instant later another arrow whizzed through the air and planted itself in the same spot. White Fawn turned swiftly and at sight of a tall strong figure standing silhouetted against the setting sun she cried out and ran into his arms. Closely he held her and as she looked into his impassive young face she questioned, "What is it, why do you look like that?" Softly he told her that that very night he must leave for the white man's country to affirm his people's rights. "But. . . " White Fawn began, and it was some time before Red Eagle could persuade her that it would be impossible for her to come with him. Soon he would return and he would find her waiting by the Roaring Waters. With his arm about her waist, the two lovers crossed to the bank of the river where the thundering waterfall poured endlessly upon the cruel rocks below and again Red Eagle told the Indian legends about the sacrifices that had been offered to the Gods of the Waters. Wistfully White Fawn raised her eyes in which tears glistened to Red Eagle and he held her for one last lingering kiss and departed over the brow of the hill.

For days White Fawn was disconsolate until one of the old women of the tribe told her that Red Eagle would not want a bride whose eyes were red with weeping. Then did White Fawn stir herself and once more she ranged the forest as was her wont and counted the days since Red Eagle had gone. Once, having crossed the river in her canoe, she sank to the ground and slept in the warm sunlight. There Marcel Rogers found her. Handsome in his uniform and with blonde hair shining in the sun, he looked down at the sleeping girl and kept a silent vigil until she awoke. Frightened she leaped up and would have darted into the woods had not Marcel assured her he meant no harm. Captivated by her beauty, Marcel lost his head and drew her into his arms. With a cry she broke from him, like a streak ran to her canoe and paddled off with firm swift strokes while the white man stood looking after her.

Days passed. White Fawn with aching heart crept beside the Roaring Waters and implored the Gods of the Waters to send Red Eagle back to her. Suddenly out of the clearing stepped Marcel and this time he did not let the girl he wanted go. Struggling against his vise-like arms, she kicked and bit and scratched, but at length she lost consciousness and he carried her off. Like one from whom life has gone, White Fawn huddled in the white man's hut and then came Red Eagle. With a cry she ran to him but with folded arms he pronounced, "They told me you had gone with white man. I did not believe. You did not wait at Roaring Waters." As she pleaded pitifully, he vanished into the forest. White Fawn crumpled upon the ground but as the white man caressed her, she broke from him with a moan and ran desperately toward the West. At Roaring Waters, White Fawn shot her last arrow into the oak. Red Eagle, unable to bear the thought of living without White Fawn returned to the white man's loathed dwelling and found him sitting drunkenly looking over women's pictures. "White Fawn went toward Roaring Waters," Marcel said thickly. Two arrows were in Red Eagle's quiver. One he sent winging into the heart of White Fawn's betrayer, the other he shot into the oak before he leaped into the Roaring Waters where moments before White Fawn, with a prayer that Red Eagle should forgive her, had thrown herself. There they were found, united in death, and the song of their people sang their love while the oak tree bore its inscription White Fawn—Red Eagle.

FOR THEIR SINS

Elizabeth Seigfried Drama File No. 9977

EVER since she could remember Joanna Stevens had seen her father come home in a blind, drunken fury each evening, pouring out abusive words about his wife, and his five children. A worker in a hat factory, when Mrs. Stevens had married him he had been a fine, loving husband, but soon after the birth of their first child he had turned to whiskey, and Joanna, the most independent of the children, often cried out to her older sisters, "Oh, why doesn't mother leave him?" As she grew older and was made to feel the scorn of her school mates, who had often seen Abe Stevens rolling in the gutter, she asked this question of her mother, who wearily replied, that she stayed only for the children's sake. When even the warning of the local police, who had been told by the neighbors of Stevens' cruelty, had no effect, Joanna, visiting her family doctor, obtained a medicine to cure the taste for liquor, and poured it into her father's evening coffee. Stevens, seized with violent pain, and imagining himself poisoned, demanded that a doctor and a priest be sent for, but Joanna revealed the true nature of the medicine.

It was a week before Stevens was able to leave his bed, and from then on he seemed a changed person. For two years the family was happy, and soon they were the proud owners of a modest home, but Mrs. Stevens seemed disturbed by a secret grief, which no amount of coaxing from Joanna could bring to light. Joanna, meanwhile, had found a position in a large real estate office, and one evening returned to their home to find it shattered by a bomb thrown by a group of racketeers invading the hat industry. Once again the Stevens were forced to begin life, but this time Abe Stevens turned back to drinking, and once more became the butt of the town's criticism.

Affairs at Joanna's office became strained, for the arrival of a new stenographer, Lillian Grayson, whose mother was reputed to be the mistress of the head of the firm, caused antagonism between the two girls. Denouncing Joanna as the daughter of a worthless drunkard, Lillian coaxed her sweetheart, the son of the president, to have Joanna fired.

Wretched and filled with hatred for her father, the author of all her misery, Joanna returned home dying. On her deathbed, she finally revealed her to find that her mother, who had been ill, was great secret—Lillian Grayson's father, whom the town believed dead, was really Abe Stevens. He had confessed this the night he thought he was going to die from the effects of the poison. As her mother breathed her last, Joanna swore to get even with Lillian, but when she learned that Lillian was to marry, she could not ruin her happiness. Soon after, the ravages of whiskey had their effect and Stevens was taken to the hospital by the manager of the factory, young Thane Cardigan. Joanna arrived too late, but Thane who had heard the whole story of Lillian Grayson, and Joanna's sacrifice, comforted Joanna, his eyes bespeaking a promise to make her future happy.

NO DEFENSE

Frank C. Biebl Drama File No. 10035

ALL Harold's life he has been kept in check by a miserly father, but when John Meyers dies he leaves a small fortune behind. Unaccustomed to the sudden wealth Harold, to the grief of his father's friends, good natured Carl and his nagging wife Emma who have been appointed guardians to the boy, becomes possessed with a sense of his own importance. Harold chooses Nora Jackson, haughty and lovely daughter of a farmer, to impress. But Nora plays the same game and when Harold has fallen in love with her she suddenly turns her affections to Mark McGibbons, son of the local banker. Harold is stunned at the thought that Nora dared to marry another when he loved her and sullenly takes to drink and gambling until Carl comes to his aid in time to save the last of his fortune. Awakened to his debt to the old people who have stood by him, Harold determines to make something of himself and show them and Nora that he is more than "a farmer with an inflated ego" as Nora had sarcastically dubbed him when he had pleaded his love and need of her. The old people weep happy tears when Harold to celebrate their anniversary takes them to town to a theater. But on the way home Harold says softly, "I could write a better play than that." Emma throws up her hands but Carl has faith in the boy. His first play sells and a market is created for his subsequent efforts.

Meanwhile Mark McGibbons inheriting his place in his father's bank becomes touched with the madness of speculation and soon is investing bank money in market flyers. Nora and Mark become wealthy only to fall the farther when the market crash sweeps away all their profits and the money entrusted to them. They move to a poorer section of a nearby town and Nora's sister Mary, young and desirable takes a position in a notorious cafe where her beauty brings her attention. However, she succumbs to the smooth line of Wren Palmer, a bootlegger, and soon is forced to beg Wren to marry her. Wren is cool in the face of Mary's entreaties and offers to send her to his cabin. However, realizing that the world must soon know her shame, Mary decides to commit suicide and she is rescued from the river by Harold who has gone on a fishing trip while he is planning his next novel. Touched by the plight of Nora's sister, and understanding Mary's fear of what Nora will do if she discovers Mary's condition, Harold offers to take Mary to a convent hospital where she can get the proper care. Mary, however, insists on going home for some things and Mark catching a glimpse of Mary getting into Harold's car believes the pair have eloped. When shortly after he sees Harold without Mary he and Nora believe that Harold has abducted Nora's sister to avenge himself. They bring him to trial and Harold goes to prison rather than betray Mary.

It is not until Mary is leaving the hospital that she discovers the harm she has caused Harold. She tells the whole truth, frees Harold and crying a little, accepts his offer of marriage.

DEPENDENT

Thomas G. Penn Drama File No. 10016

AS the belle of the small town in which she lived, Lillian Miller enjoyed the admiration of most of her fellow college students. Especially did she win the hearts of Robert Wills and John Dawson, bosom friends, but essentially different in character, for Bob was fun-loving, while John, was sedate and scholarly. Lillian had just decided to accept Bob, when his expulsion from college because of a rowdyish drinking party, caused her to swerve her affections to the more dependable John, who was overjoyed. The couple were married on the eve of their graduation from college, and seemingly, Bob was the first to offer his hearty congratulations.

The years that passed saw two happy events come to the Dawson home; John was made Secretary of the town's leading bank, and little John Jr. graduated high school, and entered the college that had sheltered his parents. Toward the end of his college term, John met Vivien, a lovely young social worker, and told of his love to Franklin Wills, Bob's nephew. Curious to meet the person John had described so glowingly Franklin accosted her at the charity bureau one day, and finding that he too cared for Vivien, his friendship with John was strained. A year after John's graduation, his father was shot while defending the bank against robbery, and the bank president offered John his father's position. As John was leaving one evening to see Vivien, a phone call from Bob Wills caused him to hurry to the Bank. There he was covered with guns by three masked men, forced to open the safe, and stay behind while his assailants escaped. With all evidence pointing towards him as a partner in the crime, for Wills had emphatically denied phoning John to meet him in front of the bank on urgent business John was given fifteen years imprisonment .

Again Mrs. Dawson's happiness was crushed, but she and Vivien believed in John's innocence. The sudden departure of Franklin from town and his return two years later, prosperous and anxious to marry her, led Vivien to suspect Franklin of the crime. Acting darlingly on this suspicion she phoned Bob Wills and told him to come immediately to her home for Franklin had some important news for him, then phoned the police and had them send two detectives to hide in the living room. Just before Wills arrived she called Franklin to come to see her. Confronting Wills with the supposed fact that Franklin had told her the whole story, she scared him into admitting that the bank robbery was planned by him and his nephew, but before the detective could rush in, Wills leaped into his car and drove furiously down the driveway. Franklin who was coming around the corner, crashed into him, and the two men were fatally injured. Armed with concrete evidence, Vivien secured John's pardon, and at last Mrs. Dawson was no longer dependent, for she had regained not only a son but a daughter.

HOTEL BUSINESS

Pauline Spicer Drama File No. 9827

WHEN Seth Brady died, his lawyer, Mr. Sims informed Brady's two son, Jack and George, that by the terms of their father's will, they were left considerable fortune, which Brady stipulated had to be used for business purposes. Both young men, following their separate interests left town, and George, settling in Harmon, in up state New York, established a small newspaper plant, while Jack bought a New York City hotel, and became its very efficient manager. As the years passed the two brothers lost touch with each other, but each knew of the other s success.

Meanwhile Dora Sims, the daughter of lawyer Sims was left an orphan, and seeking a job, found a position in a brokerage house. She had been there only a week when Stanley Bryant, secretary to the president of the firm, was discharged because he was suspected of embezzling the company's funds, although no definite proof could be found against him. As he walked out of the office haughtily, he collided with Dora, and although he hardly noticed her, she felt she could never forget his shrewd looking features.

Thrown out of her position because of her firm's bankruptcy, Dora wrote George Brady, who asked her to come to Harmon and work for him. Meanwhile, Bryant, who had sought shelter in Harmon, had obtained a position on George's paper, having charge of the magazine and book exchange section. For three months Dora did not catch sight of Bryant, but the day that George, who had fallen in love with her, told her that despite the doctor's order that he take a European trip, he hated to leave because the paper was losing money, Dora saw Bryant in the printing office. Recognizing him, she laid the paper's losses to him, and asked George to summon Bryant to his private office. Bryant, suspecting a trap, threw his clothes, together with some magazines, into a suitcase, and escaped to New York.

In the city, Bryant, knowing that the two brothers did not correspond, felt he could fleece Jack as he had George, and registered at the Moland, Brady's hotel. Learning that Jack Brady intended to leave for Europe that evening if he could find a manager for the hotel. Bryant bribed the bell hops to start a quarrel among themselves, and when Brady saw Bryant settle the dispute diplomatically, he was impressed with his ability, and hired him. With things working out as he had planned, Bryant helped Brady pack graciously offering him several of his own magazines.

Aboard ship, George, who had left for Europe, leaving his paper in Dora's care, met Jack, and seeing the magazines stamped with Bryant s name, instantly wired Dora to try to apprehend Bryant. Her blond hair effectively disguised in a brunette wig. Dora was engaged by Bryant as his secretary, and when she found checks forged with Jack Brady's name in the safe, she furnished the police with this concrete evidence of Bryant's guilt. The two brothers returned to New York on the next boat, and a week later Jack Brady smiled happily as he heard George and Dora fervently say, "I do!"

THE GLORIOUS DEFENSE

R. Alexander Bate Historical Drama File No. 10029

AS the soft strains of the music of Therese De Leyba's harp died away, Colonel George Rogers Clark, Commander of the American Forces in Kentucky and the Northwest, guest at the home of the Spanish Lieutenant Governor De Leyba, is persuaded to tell the story of how he conquered the British at Vincennes and then won the Indians' friendship. Later, in the glowing moonlit garden, Therese and Clark pledge their love, and Clark leaves for Cahokia to make a treaty with the Ottawas. Hardly has Clark accomplished this, through admirable strategy, when news is brought that the British, under Governor Hamilton, are again in possession of Vincennes. The redoubtable leader of the West leaves immediately for Vincennes, only stopping to bid farewell to Therese, still at her brother's home in St. Louis, and to tell her that he had a vision of her dressed in the garb of a nun.

Vincennes subdued, Clark, dining with the De Leybas and Governor Miro, leaves the hall with the ladies, giving Wilkinson, his rival a chance to hint that Western America should merge interests with Spain. When Wilkinson suggests that perhaps Clark is not so great, Clark's staunch supporters rise to defend him, but the conversation is interupted by the invasion of Indians who, entering the garden, fatally wound Don de Leyba, and escape. Therese, having to return with her sister-in-law to New Orleans leaves her lover with the hope that the Saints of Peace will guard him.

A few years later, at the home of Governor Miro in New Orleans, a conversation between the Governor and Wilkinson discloses that Clark, hoping to affect Detroit s subjugation found that because lies had been whispered about him he was unable to muster the necessary troops. Alone with the Governor, Wilkinson states that Clark, now become melancholy and disagreeable is losing his hold in the West, and Miro, taking the hint, agrees to grant Kentucky the use of Spanish ports if Wilkinson will ally himself with Spain.

Meanwhile Clark, still loyal to Virginia, makes peace with the Shawnee Indians, yet it is Wilkinson who is made Indian Commissioner. Anticipating Indian raids, Clark repelled the savages, his only thanks being polite words. Furious, he resigns, but to reward his troops he draws bills on the state of Virginia, which are never met. Ever honorable, Clark and his friends use their own estates to cash the bills, Clark being left penniless and disillusioned; moreover, all trace of Therese is lost, and Clark learns that the De Leyba family has been wiped out by the yellow plague. Hope gone, despair the keynote of his existence, he comes to New Orleans, and walks aimlessly by the walls of the Ursuline Convent. Suddenly the city is aflre, and Clark, scaling the steep walls to rescue the sisters, finds Therese, now a nun. After she tells him that lying tongues had made her believe him dead, he tells how a petition, forged with his friends' names had made Wilkinson Commissioner, and had insinuated that Clark was traitor to his country. He tells how the Government's failure to pay him for his years of military service or for his estate which had been given for the cause, had compelled his silence in love. Once again the lovers part, but this time with the promise of meeting soon in the land of eternity where gratitude is measured by His love.

THE FAIR SENORITA

Laurel J. Spitler Drama File No. 9903

UNTIL the coming of the avaricious Americans to the great West, the Chiquas, Spanish noblemen, had enjoyed their castles and splendors. Now, driven beyond the Rio Grande, only two of the royal family survived: an aristocratic old lady and her lovely young granddaughter Rosita. Within the breast of Rosita smouldered a hatred of Americans which her grandmother's stories had fostered and it was to carry on her own line intact that Rosita was to accept the advances of Miguel, scapegrace descendant of a family as old as her own. The day of her nineteenth birthday, a gay fiesta was to be given and Senora Chiquas planned for many days the preparations. At the last minute the proud old lady stamped her foot angrily as she realized that old Pedro had forgotten to bring Rosita's costume from the village. To reassure the old lady, Rosita insisted that she had something to get in town anyway and she would pick up the dress. But after an altercation with the costumer, Rosita prepared to leave only to discover that a sudden shower had come up. In the doorway she struggled with her parasol and as a young American stopped to inquire if he could help her, she gritted her teeth under her heavy veil and fairly shouted, "No. Go away." Amazed, Donald remained looking after the slim figure as it darted into the rain rather than share the doorway with him, and entering the costume shop Donald learned that was Senorita Rosita Chiquas, of royal descent. The heavy purse that Donald dangled sufficed to persuade the shopkeeper to give to Donald the costume which Miguel was to call for.

At the costume ball, Rosita gave most of her dances to the impetuous Donald who had persuaded his reluctant friend Joe Watson to come along. At unmasking time, Donald saw for the first time Rosita's lovely face and with a swift gesture swept her into his arms and kissed her. A growl of rage caused them both to turn and Rosita cried out, "Miguel! But I thought. . . . ' With the prop sword of his caballero costume, Donald warded off the vicious attack of Miguel, enraged at this usurper who had taken his costume and his intended bride and knocking the deadly sword Miguel wielded from his hands, Donald lightly kissed the speechless Rosita and vaulted the balcony. When Miguel regained his feet, his anger knew no bounds but when he roughly seized Rosita, she detached herself from his embrace and swiftly left him.

The next day while Rosita was riding in her coach, she was help up. Bandits forced old Pedro to drive his carriage over a cliff and the struggling girl was brought to a cave to discover her captor was Miguel, who, impatient of delays was showing his true colors. Meanwhile Donald had come to declare his love for Rosita and discovered from her distracted grandmother that Rosita had not yet returned. Pedro's broken body was discovered and he managed to gasp an account of what had happened before dying. With Joe Donald invaded Miguel's cave and this time in deadly combat left the bandit outstretched. Joe tied up Miguel and his followers and collected a reward out for their capture, while Rosita yielded to Donald's embrace and tenderly bound his wounded shoulder, souvenir of Miguel's treachery.

BRIAR VALLEY

Mrs. W. R. Covan Drama File No. 9960

BRIAR VALLEY, Virginia, was just over the Mason-Dixon line, and the Ellisons, who sided with the North, had many bitter quarrels with their neighbors, the Grimes', who expressed strong Southern sentiments. Grandma Ellison, kindly ruler of the Ellison home, leaned across her supper table one evening and said emphatically that something ought to be done about the way Mrs. Grimes and her two sons treated Janie, the step-daughter! As if she had been listening outside, Janie, scarcely more than a child, but already burdened with many sorrows, ran in to Grandma crying pitifully that she could not stand watching the cruel treatment to which the Grimes' slaves were subjected. Comforting her, Grandma took the overwrought girl out to the porch. As they sat there, their conversation was interrupted by the pleasant voice of Lewie, the goods peddler, who had never had the courage to approach the Grimes' home with his wares. The keen sighted old lady saw that the two young people were instantly attracted to each other, and when Janie was ready to go, Lewie went back with her.

Although threats of war caused the Grimes to be surly toward the Northern peddler, Lewie continued to visit Janie, and Mr. Grimes, a helpless invalid, enraged at the cruelty of his wife and step sons, threatened to leave his fortune to Janie if she married Lewis. One memorable evening, Lewis left Janie never to return again. Vividly remembering the bloodhounds' cries on the Grimes' plantation that last night, she accused her brothers of murdering Lewie. Their scornful laughs drove her from the house, but hardly had she stumbled a few feet along in the darkness, when "Pa" Ellison, galloping up on his horse, cried out, "It's war!"

War time excitement prevented her from going to the constable. A week later, she met a Northern spy, Landor Stewart, who assured by the Ellisons of Janie's Northern sympathies, begged her to introduce him as a Confederate soldier. Agreeing, Janie brought Stewart home with her, feigning intense dislike. Stewart disclosed to her that the purpose of his mission was to discover if Grimes' knew anything of the telegraphic messages that were going from the Valley to the North. Welcomed cordially by the Grimes', and billetted there, he found his sleep disturbed by the howling of the dogs. Believing his clue lay in their kennels, he bribed a slave to go to the Ellisons. The Grimes', thinking a slave had escaped, released the dogs to pursue the fugitive. Seizing the opportunity, Stewart searched the kennels, finding a complete telegraphic outfit, and also the carpet bag of materials that poor Lewis had carried. When the Grimes' returned, they were arrested by Stewart's assistants, who had been hiding at the Ellisons, and taking Janie in his arms, Stewart vowed to win peace for her.

THE GREATER INHERITANCE

Benny F. Feria Drama File No. 9898

AS Bernc looked out across the Pacific from the deck of the Philippine bound boat, he wondered what changes had been wrought during his four years' stay in the United States. His welcome arrival, and the earnest greetings of his father, old Bonifacio, convinced him that affairs were running smoothly at home. The next day he was introduced to their new neighbor, a young woman who had been left in full charge of her small plantation at the death of her father.

A sudden call from Cuba, where Bonifacio had business interest necessitated a trip to that country. On the day of his departure, the old man called in Berne, and revealed to him a plan he had cherished for a long time. Berne was to be given a fertile track of hemp-planted land, and a thousand dollars, and his management of both would show whether he was deserving of a far greater gift. Wondering, Berne accepted his duty, and as he waved farewell to his father, he determined to prove himself worthy.

Bonifacio had specified that one Miguel, a leader among the peons, was to be in charge of the plantation, and for the first three months, affairs progressed splendidly, giving Berne ample time for frequent visits to Mary, his nearest neighbor. She, too, was an efficient manager, winning the love of the natives with her sympathetic understanding. But Berne, leaving all in the hands of the capable Miguel, hardly listened to the peons, and was unaware that urged by Miguel, they were turning against him.

In the autumn, Berne and Mary stood near his warehouse, watching the first crop of hemp being tied into bales, ready for shipment, and both were proud of their achievements. During the night Berne, awakened by the sound of loud cries, ran from the house, the red-streaked sky telling him that his warehouse, holding the precious hemp, was aflame. Too late to stop the fire's course, he stood there, the picture of defeat, as his precious labor was destroyed. He judged his workers harshly, and convinced of his failure, neglected his plantation, never dreaming of Miguel's deceit. Mary found him one day in the town cafe, half-drunk, and furious, she taunted him with his apathy, remarking that she, a mere woman, had succeeded, where he had given up without half trying. Stung to the quick, he returned to the plantation, announced he was going on a business trip, camped secretly near the work quarters, and discovered that Miguel had incited the men.

The next morning he placed his foreman in chains, appealing earnestly for the confidence and co-operation of his men. When his father returned the plantation was in the best condition, with Mary and he planning to combine their business and heart interests. And after Senor Bonafacio confessed that he had ordered Miguel s actions only to test his son's character, he gave the couple their greater inheritance his affection and faith.

THE LAWS OF MAN

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 9908

SANDRA PHILLIPS was born during a raging snow storm in a Northwestern state, and her mother was fond of remarking that Sandra's life was as irregular and stormy as a blizzard. When she graduated public school, Sandra came home to find her mother in the arms of a stranger, and from that day, Sandra confided to her bosom friend, Rose, that she hoped her own life would be more peaceful than her too modern mother's. The excitement caused by Tom Phillips' suing his wife for divorce, gave Sandra an opportunity to induce her mother to let her leave high school and study music.

At sixteen, Sandra, already known for her pianistic efforts, fell madly in love with her staid music teacher, Jan Eckhard, fifteen years her senior, and recklessly promised to marry him. Jan proud of his talented pupil, sent her to a neighboring city to give a concernt, and aboard the train the hot-headed Sandra met Craig Wattell, a young high-powered salesman, who swept the romantic child off her feet. A hasty elopement followed. Sandra forgetting her promise to Eckhard. For almost a year, marriage was as peaceful as Sandra had fondly hoped it would be, but the frequent out of town trips of Craig led her to discover his infidelity. Disgusted, she knew the first break down of her ideals, and divorced him, returning to her home town. Renewing her acquaintance with Eckhard, who had forgiven her, Sandra felt she had found happiness at last when they were quietly married. Her content was spoiled slightly by the faet that Jan's mother, a querulous woman had come to live with them, but she still felt that Jan was a splendid husband, until, returning unexpectedly from an extravagant shopping spree, she overheard Jan tell Mrs. Eckhard that he had married only to avenge the broken promise. Stung, Sandra refused to believe, her ears, but when Jan treated her cruelly and stinted miserably on her allowance, she again obtained a divorce.

Thoroughly disillusioned, Sandra confided to the placidly married Rose, that hereafter, she would be just as heartless as men were. A job as a pianist in a night club led to her marriage with Leo Carlson, the owner, with Sandra determined to get all she could from her unscrupulous husband. As the hostess of the club she gained a reputation for a hard, brittle charm, and only Ray Mallison a despondent neer-do-well suspected the sweetness underlying her nature when he met her in the park one day giving eandy to a group of children. Feeling drawn toward Ray, Sandra hid her feelings, but Leo, insanely jealous of his attractive wife, won the friendship of Ray, with the intention of making him a dope addict. Sandra, discovering in Leo's room the packets of dope addressed to Ray forgot her resolution, rushed to Ray, and begged him to leave the city. "Only if you come with me—we can find happiness in each other," whispered Ray, and once again Sandra, divorced, remarried, but this time with a promise of faith and devotion singing in her heart.

GOLD CHAINS

Wynne Davidson Drama File No. 9828

IN bewilderment Rose looked after her friend Janet who introduced her curtly with, "See that my cousin Jim has a good time in town, Rose, won't you?" and walked rapidly away. "I'll try not to be too much trouble," Jim said, and a deep blush dyed Rose's cheeks. As they walked along together, embarrassed by their introduction, their conversation started lamely. Jim told Rose he had gotten a position as clerk in the library, but he was ambitious for a better position. Before they reached Rose's home, she had discovered that he was fond of music and when she invited him to use her piano anytime he wanted their friendship was cemented.

Jim formed the habit of dropping into Rose's house to play duets with her and their laughter resounded through the house until Rose's father began to inquire into the matter and finding that Jim was only an obscure library clerk informed his daughter that he wouldn't have her bringing a nobody into his house like that. It would be all right, he said, if Jim had money, but he had given his daughter every advantage—schooling, music, and he expected her to marry a rich man. No, Jim could not use his piano any more. With downcast eyes. Rose told Jim that their music hours would have to end. For a moment he looked at her as if he would say something, then he lifted his hat and left her suddenly. For days Rose waited for him to call and realized that although Jim had always regarded her as just Janet's friend and a charming companion, she had fallen in love with him. Rose waited for Janet to say something, and at last, swallowing her pride went to the library to see Jim. To her astonishment she found a new man working there and learned that Jim had been fired the day she told him he couldn't play at her house any more. She blushed scarlet as its occurred to her that he thought she said that after learning he was jobless. From Janet Rose learned that Jim had gone back to his home town.

Weeks slipped by. Rose was excited about the annual Granger dance, the first she had ever attended. Startled she looked up to find Janet whispering that her cousin Jim was present, but when happily, Rose looked into Jim's eyes, she turned pale at the realization that he was introducing her to Pansy, a lovely little red head. As they danced together. Rose felt an aching in her heart at his nearness and he told her how he missed her companionship. He was now employed as manager in the store of Pansy's father, and they were to be married within the month. With Janet Rose attended the wedding and among the other guests waited in wonder at the delayed ceremony. A ripple of chatter spread through the crowd as it became evident that the bride wasn't coming—that she had eloped with another man. Tears came to Rose's eyes for the man she loved.

Six weeks passed. Jim neither came to town nor wrote. Then came a letter saying he would be in town, might he drop in to play some music with her as they once had. Rose was shocked at seeing Jim's haggard face and as they played together she rejoiced that he was forgetting his worries in his interest in the music. For a year they saw each other regularly. Then one day Pansy came back, swathed in furs. For a moment Jim trembled then he smiled. As they neared Rose's house his hand tightened on her arm. "Rose," he began. "I know, Jim," she said and their lips met in a long kiss.

THE UNSEEN

Blanche L. H. Sanborn, M .D. Drama File No. 10015

AT college the most glorious moments Annabel had were those accompanying Eugene Mervin while he played his inspired violin. Then, during one of their hours together while playing Traumerei, a telegram came for Gene telling him that his father, having lost all his money had dazedly walked into a car and been killed and the shock had given his mother a paralytic stroke which confined her to a wheel chair. As a result, Gene had left college and had undertaken the support of his mother through giving violin lessons. Annabel frequently visited the Mervins at their home and their duets continued but now Gene never spoke of love, feeling that he had no right to ask her to marry him until he could provide for her as well as his mother.

Meanwhile, aseribing Gene's reserve to indifference, Annabel found others ready to lavish attention upon her. Foremost among her admirers was Clarence O'Connor, handsome and ruthless, who, finding Annabel the first woman to resist him was determined to have her even if it meant marriage. Planning to intoxicate her with the soft lights and music of a dance in her honor, Clarence congratulated himself as Annabel seemed to quicken to his admiration, but as he led her upon the terrace in accordance with his plans, the orchestra struck up Traumerei, and before he could stop her, she had fled.

A few months later, Gene received notice that he had won first prize in a national music composition contest. With joy in his heart he rushed to Annabel's house and for the first time dared speak his love and won her consent to be married in a month. As he left the house, Clarence saw his happiness and brooded over it. Ascribing his success to the psychology lecture of a splendid woman physician, Gene begged Dr. Sauverne to examine his mother and learned that with the will to recover Mrs. Mervin might yet be cured. Her paralysis was the result of a great emotional shock and treatment including regular massages was begun.

While on a visit to Bridget, a former maid, now ill, Annabel was told the story of Alice Vane, Bridget's room mate, who, betrayed by a lover, was dying unattended. Clarence inquiring the cause of Annabel's despondency heard the story and started for it was he, under an assumed name, who had made love to the pretty girl. Promising to marry her, Clarence called upon Alice, gave her money to go to Arizona and had her write two letters one ambiguous one to Annabel telling her the man Annabel loved was the one who had deceived Alice, and the other asking Gene to come to Bridget's apartment to see a former pupil. To Annabel, Gene's presence in Bridget's room was proof that Gene had been Alice's betrayer, and she refused to listen to explanations. However, Gene succeeded in convincing Bridget of his innocence and finally traced Alice in time to bring her back to right the wrong done. At the same time, Mrs. Mervin, touched by her son's grief walked across the room to comfort him and effected her own cure. Alice went to her rest but not before she had accused Clarence, and Annabel, clasped in Gene's arms, found forgiveness for doubting.

DOUBLE LIFE

Agnes Moen Drama File No. 10005

UPON his twenty-first birthday, Harry Rogan is summoned to his uncle Stephen's office and is told for the first time about his origin. Years before, Stephen and his brother Grant, Harry's father, had arrived together from England. Inseparable, and enjoying a companionship rare among brothers, they had gone into business together and had thoughts only for each other until Lucy had come into their lives. Then the two of them had fallen in love with the same girl and when Lucy chose Grant, Stephen had felt such bitterness toward his brother that they had parted enemies and Grant and Lucy had gone on to Nebraska where Lucy had inherited a large farm. Some years had passed and Grant had written asking Stephen to drop their enmity. Lucy had died in child-birth and he, himself was dying from an incurable illness. Touched, Stephen wrote asking Grant to come to Boston, but it was too late Grant had gone to his rest, Unable to make the trip himself at the time, Stephen had sent his lawyer, Walters, to arrange matters and send his nephew to him. The business matters completed, Walters sent Harry on East with a nurse, while he remained to visit some friends in the vicinity. However, in a train accident the lawyer Walters was killed. Now, at twenty-one Harry was to go West to claim his patrimony.

Arriving at the farm his father had left him, Harry was immediately attracted to Elise Arvold, daughter of the tenant but she shrank from his greeting and immediately called her father who lost his temper when Harry mentioned the lease. At the bank, Harry was greeted by the president but when he attempted to draw money he was informed firmly that his account had been withdrawn as he should well know. Amazed by the insistence of apparently level headed people that he had conducted all negotiations himself, Harry returned to the Arvold farm. Unable to understand why Elise avoided him, Harry left and as he reached the road a bullet whizzed uncomfortably close. Startled, he shrank into a bush and waited for several minutes before he slipped away from his would-be assassin. Determined to see the matter through without alarming his uncle, Harry again called upon the bank president and was politely but firmly told that unless he ceased his demands for more money he would be committed to prison.

That night walking down toward his hotel, Harry saw a figure rise and take aim. Instantly he shot, wounding his assailant, who to his amazement, resembled him identically. Questioning the wounded man, Harry received the startling information that the man was Harry Rogan. In the hospital, however, he learned the truth. The unscrupulous Walters, finding twin sons, and realizing that Stephen did not suspect had pretended to be killed in a crash while he raised one of the boys to control the property and then had planned to kill the Eastern-bred boy by poisoning Henry's mind against his brother. The lawyer was imprisoned, the brothers were reconciled, and Harry brought Elise east as his bride.

ALIMONY

Theodore Castle Drama File No. 9956

BORN in a small Northwestern town, Ted Hastings grows up in desolate surroundings. His father is a stern man with a violent temper, always venting his rage on Mrs. Hastings, a devoted and courageous mother who is ill from overwork and abuse. From childhood Ted knows that he must make his own way in life, and at nine he is selling pop corn and newspapers, running home to give his money to his mother. At twelve, passing as sixteen, he obtains a job as call boy on the state railroad, and his work introduces him to gambling resorts and saloons. Anxious to make extra money, he plays poker and drinks with the older men, yet, the fine spirit of his mother rises within him, and he remains free from the contamination of a life of dissipation. During this time, he often tells his half-sister, Rose, that his one ambition in life is to have a wife and a family, that he can raise in the proper environment, shielding them from the maltreatment and privation he himself has known.

Adventurous and eager to better himself, he journeys to Canada where Rose, now married lives, and at sixteen works there for several months, until, with the beginning of the war, he leaves for Chicago. Meanwhile, his mother has died from tuberculosis, and returning with his father, who seems to have become less harsh, Ted settles again in the town of his birth. Caught in a storm with an old friend, Edna Rennock, whose parents have made her live a narrow, cloistered life, Ted marries Edna to appease Mr. Rennock's wrath.

With the responsibility of marriage upon him, Ted scrupulously abandons his gambling, dancing and drinking and devotes himself to his home, but Edna, drunk with her first taste of freedom, changes from a quiet, serious girl to a hardened, dissipated wife, who does not hesitate to run about with married men. Neglecting her two children, Billy and Jane, Edna, despite the pleadings of her horrified husband, has an affair with Stan Naylor, and although she attempts to prevent the birth of her child, Nina is born. Despite his knowledge that the child is not his, Ted lavishes upon it a deep affection, still trying to give the children a happy home life.

Acused by her husband of her excesses, Edna leaves home taking with her the children and files divorce papers. Ted, patient and worthy, lives only for the visits to his children, and when Jane begs to live with him, he cannot resist her childish pleas. A divorce action, with the Judge knowing that Nina is not Ted's child, results in the awarding of Billy and Jane to Ted, and Nina to Edna. Stung with the injustice of the decision, Ted, seeing that Edna's immoral living will harm little Nina, refuses to pay for the child's support unless she is awarded to his care. Meanwhile, although disgusted with all womanhood, Ted meets Arden, and with her finds the first happiness he has ever known. Courageous and loving, Arden helps her husband fight for Nina, and in a sensational trial Ted proves overwhelmingly that Edna is not only unfit to have the child, but had passionately wished her unborn. Yet, such is the law that Ted has no claim to another's child, and Edna emerges the triumphant possessor of the child she despises leaving Ted, with Arden and a group of lawyers who sympathize with his cause, to vow that he will devote himself to crusading for better divorce and alimony laws.

THE WATER-WAGON

Antonio J. Amorin Drama File No. 10063

COUNTLESS women have married men in the hope of reforming them. But at her own wedding, Edna realized with horror that her big handsome bridegroom Mark had had so much to drink that he threatened at any moment to fall to the floor and scandalize the guests. But Edna, having made her choice determined to stand by it, and kissing her daughter Lucille, by an earlier marriage, good-bye, she left on a honeymoon whose first step was to sober up the groom. Mark's contrition when he realized how he had hurt Edna compensated somewhat for her misery and when they returned to the little farm that he had bought for them, their happiness made them the envy of their neighbors. Only the more sceptical of the observers predicted that sooner or later Mark would go back to his first love—drink.

For two years they enjoyed prosperity. A warm bond of friendship sprang up between Mark and his step-daughter Lucille, and as for Edna, she loved her husband with a devotion that remained steadfast even after Mark had lost his farm through a succession of bad breaks. Taking Lucille with them, Mark and Edna left for the city and took a small apartment. Then began a long search for work. Mark wouldn't hear of Edna or even Lucille going to work, insisting that just as soon as he got a position he could provide for them properly. Huge, brawny and ambitious, Mark, standing in line with a hundred applicants for a railroad position was chosen by young Leonard, foreman. Within a few weeks Mark had proved the stuff he was made of and he was promoted to engineer. Then one day Edna stopped to pick up her father in her Ford. Mark speaking to Leonard introduced the two young people and soon a friendship had grown up between them. However, too much good fortune had gone to Mark's head. Once, with a group of friends he stopped off for a drink and soon he had fallen into his old habits. Only the prompt action of Leonard saved Mark from walking in the path of a train, and his recklessness in running his engine brought frequent warnings. However, when, after one drink too many Mark rammed his train into another, Leonard realizing that Mark thought he could get away with coming drunk because Leonard was in love with Lucille, fired him. In the argument that followed Mark blackened Leonard's eye and ordered him to stay away from Lucille. Both Edna and her daughter stood by Mark now that he was jobless but, unable to find work, Mark became despondent and sought consolation in drink. Fiery-eyed, he arrived home to find Leonard seeing Lucille. He ordered the boy from his house and Lucille turned upon him. While her mother pleaded with her not to cause an argument, Lucille lashed Mark with her words, told him how he had let them down and all the fight went out of Mark. Quietly he told her she was right and he knew she couldn't find a better man than Leonard. At his step-daughter's marriage, Mark with his arm about Edna, refused to touch a drop, and Leonard accepting the congratulations of Mark said that he had heard that Mark's position was still available if he wanted it.

GETTING EVEN

Mrs. L. D. Brazelton Drama File No. 9716

WHEN friends of Bruce Stephens, the aged president of the town bank, saw how the finances of the bank were slowly sinking, they advised him to engage Jerry Braker, a successful young business man from a neighboring city, as manager. Although Linda Stephens saw that with Jerry's coming, the bank's affairs were greatly improved, she distrusted this glib man and his flashy wife, and when, to every one's astonishment, a run on the bank proved that the funds were insufficient. Linda felt Jerry had something to do with the failure, although Mr. Stephens insisted she was mistaken. Broken by the ruin of his one interest in life, and ashamed of the pitying stares of his friends, Stephens committed suicide, leaving Linda a note which stated that she would find $50,000 worth of securities in his vault, when Linda discovered that the box was empty, her suspicions of Jerry were reborn, and although burning with a determination to avenge her father's death, and make Jerry suffer, she was careful to show no change in her attitude toward the Brakers and their year-old baby, whom they idolized.

Taking into her confidence the aged caretakers of her home, Mr. and Mrs. Silber, who were blindly devoted to her, she made them promise to do anything she asked. Although reluctant, they watched Linda, disguised in a red wig, and gaudy attire, take a room in a disreputable neighborhood, and then search the waterfront cafes for a man to help her in her scheme for revenge. In Bill Strausler, who had lost faith in humanity because of a woman's infidelity, she found a willing accomplice, and with him she planned to kidnap the Broker baby. Meanwhile, something happened which Linda had not anticipated. Falling in love with Bill who knew her as Peggy, she posed as a maid in her own home, and allowed him to come there to see her. With him she planned the kidnapping for the eve of Mrs. Braker's dance, and that night escorted by Jerry, whom she had deliberately ensnared in a love affair she danced at the Braker home. Leaving the ball room, she went to the baby's room, and left the window open for Bill; then, returning to the dance, she flirted openly with the infatuated Jerry, while Bill kidnapping the baby, took it to the Stephens home, where Mrs. Silber put it in a specially prepared attic room.

A month later, Linda, observing the genuine anguish of the Brakers and their frantic efforts to trace the baby, finally sent Mrs. Braker a note, saying that if Jerry would give Bill $50,000 in securities the baby would be returned. Jerry, realizing that this would mean discovery of his unscrupulous part in the bank failure and his robbery of Mr. Stephens' money, hesitated, but when his wife threatened to reveal his affair with Linda, and ruin him socially, he paid the ransom to Bill, who, as instructed, took the money to the Stephens home. There, to his amazement, he was ushered into the living room by Mrs. Silber and greeted cordially by Linda. Perplexed he asked to speak to Peggy and when Linda, going out into the hall, called to him in Peggy's high voice, he realized the deception. Revealing the reason for her desire for revenge, Linda then swept away Bill's hesitation to accept her love, by reminding him, that as they had both known enough sorrow, they should try to seek happiness together. Taking her in his arms, Bill regained his lost faith, and Linda her lost love.

THE SHADOW BETWEEN

Lena Giambra Drama File No. 9912

IN celebration of their fifth wedding anniversary, Enrico takes his wife Linda and child Jeanette to hear "Madame Butterfly" as sung by the great soprano, Maria. Rejoicing in her happy marriage, Linda does not suspect that her husband is becoming infatuated with Maria and in the weeks that follow when Enrico finds his business calling him to town more and more frequently, no shadow of doubt crosses Linda's mind. Then the blow descends. Returning home from her marketing, Linda finds everything in disarray. Puzzled she notes that all her husband's things are missing and at last she finds his note leaving her a few dollars and telling her he has left her for another woman. Exposed to the pity and curiosity of the townspeople, Linda fills her heart with hate against Enrico and desiring only to get away from the scene of her unhappiness she takes Jeanette with her and migrates to America.

All softness gone now, Linda invests her small capital in a dress business and her nimble fingers soon win her many patrons. Her shop expands and she is able to send Jeanette to good schools. At college Jeanette meets Carl, a fine lad who falls in love with her and becomes a frequent visitor at her home. Often he arranges theater dates for Jeanette and for her mother and one night he surprises them with tickets for the opera, "Madame Butterfly."

As the music starts, Linda remembers the fatal night when Enrico took her to hear the beautiful music and the memory is so unbearable that pleading an excuse she hurries out. In her flight, however, she is seen by Enrico, now a broken figure, who has come to America in an attempt to trace his wife and child and plead forgiveness. He too, remembering their last happy evening together, has come to hear the music. With a cry he rushes after her and as she gets into a cab, he spends the last of his money to follow her to her door. There in the street, Enrico pleads with Linda to forgive him, but turning from him harshly, she closes the door between them. Enrico sends notes, letters, waits for her, but unable to move her he resorts to a last desperate remedy, feeling that if he can once get her alone she will hear him out and be touched by his professions of love. Therefore, when next he sees her he kidnaps her and carries her to a shack. There he pleads with her, telling her that it was not Maria he loved, it was the glamor, but even his stories of how he has spent his fortune trying to find her have no effect upon Linda, and realizing he has failed he brings her back. But hate has made Linda hard and she prefers charges against her abductor and Enrico is thrown into jail.

Only then do Jeanette and Carl learn that it is Enrico who has abducted Linda. Taught by her mother to hate her father, Jeanette is convinced that her mother is right, but Carl is shocked and it is he who induces the girl to see her father and hear his side of the case.

Touched by his suffering, Jeanette returns to Linda and after many hours persuades her to drop the charges against her husband. "You could not hate him so if you did not love him," she cries, and tears drop from Linda's eyes. At last she is persuaded to forgive Enrico, and Carl and Jeanette, seeing their happiness, softly shut the door and leave them together.

THOSE WHO WAIT

Anna Rome Drama File No. 10013

VERY much in love with Bob, a young lawyer, Dorothy thinks he is being unreasonable when he tells her he doesn't trust her employer, Jack Tappe. Dorothy defends Tappe, saying that he has always been a perfect gentleman, but when Bob leaves angrily, Dorothy, to appease him, resigns. Tappe tells her that he will find it difficult to find as capable a secretary and offers to raise her salary if she will stay, but Dorothy declines. However, when he asks if she will break in a new secretary, she thinks it only fair to comply. That night, Jack calls her and tells her that the new girl has gotten everything mixed up and unless Dorothy can help him he will lose an important contract. Believing that she will return in time to keep her date with Bob for the evening, Dorothy goes to Tappe's apartment only to realize when he seizes her in his arms and tells her he can't go on without her, that she has walked into a trap. She struggles desperately and Jack curses under his breath when a knock sounds at the door. Shoving her into an inner room, he admits a raging woman who demands to know who the girl is in the bedroom. Jack tries to quiet her and when she draws a gun he reaches for it and in the struggle he kills the woman and flees. The hotel manager breaks in and Dorothy is found in the room with the murdered woman. The evidence is all against her, and although Bob at first is overcome by the realization that Dorothy has been found in Tappe's apartment he offers to defend her. In a brilliant speech he convinces judge and jury that Dorothy is innocent and after several hours of debate and deadlock the jury comes in with a verdict of "Not Guilty!" Bob takes Dorothy into his arms and kisses her wet eyes.

The newspapers carry on a headline search for Jack Tappe while the sob sisters devote columns to the romance of Dorothy and Bob, and the plans for their wedding occupies page one for days. Dorothy shudders at thought of Tappe still at large, but Bob assures her they are safe from him although in his heart he is not so sanguine. The day of the wedding, Bob is kidnapped and as Dorothy nervously paces her room in her bridal gown, she receives a note purporting to come from Bob telling her he believes it would be better for them to get away from the crowd. His car, the note says, is waiting downstairs. Nervously, Dorothy runs down to the car but as a gun digs in her side she looks in terror into the insane face of Jack Tappe. "You thought you could get away!" he cries. "You're mad to attempt this," Dorothy whispers, but he forces her into a shack and tells her that if she attempts to resist him he will drop the trapdoor, and Bob will be hanged. Dorothy shudders at sight of Bob bound with a rope around his neck, and she pretends to yield but the moment Jack believes her, she seizes his gun and holding him at bay, phones the police. She doesn't dare to move, for fear the madman will spring, and the police enter and lead Jack away for the murder of the woman, while Dorothy finds protection in the arms of her Bob.

ONE HOUR ONLY

Genevieve Carlson Drama File No. 9751

IN the office of Rufus Brook, Mrs. Lowell mortgages her home to raise five hundred dollars. When her son Leon comes in downcast because he is unable to earn enough money in the small town to marry Doris Miller whom he loves, Mrs. Lowell induces Leon to accept the money so that he may find greater opportunities in the city.

Leon's sister Erma, married and harrassed by two very spoiled children, opposes the plan, telling Leon he can work in her husband's garage, but Mrs. Lowell insists that her son have every advantage. As the train pulls out, Leon waves good-bye to his mother and Doris and sees them walk slowly back home.

In New York Leon, looking over the want ads finds an opportunity for a young man of pleasing personality and business ability who can invest five hundred dollars. Impressed by the small factory which is struggling through its first period of placing a new invention on the market, Leon soon, through hard work and a natural aptitude for selling has the factory doing a thriving business. When the president of the company invites the boy to his home, Leon is abashed by the attention of Marian, his daughter. Beautiful, imperious, she is so utterly different from anyone he has ever met before that he becomes infatuated and her slightest wishes are Leon's commands. While in his office one day Leon receives a letter from his mother begging him to help her pay Rufus Brock before he forecloses her home. Leon, having just bought a diamond watch for Marian wonders how he can raise the money immediately but the telephone cuts into his thoughts, and when Marian petulently reminds him that he has promised to go to lunch with her, Leon goes. The letter is forgotten.

When Leon does send the money it is too late. Rufus has foreclosed and Mrs. Lowell has been forced to live with Erma whose drunken husband and quarrelsome children are a great trial to her. Erma has neglected her mother's fever-bright cheeks and when Mrs. Lowell stands long hours washing the children's clothes she develops pneumonia. Leon's money goes for doctor bills and drugs and Doris comes over to help. Distractedly Erma sends a letter to Leon telling him that mother is ill and that she cannot risk exposing her children. Getting the note the night that Marian has planned to announce their engagement at a formal dinner party, Leon rushes into a cab, seeks out Marian, and tells her he has to go to his mother. Selfishly, she demands that he stay with her and not spoil her party. Leon begins to protest but as Marion's arms steal about his neck he consents hesitatingly. As the evening progresses Leon feels as though an icy hand is gripping his throat and at last he can stand it no longer. Marian is furious with him and tells him if he leaves their engagement will be broken and he need never return. He reaches his sister's home only to learn that his mother has died one hour ago. Leon sinks beside her bed and gives way to unutterable grief. At last he arises and dazedly walks down the road to his mother's cottage, which stands empty and gaunt, the yard overgrown with weeds. Doris, coming down the street sees him enter and coming softly to the door, sees him, face buried in his hands. She pulls up a small stool and tries to comfort him and at last they arise and walk arm in arm down the path to the river, reunited in their sorrow.

UNEASY CROWNS

Clarence Kay Drama File No. 9930

THE twins sons of King Arthur, alike in appearance, differed greatly in character. Hippias, born an hour earlier, wept when his brother tortured the white rabbits that ran about the royal garden, and with his deft surgeon's fingers, the boy bound the broken legs. At military training Hannibal excelled, and his vicious attacks on the dummy soldiers won the applause of his stern father and exchanged whispers from the officers of the king's guard who told each other the boy was thirsty for blood. When, however, Hippias rebelled against learning methods of exterminating people and proclaimed that the royal family would do better to learn statesmanship, he incurred the wrath of his father. It was Hannibal who insinuated that if Hippias gained the throne he would soon lose the kingdom because he had no faith in military tactics, and Arthur, succumbing to the fawning of Hannibal agreed to send Hippias far away where he could study medicine and give up his claim to the royal succession.

At school Hippias distinguished himself and once Carolyn, one of his compatriots visited a hospital and stopped in amazement at sight of the King of her country giving medical attention to a charity case. She bowed before him and surprised he raised her to her feet and explained that he was Hippias, not Hanibal. Carolyn returned soon to her people but the thought of Hippias was with her ever. Meanwhile, Hannibal had subtly poisoned his father and succeeding him to the throne had begun a reign of terror. Living in splendor at the expense of his overtaxed subjects, Hannibal exacted a tribute of the loveliest girls in the land and when anyone dared to object he was immediately tortured and put to death. In her own home, Carolyn dared to protest against the tyrant and to tell her frightened people about Hippias so different from his brother. Then one day the King saw Carolyn and demanded that she be given to him. The soldiers killed her mother who dared to protest and Carolyn was carried to the palace. Meanwhile, Hippias, in love with Carolyn followed her to his own country and arrived to find that his brother had seized her. Hurrying to the palace he found Hannibal pretending hospitality. However, suspecting, he put a dummy in his bed and saw his brother, whom he now knew was mad, stab the recumbent figure with a poisoned sword. The next morning Hippias came to breakfast claiming an insect had stung him, and Hannibal knowing the poison to be deadly trembled. In the darkest dungeon, Hippias found his brother's victims and horror rose in him. When, however, Hannibal laid violent hands upon Carolyn, Hippias broke into the room. With insane strength, Hannibal struck him and raced to the turret as he heard his rebelling subjects march upon the palace. The rebels seized Hippias and would have killed him had not Carolyn stayed them and explained that Hippias was not the man they wanted. In the turret Hannibal waiter with bombs and would have thrown them had not Hippias' rush made him step backwards to his death in the moat. Then Hippias was crowned king and with Carolyn as his bride ruled both wisely and well.

ONE NIGHT'S MYSTERY

Frances B. Lynn Drama File No. 9935

AS the farm community of Red Oak stood before town hall, listening to the memorial day services for the war dead, many an eye turned toward George Reid, who, with his son Mark, paid silent tribute to George Reid, Jr. killed in the war. In answer to his daughter Helen's whispered question, Mr. Day, one of Red Oak's most respected citizens, explained that after his eldest son's death Reid abandoned his Red Oak farm, and moved to Leesport, fifty miles away, where he and Mark kept a general store. As if sensing that he was being discussed, Mark raised his head and his troubled gaze met the lovely eyes of Helen Day, who blushed and turned quickly toward her invalid mother.

Returning home that evening after the ceremony, Mr. Day was called back to town, and left his daughter Helen reading to her mother. A sudden storm had blown up, and Mrs. Day remarked that she felt something strange was about to happen. To soothe her mother's nerves Helen quickly swerved the conversation to pleasanter topics, casually mentioning that she had rather liked Mark Reid. As Mrs. Day teased her daughter she gazed out the window, and then uttered a long, piercing scream, and fell to the floor. Helen was able to catch a glimpse of a white eery face pressed against the glass, and an upraised arm with a knife, dripping blood. A few minutes later her father returned and hardly had the two woman finished telling the story, when a phone call from their neighbors told them that the strange figure had frightened them, too, and that the Brown's dog was found dead. Because of the storm, Mr. Day decided that a search for the intruder would be futile, and the next morning he and his neighbors set forth, their trail leading to an old stone quarry, where someone had evidently pitched camp the night before. Returning that evening with three men, Mr. Day stationed them at the entrance of the quarry, remaining until morning, without any results.

Helen, visiting friends in Leesport, told of the happenings, and the news spread rapidly around town. Homeward bound, she saw Mark Reid, gun on his shoulder, tracking through the woods. At Red Oak Helen learned that a masked figure had frightened the school children and disappeared into the forest. Determined to trap their tormenter the farmers drove that night into the woods, and cautioning them to keep silent, Mr. Day, hearing voices, extinguished the car lights. For half an hour, the men kept up a painful watch, finally rewarded by the appearance of Mark Reid, and a small man, whimpering pitifully. Quieting his companion, Mark told his poignant story. George Jr. had returned from the war, but he was demented and his father concealed his son's presence from the community. Although harmless, George had been missing from home for several days, and when Mark heard Helen's story, he guessed that his brother, supplied with toy masks and a knife taken from their store, had returned to their old home. Moved by Mark's sorrow, Mr. Day refused to press charges, and Mark placed George Jr. in a sanitarium where he died shortly after, crying that the enemy still pursued him. And it was only the devotion of Helen, who loved him, that made Mark forget his brother's tragic life.

JUST ANOTHER WOMAN

Letta Lee Drama File No. 10006

TWO hours before his wedding to Dell Winslow, the most beautiful debutante of the season, Roger Sampson nervously drinks a cocktail. When the telephone rings, he leaps forward thinking it is Dell, but as he listens his face pales, he exclaims, "My god!" and dashes madly into his roadster. The butler shrugs, finishes his master's cocktail, exclaims, "This marriage business certainly makes men act queer," and indulgently clears the table.

In the anteroom of a hospital near Dell's home, Roger rushes up to a nurse and asks to see his fiancee, but he is informed that she is still in the operating room and that he will have to wait. Roger moans, "But can't I go in? You don't understand, we were to be married in an hour. I love her!" And as he is informed that he'll just have to wait until the operation is over, he paces up and down distractedly as they tell him that the taxi driver was killed instantly. They found his card reading, "To Dell with love, Roger," clutched in the girl's hand. Roger whispers hoarsely, "I sent that with the flowers that were delivered this morning." Hours pass and still he is not permitted to see Dell whose condition is grave.

Meanwhile, at the Winslow mansion the guests are mumbling to each other and as the minutes pass Dell Winslow has hysterics. Jilted on her wedding day! Her father tries to comfort her as he mutters imprecations upon the head of Roger Sampson.

When at last they admit Roger to the girl's room he gasps at sight of a beautiful girl whom he has never seen before. Rushing from the hospital he arrives at the Winslow mansion to find the guests have already left. Dell has another burst of hysterics when she sees him and refuses to listen to an explanation, and Roger returns dazedly home. His letters are returned unopened and when the newspapers come out with the truth of the Winslow-Sampson break-up, Dell, unappeased leaves town.

Dr. Walker calls Roger and reminds him that in the moment of discovering that the girl was not Dell, Roger had waved aside the matter of expenses. These he is now asked to pay. Furiously, Roger does so and learns that in a few days the girl ought to be able to give him an explanation. The stares and questions of his friends torture Roger and the thought of Dell walking out of his life leaves him dazed.

At last he is summoned. Striding to the girl's bedside he demands, "Who are you?" and as she tries to apologize he scowls as he informs her that she has ruined his life. Close to tears she informs him that she had been so excited that last day working in the florist shop, when she learned that her aunt had bequeathed her a small fortune, that she had forgotten to enclose Roger's card in the flowers he had sent his fiancee. She had been about to deliver them in person when the crash blotted out everything and they had supposed she was Dell. Roger leaves still angry, but the next day he is drawn back. Soon flowers and books flood Letta Lee's room and the first day she can hop around on crutches, Roger finds himself perilously close to tears. "I can go back to Virginia next week," Letta informs Roger, and as his arm circles her waist he says, "You can not, young lady. You are coming home with me as my wife." Tremulously she looks at the man who was going to have nothing more to do with women, and she answers, "Yes sir."

THIS HAPPINESS

Ilse Ruhland Drama File No. 9951

HIS last examination toward his degree in Electrical Engineering finished, Karl walks gayly along with his fellow students and smiles as someone tells him how lucky he is having his father's influence behind him. Passing a lovely garden, Karl stops to beg a flower from a girl and as she pins it laughingly in his lapel, their eyes hold, and the girl blushes. That night the students are having a gay time in the village restaurant when the girl, Trude enters, and Karl jumps up and swings her into a dance. In the garden, Trude sings a song of love when Karl enters unnoticed. Slipping behind her he joins her in the chorus and at the conclusion Karl kisses her and asking her if she will be his wife, he places his signet ring on her finger.

At home Karl is restless and nervous as he dares not tell his family about Trude but finally he announces, "I am engaged." Gravely his father questions him about his rash choice but when he learns the boy is in love with a common farmer's daughter, he reasons with his son. Karl is distracted but when the War breaks out his father urges him to uphold the honor of the family and Karl goes off. Two months pass and Trude with difficulty sets upon paper her shame, begging Karl to help her since now that her father has re-married she feels estranged and lonely. Weeks pass and Trude gets her letter back marked, "Vermisst" (missing).

Her baby born, Trude no longer wants to live but she is kindly treated at the hospital where tragedies as hers, since the war are common. Two years later in an epidemic following the terrible wartime privations in Germany, Trude dies and is shortly followed by her father while her baby, called Trude too, falls into the care of her stepmother who dislikes the illegitimate child. Beaten, ill-treated, Trude slips into a tent when a traveling show hits town and becomes friendly with six year old Vera, daughter of the troupe owner. When the show pulls out, Trude goes with them and her stepmother is induced by Vera's father to give up the child. Vera's father trains the two girls as aerialists but Trude's forte is singing and dancing on more solid ground and when the show breaks up, Trude, who has taken the name Marietta, and Vera perform at an inn. There Trude is "discovered" by Wilson, a young film director, and he takes her back to Hollywood as his new find. Trude insists that Vera come too and in Hollywood, Wilson gives a party to introduce the girl to the film world. Charles, Wilson's sound director stares at the girl and sinks heavily into a chair. In answer to Wilson's concerned queries he says that the girl reminds him of his fiancee in Germany before the war. Charles tells how he was captured by the French, escaped to Holland, had success but could not communicate with his people. Then he went on to America and in 1921 returned to Germany to find his people had died in the war as had Trude. Charles could learn no more from Trude's wretched stepmother. He had then returned unhappily to America and had become a power in the film industry. Wilson questions Marietta about her past but she tells him glibly that she is Vera's sister and doesn't mention her life before she joined the tent show. Wilson, falling in love with Marietta, asks her to marry him and at the engagement party, Charles enters just as Marietta is singing the song her mother had sung to Karl long ago in the German garden. Startled, Charles grasps her hands and as he calls her Trude, she gasps, "How did you know?" The signet ring proves conclusively who she is and Wilson blesses his daughter as young Wilson softly promises that he will make her happy.

THREE CHANCE INN

William C. Emery Drama File No. 9987

THE ramshackle tavern, Three Chance Inn, once a mecca of tourists, is now being used by a desperate band of rum-runners as their Drop. Hawk Wilson, the chief of the outfit learns that a boat load of rum has been snatched from his men, and boarding another boat he starts in hot pursuit of the coast-guard boat. Through trickery he is able to get back his own ship, but he is pursued by the cutter. In the fog he manages to evade his pursuers, land his wet cargo, and load it onto the waiting trucks, but when he returns to his admiring men, he orders them to scram, saying that in a few days things will be pretty hot about the Drop. Although his men object to breaking up, he assures them that it will be best for them to scatter for two years and then return.

At the end of the given period, things have quieted down. Hawk returns with as many as he can locate of his original band, but when joyfully they enter the old hangout, they discover a girl, Muriel has calmly moved in. Hawk quiets his disgruntled men and Muriel asserts that being homeless, she had taken over the deserted inn, but would, if the men owned the place, get out. The men are all for killing the girl who knows enough to queer their whole plan, but Hawk decides that they will hold the girl a prisoner instead. Seeing one of his men agree with a glitter in his eyes, Hawk seizes him by the throat and warns them all there is to be no funny business. Realizing there is no good objecting, Muriel offers to cook for the outfit, and soon things are running smoothly. Hawk, meanwhile, is falling in love with Muriel, and one day, when he falteringly tells her of his feelings, she confesses that she loves him too, and promises to marry him. The boys plan a huge celebration, but that is their undoing. For, for the first time caught unarmed, they stare transfixed at the revenue officers who break in on them.

Muriel is released when Hawk asserts that they were keeping her captive against her will, and when the police remind him that that is even more serious a charge than rum running, Hawk says nothing to defend himself. However, Muriel tells the police that since she was going to marry the gentleman, and that they were caught in the midst of the celebration, Hawk's story would hardly hold water. The men are all sent up on charges and Hawk informs Muriel that she is well rid of him. However, she is unremitting in her efforts to get him free and when finally he is released for good behavior, he finds Muriel waiting for him. Together they remodel Three Chance Inn, block up the three escapes that have given the place its name and unsavory associations, and there spend their honeymoon, with the well wishes of the released prisoners. They all promise to go straight, but Hawk, for one means it and the gang breaks up.

RED SIGNAL

Howard Trammell Western File No. 9948

BOARDING the train taking him back to the Circle R Ranch of which is foreman, Bat Benson sees a pretty girl sitting alone and takes a seat opposite her. When he notices from her ticket that she is going to the same town he tries to engage her in conversation and when her polite but firm discouragements fail to have any effect the girl opens her purse, takes out a stunning engagement ring, and with a little twinkle in her eye puts it on her finger. Bat relapses into sullen silence.

Meanwhile two grim-visaged passengers board with a large oblong box which they place in the baggage car. They explain that they are taking the boy home to his own town to be buried. The express clerks shudder at having to travel with the casket, and speak in low tones.

In a mountain pass, a group of bandits don black masks and prepare to hold up the train for the money which their leader, Mex, a strapping fellow whose distinguishing feature is his frequent lapses into Spanish dialect, tells them is being transferred to a Western bank. Dan, Mex's "yes-man" flags the train which screeches to a sudden halt. The express clerks resolutely lock the car and refuse to open although bullets are fired through the door. The lid of the coffin pops open and a man gets out, fires at the clerk, killing one and wounding the other, and Mex enters to commend Juan for the ingenius plan. In the passenger car Juan is trying to force Rita to give up her engagement ring. Bat comes to her aid but Mex, entering, fires coldly at Bat who drops to the floor. Rita screams and gives up the ring, pillowing Bat's head in her lap. The masked bandits leave taking with them the wounded express clerk who knows too much.

The train pulls into the station. Rita goes to her hotel and Bat learns that his boss, Rawlins, is waiting impatiently for his return. Freshened up, Bat enters Rawlins room and sees him talking to Rita who is his niece. Bat soon realizes he is in love with Rita Nelson but he dares not say anything remembering the engagement ring.

At a fiesta, Bat is dancing with Rita when a handsome fellow cuts in and Bat misses Rita after a few moments. He follows her outside and finds her struggling in the arms of the fellow. Bat forces him to release Rita and as the man utters a muffled oath, Bat recognizes the same quaint expression that the hold-up man on the train used. He whips out his gun but the other, realizing he has given himself away shoots first and missing leaps upon his horse and dashes into the night. Bat gives chase, urging Rita to summon the sheriff to follow. Trailing his man for hours, Bat finally comes up to a cabin. Around a table he sees Mex's gang and before anyone can act he catches them off guard. Freeing the bound express clerk, Bat superintends the tying up of the gang and leaving the clerk in charge enters the room where Mex and Dan are counting their gains. Dan shoots then falls heavily upsetting an oil lamp which sets fire to the room, and the sheriff's posse, led by Rita rides up just as Bat, after a terrific struggle finishes Mex. The money recovered amounts to thousands and as Bat gravely restores to Rita the engagement ring he has found on Mex, she informs him that the ring was her mother's. With a cry he leaps forward. "Rita!" he says, and as she smiles mischievously he bends to her lips.

MEN SHOULD MARRY

Lucille H. Adams Drama File No. 10062

SO happy is Susan with her husband Ronald Whitney that she is scarcely conscious of the admiration her unusual beauty evokes. The discovery that she is to have a child completes her bliss and she smiles at her own whimsies about how best to inform Ronald. When he comes in, however, he is jumpy and nervous and without giving her an opportunity to speak he asks for a divorce. Susan is stunned. She sits very straight in her chair and tells him if he'd rather not explain she'll understand. Ronald turns his head away as he exclaims that he cannot help himself. He is in love with Barbara Wells, Susan's best friend, and the one thing he cannot conceive of is carrying on a clandestine affair while he is still married to Susan. A day later Susan departs for Reno and six weeks later a judge presents her with her decree. Only in her own room does she permit herself the luxury of tears, then firmly she packs and goes to Europe to visit with her father, a retired banker. In seclusion she bears her son and shortly afterwards her father dies willing her his entire fortune.

Reckless of money and emotions Susan whirls from casino to fashionable spa leaving in her wake a trail of broken hearts. King Boris, young potentate becomes enamored of her and following her, begs her to come with him. She smiles at his earnestness and when their pictures appear together in the rotogravure sections of the papers throughout the world, his subjects threaten to force him to give up the woman. Boris implores Susan to marry him promising to abdicate his throne for her but she puts him off and finally tells him she is going to Cairo with her son and a nurse. Boris asks if she will give her answer when she returns, and she scandalizes the observers by patting the royal cheek and answering, "Perhaps."

At the beach Susan's youngster is building castles of sand and as a wave destroys his fancy he rushes toward the water scolding. However, another wave sweeps down upon him and spluttering and coughing, the youngster loses footing. The shouts of the child's nurse cause Ronald Whitney to rescue the boy and as he cradles the child safely in his arms the youngster smiles and says, "Daddy." Ronald is touched as he whispers, "I wish I were, sonny." But Junior is determined. He explains that he knows his Daddy. He has seen pictures of him and his mother has told him all about his father, Ronald is astonished to learn the child is Ronald Whitney Jr. A moment later, Susan who has heard of her child's danger comes up and she and Ronald try to appear indifferent but they know they have always loved each other. Ronald asks why he was never told of his son and is told it was because of the other woman. Softly Ronald tells her he never married Barbara, having discovered before his divorce was final how fickle she was. He had gone to South America on an engineering project and having seen pictures of Susan in the papers had followed her here. Boris' telegram that he is coming to force Susan to marry him, prompts her answer that that would make her a bigamist, and Ronald takes his wife in his arms.

MODERN HERMIT

Minor Horton Drama File No. 9996

HIS waiting room crowded with well-dressed women, Doctor Jim Doyle finds himself a slave to his own success. Unable to take a moment off for himself, the ringing of the bells summoning him to this patient and that becomes a terror to him and at the height of his career, finding himself bordering on a breakdown, he decides to throw up everything and go off alone. Traveling west he trades his expensive car for some horses and equipment and sets off toward the mountains. At length he arrives at a spot that takes his breath away by its sheer beauty and there he stops. With his own hands and a song in his heart, he constructs a rough cabin and for months enjoys his pipe before his own fire. Rejoicing in his new peace of mind he finds once on a trip of exploration that there is an inhabited cabin some ten miles away. To his astonishment when he rides up he is greeted by a beautiful black haired girl. Her parents, the Castinas return soon and learning who Jim is, extend their hospitality. Castinas tells Jim he was a wealthy rancher but after the murder of a rustler with whom he had been in constant conflict, Castinas' life had been threatened by Pedro, the rustler's brother, and fearing mob violence before he should be able to establish his innocence of the crime, Castinas had fled with his wife and daughter.

Three years pass and friendship is welded between the Castinas and Jim. Mona, grown now into young womanhood is in love with Jim but he continues to regard her as the companion she has always been. Then, one day an airplane crashes and Jim's deft surgical fingers render aid to Jane Bowers the lovely pilot, daughter of one of Jim's millionaire patients. Mona, summoned to aid, is painfully conscious of the difference between her appearance and that of the fragile, groomed Jane and an unconscious rivalry exists between the two women. Jim, unwilling to impose upon Jane's helplessness, conceals his feelings, but when she is leaving for home, she pretends to fall and held in his arms, glories in his fierce kiss. A moment later, however, he releases her and Jane returns home. In the whirl of society she is unable to forget him, and when her mother becomes desperately ill and is despaired of by the physicians, Jane flies back to Jim and begs him to come. The delicate operation is a success and an enterprising reporter features the story of the hermit surgeon. Jane begs Jim to practise medicine again, but he fears getting into the rut of the fashionable physician again, and he returns, pilotted back home by Jack, Jane's brother, after his refusal has resulted in a quarrel. Jack refuses Jim's invitation to remain on as his guest but when he grounds his plane and is introduced to Mona who has been setting Jim's oabin in order, Jack changes his mind asserting that this back-to-nature idea might not be such a bad idea. From the first Jack monopolizes Mona and when Jack returns he has won the Castinas' permission to marry Mona.

Meanwhile, his loneliness intensified by the happiness of Jack and Mona, Jim has been unable to forget Jane. One day he decides to return. It is Bowers' idea that Jim open a surgical school and soon his hospital is famous as a center for advanced medical practice. Jim learns that Castinas has long since been cleared of the crime and that Pedro's death has made the return of the Castinas safe. But above all, Jim finds Jane all that he has dreamed.

EACH TO-MORROW

Mrs. Claud H. Young Drama File No. 10012

THERE had never been any love in Lee Culbertson's life. Through the failure of his business her straight-laced father had accumulated debts and had in a very short time drunk himself to death. When after three years of horror her mother, worn out by the losing struggle to keep her family in food and decent shelter, had followed, Lee had the responsibility of keeping house for her harsh, uncaring brothers. Forced to scrimp, tormented by fault-finding, Lee comforted herself with flights of fancy in which she imagined a home of her own with crisp curtains at the windows and bright rugs on the floor. Then the marriage of her brother Tom to a mean spinster, had broken up their home and Lee had gone to work in a nearby town for a family who constantly impressed upon her that she was a servant. It was at a Church sociable that Lee, lovely in her worn frock, had seen Gene Hanley for the first time and fallen desperately in love. When he sat down beside her and asked if she were having a good time she was too happy to speak and on the way walking home, Lee felt that Heaven was pouring its radiance upon her. Gene was the first man ever to be kind to her and Lee worshipped him. "You're a funny little thing," he told her and when Gene found a position for her in his own town, and a few months later asked her to marry him, they wandered hand in hand through the cottage that was Lee's castle of dreams. The only disturber of their happiness was Gene's mother who always felt felt her son should have married a wealthy girl. Often Gene would come home discouraged because he could not make money fast enough, and sometimes he would blame Lee for inveigling him into marrying her, but his penitence a moment later would only make her love him the more. Once, Gene suggested that they move away from his mother, and Lee felt her heart sing. But weeks passed and he did not mention it again. At the beginning they had decided that one day a week Gene would be free to spend at the club or with the boys, and that night Lee would spend with the girls. "You will never get Gene to leave this town," one of the girls said and the others exchanged glances. Troubled, Lee reminded Gene that they were going to move. For the first time he flew into a rage and struck her. From that time on he sought opportunities to quarrel yet Lee was certain of his love. Then one night Gene had his friends over playing cards and filling the house with vulgar laughter. That night Mary came over, seeing Lee outside, and hesitantly, told Lee she was the only one who didn't know about Mina, whom Gene had seen every night when he was supposed to be with the boys.

While the men played cards, Lee went to Mina to plead for her home, but instead of the coarse woman she expected she found Mina pitying her, but frank in her assurance that she would not give Gene up. That they had loved each other long before Gene had met and been fascinated by Lee. Gene did not deny it and Lee went back to work and accepted the divorce decree that severed her from the man she loved.

Months later, vacationing, she stared fascinated at the deep cool water when a gentle voice told her about the history of Suicide Bridge. Friendship ripened and Lee found that "Time heals all sorrows." Years later with her husband holding her hand fondly, and a youngster playing nearby, Lee found it in her heart to forget Gene—a little.

TRAPPERS OF THE NORTH

Walter Hendricks Drama File No. 10053

IN the interest of securing authentic material for a novel he is about to write, Richard Low arrives in the North country. He pays no attention to the jibes of some of the husky trappers who scorn a fellow who makes his living at the writing game but when one day, looking out of his window he sees a girl being detained hy one of the bearded men in town, he rushes to the street. Waiting just long enough to hear Helen Brightcn ohjcct to Tim Hindner's efforts to make her remain on with him in town, Richard sails into the giant and to the amazement of the crowd, knocks him out. Seeing Helen tremhling, he offers to escort her back home and rides with her in her dog sled. As they wait for the return of her father, Helen grows apprehensive and at last together they go out to his traps and find him lying in the snow. Richard marvels at the courage of the girl as she goes about nursing her father who has hroken his lcg in a treacherous hole near one of his traps. When Brighten recovers sufficiently, he begins to worry about who is to take care of his traps and when Richard offers to stay on and help until Brighten can get about again they are both grateful.

In town, Richard sells the Brighten furs and a few moments after he has seen Tim Hindner and Ned Homer, go by sniffing suspiciously like dope addicts, a bullet pierces Richard's sleeve. He picks up his dogs and rides on to the Brighten home. Brighten is now able to hobble about and one night, sitting alone by the fireside, Richard tells Helen of his love and gains her promise to marry him. Their lips meet in the first kiss of love and the next day, Richard again sets off to collect the furs from Brighten's traps. It is an overnight trip and when he returns he sniffs the air apprehensively. Arriving at the site of the Brighten cabin he is appalled to see that it has been burned to the ground. In desperation he searches for traces of the ones he has left behind, but although he finds the body of old Brighten, there is no trace of Helen. Woefully he stares at the ruins and picks up a pellet which he examines closely. A wild light comes in his eyes as he recognizes it as a morphine tablet and spurring his dogs he comes to town and makes inquiries after Hindner and Homer. But all he can learn is that they have gone. Then he pretends to be a dope addict and at the local saloon pretends he must gct hold of some dope. When he shakes a well filled purse he is told that he can get morphine at a cabin at the end of the trail. Rushing off he follows the directions and arrives at Hindner's cabin just as Helen is losing all hope of being rescued. In a desperate battle. Richard overcomes the two dope peddlers and while Helen holds his gun, he binds the pair and sends for the North West Mounted police. Hindner and Homer are revealed as a pair long wanted hy the police ,and Richard returns to the states with his bride Helen and a story that runs into the best seller class.

LOOT TRAIN

William Taylor Drama File No. 10023

IN his office John Scott chewed on the end of his cigar and consulting his watch restlessly proclaimed that he was going to fire Red Powers. Red couldn't get away with being late just because he was his brother-in-law. Nell Smith, Scott's secretary, reminded her employer that Powers was the best Engineer on the K. & C. Railroad but just then there was a knock at the office door and Scott, prepared to fly at Powers, exploded at sight of Ryan, Foreman of the Engines. Minutes later, when Scott had finished scolding about Powers, Ryan sarcastically explained that he had come to report that Powers had been there two hours already, working on Engine 999. Nell hid her head and typed furiously to hide her smile.

On the engine Powers once more proved his worth to the railroad in detecting a hot car and preventing a blaze. The crew put their train away and Red went with Shorty for a beer. Shorty secretly hated Red and knockout drops administered in the whiskey he induced Red to drink with him caused Red to fall asleep near the track. He was discovered and the whiskey on his breath made Scott and the others believe that Red was dead drunk. Next morning, after a summary hearing, Red was dishonorably discharged from the railroad he had faithfully served.

Two years passed. Destitute, Red took to drink in earnest and was thrown out of the speakeasy owned by Boss Rocco, a former railroad man now cngaged in robhing freight trains. However, Rocco passing through inquiried about the disturhance and scnt Spike after Red. Red looked up dazed at Spike who helped brush him off and inquired all about Red's dismissal, prodding his resentment. When Spike got Red to admit that he'd do anything to make money, he took him in his car and rode him out to Rocco's place in the country. Admitted to the inner sanctum, Red was given a few stiff drinks and told that he could pick up a couple of easy dollars. A few days later Red wrote a letter to his brother-in-law John Scott. Scott looked over the letter and tossed it aside, but Nell, seeing it grew excited and asked her employer if he wasn't going to do something. It took her several minutes to convince Scott that there might be some truth in Red's report of an attempted holdup of a three million dollar silk train, and a lot more talk to convince Scott of the danger Red was running in informing the railroad of the gangster's plans while he was being held to side switch the train that Shorty Logan had told them about.

Aecordingly the scheduled train was stopped and then things happened fast. The gangsters were eaught and Red was re-instated. He smiled happily at Nell who was so proud of him, and it was Scott who gave him the tip that Nell might not take his friendship amiss. So life began anew for Red Powers and his bride-to-be Nell Smith.

NIGHT DEFENSE

John Black, Jr. Drama File No. 9998

AT a lavish dinner party given by the newly rich Blakelies who are trying to hreak into society, Charles Dover and Marie Walton are drawn to each other. Mr. Blakely takes Marie in to dinner and forestalling an older man who is about to ask her, Charles extends his arm to the flattered Mrs. Blakely. Across the table the two young people exchange interested glances and Charles suddenly asks about the heautiful star sapphire that is Mrs. Blakely's prize possession. Blakely frowns as his wife, expanding tells Charles about it and as the other guests listen politely she offers, after Charles has subtly brought her to the point, to show it to them all. Her husband looks about the tahle then rises and gets it from the safe. In its velvet box it is passed carefully from guest to guest and gains startled expressions from the guests who all appreciate its heauty. At length it passes from Marie to Blakely who returns the hox to the safe but not before Charles has seen Marie drop the gem into her evening hag.

After the guests have left, Blakely scolds his wife for showing the jewel, but she protests that there is no use having jewelry if you can't show it. Blakely, still uneasy, takes another look and cries out, "It's gone! The gem is gone from the box. "The two parvenus blame each other and Blakely suddenly remembers how Charles had insisted that the gem be brought out, passed around, and how he had come around the tahle for another look after it had passed him. Accordingly Charles is arrested and charged with the crime. He refuses to defend himself, however, because he wishes to protect Marie whom, he knows, has taken it. However, on the train taking her away, Marie sees a picture of Charles held for the theft and after telling herself that he will be able to prove his innocence, she changes her mind and returns to give the gem to the police. Charles insists that he stole it and gave it to her, but she laughs at his story and tells him he is crazy. By this time reporters are surrounding the worried Blakelies who tell each other they should never have brought the case to the police. Distraoted, Blakely phones headquarters and says he is willing to drop charges, but he is told he will have to make a personal appearance and two detectives march him down before the police captain. Then Charles reveals that the Blakelies were so anxious to drop charges because they themselves picked up the jewel which they knew had been stolen. The Blakelies are find for carrying stolen goods, and Marie freed walks out of jail downcast. However, Charles is waiting for her and he tells her he knows all about her. She tries to pull away, but he seizes her arm like a detective and tells her, "However, I'm willing to forgive you—after you have been properly punished. The sentence is life—with me." And Marie clings happily to him as he kisses her.

HARD WOMAN

Elsie Cleve Drama File No. 9913

FOR a year after the death of his wife, Jack Prescott became virtually a recluse. Devoting every spare moment to the twins, he shut himself off from the world. It was only when some business friends, the Terrants, insisted that he come to a dinner party, that he finally allowed himself to be persuaded. Sitting next to Christine, a glittering and beautiful woman, Jack, cut off from all gaiety for months, felt suddenly giddy, and when she invited him into her elahorate apartment for a cocktail and leaned maddeningly close to him, he saw the invitation in her eyes. In a few weeks, Jack began to feel that after all it would be good for the twins if they had a mother's care, and he took Christine as his wife.

Disillusion was swift. Christine never had any use for the children and always seemed to find them in her way. When Jack worked late in the office so that he could keep Christine up in the extravagant style she demanded, Christie found her old friends ready to welcome her back and her elaborate parties at the apartment made home a bedlam. When Jack mentioned the children, Christine shrugged and asked why he didn't get someone to take care of them, and Jack hired Ann Deland as a governess. Often, wearily returning home from the office to find Christine out for the evening, Jack would stop at the nursery and watching Ann's skillful management of the youngsters, Jack felt a sense of peace. Sometimes, after the children had been tucked in, Ann and Jack sat together talking, and he learned how she sent her salary home to her nagging mother and selfish sister. He learned too of her thwarted love for music, and sometimes now, when there was a concert in town he gave her tickets which he said he couldn't use. The farther Christine drew away from him, the nearer and dearer Ann became but when, one night, they had planned a birthday party for the twins, Christine insisted that Jack come to a party, and shamed before Ann at Christine's rage, Jack went. The peaked faces of the twins haunted him but when Jack asked Christine to divorce him, she immediately suspected another woman and enjoyed a tantrum. Thereafter Christine's eagle eyes watched Jack feverishly and when she at last caught him speaking softly to Ann, she flew at the girl and demanded that she leave. Jack, hurt for Ann, interfered, but rather than cause a scene, Ann stayed him.

Every time Jack mentioned divorce, Christine's face contorted with rage and one night, sipping a cocktail, she struck one of the twins who dared to ask where Ann was and why she didn't come back where she belonged. Jack bounded from the room with the sobbing child. The youngster, head cut by the fall, became feverish and demanded Ann, until in desperation, Jack begged her to come. Ann stayed until the youngster fell asleep then accepted Jack's car home. For a minute Christine hesitated, then leaping into the town car she drove madly, crowding Ann's car off the road. Her own wheel caught, however, and in the hospital it was Ann they were able to save, while Christine lost her fight against death. Softly Jack asked if Ann would come home, now, and Ann wept a little as the twins rushed to greet their "mother!"

THE INSIDIOUS SCARAB

J. Fulton Green Melodrama File No. 9974

IT is at a dinner party, that the weazened Egyptologist, LanFrance leans forward to examine the scarab worn by Amy Pauley. Her brother, Colin, face flushed from too much to drink, confides to the scientist that he got that scarab from the tomb of Amen-Ptah, and adds that he had to slip out of Egypt lest the authorities learn of it. Frightened, Amy whips off the scarab, refusing to wear it, while her fiance Henry Harlow, young barrister pulls Colin out to sober him up. On the way home, Amy confesses that there is something sinister abou that scarab and she wouldn't have worn it if she had known its history. She had supposed that Colin had picked it up in a shop he seemed so hurt when she refused his gift.

The following morning, Henry is awakened by a frantic call from Colin who tells him that Amy has disappeared during the night. Henry hurriedly joins him and at sight of Colin's contrite face as he explains that he had thought it smart to have his sister wear so precious a decoration, Henry hasn't the heart to pour upon the spoiled lad's head the invective he has prepared. In desperation, Colin suggests that they enlist the aid of LanFrance since, if the Egyptians have seized his sister, the visiting celebrity may be able to give them a clue. But at sight of the shriveled creature in his mystically embroidered robe, and the strange museum like apartment in which he lives, the two men suffer a sinking of heart. "I am the re-incarnation of Thoth," the little man pronounces and an instant later claw-like hands seize Colin and Henry, and struggling against the fumes of ether, they are carried to a dark room where, regaining consciousness they find Amy, bound like themselves. After what seems like hours, Henry frees himself and the others and they steal up behind the unsuspecting guard, overcome him and escape cautiously down the narrow hall. Through a crack in the wall they see LanFrance kneeling suppliantly before a gigantic bronze statue of the God Thoth. In the room, wierdly lighted by joss sticks the face of their captor looks hideous and the trio shiver as they hear LanFrance promise his god human sacrifices to atone for the affront of the stolen scarab. Henry pats Colin's back to keep him from giving way to his remorse and whispers they must get out. However, as they are proceeding, Colin trips over the body of a half-naked man whose hideously gashed throat attests to his horrible death. The faint noise acts as an alarm, and soft padded feet scurry down the winding corridors. Henry picks up the fainting Amy and runs with her and at last they barricade themselves in a storeroom. Colin, setting his teeth against the pain of his shoulder where a flying knife has caught him, pours oil from the storeroom barrels under the door where their attackers are already forcing an entrance, while Henry loops a coil of rope about a tree and swings Amy, Colin and himself to safety. A tongue of flame leaps up, followed by a howl of agony, and as the house of horror goes up in flames, the trio vanish into the gathering throng. "Thoth got his sacrifice." Colin murmurs, and Henry's arms slip protectively about Amy.

POSSESSION

Peter Lipari Drama File No. 9474

"WHO is it this time, Dan?" Dan Forster lit a cigarette before he answered in a low voice, "I." Charlotte whistled. "You!" she said. She was employed by Dan to supply the third party for his clients' divorce cases. Briefly Dan explained that he loved Marion before he married her. He would continue to love her until life ceased to throb in his body. He had wanted to give her the best that money could buy and, working hard for that money, had left her alone too often. Now Marion wanted a divorce. There was another man.

Because she admired Dan tremendously and wanted to help him Charlotte visited his wife and urged her to reconsider her divorce. Under Marion's contempt, her veiled insinuations, Charlotte flared in anger and left after telling Marion she was unworthy of being loved by a man like Dan. At an appointed hour a raid was staged. Flashlight pictures were taken of Charlotte and Dan, and Marion got an uncontested divorce without difficulty. But a new and startling revelation had come to Charlotte. She loved Dan, she knew it now. And in the succeeding months after Marion had married Howard, Dan ceased to take an interest in his work. His clients dropped off and his friends avoided him. Gradually with the spirit of his work gone Dan took to vice. Distressed, Charlotte remonstrated but when Dan ruefully thanked her for her pity, she amazed him by her passionate confession that it wasn't pity at all. It was love. Gently Dan put her from him and reminded her that he still loved Marion. There was no room in his heart for another woman. But when the inevitable happened and Dan's health broke down under his dissipations, Charlotte cared for him. Disinterested in his recovery, Dan made it doubly hard for Charlotte, but as the crisis approached it was Marion Dan called for, and Charlotte at the advice of the doctor went to Marion's apartment. It was late in the evening when Marion, quarreling with Howard as they returned from the theater, found Charlotte waiting for her, telling her of Dan's desperate need of her. Marion's eyes flashed as she ran to Dan and Charlotte, sinking back against the chair, accepted the glass of water Howard proffered and assured him she would be all right in a moment. She was just over-tired.

The crisis over Dan began to recover and Charlotte found work in a dress salon to replenish her purse. Often Marion would visit Dan and once when she asked him why he didn't marry Charlotte, he replied he couldn't. He knew what she had done for him but he could never love her. Marion moved over and sat on the arm of Dan's chair. "You love me, Dan?" "Always, Marion." Neither noticed Charlotte's entrance or her soft departure.

Months passed. Howard told Marion they had been drifting apart. They had never loved each other. Marion smiled crookedly as he told her he loved Charlotte, but alone with the otner woman Marion asked why she was doing this. She still loved Dan. Charlotte answered, "And he still loves you." When Dan asked Charlotte to marry him, promising he would make her happy, she hushed him gently and as she left she reported, "Marion is coming Dan. She is free now. That's the best way, isn't it?"

BURNT FINGERS

Mrs. William McMullen Drama File No. 9895

IN the early days of the settlement of the adjacent western villages of Fenton and Burke an enmity had arisen between the two founders which had resulted in a duel. Fenton had died and Burke still carried upon his cheek a long ugly gash. The next generation carried on the feud and new comers to the villages found it exigent to keep up the tradition of hatred. When young Stephen Marston graduate of an Eastern University arrived to teach in the Burke schoolhouse, he was told it was his duty to inculcate in the hearts of his charges a deeper enmity for Fenton. Astounded, Stephen soon observed that both villages were suffering from the destroying competition and the needless duplication of labor prevented the industries of either town from prospering. But it was the two adjoining schoolhouses, little frame buildings with inadequate facilities that seemed most unnecessary to Stephen. When he dared to say so he was warned that malcontents were not welcome. However, the youngsters adored him and learned rapidly under his teaching.

While on a stroll to the river, Stephen met Audrey Fenton and together they decried the folly of the feud. Before they parted they knew they were in love. At a town meeting several days later, Stephen denounced the cheap frame buildings as firetraps and urged that the town take a location near the river for the school. In the midst of the dissension arising from Stephen's impassioned speech, Burke arose and his scar livid, informed the council that Stephen was a traitor to them, that he had even been seen with the Fenton girl. When Stephen admitted his friendship with Audrey he was asked to resign immediately. The discharge of their beloved master destroyed discipline among the children and one of them, thinking to please his parents whom he had heard discussing the cut-throat competition of Fenton, set fire to the Fenton school house. Inadequate protection caused the burning building to ignite the Burke schoolhouse and only the heroism of Stephen and Audrey whom he had been visiting, saved the children of both towns from a horrible fate. United by the common danger, Fenton and Burke worked together to stop the spread of the flames and when the last spark had died, Stephen called a joint meeting. Impressing upon the anguished parents the need for a modern school building, Stephen urged that they erect a structure near the river and work together for their mutual advantage. One by one volunteers contributed services and with the establishment of a reciprocal trade policy, business increased for both. It was at the wedding of Stephen and Audrey that the last hostility died and out of the ashes arose a fine and generous spirit.

SOUVENIR

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 9962

AS an encore for his appreciative audience of concert goers, the great Leslie Raymond plays Drdla's Souvenir and a hushed silence follows the last poignant note of the violin. An instant later tumultuous applause rings the rafters and as the distinguished looking violinist takes his bows the audience stands and shouts, "Bravo." The next afternoon, Leslie goes to a tuberculosis sanitarium to play for the sick and the fever-bright eyes and flushed cheeks of the patients give him richer reward than concert receipts. As he places his instrument back in its case, Diane Lynton, Head nurse steps forward to thank him for the pleasure he has given them today. Leslie looks down at her whimsically, and says it was a small thing to do. Reading the fineness of the woman in her lustrous eyes. Leslie is attracted and when he asks if he may not come again he is not unaware of her excitement. Once, as they sit together near a brook in the woods, Leslie plays for Diane alone Souvenir, as he has promised he would today and finishing, he sees a tear glistening in her eyes. Taking her gently in his arms, he tells her he loves her and they are married.

Diane leaves the sanitarium to get married and Leslie plays a last concert for the patients. That day one Amy Winters is visiting her husband, Wally, who has been forced temporarily to retire from his business of blackmailing while he regains his health. Amy looks at the handsome violinist and Wally who is to be discharged from the hospital soon suddenly gets an idea.

As the wife of the violin sensation Diane finds her husband's triumphs a mixed blessing for he is bowed down by fan mail. At a bridge one of her catty friends remarks to Diane that she must find it trying to be the wife of a matinee idol and no man could be expected to remain faithful under so much feminine adulation. Diane stoutly defends Leslie but the other women shake their heads in amusement over her naivete.

Then Amy bribes her way into Leslie's dressing room and to his astonishment she throws her arms about his neck and Wally, having snapped their pictures poses as the outraged husband who has followed the culprits and caught them in their sin. Outraged by the transparent extortion plot, Leslie refuses to bribe them to keep silent and lets the case come to court. However, the notoriety ruins him and neither the general public nor his wife believe his innocence. Diane leaves Leslie and after her baby is born she opens a tuberculosis sanitarium of her own. Several years later, Amy, having contracted the disease from her husband comes to Diane's hospital and before she dies, realizing what she has done to this woman, she confesses the truth. Diane is appalled but she can find no trace of Leslie, who, his public gone has become a tramp, unable to bring himself to touch his once beloved violin. Diane brings her son up in his father's footsteps and once the youngster is practicing on the terrace when Leslie, passing, hears Souvenir and stops. The child is frightened as the tramp comes up but when he lets the man finger his violin he is entranced with the glorious playing. Diane, attracted, comes out wondering at the boy's sudden genius but incredulously she cries, "Leslie!" Arms about each other they enter the hospital and days later, Leslie, once more himself, is playing for the spell bound patients while Diane sits by happily.

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Talking Picture Magazine is not available to the general public. DANIEL O'MALLEY CO., INC., *United States Post Office Bldg., 20 West 60th Street, New York, Publishers; Daniel S. STRANGE HONEYMOON

Francis M. Beck Drama File No. 10253

AT the Adventurer's Club a discussion is in progress concerning the proposed trip in a thirty-five foot boat by Ed Rogers. The general concensus of opinion is that he will fail, but folding up his maps, Ed returns to his room and the next morning sets out to sea. Sitting at the tiller he is complacently smoking his pipe when he discerns a moving object in the water and changing his course grasps the swimmer and pulls aboard a shivering scantily clad girl. From his cabin, he obtains short pants and a cotton shirt and flings them to the girl while he retires to the bow of the boat to allow her time to get into the clothing. Several moments later he returns to find her crumpled on the deck, her face in her hands and after some time she tells him her story. She is Alyne Cosgrove, and had been employed as social secretary aboard a yacht until Gary, the millionaire owner, had, under the influence of liquor forced his way into her room. To escape his advances, Alyne had hit him over the head with a water pitcher and aghast as he sank to the floor, she had dashed from the cabin and jumped over board. Realizing that the preponderance of evidence will be against the girl since she has fled, Ed reluctantly decides that although his boat has only provisions for one, he will take her on. Gruffly he divides his clothes and prepares a bunk for her, but as she shrinks from him, he smiles grimly and drawing up a crude marriage contract, by virtue of the power invested in him as captain performs a marriage ceremony, then leaves her abruptly. While fishing, Ed hears her muffled sobs, but after taking a step in her direction he changes his mind and goes in to cook supper. As they suffer from want of water, Alyne feels her intrusion keenly, and conversation between them is limited. A tempest blows up. Alyne is swept over board, but Ed rescues her, and to conceal his own awakened emotions continues gruffer than ever. At last they stop at a lonely island to replenish their supplies and patch their craft, and on the clean sweep of beach, they have difficulty concealing their emotions. Again they land, this time in South America. Ed buys suitable clothing for himself and Alyne and they repair to a fashionable hotel. While reading the back newspapers, Ed rushes up and bursting into Alyne's room shows her a newspaper headlining her disappearance from Gary's yacht. It is obvious from the omission of any story about Gary's accident, that he is well and the incident had been hushed. That evening Alyne finds Ed has left her a large check and a note telling her he is leaving to continue his scheduled trip, and that she will have no difficulty getting a divorce on grounds of desertion.

Each spends a miserable night and it is not until late that, Alyne, love finally conquering pride comes to the beach. Ed looks about for her, and thinking she didn't care enough to say goodbye casts off. But as she comes running up, he blows a kiss, and impulsively Alyne leaps into the sea after him. Willing arms pull her aboard, this time to hold her close . . . and the little craft sails on into the sunset's gold.

NIGHT LIFE

Sigrid Anderson Drama File No. 10152

TOO beautiful to be happy in a small town, Jennie Lee persuades her wealthy father to send her to a city college. There she meets Max, who comes from the same town as she, and under his tutelage she rapidly changes from a pretty little girl to a gay and very much sought after young woman. Caught up in the hysteria of the fast crowd, Jennie loses all sense of responsibility and when her father's business fails and he commits suicide, her grief is ephemeral. Her companions drunkenly assure her she ought to go out for consolation and that night she goes to a masquerade party which is raided by the police. Max manages to get her out through an unguarded window and laughing hysterically at her near disgrace, Jennie sways maudlinly before the accusing eye of the college matron. As a result of her escapade she is expelled from school but Max induces her that with her beauty she doesn't belong at school anyway, and taking heart she applies for a position as a chorus girl. Through the protection of an aged but fabulously wealthy Baron who lavishes gifts upon her, Jennie forgets Max, who, in his way loves her, and after a brief interlude as the acknowledged mistress of the Baron, Jennie returns to the stage. Her parties are notorious and people flock to see the most talked of woman in the theatre. Falling in love with her leading man, Jennie dismisses the Baron and crowds flock to watch the impassioned romance develop before the footlights. When, however, Jennie discovers she is to have a child, Leslie is unwilling to tie himself down to marriage. Jennie retires from the stage and in a Swiss chattel her baby breathes its few hours of life. Returning to the stage, Jennie finds the public fickle and she is forced to accept second rate roles. Her star falling, she outdoes her former extravagances and is surrounded by sycophants who desert her when her show closes and she is unable to find a new vehicle. Her physician warns her that unless she rests she will endanger her life and her world crashes. While walking down the street, Jennie stops attracted by the splendid physique and compelling voice of a salvation army captain, Peter. With a gorgeous gesture she embraces religion and begs Peter to see that she doesn't fall from graee. The beauty and incongruity of Jennie among the Salvation army volunteers wins many converts and again Jennie figures in the newspapers. However, in a month she elopes with Peter and her name becomes a by-word for public scorn. Fascinated by Jennie's charms, Peter is, however, unable to stand the general censure that is meted out to them wherever they go and at last commits suicide. In desperation, Jennie returns to Max who, shocked by her appearance, secures medical aid for her. But it is too late, and with Max holding her hand, Jennie passes to a greater rest.

THE DIVINE VAGABOND

Francisco Jose Deseartes Drama File No. 10177

A GREAT storm rages. On a great mountain outside Satanapolis, two professional mendicants drink merrily from a bottle of wine stolen from the many to be broken by the Dictator at the launching of his new battleships. Maudlinly they congratulate each other on having escaped the city before being conscripted for the coming war. A wanderer joins them. The pair warn him against Satanapolis, but smiling gently upon them, he explains that he has come to prevent war. Although they scoff, they sit in silence watching the majestic figure disappear over the brow of the hill.

Near Satanapolis, a great table is set. Eleven prosperous looking men await the arrival of the twelfth guest. The Reformer comes and as they hail him, he conceals with difficulty his dismay at the bloated appearances of his Apostles. Each boasts of how he has forced men, at the point of cannon to proclaim the Master's word. How they have misinterpreted his teachings! Peter, the Fisherman is now Peter, the wealthy Shipbuilder; Andrew is a market profiteer. All have bowed before Mammon, all are now Pillars of Society. Only Judas has had the grace not to parade his sins. While the Apostles quiver with rage, the Reformer ironically refuses to join them at their Supper.

In the streets of Satanapolis a policeman is publicly arresting a woman taken in adultery. The crowd roars its approval until the Reformer steps forward and pleads for her release. When he invites those who are themselves moral enough to pass judgment upon this woman to step forward, a sullen murmuring begins which ends in cheers as the abashed policeman frees Magdalene. The puzzled Magdalene thereupon offers payment for the Reformer's aid, but he declines. Everywhere is misery and roused by the blatant words of a street corner preacher who offers redemption in return for the pennies the crowd drops in his hat, the Reformer drives the creature from his temple.

Outside a charity hospital a long line of sick and crippled people await the opening of the clinic. The Reformer pauses before a beggar whose eyesight was lost in the last war. When the fellow proudly holds up his medal as he begs for alms, the Reformer asks why he proclaims his patriotism when in his heart he shrinks from the bloody medals as symbols of a terrible hatred of war. The blind man raises his scarred face in wonder and pitying him, the Reformer restores his sight. At his loud outcries that he can see again, the lame, the diseased, crowd about the wanderer. Each he heals by faith, and each triumphantly joins the Peace Movement which the Reformer is leading. The word spreads. A tabloid reporter arriving too late induces an actor to don a beard and a leopard skin and transposes the fakir's picture on that of Magdalene's and some of those who have been healed. The next day the faked picture blazons on the front page.

The office of the Dictator is beseiged by the protesting Preachers, Physicians, and Plutocrats. At length dismissing the chorus girl whom he has been fondling, the Dictator and his Secretary, a former Corporal, give an interview to the worried manufacturers of arms. Despite the interference of this charlatan, the Dictator assures, the war will come off as scheduled, and, winking, the unemployment problem will be solved as the soldiers perish. But the Secretary opposes violence. The people adore this Reformer. If he can be disgraced, they will turn from him. Good! They send for Magdalene, and the Dictator himself offers her a fat purse to get the Reformer to her room. He appeals to her pride hurt by his imperviousness to her charms. Still she refuses, until promised no harm will come to this man whom she voluptuously fears and respects. The Reformer, miraculously distributing loaves to the starved, is summoned to the supposedly dying Magdalene. He smiles sadly as he sees her seductive dress and perfumed boudoir. As she kisses him violently, the Dictator and police rush in. Taken to trial, the Reformer refuses to defend himself, but a world famous lawyer takes the case at the last moment and dramatically produces the now repentant Magdalene. To prevent damaging testimony, the Dictator blandly orders the release of the prisoner. The interest of the crowd wanes. The lawyer goes out, Magdalene's arm tucked in his. The broadcaster of the trial, awakening from a nap, hurriedly signs off, ironically bungling his announcement, and in the darkened courtroom, alone, forgotten, the Reformer realizes he has been saved from martyrdom and so his message has been lost. It will take another trial, perhaps not unlike the first two thousand years ago, to arouse the populace fully to his magnificent dream of a Universal Brotherhood.

CROSSED FLAGS

Gustavus C. Robbins Drama File No. 10189

HAVING won the graduation honors in foreign languages, Jim Baker, in cap and gown comes down from the platform to be congratulated by his sweetheart Lucille and his father, a Mining Engineer who has delayed his trip to Mexico to be with his son at the commencement exercises. After the excitement has died down, Jim asks Lucille to marry him, but she urges him to get a job first. With the outbreak of the World War, Jim, together with a group of his enthusiastic classmates, enlists, and Lucille promised to wait for his return. But when Jim returns, after a long seige in an army hospital, he finds that Lucille, tired of waiting, has married an older and wealthier man. In his first moment of disillusion, when the weeping Lucille, realizing that she still loves only Jim, tries to make excuses, Jim takes an airplane to Mexico, traveling with a celebrated doctor who informs the boy that he ought to see plenty of excitement since revolutions are quite common down there.

After riding for days through mountains and valleys, Jim, tired and thirsty arrives at his father's place and finds a fiesta in progress. Excitedly his father greets him and proudly introduces his boy to his friend Don Ricardo, who invites them to come in and hear Conchita, his daughter sing. Conchita, attracted to the newcomer, addresses her song to Jim, exciting the jealousy of her admirer Captain Gormez. The lovely Conchita comes out and is introduced to Jim and delighted to hear him speak Spanish so well, she asks if he will teach her English. Constraint falls on the merry-makers as Colonel Ricardo warns them he has just learned of a fresh outbreak of the revolutionists. The next morning, Jim returns to the hacienda to give Conchita her lessons, and the Colonel asks Jim and his father to remain at his home for a few days for protection while he leaves for the capitol to confer with the president about a stronger guard at the garrison. To his dismay, Jim, who is falling in love with his pupil, learns that her father is giving her in marriage to Gormez. The peon whom Gormez leaves to spy upon his fiancee reports that Jim is making love to Conchita and Gormez, defying orders returns to the hacienda in time to hear Conchita softly ask Jim how to say "I love you" in English. The Mexican breaks in on them, and when the Colonel comes home, to cover his own defection, Gormez explains he deserted his post when he learn the American was making love to Conchita. The Colonel, infuriated, orders Jim from the place and terminates his friendship with the older Baker. On his way back to the garrison, however, Gormez is attacked by rebels and his life is spared only on the condition that he betray his garrison. Accompanied by a rebel, Gormez returns to his post, and poisons the drinking water of the fort. Slowly the men drop in their tracks and when Conchita drinks she too falls before she can be made Gormez's bride. Agonized, Gormez too late shouts that the water is poisoned and the rebel fires at Gormez and escapes to notify his fellows to begin the attack. Jim, on his way back to his mine with dynamite, sees the fort's distress signal and notified by Ricardo of Conchita's illness, dashes to the airport and persuades his friend the doctor, about to return to the States, to administer antidotes. The rebels attack the weakened fort which holds out until Jim's father, anxious for his son, hastens the advancing troops, and saves the day, and Jim and Conchita are married under Crossed Flags.

THE FOG LIFTS

Charlotte Pohl Drama File No. 10092

REBELLING against her rigid guardian, Hermann Wagner, Director of a German Neurological Institute, Irene Burkardt, lovely young heiress, slips out alone for one gay day at the Hippodrome. Tempted by the spiel of a ringmaster, she mounts a horse and when a youngster mischievously shoots at the animal with a home made sling shot, the girl clings to her startled mount as it dashes wildly about the arena. With child like happiness, Irene accepts the congratulations of the relieved ring master on her return and makes her way through the cheering crowd. At last, tired, she decides to stop at the Cafe Kerka but the doorman informs her that unescorted ladies are not admitted. With flaming cheeks she turns away. A student, Fred Martens, having overheard, gallantly offers to accompany her inside. She hesitates, but as he smiles reassuringly and she remembers this is her one day of adventure, she accepts. Once inside, however, a constraint falls over her. She thanks Fred, and turns to go, but he begs her to remain and as the evening progresses, the two young people fall deeply in love. On the way home, Fred stops to buy a little white puppy for Irene and as she holds it close, her guardian meets them at the door and furiously sends the boy away. After several poignantly sweet meetings, Fred defies Irene's misgivings and dares to ask Wagner for Irene's hand. After an uncomfortable silence, the guardian asserts it will of course be necessary for the boy to submit to a physical examination. In his study Wagner probes deeper and deeper into Fred's life and at length learning that Fred's father committed suicide after being forced to witness his wife's horrible death at the hands of invading soldiers, the physician rises suddenly and proclaims that only an insane man would commit suicide, and Fred is ordered to a sanitarium for observation. Fred assures the trembling Irene that this is absurd and he will soon be released. However, when he is locked up with lunatics and regarded as one himself, he realizes that this is the scheme of Irene's guardian who will lose her fortune when she marries. Escaping, he meets Irene and urges her to elope with him. However, he is followed and recaptured. As a lunatic he is confined to an insane asylum by the ruthless Wagner, while Irene, unable to account for Fred's failure to meet her as he promised, returns home. Wagner tries to interest his ward in Eisick, a tool, but when a discharged keeper from the Nicolassee asylum comes to Irene and tells her of Fred's confinement, she hurries to him. Fred, himself from long hours in a straight jacket, attempts to choke Irene, and sobbing she leaves. At last gaining an audience with the great physician Renken the weeping girl induces him to investigate her guardian's asylum. At last the stupendous fraud Wagner is exposed, and realizing his plans have failed, Wagner, himself more than a little mad, commits suicide. Fred is released, and comes, through the love and faith of Irene, at last "out of the darkness into the light."

THIS ONE WOMAN

Effie McCloud Drama File No. 10191

ALL her life Paula had been held up to ridicule because of her excessive weight, but with her rise to fame on the radio as the foremost woman singer of popular songs, she began to get proposals from men who were not averse to sharing her hour of popularity. Every man who attempted to make love to her cut her to the heart until she met John. In the interest of the children for whom she was singing in benefits regularly, she began a personal campaign to solicit funds and as she leaned forward, her face animated by her love for the destitute little ones, John was caught by the beauty of the woman's thoughts. He suggested they have lunch together so they could discuss the matter further and soon big handsome John, who had never had time in his life for women, knew he was in love with Paula. Only a woman who had been starved for love as Paula had been could have poured such devotion upon a man, and when her fans wrote in in thousands to congratulate her upon her marriage, John tilted her sweet face and informed her gaily he was a little jealous of her big audience. Looking up at him with lovely brown eyes, Paula replied only that she could not yet believe anyone as wonderful as John could love her.

So they had gone on, happy in each other. Then one night Paula had to sing at a dinner for charity, and as she entered the ballroom, she saw John's gaze follow a beautiful slim woman. It had come, Paula thought as she swallowed hard. Ruth's cold beautiful eyes met John's in frank appraisal and soon they were dancing together. There was a poignance in Paula's voice as she sang that night which brought more congratulations than ever, but Paula watched dully through the days John's fight against his overwhelming desire for the slender and magnificently built Ruth. One night, as John refused Ruth's telephoned invitation, Paula came back from her broadcast, and seating herself heavily, asked John why he didn't go to Ruth. "You know?" he asked hoarsely, She nodded, and when he would have denied that another woman meant anything to him she told him she wouldn't be happy holding him against his will. Sometime, perhaps, if he needed her . . . "Bless you, Paula, for understanding," and John rushed to Ruth. She received him with a slow smile and together they went away.

The days that followed, John saw his passion for Ruth slowly die. When they dined together, Ruth turned away dishes, and nervous and irritable from lack of food, she felt John contrasting her with Paula and screamed at him impatiently. Once they entered the dining room and someone had tuned in Paula's broadcast. With a rush of fury, Ruth dashed the set to the floor and as the startled diners looked up, rushed from the room. When John came to her she was packing. "You love her, Heaven knows why. Go back to her," Ruth shrieked.

Paula was finishing a broadcast. It was her wedding anniversary and she had sung the songs John loved best. There were tears in her eyes when she finished. Turning from the microphone she looked in amazement at John. And as he asked softly for forgiveness she drew his head to her. In the control room, they shut the studio off, and left the two together.

HONOR AMONG WOMEN

Marcus Clarke Drama File No. 10211

IN love with the handsome and dissipated Si Lake, lovely Leon Barnet, new to Broadway at length yields to his eager lovemaking. As the days follow and realization of all the ideals she has abandoned fill her with shame, Leon cynically accepts the gin Si offers her to deaden her senses until at length, realizing how low she has sunk, she goes away. Her position in the chorus lost, Leon tries to find another job, but it is summer and new shows are not opening. More and more often she gets gin on credit from the pudgy Borneson, until at length he tells her she will have to pay in cash or . . . Desperate, Leon comes to Si to appeal for aid, and shivering before his smile, more cruel than ever, she knows she is a fool to love such a man. Si stares at Leon unseeing for several moments, then offers to give her the money on condition that she help him win a girl, Faustine May for him. For a moment Leon feels sick, but as Si goes on talking and Leon remembers Borneson's eyes, she weakly agrees. Si is to get Leon a position in the chorus of the Teddy Bears, next to Faustine, and Leon is to break down her resistance.

Si's plan gets way to a flying start. Leon, grown soft from dissipation, finds it difficult to get into her rehearsal rompers, and Faustine laughingly assists her. To strengthen her friendship with Faustine, at Si's urging, Leon even gives up the liquor for which her body cries, but in Si's new consideration and his infrequent invitations as a reward for her good service, Leon, who can not help loving him, finds consolation. One night, out with Si, she suddenly becomes ill from the doughnut and soda she has had for lunch, and Si, believing she is drunk again, takes her home. It is Faustine who cares for Leon and soon the girls take a room together.

It is then that Leon haggardly comes to Si and tells him she's not going through with it, not going to betray Faustine. Si smiles at her belated sense of decency, but at least tells the aching Leon that he will marry Faustine. Hating the whole wretched business, Leon returns home and tells Faustine she is going to a party at Si's and would appreciate Faustine coming along for moral support. Si is a good host, but Leon's nerves are at the breaking point, and when at last Faustine and Si are off in a corner in earnest conversation, Leon gets up to go according to plans. Outside, however, she dismisses the taxi that is to take her back, and waits unhappily in the garden unable to move from the still house. At last, hearing a struggle within, she rushes to the door and pounds for admittance. A disheveled and hysterical Faustine greets her and as Leon sees Si's body lying in a pool of blood, she forces the weeping Faustine to go, and sends for a doctor. Si's wound where Faustine has struck him on the head with a bronze statuette is deep, but far worse is the doctor's grave assurance that Si is addicted to drugs. Only her great love gives Leon the courage to stay with Si during the torturous cure. Alternately he curses and worships her, but at length, his long struggle over, he looks at her humbly and tells her he loves her. If she will marry him, he will try now to make up to her for all her unhappiness, and Leon, weeping a little, allows the regenerated Si to hold her to his heart.

QUEEN OF THE VALLEY

Lillie Knight Drama File No. 10089

ALONE in the darkened schoolhouse Mary Hammond gave way to sobs. For eight long years she had taught here so that some day she and Walter could be married. Because Walter had never wanted her to go out with other men and because she loved him, Mary had dropped all the eager young suitors who had come to pay her court. Today had come Walter's letter telling her that eight years was a long time—and he had fallen in love with another girl, younger, prettier. Mary was not one for holding a man who would be free, but the pitying glances of her neighbors cut her to the quick. It was Mr. Rankin, the County Superintendent who asked her if she would be interested in teaching in an isolated school. "A little missionary work," he called it, smiling wryly, and Mary who wanted to go away, anywhere away from the people who knew about her and Walter accepted the post.

Half way up the steep mountain side, the car stalled. For hours Mary plodded in the broiling sun until at last she reached the first farm and introduced herself to the garrulous Mrs. Boyd. It was discouraging work bringing education to the valley and starting with thirteen pupils, Mary soon found she was expected to be an information bureau, practical nurse and spiritual adviser as well as teacher, but in the strain of her work she found surcease from the recurring thought of Walter and the happiness that was not to be. More than that in David Rawlins, tied to his farm by the necessity of having to support an indolent father, Mary found a friend. He came to her for books and for stories of the outside world which he was only able to visit on rare occasions, and brought to her an understanding of the simple valley folk. It was David who suggested that she conduct classes for adults, and soon the unlearned people were assembling eagerly listening to her stories taken from the history of their country. She taught them the rudiments of arithmetic and enthusiastically sent off a report to the superintendent about her classes. Then, the next day to her dismay, she learned that most of her pupils were otherwise engaged in illicit distilling of liquor. David's father was one of the worst offenders attracted by the promises extended by a promoter, Day. And when Mary valiantly tried to show her pupils that Day was paying none of the huge profits he had promised, Day informed her pupils that she was jealous of their success and induced them to stop coming to her school.

Then one day a still exploded and set fire to the vicinity. Day and two others were instantly killed and David's father gravely injured. Together David and Mary cared for the injured and saved many lives. At last the valley people had their lesson and again they turned to Mary wistfully, trustingly. When Walter wrote asking if she wouldn't come to his wedding, Mary asked David to drive her to her own town and as she sat in the little Church she knew she didn't care that Walter was being married to another woman. David reached for her hand understandingly, and in her eyes was the answer to the question he was going to ask.

HIGH MANSIONS

Rose Famulary Drama File No. 10105

LONG after their fathers had split up their business partnership after an irreconcilable argument, Thelma Groves and Russell Manners met again in a restaurant, and recognizing each other, ruefully started a conversation. Soon, in love with each other, they tried to get their parent's consent to their marriage, but when Mr. Groves refused to allow his daughter to marry Manners' son, recounting at great length his grievances against his former partner, the Manners angrily added their objections, and the youngsters spurred on by the opposition eloped. Lionel Parks, the young lawyer for whom Thelma worked, looked at her dazedly as she explained that she was leaving to get married. He had never dared to tell her of his love knowing she was in love with Russell, and now his chance was gone. With what enthusiasm he could muster, he wished her well and assured her if ever she needed her position it would be open to her.

However, on their return from their honeymoon, Thelma and Russell discovered that their belief that their parents would be reconciled to their marriage if they eloped, proved without foundation. Russell's parents threatened to cut him off without money or a position unless he came to live with them, and ungraciously consented to allow his bride to come with him, while Thelma's parents foresaw only disaster ahead for the newlyweds if they went to live with the Manners. Within a few months Mrs. Manners' nagging drove Thelma frantic and after unfounded accusations, Thelma went back to her parents. Realizing for once that his mother was at fault, Russell came after his wife and promised he would get an apartment for her and the baby that was coming if she would only return to him. Russell managed to get another job but the day the baby was born he lost it through his parents interference. Thereafter conditions were worse. Pitying himself, Russell drank continuously and when the baby needed food, Thelma, ill from malnutrition and improper care, sent Russell out to pawn her engagement ring. As he reeled to the door, however, Russell met his father who had come to tell a story about Mrs. Manners' heart attack caused by her son leaving home, and torn between his wife and his mother, Russell went to his mother. For hours Thelma waited, and at last, miserable, held her baby to her and returned to her mother's home. On the way she was almost hit by a car and shocked, Lionel got out and came to her rescue. Too weak to refuse his assistance, Thelma accepted the wholesome food he bought for her and little Buddy. But as Lionel was leaving, Russell returned and bitterly he muttered that he never believed what his mother had said about Thelma before. In that moment, the last vestige of Thelma's love for her husband faded and when Russell went off again, Thelma found a position to support herself and her child. Associating with cheap women, Russell, on a crying drunk, decided to return to his wife and staving off the hands that sought to stay him, he climbed into his car. Intoxicated, blinded by the lights, he ran his car over an embankment and perished as his car went up in flames.

Years later, at the engagement party Lionel was giving for his sister, he led Thelma into the garden and taking her hand asked if she wouldn't take his sister's place as mistress of his home, and as he added, "Buddy, I think, will like it," their lips met in the first, long-waited for kiss of love.

THE EGG THIEF

Rose Famulary Comedy File No. 10106

MR. JONES asks his wife why there are no eggs for breakfast and is told that the chickens apparently have not been laying for the last few days, as she has found nothing in the nests. Sambo, the ten-year-old colored boy is called in, and told that since he has complete charge of the chicken coops, he must find out what is happening to the eggs or lose his job. He goes behind the barn and gives three long whistles, summoning his gang. They promise to help him; and agree to hide and seize anyone seen taking eggs. Sandy, the youngest member of the gang, says that he thinks rabbits are stealing the eggs to color them for Easter. They all laugh at this, but he trots off toward the rabbit pen. That afternoon Mickey sees a strange man leaving the chicken coops. He gives three whistles for the gang, and they surround the man and drag him toward the farm house, calling for Mr. Jones, who appears, and sees his friend, Judge Bailey, being pushed by the boys. The judge says that on his way home he stopped for a minute to see Mr. Jones' prize-winning

Rhode Island Red. The gang quickly disperse, knocking the judge over in their haste, and return to their hiding posts. Mary then sees a woman walking across the field toward the house with a basket. The gang take it away from her, finding it filled with eggs, but Mary tells them to run as the woman is Miranda Hopkins, her music teacher. Mrs. Jones comes running out of the house, hearing Miranda's screams, but before she can reach her, she falls down, breaking all her eggs. She tells Mrs. Jones that, hearing they had no eggs in their coop, she brought these for them. Both Mr. and Mrs. Jones warn the gang to stay off their property.

As they pass the Brown farm next door, Bobby sees what appears to be a white egg lying in a box on the window-sill. He reaches for it but it turns out to be a china egg, used in darning, and several pairs of sox fall out over the ground, just as Mrs. Brown comes to the window. She calls to her son to turn the hose on the gang, which he does, tripping over it himself. Mickey informs the rest that since they cannot find the thief, they must get some eggs to put in the coop so that Sambo will not lose his job. The gang enter Hammer's grocery store, telling the clerk that they are "just looking around," and each one takes a few eggs, hiding them in their shirts. As they leave, they pretend to be absorbed in looking at the array of canned goods on the top shelf, and do not see that Lem Carter, Mr. Andrew's clerk, is waxing the floor. They slip and stumble over each other, while the eggs roll out and break.

Mickey whistles for Sambo, and tells him that they will all watch for the thief that night. As soon as it is dark, they gather around the chicken coop; Sambo is frightened by a "ghost," but it turns out to be Mr. Jones' night-shirt. They decide to leave, and on passing the pig-pen, hear a cackle. The missing eggs are found; the chickens, escaping through a hole in the fence, have gone here to lay their eggs. Sambo then discovers that Sandy is missing; they remember the rabbit pens, and find him there, asleep.

WILD BLOOD

Mildred Cullum Pyle Drama File No. 10198

INFURIATED by her aunt Brenda's warning to be less reckless, Megs leaped on her horse and like a streak cleared the fence into the next estate. While Aunt Brenda cried out in relief and her father in admiration at her spirit, Megs laughed gaily. But the next instant Blast tripped over a vine and she landed ungracefully in a small pool. Swearing viciously, she looked up into the grinning face of the artist who had rented the Colby estate. Her face contracted with fury and Kit Colby recognizing her as Megs Brown whom he had been warned against as a hard headed little devil, mockingly advised her to learn how to handle a horse better before she attempted another stunt like that. Goaded to fury, Megs strode to her horse, but seeing that Blast was limping she flung herself down and pityingly lifted the injured leg. Roughly Kit dragged her back warning her she'd get kicked, and with firm hands he bound Blast's leg. "Thank you," Megs said, but as she attempted to go a dizziness called her attention to her bloody shoulder. Kit asked if he should send for the doctor or remove the thorn himself immediately and wrinkling her nose Megs replied she hated fussy Doctor Hensley. Carefully Kit washed his pen knife in antiseptic and as he probed for the thorn her nails bit into his flesh where she held him but no sound escaped her white lips. Only when she turned to go did she faint, and Kit felt a curious sensation as he held the plucky kid. Recovering, however, she left curtly.

Humiliated by Kit's taunting, Megs laundered his handkerchief and returned. "That sketch isn't so hot," she said and Kit wheeled. Silently he completed it, but when she came to look again he had added a caricature of her sprawled in the pond. "I'd like to slap you," she choked. "Why don't you?" he goaded. But when she did, he pulled her against his body and as she struggled in his iron grip he announced that he was going to make her beg for mercy. Megs fought violently against his crushing mouth, and at last he relased her.

Trembling she ran home and flung herself under a tree. Long sobs shook her body. Seven days passed. One night her father had a guest for dinner and Megs felt her face redden as Kit acknowledged they had met before. All through dinner he tried to apologize for his conduct but Megs sat stonily even when he spoke of the picnic he had been planning for them. For three days she held out against her curiosity. Then she came and together they had their picnic, ruined for Megs by Kit's explanation that he was going away. When the impending storm broke in all its fury, Megs clung to Kit who sarcastically asked what had become of her old courage. Suddenly she was gone, and Kit found her sobbing under a tree. Kneeling besides her he said humbly, "I've been rotton Megs, but you would have laughed if you knew that I loved you." "Laugh!" It was a sob. But the rest was lost as they clung together, never more to doubt.

BROKEN RAINBOW

Olga Elva Ardrey Drama File No. 10070

AT the Community House dance Bob and Jean gaily just as if their hearts aren't aching dully. Handsome in his uniform Bob holds Jean close and as they walk home together he begs her to marry him to-night, so they can have one night before he leaves for the war. Then, knowing too well the madness that is seizing everyone about he shakes his head and with one long kiss they part. All during the long months while Bob is away, Jean regrets that they did not marry but when, the war over, he returns to her unwounded, their joy is inexpressible. When the boat docks she meets him in New York. They are married, and with the assurance that Bob's job is waiting for him they go to Niagara for a poignantly sweet honeymoon. Still under the spell of their happiness, they return home, take an adorable apartment, and Bob sits Jean in the big comfortable chair while he shows her how proficient he is at cooking a steak.

The next day Bob leaves for work but when he returns there is something in his heavy footsteps that is ominous and at last he tells Jean that his promised job has been filled by another and there is no opening for him. Forcing gaiety, Jean assures him there will be other positions but Bob shakes his head. He has spent the day looking, and he knows how few jobs there are available. So Jean goes back to work and at the end of the week they leave their little apartment and move into a cheaper furnished room. Jean sees how discouraged Bob is as he comes home each night after an unsuccessful attempt to find work, any kind of work, and her heart bleeds for him, but at last Bob can no longer stand living on his wife's salary. One night when Jean returns home she finds only a note telling her that he has gone to Boston and has not had the courage to say goodbye. As soon as he can support her, Bob ends, he will send for his beloved Jean. Alone Jean weeps but when she confides to her employer her difficulty his arms steal about her shoulders as he comforts her with the statement that he has long wanted to take care of her. As his mouth comes down over hers, Jean tears herself out of his grasp and slaps him hard. Weeping, she returns to her empty room.

Meanwhile Bob has hopped a freight and falling asleep awakens to find that two desperate characters are sharing his quarters. Only Bob's assurance that he is in the same fix they are restrain them from "bumping him off." The criminals hop off but Bob is caught by the police who are searching for them. Suddenly a blue-coated figure is attracted by the commotion and with a cry of relief Bob greets Mickey, one of his war buddies who assures the others that Bob is guiltless. At headquarters Bob proves his innocence and staked by Mickey, goes on to Boston, gets work and sends for Jean who with tears of joy in her lovely arms comes to her husband, never more to be separated from him.

THE FIGHTING KID

Virgil Stewart Drama File No. 10051

FOR as long as Eddie Smith can remember he has been taunted because his brother Jack is the heavyweight champion and he, well he is nobody. Eddie would like to be a fighter himself, and he gives promise of having the build to seriously rival his brother, but he likes good times better. In an attempt to knock some sense into his kid brother's head, Jack gives him a fierce beating, but when he attemps to bathe the boy's forehead and tell him what a good sport he is, Eddie brushes him away violently and leaves home.

In the gym, Eddie learns that two managers Bill and Jim will train him if he shows them he's good, but Eddie's eye catches a pretty girl and he is off. As he is entering a night club with the girl, Jack passes and with a look of contempt tells his brother he's yellow. The girl stares at Eddie and asks him if he's going to take that talk from a big palooka and disgustedly Eddie returns to the gym, starts training, and soon convinces the two cynical managers that he has what it takes. With the thought "Yellow" in his mind, Eddie trains like a fury, but soon he begins to hanker after night life again and the managers have to force him to go through his training. While doing his road work one day, Eddie stops to help a pretty girl fix a flat tire. In gratitude she invites him to a dance and soon he is head over heels in love. Lorette promises she will marry him if he wins the heavy weight championship and with this to spur him on, Eddie gets out of bounds. His sparring partners groan under the force of his onslaught and one after another Eddie begins eliminating each of the fighters his rejoicing managers get for him until finally he is up to the top. There remains only his brother between him and the crown, but Eddie makes up his mind he doesn't want the title if he has to take it away from Jack. When he tells his managers they plead with him that he has a right to win, but Eddie can't see their viewpoint at all. He sees Lorette out front and goes white but he enters the ring to lose. The fans razz and boo as Eddie's shots pad lightly on the champ's shoulders and for six rounds Eddie takes his punishment. Then while he is taking the count, Jack sneers at him and calls him "Yellow!" again. With a bound, Eddie leaps across the ring and sails into his brother. For several rounds the elated fans yell and cheer at the great fight and at last Eddie wins. He helps to carry his brother out and in the dressing room, Jack confides that it was his last fight. He had decided to retire on his profits. He wanted to see what a good fight Eddie could put up, that's why he called him, "Yellow!" With one arm around Lorette, Eddie introduces a great guy, his brother, and goes outside where a cheering crowd awaits him.

CHILDREN OF THE TENEMENT

Betty F. Geesey Drama File No. 10049

FROM the window of his father's office building, Dale Emerson, scion of wealth, hears a woman scream and looks down in the street to see the lifeless body of a child dragged from the wheels of his father's car. To his amazement his father seems unmoved and tells his lawyer to take care of the case. That night at a dinner party given by the Emersons everybody sympathizes with the money king for the annoyance caused him and Dale, unable to stand it any longer rushes away from the gaiety and at the hospital secures the address of the child's people. Touched by the grief of Mrs. Thorps, the child's mother, Dale soon convinces her his sympathy is genuine and he determines to help the little family. The following evening, after work he returns and meets for the first time the oldest daughter June. Dale stays for dinner and in the simple goodness of the little home sees the contrast to his own luxurious mansion where, upon his return, his mother and Gloria, the girl she would like him to marry, are laughing hysterically after too many drinks.

Dale astounds Stephens, his faithful servant when he orders a hamper packed for an outing in the country and the weekend with the Thorps, little Anneta, Tommy, and June, is one which he is always to remember. The last hour, Dale quietly carves in a tall straight tree June's name, his own, and the date, and whispers that some day they will return to this shrine of their love. Weeks pass and soon the Emersons begin to worry about their son's preference for the tenement girl and in an effort to make him forget, the Senior Emerson sends his son to South America to encourage small investors to buy stock in a company which after a phenomenal rise will crash and wipe out the little men. It is with a determination to prevent this fraud that Dale leaves, promising to write regularly to June, of whose love he is now certain.

Stephens it is who comes to the dress shop where June models and warns her that Mrs. Emerson and Gloria are scheming to destroy June's faith in Dale. Forewarned, June appears unmoved when Gloria has June model a trousseau for her marriage to Dale. But when June sees an announcement of their engagement in the papers and gets no mail from Dale for months although she writes regularly she begins to feel less secure. A visit from Mrs. Emerson who sweeps in to assure the little tenement girl that even if her son married her, she would never be able to appear in his society and in time he would hold her responsible for losing for him his status in the world to which he was born, routs June's hope. At last she breaks down and when the doctor advises her to take a trip away from the city, the little family go to the place in the mountains where they had spent their first glorious week end with Dale, son of the man who killed June's sister. Meanwhile Dale, having ruined his father by warning the small investors of the Emerson methods, returns to discover the false report of his engagement. Hurrying to the tenement he finds the Thorps have gone without a clue and when Stephen assures him that June wrote regularly, Dale makes his mother confess that she bribed the mail clerk to destroy both Dale's mail and June's. Gloria finds easy consolation elsewhere and with the certain instinct of one who truly loves, Dale finds June in the mountains besides the tree where first they pledged their love.

OTHER TIMES

Mrs. Henry Paar Drama File No. 9897

NEW YORK had seemed to Martha to be the Mecca of joy-seekers, and with the sum of money she had inherited she had come on alone to find some of the happiness she felt was her due. But amidst all the hurrying, happy people crowding the streets not one looked friendly and alone she crept back to her hotel to weep alone in her room. Dressed in the new clothes she had though would open the way to romance, Martha sat friendless and unhappy in the hotel dining room and envied all the women who had escorts. The waiter, tall, smooth looking took her order and smiled. Blinking back her tears she smiled back rejoicing in the first cordiality shown her. It didn't matter that he was a waiter. And as he suggested dishes for her to order and his eyes gleamed, she knew he would attempt to speak to her later, and she didn't care. Walking through the park with him after his hours, Martha found Nicholas sleek and poised. Although it was she who paid for the taxis, there was something in the way he tipped the driver that made her feel secure and in a few short weeks he had convinced her to invest her money in a farm where they, as husband and wife, could be happy. The farm Nicholas selected was a little disappointing, but Martha didn't show that. Two days later, Nicholas disappeared and soon they told her the truth. He had only leased the farm and had run off with her money. Her baby was born dead and disillusioned and bitter, Martha signed up as a red cross nurse. The soldiers, discovering that she would have nothing to do with them, took pleasure in tormenting her and frequently Dan Parkley, rescued her from the too ardent attentions of one of the others. While Dan convalesced he told Martha of his frail wife and his three adored children, but one day Martha found him bowed in grief and learn that his wife had died. Shortly afterwards the Armistice was signed but Dan and Martha stood apart from the rejoicing throngs. They had nothing to look forward to. The day they were to leave for home Dan softly asked Martha if she would marry him and come and live with his youngsters.

It was hard for Martha, still young, to act as mother to children nearly grown, but she adored them all and working for them found happiness. Dan's tenderness was unfailing until the depression set in and he stood in danger of losing the farm with its creameries and gardens. Then, grown suddenly discouraged, he came to the table and gruffly scolded because his food wasn't kept hot until late hours. Martha bore it all uncomplaining until after a fight he told her she didn't belong. Then, wet-eyed, she left. But the children wept for her and Dan, awakening to his cruelty, ran all the way to the station and begged Martha's forgiveness. Together they returned and with the children about, told each other they would see the hard times through and find the happiness that awaited them.

A MAN IN A THOUSAND

Florence M. Michaelis Drama File No. 10096

IT is with a feeling of happiness that Leonard Worth gives his sister Cora in marriage to the fine and honorable Robert Merrill. Within a few years, however, Cora rebels against her husband's preoccupation with his business and although Robert lavishes diamonds and flowers upon her, she yearns for the tenderness that his frequent trips to his mines deprive her of. Then Harold, with whom Cora has once been infatuated, arrives in town and makes her pity herself as a neglected wife, and when trouble at his mines causes Robert to postpone the long anticipated fifth anniversary trip to Europe, Harold's glib comfort deludes Cora into eloping with him.

Meanwhile the town is agog over the fight of the independent railroad which they control, against the main system. Robert, uncertain whether he can return in time, leaves his proxy vote to Leonard whom most of the small stockholders have already made their proxy. But when Leonard finds Cora's child sobbing because he has not received his good night kiss, Leonard is led to the discovery of Cora's note telling of her elopement with Harold. At the risk of not being on hand for the meeting, Leonard rushes to save Cora and finds her in despair, already conscious of her great folly. Holding her to him, Leonard convinces her that for the sake of her husband and her child she must return as though nothing happened. His secretary unable to hold the meeting up, Leonard learns that by default, he has betrayed the trust imposed in him. Even Robert is forced to look upon him as a Judas when Leonard explains only that he was detained on personal matters. In an address to the mob of infuriated citizens, Leonard gives his entire fortune so that no stockholder will lose anything, but the distrustful citizens suspect some ulterior motive. It is only when Leonard learns that Harold has misused his sister for the express purposes of keeping him from the meeting that Leonard loses his head and finding Harold administers a violent beating. Under a fictitious name and without protest, Leonard allows himself to be arrested for assault and after some time is freed on parole.

His prison record, however, serves to seal his lips when he subsequently falls in love with Cora's school mate, Ellen Meredith, but Cora helps Ellen break down her brother's defenses and hungrily he kisses her. Ellen plans a gay engagement party and her unhappy fiancee starts as he looks into the accusing eyes of Ellen's uncle, head of the parole board. But even when Leonard tells her of his prison record, Ellen stands by him. However, Harold is finally captured by the police for pulling another shady deal and he claims that Leonard, who has already made an attempt on his life, framed him. Afraid that after all his sacrifices, Cora's indiscretion will be revealed, Leonard makes no answer, but Cora moves forward and tells the whole truth. Her husband puts his arms about her quivering shoulders in a new understanding, Harold is led to prison, and in the garden Leonard draws Ellen into his arms.

THE GARDENIA MAN

Barbara Dunn Drama File No. 10190

ONE of the thousands of fame-seeking extras in Hollywood, Martha Moore daily makes her round of the studios and returns tired but undaunted to the tiny apartment she shares with her mother. When she and Ross Newcombe, another eager young extra, are given bits in a picture, in thier shared happiness, Ross asks if he may take her home. On the way Ross spends most of his first paycheck to buy gardenias for Martha at the stand of Julius Capper. Touched by the gesture, Martha invites Ross to dinner and they laugh like two youngsters as he helps her wash the dishes. Martha's bit is cut out of the picture but Ross wins the enthusiastic acclaim of the producers who hastily offer him a contract. Over-joyed, he stops to buy a box of gardenias carefully arranged by Julius, and rushing up to Martha's apartment, sweeps her into his arms and tells her his success will mean nothing unless she will share it. Mistily she arranges her flowers and gives her lips to Ross.

However, Martha's mother becomes ill of a contagious disease and Martha, tending her is quarantined. Ross sends daily gifts of gardenias, unable to visit, and Martha is stricken too. During his work upon his new picture, Ross meets Salina Roger, an exotic society woman, who becomes infatuated with him. The fan magazines devote considerable space to the supposed romance of the rising young star and Martha, during her illness decides that she can only hold Ross down by marrying him. When she recovers, she goes to his apartment and finds Salina waiting for Ross. Ross sends Salina home, but Martha tells him as he is driving her home, that she will release him from his promise to marry him. Despite all his protests, she is firm and wishes him well.

Her mother dies, and Martha, taking up her career again, wins the friendship of Stephen Gregory, a director, who, falling in love with her asks her to marry him, offering security and lasting devotion. Martha promises to give him her answer, but walking home she passes Julius Capper, and when he offers her a gardenia, she makes a great effort to hold back her tears. She prattles of her role, of her present happiness, but Julius discerns the grief hidden beneath her gaiety and lets her talk on.

Meanwhile, for several months Ross has been making a picture in the Eastern studios, to which Salina had followed him. Now, he returns alone and sauntering down Hollywood Boulevard, he too hungers for Julius' understanding and his flowers. As he stops the sight of the gardenias bring deep pangs of remorse. Salina was glamorous but it is for Martha he longs, Martha who had understood him. Salina, greedy for new sensations was a beautiful parasitic orchid, but Martha, dewy in her freshness, giving all, asking nothing, had answered a chord of his being. Julius, greeting him as if he had not been away for so long, explains off-handedly that Martha had bought some flowers and forgotten to take them with her. Half-hesitating, Ross agrees to deliver them to her, and as he stands at her threshold, with a sob, he draws her into the shelter of his hungry arms. The next day, Ross and Martha are married, and Martha wears lovely gardenias, bought from Julius Capper.

UP AGAIN FLANNIGAN

H. W. Swope Comedy File No. 10230

HERBIE FLINT had never yet gotten the short end of a bargain. That is he hadn't until Vivian Hilquit, blonde, petite, and ravishing in the outfit of an aviatrix met him. Herbie began to find, suddenly, that he was air minded. Come to think of it hadn't his old associate Mike Flannigan joined the Royal Flying Aeronautical Association. Herbie remembered with a blush of shame how he had scoffed at Mike for paying out good money to learn how to fly, but now he felt, as he stole another look at Vivian's trim figure, there was something to this air business. Vivian took up her plane, poised breathlessly on the wing, and leaped into the void. For a moment, Herbie turned away. He couldn't stand it. That beautiful girl . . . But in a few minutes she was disentangling herself from her parachute and laughingly she put her arm through his and walked off the field with him. Herbie didn't see the wink she gave her confederates. He only knew that it was incredible that a girl like Vivian should be so interested in him, so willing to explain all about the glorious future of aviation. That night Vivian and Herbie went to a night club. Herbie wasn't a drinking man, but it was a wonderful feeling that tingling in his brain, and Vivian was beautiful and before Herbie staggered home he had paid fifteen hundred dollars for a plane. The next day, repenting of his prodigality and moaning with the pain of his head, he called up Vivian but she and her pals had fled and there remained only the old plane for which he had paid fifteen hundred American dollars. Herbie groaned. The door burst open. In came Mike Flannigan dressed up in an aviation outfit. Herbie groaned again and turned his head but Mike was enthusiastically prattling of having a diploma for flying and being on the lookout for a nice bargain in an airplane, and Herbie sank heavily in his chair. In a few minutes, Herbie had signed his plane over to the happy Mike for a paper note which Mike could meet only if he made good. Outside, Mike tried to get customers to take up in his plane, but people just didn't seem to have confidence. So back he came to Herbie and begged him to come out as sort of a come-on. Just sit in the plane so others would take courage. Herbie came, and Mike seeing customers but still no confidence suddenly started the motor. Herbie yelled above the motor. There was a tremendous explosion. Herbie moaned, 'The engine must dropped out," but Mike explained it was just the backfire, and went into a triple loop that made Herbie go white. Mike took out a bracer, and after a long swallow, Herbie felt a little better. Another loop and he was shouting, then an air pocket, "If I can get hold of my toad sticker I'll cut myself loose" cried Herbie and always that spitting of the engine. At last, his head reeling, Herbie stepped to the ground. "That ends it!" he shrieked. "Ends what?" Mike asked. "My flying career," replied Herbie as he sank to the ground in a dead faint.

MODEL WANTED

Helen Barnum Drama File No. 10054

WITH the money she has earned washing dishes, Selma Wayner walks longingly past a restaurant, buys a newspaper and scans the Help Wanted ads feverishly. As her fingers rests on an ad for a model, she crosses the street away from the restaurant, buys cheap rouge and fancy clothes in a department store basement, and enters the fashionable dress establishment of Franz and Lorenz. When the amazed Charlotte tries to get her to leave, she sits herself down on the cut velvet divan and swinging her legs shrills that she is here to stay until she sees the head guy. Chagrinned, Charlotte tells Lorenz about the girl and as he looks out through his peep door, a grin spreads his features. Before the mirror, propped on her ridiculously high heeled red shoes, the girl is gyrating with her skirt pulled high over long straight legs. It is an amazed Charlotte who receives orders to have the girl report to-morrow and slangily distrustful of the questions put her, Selma goes through the paces required. Her exaggerated hip-swing as he walks as she supposes a model should evokes a noise like a muffled laugh from the office of Lorenz, and the girl swings about hoydenishly, to look into the smiling eyes of David Lorenz. Gravely he tells her she is going to make a wonderful model.

The next morning Selma arrives while the colored maid is dusting and making her way into the model's dressing room is transfixed at sight of the lotion jars and lovely clothes. She has thrown off her own cheap things for a lovely gown when the other models come in and laugh at her painted face. Trying to be calm, Selma light a cigarette only to be told there is no smoking permitted. A feeling of panic comes over her and she shudders at the thought of the laughter her combination suit will evoke. With unsteady fingers she dips her hand into the cold cream jar and removes her makeup and the maid takes her in hand, puts a hot towel over her face and sets her hair. In a few minutes the beauty that Lorenz has detected is obvious and trembling and still trying to hold on to her pose, Selma takes her place with the other girls in the model drill. There is a disturbance as Lorenz enters with some suave looking men and the girls are informed that six of them will be chosen for a style parade at Pierre's at extra pay. When they are asked to slip out of the dresses to insure the best figures for the underwear review, Selma hesitates, then in an astounded silence stands before them in her ugly combination. With eyes fixed ahead she marches around and around and as she is called among the six murmurs of 'Good sport" reach her.

Determined to make good, Selma buries herself in books of etiquette to the amusement of the other models and when Lorenz tries to speak to her she evades him lest he guess she idolizes him. When at last she is told the boss wants to see her in his office, he offers her a better job. Trembling she tells him she likes this one but after a long time David Lorenz tells her that he has loved her from the first and the position is as his wife, at last believing, she gives herself to his kisses.

HIGH MOUNTAINS

Dr. P. J. Park Drama File No. 9959

HIS unwavering faith that his patients will in time pay him for the medical services he has rendered for years causes Dr. John Horn to come at last to the realization that his wife and daughter Jane are being deprived of proper food and clothing while his patients are flocking to a quack recently come to town. Sighing heavily, John at length decides to take his little family with him and join the pioneers who are travelling westward. In a covered wagon drawn by two long horned oxen the emigrants start toward Arkansas and after many days come to the foot of a mountain where a little spring purls. There they stop to rest and as they exclaim over the beautiful scenery, John tasting the water is convinced that it has medical properties and he and Emma decide to settle.

Shooting small game for their needs, John begins flooring the tent he has brought with him and all day he works chopping down wood to make a home for his family. Emma too works tirelessly but when John comes in from his fields she and Jane meet him cheerily. It is November when John, working in his fields, sees a caravan of covered wagons approaching. Some forty or fifty pioneers arrive but John is touched by their low spirits. An epidemic of malaria has laid many of their number low. Bringing the sick in, John begins tending them and with the aid of the spring which is a remarkable curative, he soon has them all on the way to recovery. With gratitude in their hearts they plan a celebration and John gets out his fiddle, the one luxury he has permitted himself. All cares vanish there in the mountains as they dance to the tunes of the violin and Lee Gray, one of the younger men who has fallen in love with Jane, discovering that John is unable single handed to build as he wishes, instigates a vote among his companions to help John build his house before they move on. With willing hands the house soon is erected and when the others leave, Lee together with five families of the settlers remain on to settle in the Arkansas mountains. Busy days follow. Temporary tents are erected about John's residence while the pioneers begin fencing off their fields for their own settlements. Soon John discovers that they can save themselves much time if they work together and they begin clearing each field separately. It is Lee, whose irrepressible spirits lighten many hearts grown heavy with disappointment, who proposes a log rolling contest so that the heaviest tasks of the day are accomplished in the spirit of rivalry and fun. The women quilt and wash clothes together and the community becomes welded together by the firmest of bonds. Often barn dances are organized and to the tune of John's fiddle they dance light heartedly. Other caravans pass, going west, and soon the curative value of the spring makes the Mountain Springs, as the community is called, a spa for malarial sufferers. John's fame spreads. The community benefits and the town becomes a center of activity. But the happiest moment for John and Emma, whose clear eyes have envisioned the greatness of their country, comes when Mountain Springs celebrates its first wedding, and Emma and John give their daughter Jane to the love of the sturdy dependable Lee Gray who has adored her from the first.

TEARS glistening in her eyes, Feola tried to smile as Paul left for New York to study medicine. Returning to her house she found her mother fussing over the wealthy Stephen Miller and as Stephen rose and came toward her, she begged to be excused. Later her mother shook her furiously and asked what right she had to give up Stephen for a worthless good-for-nothing. When arugments failed, Mrs. Vanston resorted to trickery. Pretending to be gravely ill, she touched Feola's heart with her moaning and martyrdom and at last Feola promised to marry Stephen. Only after the wedding did her mother miraculously recover to boast to her friends of the splendid marriage her daughter had made.

Meanwhile, Feola tried faithfully to make a good wife for the exacting Stephen, but when her baby was born in the hospital where Paul was interning, Stephen entered in time to hear Feola plead that she still loved Paul and see Paul rush out of the hospital room. Too dazed by Paul's repudiation to hear what Stephen was saying, Feola, numbly let Stephen divorce her, and she made no defense when he told her he hated her for ruining his name. Stephen's revenge came in taking her son from her since with his money it was easy to gain custody of the child. Her mother, furious with her for giving up a prosperous marriage for a man who would not even stand by her, refused to have anything more to do with her. It was when Feola learned that Paul had gone to a tropic island in an effort to forget, that she realized he must, in spite of his ugly recriminations, love her. Heedless of public opinion, she took passage to join him, but fell into the hands of the natives. Her guides, searching for her implored the help of Paul for the white woman and when he discovered that it was Feola, he risked his life to save her from the filthy hut in which she being held. With native spears flying, Feola and Paul made their escape and seized a boat heading for home. But Feola had contracted a deadly fever from her captors and for weeks her life hung in the balance while Paul wrested with Death for her and emerged triumphant.

Meanwhile, Stephen, remarried, had brought his son up in ignorance of his mother and when Feola, begged to see her boy, Stephen sternly told her she had forfeited her right to have a son when she betrayed him. Paul unable to have a son of his own, saw Feola's unhappiness and grieved with her.

Stephen, a great sportsman, never could understand why his son hated to hunt animals, and once, when young Peter rushed forward to aid a wounded rabbit, Stephen's second shot gravely injured the boy. It was only when all else failed that Stephen called Feola and Paul and for the sake of the woman he loved. Paul save her son. Peter looked at Paul as if he were a god and determined that he too would be a great doctor. Chastened by the near tragedy and Feola's suffering, Stephen admitted that he had never gotten along with Peter, whose sensitivities made him different. And Peter joyously learned that from now on he was going to live with Feola and Paul whom he worshipped.

LUCKY AT CARDS

Kenneth Englund Drama File No. 10066

SUAVE and cool, Tom "Bigshot" Nonnelly lit a cigarette as the elevator shot him to the tenth floor of the Hotel Fenton. Instead of his customary lusty thump, he knuckled the door meekly for he, Bigshot, who called all husbands suckers, was going to see Alice. And Bigshot was going to marry Alice. "You're late," she greeted, then burlesquing coyness she added, "And the supper that I made with my own little hands is a-waiting." Bigshot mockingly portrayed grief as Alice explained that her mother, Madame Rosseure (nee Lizzie Curtis) modiste to those who could afford fancy prices, was detained at her shoppe and he couldn't meet her yet. Alice smiled as she noticed the difficulty Bigshot was having handling his knife a la Eleanor Post but when he laughed later at the thought that he, Bigshot was helping her dry dishes, and seized her in his arms, she returned his kiss then pushed him away. "No, Bigshot," she said. She had found out then. But when she told him she could never marry a gambler and begged him to reform, he laughed harshly. Then pulling her roughly to him he delivered burning kisses to her face as he told her not to be a fool most women would be glad to have him with or without the marrying part. Tearing from his embrace she slapped him viciously and, his dignity hurt, he pushed her hard. Her slim body catapulted through the big kitchen window and with a pitiful cry she fell to the street. His face an icy sheet Bigshot somehow staggered home.

After that Bigshot went haywire. Alice's face, pleading, pleading, was always before him and if it had not heen for Tie Werken, whom he had once sprung from prison, Bigshot would have been put in an insane asylum instead of a private sanitarium where for five long years he battled with his inward self to forget Alice's face. Finally he succeeded and his black hair now streaked with gray, came back to show the wise guys he wasn't through. Time heals all, and now once more Bigshot was in love. One more killing and he was through. Tie called. Three lumber men with plenty of dough were in. The rub was that Banton, one of them had a suite on the tenth floor of the Fenton and when Tie had tried to make excuses he had gotten suspicious. For a long time Tie persuaded Bigshot that after all Alice was dead a long time and finally Bigshot consented to come. Nonchalantly he entered the room and by morning raked in the last of the chips. "Fire!" Outside screaming panicky hotel guests crowded the halls waiting feverishly for the elevator. Wierdly through the grating sounded the warning of an elevator boy to jump into the fire nets, the fourth floor was impassable. Bigshot laughed insanely at the thought of roasting with the others, and looking down at the fireman's nets dived from the window. Startled cries echoed from the street . . . .

Two chorines were discussing the fire at the Fenton which had been put out after one man had gotten panic-stricken and fallen to his death when a scared elevator kid told everyone to jump for their lives. "Bigshot Nonnelly, one crook the less," the other yawned. Then as she spoke warmly of her Bob who had worked himself up from the bottom, she laughed at her friend's warning that she and Bob had hetter not win too much at cards, "Lucky at cards," you know. Lovely Lucille spoke, "That's a lot of hooey," and ran to admit her Bob.

TRUANT SCHOOL

Sol Richman Drama File No. 10095

IN the principal's office Jim and his friends Jack and Rusty attempt a show of bravado as the vindictive truant officer testifies to their ducking him when he had come to the dock after them. But removed to a truant school, their spirits fail as they are herded with little gangsters behind grim walls. A rigid discipline is brutally maintained but Jim sees the stealing and gambling rampant between the eternally blowing whistles. Within the classrooms the teachers use broomsticks and cudgels to enforce order and Jim is appalled to see in one room, the whole class rise and violently pummel a latecomer. He learns that the teacher encourages this, permitting her class to go home early on Friday afternoons, if they have maintained a perfect attendance record for the week. Jim declines to add his blows until once, unavoidably detained, he is whipped by one teacher and then pounded into temporary senselessness by his own classmates. Resentment makes him take revenge on the next unfortunate and realizing that the truant school is destroying everything that was fine within him, he begs to be released. His petition denied, he manages to survive until graduation. It is Mary, who has loved him throughout, who gives him new hope and together they begin working so they can be married. However, when Jim gets into a quarrel with the foreman over some type accidently dropped, he loses his job. Utterly discouraged he meets his old friends Jack and Rusty, now flashing bankrolls and they show him how easy it is to hold up chain stores. Jim intends to quit and marry Mary when he has made his pile but one night a victim yells for help. Jim and Rusty escape but Jack stops to fire at the man is captured. Wild-eyed, Jim wakes Mary and confesses all to her. Tenderly she comforts him and with the anticipation of their marriage the next morning, Jim stays over. The next morning they are awakened by a policeman who laughs at Mary's plea that they were going to be married and at the police station, Jim and Rusty are identified by Jack who has been horribly beaten by the police to force a confession. Tried and convicted, Jim urges Mary to find another man, but she tells him she loves him and when Jim learns she is going to have his child, a hasty marriage is performed and the bridegroom after a snatched kiss is led to his cell to serve ten years.

Mary tries to carry on and is taken care of by a former school mate whose profession is an ancient and profitahle one. At last Mary yields and when Jim learns of it, he laughs hysterically at the thought that he has been counting the days until he could be a free man, and with the aid of Rusty, he escapes in a garbage container. Dressed in clothes he has taken from a scarecrow, Jim appears at Mary's "place of business" and throwing her from him demands their child. In the scene that follows, Jim is returned to prison and remains unmoved by all Mary's letters. At last, however, his term expires, and now that Jack has been killed in a jailbreak and Rusty hanged himself in his cell when his sentence was extended, Jim, who had refused to break because there was nothing for him outside, finds Mary still waiting. Geutly, his arm encircles her waist and with their child holding his hand, Jim leads Mary to a new life.

POOR Charlie soon discovers that he is in for a henpecked existence as the husband of the socially ambitious Laura. Charlie's greatest desire is to drink a lager of beer and stretch out before his fireplace, but after the first six times, he has given that up as a dream not to be realized. Every penny Charlie makes must be given over to Laura who squanders her husband's salary entertaining society.

It is the wedding anniversary of the Larkins and when Charlie tries to sit in the living room he is ousted by his wife and her vacuum cleaner. He tries to read in the dining room, but she shoos him away. The kitchen, the bedroom, Charlie is driven from each while Laura warns him that he must not say one word too many or do anything that will in any way endanger her status, for this is her big opportunity. Tonight the Mayor is to be her guest of honor and if the affair is a success her status will be assured. Fondly she fancies newspaper society items about the very fashionable Mrs. Larkin and Charlie groaning as he is once more dispossessed wanders out to the street and under the light of a lamp post helps himself to one long swig of liquor. He gulps as a hand descends heavily upon his shoulder and a huge cop says, "It's you again!" Locked up in the jail, Charlie staggers upon a cot while the police chief calls up Mrs. Larkin and tells her to come and get her husband again. With tears in her eyes Mrs. Larkin pays the fine and the chief shakes his head as Charlie leaves guided by his indignant wife. Fifty times in one year! At home Laura scolds like a fishwife, puts Charlie in the shower with all his clothes on and turns on the cold water. In a few hours Charlie is sober again and wearily he promises not to misbehave again.

That evening the Larkin home is brilliant with lights and when the Mayor comes in he listlessly shakes his hostess' hand and explains he cannot stay long. His secretary has advised him to attend the party since Mrs. Larkins gives a lot of money toward beautifying the city, but the Mayor would rather be at his favorite speakeasy. Laura kicks Charlie and indicates that he is to smile to His Honor. She almost faints when he takes the Mayor's arm familiarly and leads him to his den. Laura's heart almost stops beating several times as she can hear indistinct sounds from the den but what she doesn't know is that Charlie has been saying it's a terrible party and His Honor has been heartily agreeing with him. It is the Mayor who sighs that what they need is a good drink, and Charlie unscrews bottles of liquor from secret hiding places until they are both uproariously happy. As they come forth arm in arm they both trip down the stairs and the Mayor embraces Charlie and calls him "my pal." Laura follows them to the buffet where they begin biting into pies, and suddenly the Mayor throws a pie at a pretty girl. Her escort returns the shot but his aim is wild and soon the whole party is throwing pies while Mrs. Larkin finds Charlie behind the piano and finishes the party by breaking all the hottles over his head.

EASY LIVING

Malchus Sevell Drama File No. 10004

BORN into a family of successful merchants, Martin shocks his family when he informs them his ambition is to be a minister. But, they cry, that is a life of renunciation. It is sheer folly to be always dependent upon others for existence when one can wrest a comfortable livelihood through modern business methods. Unable to make them see his way, Martin leaves home determined that his great dream shall not be set aside. Working long hours to defray his tuition Martin enrolls at a University where he can prepare himself for a theological decree. His fervor makes him stand out among the other students and he is early marked for honors. However, he wins the enmity of Peter, a student whose glib tongue if not personal conviction has won him distinction and when Martin succeeds in triumphing over Peter in every contest for honors, Peter plans to ruin Martin.

Martin sets his heart on a fellowship offered by Rogers, a millionaire who as a salve to his own conscience, is setting aside a sum of money to be awarded to the most promising student. This money is to be used for deeper study. Peter too has his heart set upon the award but loses out to Martin. Invited to the home of his benefactor, Martin is dismayed at the realization that Rogers' young wife has been largely responsible for his selection and when she puts her arms about the student's neck and tells she knew from the moment she saw him he was marked for honors, Martin breaks away from her in disgust and telling her she is no better than a woman of the streets, he rushes from the house. Walking for hours to cool his fevered brow, he is accosted by a shabby woman. Looking at her pinched face in pity, Martin compares her with Mrs. Rogers and he reaches into his pocket to give her money only to discover that in his haste to quit the Rogers' house he has left his wallet there. As the girl turns away, Rogers looks after her and her look of despair makes him come up to her and offer her food if she cares to come with him. He takes her to his room and sets a hot dinner before her. As she devours the food ravenously there is a knock at the door and with a grin of triumph, Peter points out the woman to the lowering-browed Rogers. Martin is given no opportunity to defend himself. Rogers withdraws the honors and in disgrace, Martin is forced to leave the college. Laughing hysterically he tells them all what hypocrites they are, and in fury they reply that they will bar him from employment.

His faith is humanity gone, Martin vainly tries to find work and as his clothes begin to hang from his shoulders, he wanders to the river and laughs violently until he sinks exhausted on a bench. In the dark a woman joins him and as he continues to laugh, she looks at him apprehensively. A cry escapes her painted lips. It is the girl whom Martin befriended. Seeing him there, burning with fever, she takes him to her own lodging and bathes his head. Together the two who have lost faith in mankind, find a spark and for each other's sake they take new hold on life. Soon Martin finds employment at the doek and returning to Margot, whose face is now free of rouge, he asks her softly if she will share what is left of his life—as his wife.

CONTINUAL failures in his search for a job had utterly discouraged Jack. One morning, however, he was awakened by his mother who showed him an advertisement reading, "Office boy wanted; long hours, hard work, seven dollars weekly, Anti-War Society, 318 Madison Avenue." Jack dressed hastily and dashed from the house while still combing his hair. Arriving at 318 Madison Avenue, he saw, to his consternation, that he was about 400 applicants too late. The hall was a mass of struggling boys, each striving to get nearer the sacred portal marked, "Anti-War Society."

To remedy this misfortune Jack employed amazing tactics. He dropped to his hands and knees and by pushing, punching, pinching, tickling, and even biting, was progressing rapidly when he suddenly heard someone call out, "The Job's Taken."

In the mad rush to the street Jack, wearied by his strenuous struggle. was thrown from his feet and crushed into unconsciousness by the human stampede.

As he awoke in the private office of the president of the Anti-War Society believing that the love-talk of a beautiful blonde was directed towards himself, he responded ardently, only to be seized from behind by the boss, an ox-like creature, whom the blonde had been addressing.

After the boss and the blonde left, a very ugly lady entered the room and mistaking Jack for the clerk she ordered him about. He insulted her whereupon she set up such a howl that the entire force came rushing out. She screamed that she had been attacked and vowed that she would never set foot there again. Apoplectic, the boss accused Jack of driving away the firm's chief patroness, Mrs. Hulky.

The cries of "America enters the War!" caused Jack to enter an advertisement in the newspapers reading, "Young man. Office work. Apply before nine A. M." Although his mother told him frankly that he was mad to expect employers to come to his home to hire him, the next morning saw hundreds of eager employers, their forces cut down because of the army draft, storming Jack's house. With great nonchalance Jack accepted an offer of $150. a week from the burly president of the Anti-War Society. Back again at 318 Madison Avenue, but under entirely different conditions Jack was given the big bosses private office, and eight beautiful young women to wait on him, who ordered for him a sumptuous banquet. The boss's daughter, the beautiful blonde, tried in vain to attract his attention, but with a scornful raise of his eyebrows, Jack continued eating.

An hour later, as Jack sat in blissful repose, his secretary ushered in the redoubtable Mrs. Hulky, and this time Jack had no hesitation in advising her to wear a black veil to cover her ugly face. Purple with rage, Mrs. Hulky leaned toward Jack, and shook him furiously.

"Get up, brother, get up!" And Jack looked up into the charcoal face of the elevator boy, who told him that he had found him unconscious before the door of the Anti-War Society, and had been shaking him for the last ten minutes.

LOVE WILL COME

Marie A. Betit Drama File No. 10011

TONGUES of flame lick the building and when the casualties are reckoned it is discovered that the twins Jean and Allen Webster and their brother Joseph have been left orphans. At the asylum the youngsters stand out but they are adopted by three different families and years later, when they attempt to carry out their vow to meet again, they find the destruction of the orphan asylum has left no clue to each other's whereabouts. Little Joseph is adopted by Tim O'Rourke, the struggling fireman who rescued the youngsters, while Jean and Allen are both taken into the well-to-do families and years later meet again, unsuspecting their relationship, at a co-ed college. They are immediately drawn to each other, but Jean is in love with Jack Ralston, scion of a snobbish family. The Ralstons, determined to prevent their son from marrying an adopted child, send Jack to another college, but the separation only flames the love of the two young people and they meet clandestinely for ecstatic moments together.

Soon, however, Jean is overtaken by the consequences of her love and her foster mother, distracted by her daughter's unhappiness, goes to plead with the Ralston for the happiness of the young people, only to learn that they have shut their home and taken their son to Europe. Meanwhile, Allen, reading of Jack's departure, feels that perhaps Jean will think more kindly of him, and when his foster mother dies, Allen induces the bereaved Allison to accompany him to Philadephia. A friendship soon rises between Jean's mother and Allen's father and when they reveal to each other the history of their adopted children Allison realizes that Jean and Allen are twins. But, when Allen learns of Jean's betrayal and the subsequent arrival from Europe of Jack, married to another, he rushes out to avenge his sister. Only the despair of Jack when he learns about Jean, and his white-faced recounting of how he could not ask Jean to share his poverty since he would have been disowned if they had married, and so had accepted the bride his parents had chosen, makes Allen leave Jack to the nemesis of marriage to a woman he doesn't love. Jean has her child and Allen's foster parent hires detectives to try to trace the third child, and they find him at the point of death in a hospital. Together Jean and Allen hurry to the bedside of their brother Joseph, who, as a fireman, has given his life to save his foster-sister Janet, a girl of sixteen. Joseph dies happy in the knowledge of his reunion with his brother and sister, and coming from the room of tragedy, Jean and Allen are drawn by their common bereavement to the O'Rourkes. Joseph's inseparable friend, Tim, the oldest of the O'Rourkes is particularly drawn to Jean, and although he learns her story, his love is greater enough to forgive her transgression and they are married. Allen takes his father's place in the bank when Allison retires to go on a world cruise with his bride, Jean's foster mother, and Jean, although at first in love only with Jack, soon responds to Tim's tenderness with a deep and lasting affection. There are smiles in the home of Jean and Tim for they guess that Allen's frequent visits have something to do with the lovely young Janet O'Rourke.

THAT BOY

J. Edwin Ellsworth Drama File No. 9933

"THERE goes that boy," whispered the group of gossips lounging in front of the general store, and as Creighton Lord passed by the group snickered openly. But Creighton, who was used to being regarded by the rest of the town as being eccentric, did not seem to mind, continuing his walk with an abstract expression on his face. Still dreaming, he strolled into the post office, where Abby, the charming post assistant handed Creighton his mail, a bulky package containing photography film. Abby was the only one in the whole village who did not laugh at Creighton's amateur photography, and regarded him as a positive genius. Through her post office window, she had handed out to Creighton books on engineering, electricity and architecture, and now the ambitious youth had turned to photography. Although Creighton had never really looked at her, so intent was he on making a career for himself, Abby never gave up hope.

Meanwhile, Creighton, armed with the precious film, was busily snapping pictures of the natural beauties of his town. Privately he wondered why the Chamber of Commerce of Darly had never thought of exploiting the town as a pleasure resort since the village was evidently losing money, and the city fathers were shaking their heads over Darly's failure to progress. Coming to a woodland glen, Creighton photographed the spot just as the startled figure of Abby, in a bathing suit, intruded, but Creighton hardly noticed her.

The next day a long awaited letter from a New York electrical firm arrived, and Creighton, his photos secure in a brief case, boarded the train for New York, hoping in some way to dispose of his pictures. Aboard the train, Mel Borden, the movie producer was holding a desperate session with his "yes-men," clamoring that he wanted new ideas. Disgusted with their work, he went to the smoking car, where he accidently took the briefcase of the sleeping Creighton, dozing in a chair. In his compartment, Borden, examining the photos, was galvanized into action, and scrambled through the train, yelling for his assistants. Confronting Creighton, he offered him a cigar, then said, "Boy, with these pictures and this girl, I've gotten an idea for a movie showing the natural, typical American girl in her beautiful home surroundings. Where is this place?" With Borden, Creighton hurried back to Darly where the astonished Abby was given a substantial contract, and Creighton really noticed her. Quick to see his advantage, Creighton, financed by his father, manufactured postal cards with scenes of Darly on them, and when, "America's Girl," starring Abby was completed, the whole town, flooded with visitors helped celebrate Creighton and Abby's wedding, in the assembly hall of the new postal card factory.

THREE BROWNS

R. A. Lee Comedy File No. 10036

IN an effort to keep his meddlesome sister-in-law Ann from visiting, the Rev. John Raymond whitelies that his wife Ruth has gone on a trip. Ann come anyway and lest he be caught, John begs Ruth to conceal herself in her room until he can get rid of the unwelcome Ann. However, finding a letter on the pastors desk from Mary, the pastor's typist, saying she cannot bear the thought of "finishing" Ruth, and not suspecting that Mary is referring to an article on the Biblical Book of Ruth, Ann jumps to the conclusion that her brother-in-law in league with a paramour has murdered his wife.

George Brown, a bill collector who has come to either collect for or get back an antique chair which Ruth has bought and unfortunately broken, agrees over the phone to keep his business secret and accepts the alias Brown given by Alberta, the pastor's sister, who mistakes him for the Will Brown whom she had been corresponding with secretly through a matrimonial bureau. The last complication is afforded when the meddlesome Ann sends for a detective Dave Brown to catch the murderer. When the bill collector George, getting down to business asks Alberta, whom he supposes is Mrs. Raymond, how she likes the chair (referring to the antique) she astounds him by saying she likes the sofa better and inviting him shyly to kiss her. Alberta tells the astonished collector that she will keep him secretly in her room, and he believes she means until she can give him the money for the chair. It is to the matrimonially inclined Will Brown to whom Ann, thinking he is the detective she sent for, confides that the pastor has murdered his wife and she suspects he has hidden the body in a trunk; while Ruth's plea that the detective whom she thinks to be the collector, conceal the reason for his being there suits that gentleman entirely.

Although Collector George enjoys Alberta's amiability, he decides to hunt for the chair and after Ann has let Alberta in on her suspicion of the pastor, George's triumphant, "I found it!" makes the women shudderingly inquire, "How does it look?" Mistaking his reference to the chair for the description of Ruth's body, both faint when he calls out, "THE BACK IS BROKEN AND ONE LEG IS GONE."

John soon comes to the conclusion that the three Brown whom he meets at odd moments in his house, are dangerous characters and when he catches the detective snooping he knocks him out and locks him in a room. The loaded gun makes him determined to beat the other Browns to the draw and he locks Will in a room while a conversation with the bill collector who remembers to conceal his business although he reluctantly confesses that the lady kissed him, makes John believe that Ruth is betraying him. When he tells his wife the man agreed to go away if paid, Ruth sobs and says she never should have deceived John but it was the straight legs and back that won her. Ann and Alberta steal John's keys and free the detective and collector who are more prone now to believe the crazy pastor murdered his wife. Will rushes out, a sheet over his head, and is mistaken for the ghost of the lamented Ruth, when the pastor's gun accidentally goes off and the whole household (except Ruth) assemble and amidst the confusion of mistaken identities, John discovers he is accused of murder. Ruth's appearance causes general explanations while the bill collector decides he wants more of Alberta's kisses even if he has to marry her.

WHEN LOVE COMMANDS

Louise M. Courtney Drama File No. 10046

SWEPT off her feet by the impetuous wooing of Tom North, the blonde giant who has covered himself with glory at the annual festival in the small fishing village, lovely Cadence McKay does not suspect that Tom is using her to injure her father Hiram. With a following of the young bloods, Tom is ambitious for the captaincy of the fishing fleet, a position which Hiram has been elected to for fifteen years, and smarting under the sting of his defeat, Tom, after several clandestine meetings induces Cadence to marry him secretly and romantically upon the beach. However, Tom's intention to get a fake minister is foiled by the village dreamer who induces a real minister to tie the knot, At the next election Tom wins the coveted post from Hiram and, discovered by Cadence in the arms of a beautiful dancer, Nashti, tells the girl harshly that the marriage was a joke. For the last time Hiram captains his fleets. A storm arises and when he counsels landing, Tom induces his men to remain out for one more cast of the nets. Hiram risks his own life to try to save the rash Tom, but the boat goes down with all aboard. Without Tom to hold her, Nashti travels on.

The report of the fishing town tragedy is read by Dick Stern, young artist who tosses a coin to decide whether to vacation there or accept the countless country house invitations extended him. Arriving at the fishing town, Dick draws in his breath sharply at sight of Cadence striding along the beach and he induces her to pose for his painting, "Innocenee." At the completion of the canvas, Dick induces Cadence to marry him and come to New York with him. Troubled by her past, when her child Dickie hovers between life and death, Cadence tells Dick about her betrayal. The child recovers but Dick in an excess of self pity asks Cadenee to leave. He seeks consolation vainly in wild parties and at last meets Nashti, the dancer and asks her to pose for his painting "Consolation." Warm blooded, Nashti tells Dick she loves him but even as he marks the surrender of her full lips, he recovers himself and tells her she is deluding herself in that belief. Accordingly he returns to Cadence's village and directed by old Hiram finds her on the beaeh and begs her to return with him. Back in New York with her baby and her father who has insisted on bringing with him the faithful old clock of which he is so proud, Cadence is seen by the jealous Nashti who taunts Dick with his wife's "purity" and tells about the episode when Cadence had been spurned by Tom North. Dick pretends to be unmoved by the recital but Cadence sees him wince. It is then, however, that Hiram, fiddling with his clock which has stopped finds a letter that was delivered to him shortly after Cadence left forgotten is from the minister telling how he had with Dick as his bride. The letter he had completely officiated at the marriage ceremony and enclosing the marriage certificate. Hiram, unsuspecting the importance of the letter even now ascends the stairs murmuring the fool letter stopped his clock, but Dick taking Cadence in his arms for the first time begs forgiveness for all his harshness.

JUNGLE OF SOULS

Oswald Fisher Comedy Drama File No. 10052

AT the dock Marie Thompson waves gallantly to her daughter sailing out of her life on the arm of her distinguished bridegroom, and with slow steps returns to her beautiful apartment on Riverside Drive. As she sits alone in her vast living room, she recalls the past. Her girlhood in a small village, her brilliant marriage. Through the years her memory carries her to her widowhood and the day she sees her son Robert off to war. Then the tragic notice that her boy is listed among the missing . . . Now, her daughter married, there is nothing to keep Marie from going back to the village and scenes of her happy girlhood.

Arrived home, Marie gazes with sinking heart at the old homestead overgrown with weeds and gone to seed and in the village tavern she learns that for years the place has been surrounded by ghostly stories. Undaunted, Marie determines to resurrect the old homestead and under her able supervision it soon emerges in simple loveliness. She moves in with Milly, a woman of all work, too simple to acknowledge ghostly fears and too awkward to be in general demand. After weeks of tranquility, during a thunderstorm the two women are awakened by a terrific crash of pots below and armed with pokers they cautiously descend to see two tramps leaving. Marie stays their flight and learns that for several years the old home has served as a meeting place or Jungle where men of the road come for shelter.

Touched by Marie's kindly interest, one of the wanderers known as the Duke, is influenced to stay as a handy man and under Marie's skillful questioning becomes a book of knowledge of the quarter million jobless fellows of the road.

Of great interest to Marie is this jungle of souls. She has the idea of revamping the dairy house into a station for homeless men. With the Duke's assistance the place with its self serve plan of management soon becomes famous amongst the brotherhood. Beneath the roof of Jungle Home are enacted many scenes of comedy and pathos and despite the antagonism of the local mission to Marie's ministering, the work goes on and many a man is given a new lease on life.

A year passes. Spring floods sweep the neighboring train trestle away. Terror reigns along the bank for there is nobody to warn the train, due in ten minutes. It is one of Marie's boys, who, with a rope about his waist, swims the seething current, warns the approaching train in time to save the lives of countless people although he, himself, is dragged many feet. A hero, he is tended by Duke, and later by Marie who in the delirious raving recognizes in the sick man her long lost Robert. Under the gentle ministrations of a mother, Bob soon recovers. As mother and son watch the glory of a setting sun Marie with a radiant face quotes:

'Ye that cast bread upon the waters to ye shall it be returned hundredfold."

THE THIRD GENERATION

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 10061

TIRED of the restraint imposed upon him in the little town of Hilton where he has made his fortune. Nicholas Warnell takes a trip to Florida. There he became infatuated with a night club hostess and realizing the ridicule to which he, father of a grown son would be exposed if his liason were suspected, Nicholas, assured by the woman that she can him happy, decides to sever all relations with his past. Accordingly he has a note delivered to his son's family telling them of the death by drowning of Nicholas Warnell. In a few short months, however, the woman having run through his fortune leaves him for a younger and richer man, and brokenly Nicholas longs to return to his own dear ones but dares not for shame.

Years pass and his longing to see his son and grandchild overcomes all other considerations. At last in the guise of an old and deaf junk dealer, the once proud Nicholas Warnell returns to Hilton and takes a little shack at the edge of the town. Stolen glimpses into his son's happy home, comfort him and one day, seeing his grandson Arnold embace Enid, the adopted daughter of the Warnells, the bent old man is so happy that he coughs. Enid gasps at sight of the old gray head at the window, but when Arnold turns, the old man has hurried away into the night. The Warnells go away for a vacation taking Enid with them. Arnold, left alone begins to hang out with bad company. One of his companions, a young rake tells him of easy money and offers to let Arnold in on "something." Pointing at Nicholas who stops his decrepit horse and wagon in front of the poolroom and drops in for some tobacco, the gambler tells Arnold that the junk dealer is supposed to have hidden money in his shack. Together they make plans to rob Nicholas and that night they steal up to the tiny hut and demand that the hemit give up his loot. Nicholas insists that he has nothing and the gambler flourishes a gun. Thoroughly sick of the whole business Arnolds begs his accomplice to put the weapon away and in the struggle, Nicholas is shot and falls unconscious to the floor. The gambler upturns the room and finds a paper proving the old man to be Arnold's own grandfather. Remorseful, Arnold brings the wonded man to his home and sends for a doctor.

Nicholas recovers and points out the dangers of loose living to Arnold who, however, feels unworthy of Enid. However, Nicholas tells the returned Warnells that his junk wagon had been struck by a hit-and-run driver and Arnold had brought him to his home to be cared for. Arnold, his slip covered, asks Enid to marry him and so happy are the Warnells to discover Nicholas alive that the past is entirely forgotten.

THE CHAINED HEART

Kenneth Barger Drama File No. 10048

WHILE on a newspaper assignment, Kenneth Brown, young reporter, is appalled by the harshness of Judge Danton in sentencing Ed McConnell to a long term in prison after the boy has proved that he didn't know the car he was driving was going to be used to escape from a bank robbery. The man who had hired Ed to drive the car had been killed by policemen's bullets and Ed had been captured. Kenneth writes up Ed's story as a human interest feature for his paper and incurs the wrath of the bull-headed judge. However, when Kenneth falls in love with Sylvia, who happens to be the Judge's daughter, he knows he is in for trouble. The Judge throws the boy out of his house when he discovers him talking to Sylvia and warns him if he ever sets foot in again he'll be thrown in jail. For days Sylvia is miserable and knowing that not one word that Kenneth published about her father was an exaggeration, she dares to plead her love for the young reporter. As a result, Danton uses his political influence to take Kenneth's job from him. Sylvia meets Kenneth in defiance of her father's wishes and Danton finding out he has been disobeyed, strikes his daughter. Unable to endure the thought that the girl he loves is being mal-treated, Kenneth begs Sylvia to elope with him. They leave the city together but on the train they are appalled to learn that the vindictive Judge has broadcasted police alarms charging Kenneth with the abduction of his daughter and claiming that the former news reporter has stolen a large sum of money from his house. Since Sylvia is under age they know that if they are found Danton can prosecuted Kenneth but in the months that follow their happiness is shadowed by the constant need to elude the police. A baby is born to them and just as they have at last settled down happily, the police led by the ruthless Danton break in on them and bring Kenneth back on the charges his father-in-law has trumped up. Sylvia's heart sinks as her father looks at her with an insane light in his eyes and tells her that nobody can defy him and get away with it. He'll show the newspapers that he can be just as stern with his daughter's husband as with other criminals, and when Sylvia pleads with him, Danton shoves her aside so that she falls cutting her check.

The day for Kenneth's trial is set. Danton has refused to set bail for him and he has been confined to prison all this while. While the Judge is waiting to pass judgment upon his son-in-law, McConnell, who has just escaped from prison with several years more of his sentence still to serve, creeps into the Judge's room. Danton wheels about and blanches as he stares into the muzzle of McConnell's gun. As McConnell edges up to the Judge, telling him he is going to pay for every long minute in prison, Danton winces and pleads for mercy. Then, with a cry of terror he wheels and plunges backward through an open window to his death. In the courtroom all is confusion and McConnell escapes. Kenneth is tried before a just judge and is released. Re-instated on his newspaper, he begins a campaign to consider the appeals of many of the victims of Danton's severe sentences, and as the political machinations of the once respected Judge Danton are brought to light, Sylvia shudders and clings to the husband she loves.

WHAT A DAY!

Jessie L. Ryburn Comedy File No. 9975

THE brrrrrrrrrr of an alarm clock awakens Mrs. Petwin from her dreaming of a country in which nobody has to work, and after turning over three or four times she arises, sees that it is 5 A. M. and with a sigh begins dressing. Hurrying to the kitchen she prepares breakfast for her brood of young ones and pulling her hat on as she runs, dashes down the steps and into the rickety Ford her husband drives. As the car stalls she rocks impatiently, worrying about all the nurses who will be delayed and at last she gets to the hospital where she works in the kitchen as a nurse. Hat still perched high on her head she begins getting out eggs and bacon and she claps her hands to her head in good natured confusion as the nurses fire orders at her. Suddenly there is a disturbance without, and in march a troup of painters, ladders and all. She urges them to get their ladders out of the way and one of the bolder of the painters, amused at her delightfully flushed cheeks, bends forward and administers a resounding kiss. Just then the pompous thin-lipped matron walks in and exclaims, "Well, I must say!" After hopping about excitedly she prepares to make a grand exit only to trip over the painters' ladder and sprawl ungracefully across the floor.

The painters get to work after a hearty meal and Mrs. Petwin prepares to go to the bank before it closes at three. Suddenly there is a wailing in the hall and the two youngsters, children of the painter fling themselves on Mrs. Petwin's broad lap as they tell her about opening a closet and having a skeleton jump out at them. She manages to quiet them and begins to go when the painter's helper comes hobbling in, much the worse for a fall from the nursery window. He had been painting what he supposed was the room where empty cribs were kept when suddenly all the babies began crying and in his surprise he fell from his ladder. Mrs. Petwin prepares hot coffee for him and is just going when the nurses come in clamoring for food and she has to serve them all. Fleeing down the street she arrives at the bank at 3:05, just too late. But a fat man comes out and Mrs. Petwin slips in, makes her deposit and grandly departs. Back at the hospital she continues to dispense food and be kidded by doctors, nurses and painters until fatigned she returns home where she has to prepare supper for the family. Groaning she yields to their pleas to take them to the movies. But Mr. Petwin's Flivver sputters and phuts and finally stops utterly and holding the children the unhappy family tramp home through the rain. After putting all the babies to bed, Mrs. Petwin stretches herself and clad in an old-fashioned flannel nightie answers the door and reads a telegram saying her youngest daughter has cloped and has left with her bridegroom for a Cook's Tour. "What a day!" mutters Mrs. Petwin as she tumbles heavily into bed.

MAN OF TWO FACES

Mrs. Charles Adams Drama File No. 9198

THERE was a reason for Bill's nickname of Coal Bank Bill for he loved working in the mines which were the sole industry of their little town. Like his father and his brother he fitted the miners cap to his head, slung his jacket over his arm, and with his lunch-kit firmly in hand blew a departing kiss in his mother's direction and joined them for the walk to the mines. He never failed to wave when they passed the Meister cottage for Alice looked for his morning greeting. Though Bill bashfully scouted any one elses's suggestion that Alice and he were in love he knew that it was true and he expected to marry her some day when they were both a little older. In the company of his friends one evening he good-naturedly tried to laugh off their teasing about never drinking anything stronger than his mother's cider. However when they dared him, he seized the proffered glasses of whiskey and drank them at a gulp. Amused by the success of their taunting they bullied Bill into drinking more and more until Bill was hopelessly drunk. Late that night his mother awoke to help a reeling son to bed. From long habit Bill awoke at the usual early hour but his head was heavy and his senses numb. His father stormed and raged as he presented himself at the table but his mother tried to keep him from the mines that day. Working in one of the lower shafts besides his father who maintained his stubborn silence, Bill suddenly heard a loud roar and looked up to see the roof of the mine collapsing. Before he could move his father was pinned under a falling pillar. When help reached them Bill was weeping and cursing himself as he held his father lifeless body.

Feeling that if his senses had not been stupefied he might have done something to aid his father. Bill took to drink to shut out the jeering fingers which he imagined pointed at him from every corner. As he looked up from pouring a drink for himself at a table in a cheap dance-hall, he saw a smiling blonde who asked if he weren't going to invite her to drink with him. Her cheap prettiness attracted him and he reacted pleasantly to her obviously flattering sallies. With his arm about her shoulders which showed enticingly from her abbreviated dress, they left the hall and shakily made their way to her room. He believed Gert when she told him she loved him and though he did not give up drink entirely he got a laborer's job so that he could provide for his woman. But one night Gert rose to leave the hall with Ryan, a coarse fellow who had just gotten leave from his ship. And as Ryan pushed the protesting Bill back into his chair Gert stood by with a mocking laugh, Bill realized how little he meant in Gert's life. Tottering out of the place he was sharply awakened by the excited murmurs of little groups of people clustered about the street. When he understood that there had been an accident at the mines nearby, he remembered that his brother was probably one of the men trapped in the disaster. Rushing to the scene he worked tirelessly to bring aid to the victims. When one of the men whom Bill succeeded in bringing to the surface from the gas-filled mine proved to be Bill's brother, Bill thought that now perhaps he had redeemed himself and could meet his mother and Alice once more. And Alice's warm kiss of greeting as she ran to meet Bill was ample warrant that she agreed with him.

ROMANCE OF THE NORTHWEST

Hyman Rabinovitz Melodrama File No. 10110

WHILE making a tour of inspection of her father's vast timber interests, Barbara Westley is sighted by Pete Ford, leader of a band of outlaws, who gives chase. Terror lends wings to Barbara's legs and as she pauses breathlessly at the bank of a river impassable because of its falls, Pete comes in sight. Hurling herself into the troubled waters, Barbara is swept relentlessly toward the rapids and Pete, watching from the bank, sees her rescued by Wayne Marston, rookie Northwest Mountie. Wayne pulls her ashore and in a nearby cabin restores her to consciousness. As Barbara's eyes widen with terror, he reassures her that she is safe and urges her to get some rest. Meanwhile, Wayne's chief, riding up with some of his fellow redcoats, finds Wayne guarding the girl. The boy begs to be allowed to escort Barbara safely home, but he is reminded that he has had previous instruction and is commanded to follow them. The Chief himself accompanies Barbara but as she nears her father's estate, she is appalled at sight of the still smoking ruins. A shot rings out and the redcoat slips from his horse, dead. Barbara is seized by the guard Pete has posted to await her return and she is carried to the outlaw hideout. When Pete pulls her into his arms, however, Barbara defiantly administers a resounding slap before all his men. Furious at the insult, Pete has Barbara confined to an inner room and decides to kill both her and her father whom he has kidnapped in order to gain possession of the Westley timber lands. However, Estelle, Pete's woman realizes that it is a case of wounded pride with Pete, but when she speaks her resentment, Pete hurls her violently from him. Brooding, Estelle decides to avenge herself and rides to the ranger camp to give Pete's whereabouts away. Meanwhile Wayne has returned and is frantic because they have heard no word from Barbara or her escort. When Estelle comes in, he proceeds immediately to Barbara's resuce leaving Estelle to guide re-inforcements summoned from the various outposts.

Breaking through the outlaw guard, Wayne sees Barbara struggling in the arms of Pete. He tears into the outlaw who, however, with the aid of five of his guards, soon overpowers Wayne. Shaking his head to clear it, Wayne finds Pete has fled with the girl and follows. On a cliff he sees Pete holding Barbara as a shield but by a ruse gets him off guard and in a terrific hand to hand battle finishes the fight. Weakened as he is, Wayne overcomes Pete who staggers backwards and falls to a horrible death over the cliff. Meanwhile, the re-inforcements have arrived and the remaining outlaws surrender. Among those lost is Estelle, killed by a bullet from Pete's henchman. Barbara's father, badly wounded is released and in a colorful ceremony, he gives his daughter in marriage to Wayne, and as a wedding present, Mr. Westley entrusts the management of his vast interests to the stalwart and handsome young bridegroom.

SKY RIDE

Bessie Blunden Drama File No. 10104

WHEN the intrepid and lovely Claire Adams flies her plane to Africa to inspect the diamond mines left by her father, she lands at a small outpost. There she meets Peter Staunton, a young missionary, who pleads with her to leave the wild country telling her she isn't safe. She laughs at his fears and taunts him for letting imaginative stories written by stay-at-homes go to his head. Peter blushes scarlet at her raillery but while she is out in her canoe she is espied by a gorilla who overturns her craft and swinging her across his back, plods rapidly through the forest. Claire's screams avail her nothing and at last exhausted, she stops. In the branches of a buge tree the gorilla has its lair and to it he carries the frightened girl. For many moments the beast stares at her while she cowers but when she attempts to escape, he pulls her baek with his hairy paw. Still frightened, she is aware that her captor is trying to amuse her and at last she regains something of the courage for which she is famous. As she begins to feel pangs of hunger she makes motions of eating and the gorilla vanishes to return with a huge stalk of bananas and cocoanuts. These last he breaks open by cracking them together with his first and upon the crude meal Claire dines while the beast follows her movements. Night comes on and Claire trembles but as her captor knocks her down several times, she realizes he wants her to go to sleep. For hours she remains on the bed of leaves he has prepared, all senses alert, but at last she falls asleep in spite of herself. When she awakens the next morning, she gasps at sight of the beast looking fixedly at her face, but he makes no attempt to harm her and again she eats the food he brings to her. For days she remains waiting for her chance to escape and at last one day, after she has turned up her nose at the eternal bananas and cocoanut milk, the gorilla leaves her alone while he vanishes into the forest in search of exotic fruits since she will not touch the meat he brings to her. Seizing her opportunity, Claire breaks away and runs madly into the thick of the forest, certain she can find her way back to Peter, who mourns her death by drowning. On the way she is seized by African head hunters and carried a prisoner to their tribe. She shudders at sight of the shriveled heads of what have once been men but the Chief, fancying her, grins. Terrified at the cruel filed teeth, Claire is brought into a native hut and the women strip her clothes from her and begin dressing her hair to prepare her for the ceremony of marrying their chief. The native drums beat steadily, rising in sound until her head feels as though it will spilt, while the natives, sent to get new victims to kill for the feast in honor of the wedding, invade the town and bring in among others, Peter. Claire screams when she sees him ready for slaughter and her cries are overheard by the gorilla who has been frantically searching for his white goddess. Armed with cocoanuts the gorilla breaks up the deadly ceremony. Deadly arrows fly at him but when he kills the chief and many of his braves, the others fly. Peter frees himself and Claire and they dash over to the gorilla who with a last adoring look at Claire, dies from a poisoned arrow. Claire and Peter return together to civilization in the plane which is never again to return to the tropics.

THE HIGHER GUIDANCE

Carl Wolford Drama File No. 10071

AT the airport where he flies United States mail, Ronald Pearson climbs out of his flying togs and leaves on a vacation trip to a beach near San Francisco. The first day there, while swimming, he meets Madeline Thomas, daughter of banker Malcolm Thomas. Their friendship fast ripens into love and the last day at sunset the two lovers part at the edge of a cliff wher they have spent many happy hours. The banker, believing that the youngsters' love may be just an infatuation has urged them to wait for one year and Ronnie is returning to his job. In silence they drive back to the Thomas mansion and with one last kiss part.

Intending to reach the airport by morning, Ronnie speeds through the night and as he is passing a lonely road his car collides with another. He leaps free of the accident but as he picks himself up from the ground he hears a shot and sees the driver of the other car has been shot by his passenger who flees into the night. Ronnie attempts to give chase then tries to aid the wounded man, who, however, dies in his arms. A motorcycle cop rides up. Ronnie is accused of the murder and after a short trial his guilt is proved hy the evidenee of the gun thrown at the side of murdered man showing only Ronnie's fingerprints where he picked it up. Hopelessly Ronnie's eyes meet Madeline's as the judge sentences him to life imprisonment. Behind bars Ronnie is visited by Madeline and by a stranger who, pretending to be Ronnie's brother leaves a harmless newspaper clipping on which, in invisible ink is written, "Manage to be in prison yard at ten. Watch for sky rope." Ronnie tricks his guard, knocks him out and over the prison yard sees a dirigible with a trailing rope. Shot in the leg by the prison guards, Ronnie is slowly hauled aboard the small blimp and carried to an island in the Pacific wher his wound is treated and he is informed that he has been rescued to help in a racket. Personable young aviators are to induce the wives of men heavily insured, to learn to fly. The rich man dies. The widow gets the money. It is taken from her and she loses her life in an air casualty. Stunned Ronnie refuses but he is reminded that he is a hunted criminal and when he learns that his first victim is Madeline Thomas, he accepts rather than let another victimize the girl he loves. At the cliff he meets Madeline again and alone with her tells her all. The Senior Thomas is heavily guarded by detectives while Ronnie is commended for the way he is getting along with the Thomas girl.

Ronnie receives a note to come back to the island and he tells Malcolm Thomas to sail his yacht near the island day after to-morrow. That night an attempt to rescue another lifer from prison fails but Ronnie gets his opportunity to tamper with the dirigible. Strapping on a parachute he climbs out, presumably to fix the rent, but in reality to jump free of the dirigible which crashes with the fiendish chief aboard. Ronnie is picked up by the Thomas yacht and when the bandits surprised at the island admit their chief was guilty of the crime for which Ronnie was convicted, Ronnie re-instated in society takes the willing Madeline in his arms while Malcolm Thomas clears the decks leaving the two lovers together.

THE MIRROR OF CONSCIENCE

W. Roland Baker Drama Fiel No. 10057

EMBITTERED by her own unhappy married life the widowed Mrs. Burton, still tall and beautiful, determines to protect her three daughters, Genevieve, Georgia, and lame little Elenor from marriage. Accordingly she permits no man on the Burton grounds. But, while walking alone to the end of the estate, Genevieve hears a man groan. Startled she investigates and finds Ralph Foster, a young but shabbily dressed fellow suffering from a bullet wound. Realizing that if she brings him into the house her mother will have the police after him, Genevieve runs in the house to the astonishment of the maid, and secures bandages and hot water. In the outhouse she makes him comfortable and he tells her that he had heard of oil discovered in the vicinity of an abandoned farm of his and, broke, had hopped a freight to get there. Spotted by a railroad detective he had run rather than be arrested as a vagrant but a bullet had caught him in the shoulder. Soon the two are in love but Genevieve dares not bring Ralph to her home knowing her mother's attitude. Only Elenor guesses her secret and sympathizes but when Mrs. Burton finds out her daughter is in love with a common hobo, she denounces her and orders her to leave with her tramp. Elenor returning home from school in a terrific storm, learns of her sister's ejection and with tears streaming down her cheeks limps to the station, to arrive after the train has pulled out. Dismally she sinks to the ground and contracts pneumonia from exposure. In her delirium she cries constantly that she hopes her sister is happy. Mrs. Burton sends for a physician and to her dismay sees the young Dr. Hilton take over the case in the absence of the town doctor. However, she is too concerned over Elenor to object strenuously until she learns that in the interim, Georgia has haggardly met the doctor to inquire after her sister's condition and the two have fallen in love. All her plans crashing, Mrs. Burton dismisses Dr. Hilton and sends for an older doctor. But Elenor, beginning to recover confides in the kindly old doctor who realizes how warped Mrs. Burton's life has been and yet cannot help feeling touched by her loneliness. When the doctor puts his hand over Mrs. Burton's while talking to her, she hastily withdraws it remembering to her shame how she has interfered with her daughters' love affairs. But Elenor discerns that new softness about her mother and induces her to recall the now happily married Genevieve. In an effort to make amends, Mrs. Burton asks Georgia why she doesn't invite Dr. Hilton to dinner, and hurriedly leaves the room to hide the tell tale tears in her eyes. Elenor rejoices in the new happiness and freedom that has come to the Burton home and at the marriage of Georgia and the young Dr., Mrs. Burton looks up shyly to see the understanding Dr. Westley smiling at her approvingly.

THE THREE STARS

Lawrence Edward Anderson Drama File No. 9946

IT was Larry who ran interference for Bud Tracy when they played college football together, and while Larry cleared the path, Bud made touchdowns and reaped the glory. Both of them went after the same girl, but Larry, having to work evenings to pay his tuition, had little time for Helen, whereas Bud's seemingly unlimited allowance offered him opportunities to take Helen to all the proms and shows. One night Larry determined to ask Helen to marry him but arriving at the sorority house he, saw Bud's orchids on her shoulder and realizing that he'd never be able to give her orchids or provide for her as she deserved, he said nothing and sullenly went away.

After graduation, Larry obtained a position on the New York police force, and once sent to a night club where gangsters hung out, he was stunned to see Helen enter with Bud Tracy. Desperate in the knowledge that in a few moments the raid would be pulled and Helen would he caught, Larry tried to get her attention but she looked through him without seeming to recognize him, and when the police broke in and Bud shot out the lights so his men could escape, Larry leaped across the room, grabbed Helen who had been deserted in the melee and helped her out the back door. For his pains, one of the gangsters shot him, but although he was confined to a hospital for weary months, his evidence served to convict the leaders of a vicious narcotic ring, and for Helen's sake when Bud was brought in as a suspect, Larry, who had not seen Bud when the shooting began, lied and said that he noticed particularly that Bud didn't have a gun.

Larry searched the city in vain for Helen, but it was several months later before he found her. She was waiting outside the Red Devil Night club and as he approached her, a blow on the back of his head stunned Larry. Through a mist Larry heard Helen scream and a man mutter "You fool!" Then the police came, and Larry sank into oblivion. When he awoke in the hospital room his head was splitting with pain. His door opened and a small figure glided to the bed. "Larry, Larry," it whispered, shaking him desperately. In amazement Larry sat up. "What are you doing here!" "Larry, you've got to get out of here. They're going to get you. They think you know too much." "How do you know?" "For Heaven's sake, Larry don't talk. Go!" "What of you?" he asked. "Oh, it doesn't matter about me," she replied dully. "Get me my coat," he ordered, and groaning as his aching head made his movements slow, Larry drew on his coat, cocked his two guns and pushing Helen into a closet in his hospital room as a tiny sliver of light showed that the door was being stealthily opened, Larry waited behind the door. Two men crept to the bed and a brief expletive escaped as they cried, "Gone!" "Put your hands up!" Larry snapped. The men wheeled, but looking into the deadly guns they faltered and dropped their own weapons. Only Bud Tracy leaped through the air at Larry, and at the shot, fell heavily to the floor. White coated internes ran to the room and police came. After Bud and his friends had been led away, Larry drew the weeping Helen from the closet and she told how, believing that Larry didn't love her, she had accepted Bud's attentions, only to learn he was gangster. Fiercely jealous of her, he had not let her escape, and if not for her scream outside the Red Devil that night, Bud would have finished Larry whom he knew Helen loved. She learned they were going to get Larry in the hospital tonight and she had come to warn him. Larry drew her into his arms and softly said, "But that's all over. And now will you marry me dearest?" And Helen answered, "Yes."

DECEIT

Dorothy Cohoon Drama File No. 10045

ALL Claudette's life she was conscious of her mother's partiality to her younger sister Gloria and it was Gloria who was sent to finishing school while Claudette was kept at home because, as Mrs. Thorpe put it, "Somebody had to see that things were running smoothly at home." When Gloria came home for her vacation, Claudette and Mrs. Thorpe planned a gay party for her but Gloria, sweeping in grandly, took everything for granted and with some few comments on how much better things were done at school left again. It had long been Claudette's ambition to go to Paris for advanced Violin lessons but after the reception Mrs. Thorpe had given her request Claudette said nothing about the subject again until the doctor, examining the overworked Mr. Thorpe advised an immediate rest,—say a trip abroad. For once Mr. Thorpe put his foot down in his insistence that Claudette accompany him and at the compromise of a large check for clothes for Gloria, Thorpe and Claudette left. Although most of the trip Claudette was confined to her stateroom with her father, Russell Lanau, a young American, hearing her play the violin insisted that she perform at the ship's concert and offered to accompany her on the piano. Their duet brought a storm of applause and later, flushed with happiness, Claudette and Russ walked out on the deck and he told her he too was going to Paris to study music. The stay in Paris saw the development of the love of the youngsters and Mr. Thorpe felt better than he ever had in his life. A concert at which Russ and Claudette played together won the critical plaudits of a distinguished musician and Thorpe proudly sent the clipping home. When the Thorpes returned Russ sailed on the same boat and in New York introdueed

Claudette and her father to his patrician parents who approved ot their son's lovely choice. For the older people, Russ and Claudette played "Kiss Me Again," and Russ promised to come to the Thorpe home as soon as he could manage. Claudette and her father arrived home during one of Gloria's parties and the sensation that the exquisite Claudette created infuriated her sister. But it was when Russell arrived for his visit that Gloria, at first for revenge and finally because she really believed she loved her sister's fiance, arranged to fling herself in Russell's arms just as Claudette came into the garden. Returning blindly to her room, Claudette wept and when her mother assured her that it was all for the best that Russell was choosing Gloria, since Claudette was an illegitimate child and not one of their own, Claudette rushed madly to her car, started the engine, and as her tears blinded her, overturned into a ditch. Carried to a hospital, her accident made the front pages with a picture of her holding her violin.

A distinguished judge, seeing the picture dashed to the hospital and after an excited conversation with Mr. Thorpe waited anxiously with Thorpe and the agitated Russell. Only when Claudette began to convalesce did she learn that she had been born in a terrible train accident. Her mother had died and her father had regained consciousness too late to prevent the child from being given over, nameless, to an orphanage. The lad had risen to a judgeship in time but until Claudette's picture in the paper looking just like his beloved wife, had been unable to trace the people who had adopted her. At Claudette's marriage to Russell, she is blessed by both fathers, now fast friends.

HELL ON EARTH

Francis B. Warnock Drama File No. 10047

TALL, well built, Paul had always been contemptuous of his step-brother Mark who loved Alice too. And Alice, although she was fond of Mark and enjoyed their rides on horseback into the country felt that irresistible attraction Paul always exerted over people. It didn't matter that she knew Mark would plod on ahead while Paul was destined to live always on the surface of life, seizing the pleasure of the moment. It was Paul whose arms she loved to be in. But Paul wasn't ready for marriage yet. Life seemed to hold too much. The glitter of the spinning roulette wheel, the perfumed embraces of white-armed women drew him. Back from one of his debauches, he lifted his hands to his splitting head and looked dissatisfied into the glass that mirrored tiny lines etched in his handsome face. Mark was coming in with a bunch of law books when the telephone rang. Paul heard a brief conversation and then, "It's for you, Paul," in a bitter hurt voice. It was Alice and as Paul spoke to her the hardness seemed to drop from him.

That night, driving her in his long roadster, not wholly paid for, Paul knew suddenly that he wanted this woman enough to give up everything else, and as he drew her into his arms she struggled for a moment then relaxed against him. Gravely her eyes looked into his as he asked her to marry him and hesitating she told him she would give him her answer within a week. In her room Alice tried to tell herself that Mark was the man for her, but when the next day ,stopping their horses for a moment at the side of a water fall, Mark asked her to marry him, she saw his rough tweeds, his square cut chin, and knew that she wanted Paul.

Paul started as Geneva's letter implored his help, threatened to expose him and with a voice that was not quite steady he told her to meet him in the usual place in the park. All day Paul tried to get money finally "borrowing" some from Mark's safe. At the gambling tables, his luck was against him, Paul cheated and unsteadily rose from the table with money in his pockets . In the park a white faced Geneva waited, telling him in a voice strident with fear that he had to marry her. When he offered her money, told her he'd do anything to make restitution, but he couldn't marry her, she drew forth a gun. He leaped forward and as the trigger pulled, Geneva crumpled to the ground. With haunted eyes, Paul took a train west. Days later, "Murderer, Murderer" still ringing in his ears, he took up with Stone, a twisted faced prospector who told Paul that with the necessary capital they could clean up a fortune. In the car they bought, with the supplies that Paul had paid for, the miner and Paul started across the desert. The heat grew more intense. The engine stopped. They walked until Paul sank to the hot sands unable to take another step. Stone tugged for a few moments, then dragged himself on . . . alone . . . "Alice," Paul moaned and was silent . . .

At home Mark cleared himself of the accusation of theft. He it was who gave the wounded Geneva money so she could start life again, and Alice found that after all she could forget Paul for there was Mark, steady, sure, and dependable.

THE LONG TRAIL

W. H. Koontz Western File No. 10017

WHEN rumors reach 7 UP Ranch that Notch Ear Agulas and his greasers are rustling cattle in the vicinity, Dave and his pal Bill, are sent out to bunch up the valuable White Faces. As they are passing a clump of bushes shots ring out. Dave's hat is popped from his head and with lightning speed he shoots at two greasers, getting one while the other rides off. Then turning to his pal, he discovers to his grief, that Bill is dead. Gently he picks up his friend's body and rides into camp, then heads a trailing crowd back to the range. However, Agulas, tipped off that Dave is heading this way, has fled leaving the two 7 UP scouts dead, shot through the back. The cattle is rounded up and Dave, returning to the ranch sits brooding over his friend's death. That night he packs his few things and leaves 7 UP to avenge the death of Bill. He takes part of the salary due him and tells the ranch owner that all he knows about Bill's family is that he had a sister who went to school in Chicago.

At the nearest town, Dave learns from the saloon keeper that Agulas and his greasers passed through the place leaving terror in their trail. Heading for the mountains, Dave closes on the Mexican and at last hears the scream of a woman. Riding up, he ducks low as bullets whistle uncomfortably close, and with his gun no higher than his hip he fires a shot killing the greaser attacking a girl. He revives Mable Hanson, whom the greaser had knocked out when her scream warned Dave, and she shudders as she tells him that having just returned to her father's ranch she had gone for her first ride alone when the Mexican had assaulted her. Dave gives her safe escort to Diamond H. and accepts the hospitality of her grateful father. Dave tells them that he is here to avenge the murder of his friend Bill, and they sympathize with him when they learn that Agulas' gang has shot the boy. Dave gets three more of Agulas' men but the chief eludes him. Then, near where his last victim fell, Dave finds a scarcely legible note to him demanding that Dave accept a challenge to single combat. Mabel astounds Dave by pleading with him not to risk his life, but he convinces her that although it may be a trap, he owes it to Bill to have it out. Hanson sends some of his own men to stand by in case of any tricks. That same night Dave learns that Hanson had a quarrel with his son who left the ranch, and finding too that Mabel had just come back from a school in Chicago he is convinced that his friend Bill was Bud Hanson, Mabel's brother.

The encounter takes place. Characteristically, Agulas has his men lined up in the open, but one, skulking in the grass shoots Dave, who, however, kills Agulas before he falls from his horse. Weak from loss of blood, Dave is carried back to the ranch and through Mabel's nursing he recovers. Mabel cries a little when she learns that it was for her brother that Dave risked his life, and Hanson thoroughly approves of his daughter's bridegroom whom he makes new boss of Diamond H.

WIVES OF MEN

Belva George Drama File No. 10019

STRICTLY reared in a small town, Claire falls in love with Dick Gaylord, there on a visit and returns with him to Cleveland. Appalled by the easy familiarity of Dick's friends, Claire feels like an outsider and when she catches the wife of Dick's best friend kissing her husband, Claire feels that she cannot remain on longer and she leaves Dick.

In Chicago she searches in vain for a position and finally is chosen out of a large number of applicants with another girl, Leslyn, a slangy but intense young modern, who suggests to Claire that they save on their room rent by taking an apartment together. Claire soon learns that her friend is in love with a married man, Bowers, but when one day, Claire starts at sight of the two of them together, she is uncomfortably aware of Bowers' glittering eyes fastened upon her. When Leslyn becomes ill, Bowers gives her money to go away for a rest but that night when Claire comes home she finds Bowers, in an intoxicated state, waiting in her room. Startled she orders him to go, but he seizes her in his arms and tells her he has wanted her from the moment he saw her, Claire struggles desperately and Bowers babbles about being tired of Leslyn. At length, Bowers sinks back in a stupor, and sobbing wildly, Claire rushes out of the room rather than create a scandal.

When Leslyn returns she finds a monogrammed handkerchief of Bowers' and she screams that Claire has betrayed her. Their quarrel is heard all over the house and the landlady comes up to warn them to be quiet. Finally, however, Claire convinces Leslyn of the truth. Sobbing hysterically, Leslyn meets Bowers and begs him to come to her, but he brutally tells her he is through and when she cries that she will commit suicide, he gives her a gun and tells her to be still. Claire is dressing when Leslyn comes in. She sees the gun and tries to prevent Leslyn from killing herself but in the struggle, Leslyn manages to fire the gun and falls. Claire is held for the murder and the landlady's story of a terrific quarrel serves to incriminate Claire the more. However, Claire is unable to find Bowers who might prove that Leslyn was determined to kill herself, and Bowers, whose real name is Bentley, doesn't come forward lest his wife, whose fortune he lives on, divorce him. The District Attorney paints Claire as a murderess and the presence of a man in her room while Leslyn was away is used to show how despicable a character she is. Gaylord learns of his wife's trial for her life and immediately rushes to her only to find she has been sentenced to life imprisonment. She tells him everything, but is unable to lead Gaylord to Bowers who had always met Leslyn outside. One clue Dicks finds in Claire's room, a bit of Bowers' monogrammed handkerchief that Leslyn had thrown in the fire and had not wholly burned. Months later, Dick's eye fixes on the monogrammed handkerchief of a man waiting for a taxi and Dick follows him to the room of another poor girl whom he is betraying. Bowers confesses that Leslyn was going to commit suicide and Claire, freed, goes home with her husband.

RETURN TRIP

Mrs. M. Sweeney Drama File No. 10080

THE news that Helen has gotten a nursing position is received with misgivings by her straight-laced family. But new vistas of independence seem to open for her and a new spring comes into her step these days for an attraction is already springing up between her and the X-ray technician, Jim Norman. Helen wonders why Jim never asks to see her outside since even to her, ungoverned in the ways of men, it is evident that he feels strongly about her. They are enthusiastically discussing a recent novel when Jim suggests they finish their talk later. A second later he bites his lip and when Helen asks what it is he tells her he is married.

For days they try to ignore each other but at length, convincing themselves there is nothing wrong in their taking a walk together, they allow themselves the one meeting. Together they find such peace and happiness that it is inevitable they meet again and again, clandestinely. Then, one night Jim takes Helen in his arms and kisses her for the first time. Shaken she tells him that it will be best for both of them if she goes away and tries to forget him. He does nothing to stop her and she gets a position in another hospital. Weeks pass and Helen, torn by her longing for Jim drops him a brief note, for the first time telling him where she is. The letter that comes to her by return post proves to her that Jim is feeling the separation as keenly as she and when her brother Ray is injured, Helen returns home to nurse him. Jim and Helen look at each other and all their resolutions fade. When his wife raises shocked eyebrows at Jim's request for a divorce and claim that a divorcee has no prestige in her society and she couldn't think of endangering her social status, Jim gets a position in a hospital a hundred miles away and sends for Helen. It is an irrevocable step for her, cutting herself off from her family and life begins for the two lovers. Poignantly sweet meetings when nobody suspects follow and their love grows stronger each day. Then Helen discovers to her dismay that she is going to have a child and although they plan to have the baby grow up in a home, Helen is miserable and at last Jim gets a little home for them and they begin to live together as husband and wife. In the neighborhood nobody suspects they are not married but Helen looks unhappily at the child that must bear the stigma of his illegitmate birth. It is when Jim's wife meets a richer man that she decides to get a divorce and in secret Helen and Jim suffer agonies for fear their neighbors will discover the plans under way. At length the divorce is final and their honeymoon is all the sweeter for being so long put off. But Jim realizes how unhappy Helen is and at last she tells him that her heaviest burden these many years has been her separation from her family. Having made her choice to go with Jim she dared not return. Now with two children she goes back and discovers that her mother has long been dead and that Ray and her father are victims of the pneumonia epidemic . Through many days she nurses them and at last pulls them both through. At last she is forgiven and bringing her father and brother with her she returns to happiness with her adoring husband and babies.

CONVICT CAMP

I. N. Stowe Drama File No. 10032

WITH leaping heart Frank walks down the aisle to meet his bride Doris, and as he kisses her full red lips he feels that happiness is at last within his grasp. Soon however, he realizes that no matter how late he works, he cannot earn enough money in his home town to keep Doris in the luxurious clothes she demands, and rather than see her pout, he worries in silence over their limited bank account. When, therefore, Frank is called into the manager's office and offered a considerable raise in salary for showing a line of goods in a distant territory, he thinks carefully before refusing. Doris sees he is pondering and coaxes him to reveal the offer. At her enthusiastic planning of what they can do with the extra money, Frank decides after all to take the position although it means several months seperation from his wife.

In the different cities of his route, Frank suffers agonies of loneliness and Doris' hurried letters are scant comfort. While in Georgia, sitting alone in the hotel lobby, he decides to accept the invitation of another traveling man who, seeing that Frank will not come out for a "real good time" finally induces him to come to the club for a drink. Worried over Doris' failure to write lately, Frank takes one drink too many and then forgets . . . He awakens with a splitting headache in the town jail and is brought before the judge to learn that he is charged with burglary. The story is that he and some accomplices broke into a store. The others escaped but Frank was so drunk he fell down. Unable to prove his innocence, Frank is sentenced to a year on the Chain Gang. Only his faith in Doris keeps from giving way to despair and when Dr. Farley, a practicing physician who does social work at the convict camp, learns Frank's story, he agrees to post letters for Frank in which Frank pretends that his work is keeping him from returning. It is Dr. Farley too, who gets Frank off a few months sooner for good behavior and takes the boy to his home to give him a deeent meal and clothing. Frank is touehed by the kindness of the doctor and his sister Janet who had early taken an interest in the case, but a few days later he learns the appalling news tbat a jealous wife has shot his Doris for alienating the affections of her husband. Frank returns immediately to eare for Doris, but he is dismayed by the change in her. She is hardenod and harsh voiced now. Still he says nothing, awaiting an opportunity to tell Doris the truth about his absence. She nags and frets giving him no opportunity and then, one day, she notices the characteristic shuffle of the chain gang prisoner. Whereupon she turns upon him and refusing to believe his story tells him she is getting a divorce. Discouraged, unhappy, Frank returns to Georgia to accept a position that Dr. Farley has mentioned and months later through the gentle Janet Farley, Frank regains his respect for women and finds happiness with the Doctor's sister.

TRAINING CAMP

John W. Schuetz Drama File No. 10119

WHEN Jack's parents die, the boy is adopted by his father's best friend, the Carrolls, and grows up as a brother to Bud, Paul and Edith. At school the youngsters are inseparable and it is their remarkable team work that makes their high school football team invincible. Jack takes Edith to his prom but as he is about to tell her of his affections, he realizes that she is asking him about Joe, the captain of the team. He introduces them and with a sinking of his heart, realizes they have forgotten about him. To Edith he is always the dependable big brother aud when the boys. upon their graduation, leave to spend a summer at the Kearns ranch in the west, Edith begs Jack to see that Joe doesn't get hurt out there. Repressing a smile at her idea of the West, Jack promises and as the train pulls out, he realizes only too clearly that Edith's every thought is of Joe.

On the ranch the boys have a grand time learning how to ride, and they take their falls good humoredly. Soon all of them have found girls except Jack. Bud falls desperately in love with Libbey, whom he has saved when her horse, frightened, runs wild and only Jack sympathizes with Bud's love sick actions. Paul, the most reserved of the quartette, finds a kindred spirit in Marcella, daughter of the owner of the ranch, and the irrespressible Joe always manages to find amusement with the waitresses at the refreshment store, the girls of the traveling show troupe, or visiting tourists. Then the echoes of war becomes stronger. Everywhere men are enlisting to fight for their country and when a patriotic rally is held nearby, the four sign up. Libbey begs Bud not to go, but after a poignantly brief secret marriage of whicb only Jack is aware, Bud marches off with the others to serve his country. They stop for a while in their home town, and Jack's heart leaps at sight of Edith who is too troubled by the change in Joe, to think of anything else. At the station she clings to her brothers and to Joe, but it is Jack she turns to for the reassurance that leaves her head held high, as her loved ones leave for the front.

In the training camp Bud writes constantly to Libbey and Joe is kept busy writing to all the girls whom he promised letters and pictures of himself in uniform. However, when in the first air raid Paul is killed and Jack wounded trying to save him, the grimness of the struggle becomes more real. They meet Bob, a former football player with them at school. One moment they are talking over old times, the next, Bob is lying out there on Flanders Field. Then, after distinguishing themselves by wiping out a machine gun nest that has caused deadly havoc, the boys get into the aviation corps. Joe attempts to bring down three enemy ships at once and goes down in flames while Jack and Bud finish up his work in a frenzy of grief. While Bud lies, desperately wounded in a hospital, Jack writes his letters to Libbey who never suspects that he is not at the training camp safe. Months after the Armistice, Bud is able to leave the hospital on crutches and he and Jack return home. Libbey weeps as she sees the once fine body torn and crippled, but she brushes away her tears and shows Bud their child. To Jack falls the task of comforting Edith but as she looks into the soft eyes of the one whose strength she has always leaned upon, she knows that she can find consolation—and love with Jack.

INNISFAIL

Ramon Clark Drama File No. 10079

IN the hysteria of war patriotism, young Dale Collins leaves his fiancee Ramona Van to serve his country. Almost immediately, however, the reaction sets in and loathing the needless bloodshed and violence, Dale adopts little Billy, a French war orphan. Until Dale writes of Billy, Ramona's letters have been friendly in tone but now he receives a querulous letter asking if Dale thinks she is going to give her youth and beauty to the care of somebody else's child. Soon the engagement is broken. War! Dale forgets. Little Billy induces Dale to sing and play for the wounded and when the Armistice is signed Dale tries to support himself and Billy by his singing but can't find anyone to give him a chance. Utterly discouraged he is induced by a former buddy to attend a "doughboy return" party and drunk, he makes love to Sylvia, an American heiress . Only the next morning, awaking with a splitting headache, does he take a good look at the girl he married. Then he groans for through illness her face is distorted. Brutually he tells her she got a bad bargain herself but when he tells her of Billy, surprisingly enough Sylvia rejoices in having a child to bring up. Reporters throng the gates and Dale with his arm around his wife, lies about how happy they are, but both of them overhear one of the newsmen remark, "I wouldn't marry a face like that even for her millions." Now Dale organizes a band and soon becomes a sensation. In his success he neglects the patient Sylvia who stays home nights with little Billy whom she adores. Dale talks of going to Tahiti but his plans exclude his wife and at last, unable to remain on, she leaves him, taking Billy with her. Realization comes to Dale at last, but it is too late and after a long search he begins to drink to forget. Soon his contracts are broken and his public deserts him. He gets a job as a stoker aboard a boat bound for Tahiti and aboard sees Ramona, now married to a middle aged millionaire. The boat sinks. Dale and Ramona take refuge on a raft and are the only survivors. After days of horror drifting at sea they are picked up and brought to Tahiti. Feeling completely cut off from the past, they get a job together in a cafe as the team Ramona and Dale and soon their fame spreads.

Meanwhile Sylvia has been operated upon and her blemishes are removed. Learning of Dale's disappearance, she takes up social work and when she learns of an opening in Tahiti, remembering all that Dale had said of the place, she goes with Billy. There she goes to the cafe to induce the entertainers to perform for her charities, and recognizes Dale. Trembling, Sylvia asks the team if they will help her and as Dale accepts and Ramona refuses, Sylvia realizes that her husband does not recognize her. She deliberately sets out to win him from the clinging Ramona but it is the discovery of Ramona's flirtation with a captain that causes Dale to break with her. Ramona sails back to America and Dale sinks into a chair his head in his arms. It is then that Sylvia sends Billy into Dale and with a cry he folds the child in his arms and looks up at Sylvia with the light of understanding in his eyes.

POVERTY PAYS

Harrison C. Butler Drama File No. 10162

HENRY CLAY LISLE, 17 year old son of socially prominent and formerly wealthy southern family goes with three friends to western Kansas to homestead. He lives alone in "dug out," crops for four years. For four months each year he secures work as a section hand on railroad, also as a telegraph lineman, meanwhile writing and submitting magazines stories, none of which are accepted. A prairie fire sweeps down, destroying wheat crops, teams, farm implements, and homes over a large area. By heroic fighting he helps save the house of William Anderson, former Illinois farmer, who gives him shelter for a few months.

During his stay at the Anderson home he writes frequently and he and Anderson's 15 year old daughter, Shirely, become warm friends. Finally Lisle, having lost everything in the prairie fire and without prospect of remunerative employment, is compelled to return to his home in Kentucky, where his family has suffered severe losses from the recent panic.

Meanwhile the Andersons become financially involved very heavily thru land speculation in Kansas, and move to Detroit. Lisle and Shirley, lose contact with each other entirely. Shirley works her way thru Normal School, secures a position as teacher and becomes main support of the family. A sister, Jean, marries Bob McClelland, a bank executive.

After a year of trying to get ahead and discouragements on the farm. Lisle decides to study law. He borrows $100.00 and enters law school at University of Michigan. He works his way through and upon graduation begins the practice of law in Detroit. Just when he begins to get established, the World War breaks out. He enters an officer's Training Camp, goes to France, distinguishing himself as a lieutenant. Wounded, he remains in a hospital. Upon his discharge he receives a small compensation, and returns to Detroit practically penniless to begin the practice of law . Has very few clients and is barely able to make a living. Does some magazine writing, and receives a small check occasionally for his stories. Tries a scenario or two, but none are accepted. Finally secures a position with a law firm as a runner for damage suits.

Six year old Billy McClelland, unusually bright and attractive son of Robert and Jean McClelland, while crossing the street with his devoted aunt, Shirley Anderson, is knocked down by an auto, and suffers concussion of the brain. For several days he is unconscious and practically paralyzed, but finally recovers. Bob McClelland loses position when Detroit banks close. The McClellands are in very desperate circumstances, and hospital expenses are serious burden.

Lisle interviews the family several times and finally secures consent of Billy's parents to allow him to handle their claim against the Detroit Transfer Company. Lisle calls at the house after Billy has returned from the hospital and sees for the first time Billy's Aunt Shirley.

Shirley has been teaching school, supporting her parents and assisting the McClellands. Lisle does not recognize her at all at the first visit, but on his way back to the office keeps repeating her name and recalling the girl he knew in Kansas by the same name. He calls at the McClelland house the next day —and the next day—and finally asks Shirley if she recognizes him. Startled, she recognizes him as the young man who lived with them for a few months in Kansas. They become greatly interested in each other, but he is without funds or income, while she has her father and mother as well as her married sister whose husband has lost his position to support.

A new fire and determination seize Lisle. He is determined to overcome the economic barriers and become "eligible."

Billy recovers. Lisle secures a heavy judgement for Billy's accident. He sells scenario, 'Poverty Pays" for a large sum. And proud of his success, Shirley gives her lips to his kisses. Assured of a market for his scenarios Lisle leaves with Shirley, his bride for an airplane honeymoon in Florida.

POISONED WINE

Bessie Mae West Drama File No. 10097

INFATUATED with a blues singer Ruby, Hal Lyon, owner of the fashionable night club, "Paradise" does not suspect that his crafty little wife Fay is having an affair with his dance director, Jackie. Love makes Hal reckless and when Ruby sings Hal takes a table on the floor so that he can watch her. To him Fay's interest in the dance routines, her pep talks to the chorus girls are a convenience, but when Jackie, who is the one reason for Fay's trips to the dressing rooms, begs Fay to get a divorce, Fay retorts she would be a fool to cut herself off from her husband's income. Besides if Hal fired Jackie, he might not get a job elsewhere. The clandestine meetings begin to frazzle Ruby's nerves and her singing lacks color. Hal, seeing how pale she is is concerned and when Fay slyly suggests that he go back and warn Ruby to pick up in her performance, Hall is grateful for the opportunity of seeing the woman he loves alone. When Fay follows she hears Ruby cry out that she can't stand this furtive business any longer. Hal breaks away from the scene to find Fay waiting for him. "Is Ruby feeling better?" she asks cuttingly as her husband dabs ineffectually at the lip stick smudges on his cheek. Together they ride home in silence and Fay goes to bed while Hal remains up thinking.

The next morning a woman's voice calls headquarters and when the police break into the Lyons apartment they find Hal lying dead, a note telling Ruby they can't go on this way any longer, he loves her but he can't wreck Fay's life, under his hand. While outstretched on the floor is his wife Fay. At the hospital for several days Fay is too ill to be questioned, but when she recovers she explains that she had come in after a game of tennis. She saw Hal lying down, apparently asleep and seeing a decanter of wine besides him had drunk some. At the curious feeling of lassitude she had grown suspicious and for the first time realized that her husband was dead. After calling the police she fainted. Hall is adjudged a suicide and Fay comes into his inheritance. However, she is too ill to enjoy the proceeds and on the advice of her physician she goes to Florida leaving the management of the night club to Jackie. Soon, upset because he does not write write regularly, she returns and unseen by Jackie watches him at the same table from which Hal used to listen to Ruby. In Jackie's eyes there is a glitter inspired by the little singer Lilly. Fay's fears are confirmed when she hears Lilly beg Jackie to marry her and at last he consents. But at his apartment Fay confronts him and after trying to lie out of it, Jackie finally admits he is in love with the younger woman. Fay pulls herself together and in a last attempt to make a gallant gesture says "Good luck, Jackie. Guess I'll drop out of sight like Ruby did." It is when Jackie tells her that Ruby is lying desperately ill at the Sunshine Sanitarium, that Fay, pretending to be the girl's sister is admitted to the room. Ruby smiles wanly as she sees Fay enter and weeping softly Fay tells her that she couldn't rest because she killed Hal. She saw him write the note the night before and knew that it would make him seem a suicide but in her zeal to establish her own innocence she had taken too much of the poisoned wine and had never been well since. With Ruby's forgiveness, Fay takes her hand and together they pass beyond while Jackie and his wife Lilly look across at each other silently as the mail brings a check from Fay, who sends with it her wishes that their happiness shall endure.

DIAGNOSIS

M. M. D. Drama File No. 10060

IT was because she had loved Walter Jones, the famous surgeon so desperately, that Joan, unable to comprehend why he hadn't called for several days, had come to the hospital anl learned that Dr. Jones had left town. Dazed Joan turned away from the window and bumped headlong into Dr. George Williams. He apologized hastily and as she burst into tears he looked at her in dismay and tried to comfort her. In a moment they were both laughing because they were so unhappy and when Williams suggested that they go out and have a bite they remembered that neither of them had eaten for many hours. But seated opposite each other in the dimly lighted restaurant neither of them had anything to say and the paper in William's pocket telling him of Tony's marriage to another man seemed to burn holes through his suit. It was then with a hunted look that the young doctor turned to Joan and said, "If we were married that might help." Joan started. Warming to his subject, Williams explained that they could say they had been married two months already and it would give Tony a taste of what it felt like to be thrown aside. So they had gone to the marriage clerk and the ceremony had been performed. Very coolly Williams introduced Joan to his housekeeper Agnes and then the telephone rang. It was Tony. She had decided her marriage was a mistake and she was waiting for George. All that night Joan heard her bridegroom pace the floor in torment and when, with a set face she offered to go away he grabbed her arm roughly and said, "No, we'll stick to this. For a year anyway." Joan said nothing. He made it very clear. Of course they'd be strangers to each other. But Tony wouldn't have a hold on him. Saying which he left his bride and went to Tony. Months passed. It was Agnes meeting him at the door who placed her hands on her hips and exclaimed that it was shameful the way he was neglecting Joan, especially now. Now? Joan came in. Williams eyes bored through her. She didn't flinch. That was why she had accepted his name. Joan thought he would strike her, but he merely said gruffly, "The bargain was to be for a year." Williams was out on a case when Joan's baby was born and her nurse handed him a note that Joan, believing she was going to die, had written. She said she loved only George. Tenderly he bent over the white face. At the end of the year Tony reminded him he was going to divorce his wife, but Williams looked in on Joan and Matthew George Williams, and he sent Tony away.

Years had passed. George Williams was at the top of his profession when he received a professional visit from Dr. Walter Jones who had retired from surgery, because as he explained to a suddenly comprehending husband, he had never forgotten a woman he had betrayed. Now Jones had nothing to live for. Jones was a very sick man. George sent for his adoring wife and the youngster who was Walter's. Jones held the boy close and Joan and George softly left the room together.

THE DIAMOND CRESCENT

Edgar Willis MacDonald Drama File No. 10027

RETURNING from a dance at the Country Club, Lola Bada discovers that burglars have entered her home, gagged and bound her servants, and taken her most cherished possession, a valuable diamond crescent. She notifies the police and offers a reward for its return. Larry Wye, a young reporter, interviews her. She tells him that she is particularly anxious to recover the crescent as it is a present from her father, given to him by a Hindu prince and supposed to protect its owner from misfortune. Attracted by her beauty and interested in the story for his paper, Larry is anxious to help. As the police are examining the house for clues that evening they see a masked figure, wearing a purple cape and hood, kneeling before the safe from which the Diamond Crescent was taken. Before they can reach him he quickly disappears through an open window. They find a card with the words "The Picaroon" written in scarlet letters on it, lying in front of the safe.

In another section of town, three men are discussing the sale of the crescent. They agree to let it go for ten thousand dollars to Habla, a Hindu antique dealer. One of them is appointed to negotiate the deal. While they are talking the cloaked figure of the Picaroon stealthily breaks the window lock and glides into the next room. A few minutes later the thief returns from the sale of the crescent. The money is placed in a bureau drawer, and the men decide to play poker while waiting for a train which will take them out of the city. Suddenly, as they are in the midst of their game, the Picaroon steps into the room, carrying a pistol. He commands them not to move, quickly takes the ten thousands dollars, and escapes through the window and down the fire escape.

Meanwhile, Lola receives a telephone call from Habla . He tells her that he has the crescent and that if she will come to his residence alone he will return it. Anxious to have it, she complies .The Picaroon telephones the police, informing them of his discovery, and starts out to find Habla. On his way, he stops at an orphanage, presenting the ten thousand dollars to the matron to be used for the promotion of good citizenship among the children.

Habla, receiving Lola in his apartment near the waterfront, plans to kidnap her. On the pretext of showing her the crescent, he leads her into the cellar and locks her in a small room. As Habla is preparing to escape with Lola the Picaroon breaks into the room through a skylight. He struggles with Habla, over-powers him, and binds him. As he is searching for the Crescent he discovers Lola in the cellar. Taking off his mask, he discloses to her that he is Larry Wye, the reporter. Together they find the crescent and notify the police. Larry tells them that he suspected the thieves because of a scarf pin which he found in Lola's home on the night of the robbery and recognized as belonging to Bert Lingle, an ex-convict whom he had at one time interviewed. He traced the crescent to Habla by overhearing their plans for its disposal . Larry is promoted for his clever detective work ,and is rewarded by Lola's love, as she realizes she has found a man whose adventurous spirit matches her own.

EASY MONEY

Mrs. Barney Sovey Drama File No. 10099

IN the summer evening of 1890 Louisa and John, seated on the steps of the tenement house in which they both live, plan the future when John will have completed his studies at law school and they can be married. Louisa promises to wait for John, but her father a worker in a steel mill, is injured when a heavy piece of iron slips from a crane and strikes him. Doctors tell Louisa that he must have complete rest and expert care as his life is in danger, and in order to provide for this she takes a position as house-keeper in the country home of John Anderson, a retired banker. Anderson is attracted by her beauty, and offers to help her . She refuses, until her father writes that he must have an operation and a few months in a country sanitarium if he is to recover. In order to finance this Louisa agrees to Anderson's plans and accepts the money he gives her. At first he is kind to her, but when she tells him that they must be married because of the baby that is expected, he says that he is no longer in love with her. She returns to the city to look for work and receives a telegram that her father is dead. John has completed his education and enters the firm of a prominent lawyer. Finding Louisa at their old tenement home, he urges her now to marry him. For the sake of her child she agrees, concealing her experience with Anderson from him. He is very happy with his wife and the little son whom he believes is his own.

A few years later John telephones his wife that he is bringing a client to dinner. As Louisa greets the guest she realizes that it is Anderson, who has come to John's office to trace her. He tells John her past experience with him, as he now wishes Louisa and the child to return to him. John orders him from the house; later he tells Louisa that she must leave but that he will take care of the little boy whom he has grown to love. She steals the child from the nursery as she goes. The next morning Anderson is found killed by a pistol shot, in his hotel room. During the trial that follows, John is suspected of the murder as Anderson was known to have dined at his house and a servant testifies that she heard John order him to leave. Reading this in the paper, Louisa, who has been hiding with her son in a boarding house, goes to court and confesses that she killed Anderson, revealing the whole story. As the case is drawing to a conclusion, with Louisa's conviction almost certain, another witness appears. Clem Wilson, a care-taker on Anderson's country estate, states that he murdered Anderson to avenge the betrayal of his sister. He produces the gun, whose remaining bullets correspond to the one found in Anderson's body, proving his point. Louisa and John are released.

Realizing that Louisa confessed to the murder of Anderson to shield him, John now knows that her love for him is sincere. He asks her to return to nim and the three of them are happily reunited.

ON ONE CONDITION

W. E. Hogg Drama File No. 10113

DISCOURAGED by his inability, because of lack of the necessary money, to open a law office of his own, Dan continues to work in the office of Attorney Spitz, for whom he has clerked, accepting small fees for cases from the prominent lawyer's practice. His one escape from the monotony of life is upon the bridge at dusk each day when he watches the lights of the city snap on in a thousand offices. During his solitary walks he frequently notices a girl who, like himself, finds beauty in the city. One night they stop near each other, looking off into the distance. "Beautiful, isn't it?" he says softly. She turns to him with shining eyes and as they talk together, they find how many interests they share. Dan asks if he may walk home with her, and when she enters the Black mansion he believes she is employed as governess. The next evening they meet again and Dan grins sheepishly as he tells her how he worried all night that she wouldn't come tonight since in the joy of speaking to her he had forgotten to ask her name. However ,when she tells him she is Julie Black, Dan relapses into silence, thinking bitterly he might have guessed. Black is one of Mr. Spitz's wealthiest clients. It is Julie, however, who makes him believe that wealth means nothing to her, that she has seen only too well how little happiness it has brought her father who worries and frets about the income derived from his oyster business. Then, one night, in the hushed stillness on the bridge, Dan takes courage to kiss Julie, and as he looks at her, shaken by the new feeling, he realizes he cannot give her up and with Julie encouraging him, he calls on Mr. Black to state his intentions. The millionaire looks at him sharply and after a biting lecture, refuses his consent. Julie assures Dan that she is willing to give up everything, but, loving her as he does, Dan realizes that he has no right to ask her to live in poverty.

Then the government seizes the river containing the Black oyster beds, and paying a few hundred to its owner, proceeds with its contruction of a naval depot upon the site. Spluttering his rage, Black appeals to Spitz for redress, but the attorney discovers that in a similar case the court ruled against the former owner. It is Dan who holds out the possibility of recovering handsomely for the seized property and Julie induces her father to let Dan try the case on a contingent basis, so that Black loses nothing in case of denial, whereas Dan gets half the sum collected, in the advent that he wins. Black sees the pleading in his daughter's eyes, and makes the condition that if Dan doesn't win, she'll drop him from her mind. Julie cries out that Spitz has already given up the case as hopeless, but seeing her father will not yield otherwise, she places her faith in Dan. One night as they are working together over the books, Dan and Mr. Black look into the guns of two thugs. It is Dan's courage that saves Black's life and lodges the two desperate criminals in prison. But when Julie excitedly commends Dan, her father reminds her of the case and puffs importantly at the thought of the boy winning. However, Dan does manage to collect the full sum in the Court of Claims and the pleased old man at length gives the youngsters his blessing.

BRIEF MARRIAGE

Lucille H. Adams Drama File No. 10148

UPON her return from studying music abroad, Mary Margot finds her father in a perturbed state. That night, hearing footsteps descending, she quietly follows him to the library and finds him on the point of committing suicide. Rushing to him she throws her arms about his neck and he admits forlornly that unless he can raise a hundred thousand dollars in twenty-four hours, his unsuccessful speculations with the funds of the bank of which he is president will be discovered and he will be disgraced. Realizing that the shock of such exposure will kill her invalid mother, Mary considers the irony of being unable to touch a fortune which she will inherit in a year on the condition that she be married on her twenty-first birthday. However, her father tells her that Nat Tyler, a young wizard of finance, may be persuaded to lend the money.

Mary goes to his apartment and when Nat's butler, Tompkins says that his mater may not be disturbed, Mary inveigles him into admitting her. Nat is astonished at her cool request for the vast sum, and in spite of himself he admires her tremendously as she explains desperately that she will get married and in a year will be able to repay the money. When he asks her whom she will marry she hesitates for a moment, then tells him a boy she met in Paris. He realizes that she doesn't love this Tom Lake and since he is himself anxious to escape the unwelcome pursuit of Carol Conway, makes a sporting proposition that they be married for a year, in name only, of course, and then get a divorce. However, married, Nat finds himself falling in love with Mary and sets out to win her. Tom returns from Paris and discovering that Mary is bound to the strange bargain, insults Nat and warns him he is going to use every means of getting Mary from him. Meanwhile Carol is continuing her seduction of Nat and when Carol comes to the Tyler home to lie to Mary about Nat, Mary refuses to believe her story and defends her husband. The strain of the unnatural relationship ,however, is beginning to tell on the two young people and when they are together they appear very restrained and each asks with cutting politeness about the amours of the other. It is Tompkins who realizes that each of them has too much pride to confess his love for the other and removing all dangerous weapons from the house, he plans a fake robbery. However, at the thought that Mary is being exposed to danger, Nat throws caution to the wind, and flinging himself upon the hired assailant gives such violent battle that he is flung against the window, in self defense, and his head is cut. The hired thief escapes to settle his score with the well meaning butler who is overcome at the realization that his plans have worked out with too much realism. Meanwhile, however, Mary has applied herself to bandaging Nat's head and as she shudders, afraid to remain in her room alone, Nat picks her up in his arms and carries her to his room.

The next morning Tompkins, his eye blackened, answers the door twice. To Carol and Tom, he triumphantly explains that his master and mistress have left on a "second" honeymoon.

THE COMMON DESIRE

Sarah M. Hurr Drama File No. 10108

CHOOSING Ohio as his future home, Robert North brings his two daughters, Rose and Lucy, with him to Valley Junction, when his mining interests in Norway fail. They are given a plot of ground for home-steading by the government on which they erect a log-cabin, and plant a garden. The girls help their father herd the sheep which he buys the following year, and all three soon make many friends among the people of the community. When she is sixteen, Rose goes to work in a dry-goods and grocery store owned by Arthur Brown and his wife, Sarah, in Valley Junction. Their son, Dick, is usually found in the store talking to Rose, and almost every evening, he walks home with her. In company with Lucy and her friend, Victor Lorenz, Dick and Rose attend dances at the town hall and revival meetings in the little valley church. Dick tells Rose that he wishes to marry her, but she replies that she is not ready for that responsibility yet, and that she only thinks of him as a friend. She is going home alone one evening when a stranger passes her driving a horse and buggy. It begins to rain, and he slows up, inviting her to ride; for a moment she hesitates, then, as the drops of water becomes faster, accepts. The man introduces himself as William La Fond, a lawyer.

William calls often in the days that follow, and by spring Rose promises to marry him. Amy Winters, a neighbor girl, hears of this, and tells Dick, who says it will never happen. As she is dressing to attend a dance, Dick calls, bringing a note from William, which states that he will be detained at his office, and will join her, in company with Lucy and Victor, at the hotel. They wait, but he does not appear, so Dick goes to the town hall in search of William. He returns, saying that William is dancing with Amy Winters, and the four, going there, finds this is true; also that he has been drinking. Seeing her, William announces that he is going to marry Amy, and leaves her standing there. She asks Dick to take her home, and the next morning, Mrs. Brown tells her that William and Amy have eloped and left Valley Junction. Weeks go by, but still she refuses to marry Dick. Arthur Brown calls the girl into the back of the store one afternoon, and says that his wife has just told him that on the evening of the dance Amy Winters forged a note from her to William, stating that she had only been playing around with him, which her son, Dick, presented. He tells her that Amy and William are living about fifty miles away. At first, Rose swears she will go to William, but remembering that Amy is now his wife, she decides she cannot.

Two years later, a new family move into the homestead next to the North's, and kill several of their sheep when they wander over the fence. Mr. North writes to his brother in Akron to send an attorney to handle the matter, and William, the brother's lawyer goes. Meeting Rose once again, he tells her that his wife is dead. She is now free to explain the mistake and they are reconciled.

DESERT AIRPORT

Frank Vaccaro Drama File No. 10155

FOR years John Oleson had saved his money so that he could take a course in aeronautics, but when he completed it he learned that the only immediate prospect of a job lay at a desert airport as a mechanic. Needing the money badly, John accepted and was assigned work starting and turning the engines. On the field one day, John climbed into the cockpit of a plane to examine the controls and looked up as a harsh voice ordered him out. "Fine engine," John commented enthusiastically but the pilot, Jim Parker sneered, 'Keep your hands off my plane, grease monkey, savvy?" Coloring John walked away . A few days later, John, tinkering with an old ship during his spare time, saw a girl standing nearby and when she inquired about the type of ship, John carefully explained each part. She smiled at his excitement over the ships and told him she was Grace Ward, daughter of a nearby rancher. When John asked if he might see her home, she consented and as they walked off together, Jim Parker came hurrying up and said, "I'm ready now." "Sorry, you're too late," Grace replied with her arm through John's. Pat Baron, one of the older pilots, warned John that Jim Parker considered the girl his, but John replied hotly that Miss Ward was the only one who could pick her friends for her, and he was staying until she asked him to go. Thereafter the enmity between John and Parker was more marked and Parker managed to find fault with everything John did around the field. Realizing it would be a long time before he made the hours necessary to pass the mail pilot's license, while around the airport, John left when he learned of a position piloting a wealthy business man around the country. He hated to leave Grace, and when Pat wrote that Parker was hanging around the girl and bothering her, John grew desperate. At last he passed his mail pilot's license and learned that one of the crack pilots at the desert airport had smashed up and they were taking on a new man. Although his employer offered to raise his salary if he remained on, John was anxious to get back to Grace.

On his first flight with the mail, however, John felt his radio go dead. A few minutes later the engine spluttered and John side-slipped into an open field, dashed across to the nearest store and phoned a gas company for a fresh supply to replenish his leaky tank. In his absence, two Spaniards had ridden up to the stalled plane, stolen three bags of mail and planted them in nearby bushes. Having retanked John took off without suspecting his loss, but at the field he was arrested and charged with the theft of U. S. mail. Stunned, John could produce no alibi and it was Jim Parker who led searchers to the cached mail sacks. At the trial, however, John got permission to cross question Parker and after asking how it was that his radio went dead simultaneously with the leakage of his gas tanks, he inquired exactly how Jim had been able to lead officials to the exact spot where he, John was supposed to have hidden the loot if he had no previous information. The tables turned, John was freed and his job assured, he left the court with Grace who was going to say yes to an important question.

NO MORE SUMMER

Myrtle D. Marmor Mystery File No. 10159

RETIRING from a life-time of teaching, Miss Sally Perkins tells her niece, Gloria, that she wishes to buy a farm in the Ozark mountains where the two of them can find a little peace and quiet. Gloria promises to spend the summer with her there, although warning her that she will not care for country life. The two of them are driven through the hills by Clem Rogers, the local real estate agent, in his old Ford. At last Miss Perkins finds what she wants, a small farm, next to a cemetery, which she announces will assure its restfulness. The next day she wanders among the tomb-stones, reading and commenting on the inscriptions to Gloria. They discover one monument with a beautiful figure of an angel, weeping, carved in white marble, bearing the inscription: "Neeta Carver: Beloved daughter of John Steele and Sarah Williams Carver—1852-1870." Gloria remarks that she was probably a beautiful girl, killed on her wedding day, but Aunt Sally replies she probably died of scarlet fever. Wandering alone to the grave one evening, Gloria finds a young man standing before it. She starts to leave, but he asks her to wait a moment, and introduces himself as Lewis Warren, a medical student and assistant to Dr. Peters, a St. Louis physician and psychiatrist, who he has accompanied here to help conduct an experiment. Granting permission to walk home with her, Gloria promises to meet Lewis at this same spot tomorrow evening, which she does. Seated together on a little rustic bench, they talk, and are about to leave, when they hear someone approaching them, carrying a lighted torch. As they are unarmed, Lewis takes Gloria home. The following day, Gloria discovers that one of the graves has been opened; she confides her discovery to Lewis, and together they describe the happenings of the past evenings to the sheriff. As they are going back to the farm, they encounter a strange-looking man, poorly clad, who stares at Gloria, and are told by the store-keeper that this is Old Steve, a harmless but demented creature who has always lived in these hills. Gloria presents Lewis to her aunt, and they tell her of last night's occurence.

Within in the next month, four graves are opened. The Sheriff stations himself in the cemetery, but is never quick enough to catch anyone, and finally asks for volunteers. Accompanied by a number of people whose relatives have been disturbed in their graves, the sheriff secretly goes again, this time discovering Lewis, who is waiting for Gloria. He is arrested, and when he tells them that he is an assistant of Dr. Peters, the sheriff at once concludes that he is robbing the graves for bodies to use in his medical studies, although he points out that no bodies have been taken. At that moment the store-keeper tells them that he has just passed Old Steve, running wildly toward the cemetery, calling "Neeta." Led by Lewis, they hasten there, and find Old Steve carrying the struggling Gloria to Neeta's open grave. Taking the girl in his arms. Lewis tells her he loves her. Dr. Peters is called to examine Old Steve, and reports that in his youth the unfortunate man loved Neeta, who was killed while he was away at school. For a time he was confined in an asylum, then pronounced cured, when again his mind clouded, and he began searching for his lost sweetheart. Confused, he thought Gloria to be Neeta, restored to him. Lewis, Gloria, and Aunt Sally return to St. Louis, all declaring that there will be no more summer here for them.

CHIVALRY'S JEST

Catherine Borden Mason Drama File No. 10147

UPON his return home from business in South America, Jim Leigh dashes up the steps of Dona's house, only to learn that during his absence fiancee has married and gone to San Francisco. For months he travels, desperately trying to forget and at last, penniless and unshaven, comes to the realization that he is wasting his life. As he walks up Main Street of Tucson, his heart contracts painfully at sight of a laughing girl embraced by a blonde giant of a man. The next day while applying for a position, he reddens as he recognizes the laughing girl. At first curt to the shabby fellow, Jo-Ann feels a wave of pity as, in a low voice, he asks for any kind of work. Knowing that her employer has nothing for him, she asks if he is willing to work as a carpenter for her father. In a few weeks an affection springs up in Jim's heart for the Marchalls in whose house he boards as well as works. Jim learns that Jo-Ann is in love with the blonde giant, Bob, who frequently comes to Tucson on business and Jo-Ann sympathizes when she learns that Jim is looking forward to finding Dona to assure himself that she is really happy. Only the realization that the Marchalls have grown to depend upon him, keeps him from leaving now. While Jo-Ann is away on her vacation, her mother suffers a heart attack and the doctor warns the family to protect her from shock. A few nights later a shivering Jo-Ann creeps up the stairs and Jim, amazed at her haggard appearance draws her to the fire. At last, under his prompting, Jo-Ann confesses that she had gone away with Bob and discovered that he was already married only after she was going to have a child. To Jim there are only two kinds of women, good and bad, but touched by her misery, he induces Jo-Ann to accept the protection of his name. Months later Bob returns and when he boasts that he dropped Jo-Ann when he learned she was having Jim's child, Jim rushes at him and only the interference of passers-by saves Bob. But when Jo-Ann learns that Bob is spreading lies, she goes to his room to threaten to expose him unless he leaves town. Laughing drunkenly, Bob kisses the angry girl and Jim comes in, afraid of just such rashness from his wife. In the ensuing struggle, Bob falls against a table and is killed. Jim refuses to let Jo-Ann testify lest she ruin her child's life and the prosecutor sways the jury as he tells them that the murdered man's wife is, this moment, at the hospital bearing a child. Convicted of manslaughter, the thought of Bob's innocent wife preys on Jim's mind and when he makes money through his cabinet work, and Jo-Ann comes to the prison to tell him that she is self-supporting again, Jim arranges to have money sent regularly to Mrs. Merritt, although he refuses to read her letters of gratitude. The warden transacts all the money matters and each week Jim looks forward eagerly to the coming of Jo-Ann and her baby Joy. Then Joy catches pneumonia and Jim now finishing the last year of his curtailed sentence, realizes in the hours of anguish he shares with Jo-Ann that he loves his wife. It is when Mrs. Merritt comes in person to thank Jim, that he learns all these years he has been sending money to Dona, Bob's widow who is going to marry another man. But nothing matters to Jim now, save that he will soon be free to go to Jo-Ann and Joy.

HILL'S CALL

Vaneta Collier Drama File No. 10090

THE Burton farm is situated in the heart of the Ozarks, on the banks of the Gasconade River. Here Donald Holmes works to help support his mother and five younger brothers and sisters. At night he returns to his simple home and after dinner plays the banjo and sings ballads of the mountains to Mary Willis, an orphan whom his mother has cared for since babyhood. He reads to her and tells her that someday he will go away to school, but there is no opportunity for that at present, he realizes. Mr. Burton tells Donald that he wishes his own son, Frank. had his ambition. He helps the boy with his studies and encourages him. Lila Marshall, whose father owns the farm adjoining Mrs. Burton's home, returns for the summer months from an eastern school for girls on the same train with Frank Burton, a student at Princeton. Frank falls in love with her, but she tells him he must wait for an answer. One day while she is walking along the edge of her father's farm she sees Donald on his way home reading a book of English history. Attracted by his appearance and interested in him, she stops to talk to the boy. He tells her of his desire for education; she is intrigued, and in the days that follow, often crosses the fence into the Burton farm to see him. Later, she invites him to a party, surprised he gratefully accepts. Frank Burton, attending the same his jealousy by devoting all her attention to this boy party, is infuriated to see Donald, and Lila arouses who works on his father's farm. Donald loves Lila, but she has often said that she will never marry a poor man.

An old indian woman tells Donald a legend of her people. She says that years ago a tribe of indians living in these hills buried gold plates and ornaments in a cave so that they would not be found by the white men. Shortly afterwards the entire tribe was killed and the gold never found, but its hiding place, she believes, is close to Donald's home. He decides to follow her directions and not realizing Frank's enmity toward him, invites him to accompany him, as they had often explored together since childhood. As the two boys are climbing a narrow mountain pass, Frank, jealous of Donald because of Lila, attempts to push him into a ravine, but in doing so, loses his own balance. As he is falling he manages to cling to shrubbery growing on the side of the hill; Donald, risking his own life, leans over the ledge and slowly pulls Frank up the side of the hill to safety. Frank tells Donald of his insane jealousy and asks him for forgiveness. which Donald grants. For his father's sake, at Donald's request, Frank informs Mr. Burton that Donald saved his life but does not reveal his attemp to kill his friend.

As a reward, Mr. Burton plans to educate Donald, whom he has always admired, and to care for his family while he is away at school. Lila tells Donald that she will be waiting for him, but he realizes that it is Mary, who has always loved him, that he wishes to marry. He tells his childhood sweetheart that he will someday return to the hills for her.

FALSE COLORS

Evelyn E. Burroughs Drama File No. 10101

AFTER his graduation from a southern university, Thomas Madden leaves his parents's home in Kentucky to go to New York. Harold Donville, a boyhood friend, introduces Thomas to the manager of the dry-goods firm for which he works, who offers him a position as a salesman, which he accepts. Edgar Steele, a fellow-salesman, takes Thomas to a penthouse party where he is introduced to Ann Withnell, an actress. He is warned by Harold that she is an unscrupulous woman but when he sees her again in the company of Edgar and a party of friends at a night club he asks permission to call. Alone in her apartment, he tells her that he loves her and she agrees to become his mistress. After several months, the manager of his firm appoints Thomas as his assistant, and he plans to visit his parents in Kentucky with Harold. Dorothy, Harold's sister returns from college and renews her childhood friendship with Thomas, as they meet again at a dinner in the Donville home. He tells her that she has changed from a tom-boy into a beautiful girl, and they laugh at the days when she used to tag along with Thomas and Harold, a somewhat unwelcome addition to their outings. Dorothy and Thomas swim and play tennis together in the days that follow and ride in her little car during the long summer evenings. Before his vacation is ended, Thomas tells Harold that he wishes to marry his sister, but first he must end his affair with Ann Withnell.

When he returns to New York he tells Ann that he wishes to marry Dorothy, and that they must not see each other again. Ann refuses to release him, threatening to expose his affair with her if he leaves, and Thomas decides that he cannot ask Dorothy to become his wife until the situation is settled, although he writes to her frequently. Edgar Steele tells Thomas that Ann has not been true to him but is in love with an actor in her company whom she has helped with Thomas' money. He hires detectives who confirm this report after following the two to Ann's apartment. Thomas tells Harold that he feels under no further obligation to Ann and asks him if he has the right to marry Dorothy; he is advised to tell her the whole story as soon as he has an opportunity to go to Kentucky and let her decide for herself. Before he can do this, Ann bribes his valet to admit her to his apartment during his absence. Here she discovers and steals letters he has received from Dorothy. Writing a letter which states that Thomas is her fiuance, she encloses Dorothy's correspondence which she says he has given her. and mails it to the Kentucky girl. Dorothy writes to Thomas, telling him if this is true he has been sailing under false colors and they must discontue their friendship.

Thomas goes to Ann's apartment and demands an explanation. He tells her that he knows of her affair with the actor and that she has no claim on him. She takes a pistol from her desk and shoots him. Thomas is seriously wounded and rushed to the emergency hospital; Ann is arrested as she tries to escape down the fire escape. Dorothy, summoned by her brother when Thomas asks for her, goes to him. He tells her the whole story of his relationship with Ann, and she forgives him. He agrees to drop charges against Ann if she will return all his letters, which she does. As soon as he is dismissed from the hospital he marries Dorothy.

COURAGE

Andrew Dobrywoda Drama File No. 10073

TEACHERS at the public school in the lower East side of New York agree that Andrew Sloane is the brightest pupil they have. Every evening, after he has completed his paper route, he studies far into the night. He tells Rose, a neighbor girl, that he is going to work his way through college, but the boy's father is killed in an auto accident, and he is forced to leave high-school at the end of his first year, to support his invalid mother and four younger brothers and sisters. Andrew becomes a reporter for a leading paper; in a few years' time he is promoted to the position of city editor. One afternoon. as Andrew is consulting with James Benson, the owner of the paper, Alice Benson drops into the office to see her father, and Andrew is presented to her. She persuades her father to invite Andrew to dinner at their home, saying that he interests her and that she is bored with the men with whom she comes in contact as they have no ambition. Andrew tells Alice that he has little time for recreation, but whenever possible they are together and a year later, they marry.

Rose calls at the newspaper office one day, asking Andrew for a position. He tells her that he is happy to see her, and appoints her as assistant society editor. In the rush of business, he explains, he has seen very little of his old friends. A campaign is begun by the paper to expose corruption in city politics. Andrew orders his men investigate every possible source, and to spare no one because of the prominence of their position. He explains this reform movement to Alice that evening, but she answers petulantly that he thinks more of the paper than he does of her, and that she has been neglected ever since their marriage. He tells her that he has worked for her father's paper ever since he was a boy, and that he considers it a civic duty to conduct this campaign. He appoints Rose to help him with the investigation.

It is discovered that the city milk from four of the leading dairies has been diluted with water although it is passed by the Board of Health and Sanitation as satisfactory. Andrew prints these facts in the paper, and declares in an editorial that he will find out who is responsible for this outrage. He tells Rose that he suspects Henry B. Rutherford, the mayor. of receiving bribes from the dairies and splitting them with the health inspector, and instructs her to become acquainted with him. Rose calls at his office, and, pretending to admire him, is invited to his apartment. While she is there Alice calls, and Rose, over-hearing their conversation in the next room, learns that she is in love with the mayor. Breaking into his desk, Rose secures the documents proving Rutherford's guilt in the milk situation and leaves while Alice is still talking. She turns this evidence over to Andrew, but does not mention Alice's visit. Andrew tells Alice that he plans to print information that will lead to Rutherford's removal from office. She begs him not to, but he says he must. The she confesses that she loves Rutherford, and leaves Andrew. The next year he buys his own paper, encouraged by Rose. He asks her to to accept the position of his wife, and she consents.

Grey Eable proclaims war-fare against the Sioux tribe and drive them from the land with tomahawks. Calling his people together. he tells them that they shall forever more be enemies of the Sioux Indians.

Kokohmo, Ne-Bow-In's mother, raises the little Cloud Bird. She teaches her to gather berries from the forest. to weave baskets and shape pottery from clay. Her father teaches her to swim and fish, since he has no son. As she is gathering acorns in the woods one day, she hears a call, and sees, down the stream, an Indian brave, who asks her to take him to her chief in her canoe. As he is from another tribe, she does not speak, but guides him to her father. He tells Grey Eagle that he is Gabena, a Sioux, who brings a message of peace from his people, but the Chippewa chief will not smoke the pipe of peace with him, although many of his people wish him to. Kokohmo calls to Gabena as he leaves and says that she will help him to bring peace between the tribes. He asks her who the beautiful maiden is that brought him here, and tells Kokohmo that he wishes to marry her. Crow Bird, a Chippewa, overhears this, and promises Grey Eagle twenty ponies if he will give him Cloud Bird's hand in marriage, to which he consents. His daughter tells Kokohmo that she loves the Sioux Peace Chief, and tears Crow Bird. As Gabena returns to his people, Crow Bird takes a band of Indians with him to the rapids which the Sioux must cross, promising them each a pony it they will do his bidding, but a storm comes up before Gabena arrives, and they go back. Taking his canoe, Crow Bird goes alone to pierce Gabena's boat with a lance so that it will smk, but he is thrown out by the waves. Gabena saves him and takes him to shore.

Kokohmo tells Cloud Bird to follow her, and they go to the Sioux camp, where Gabena meets her and the two are wed. Kokohmo then returns home, throwing Cloud Bird's canoe over the rapids . She tells Grey Eagle that his daughter has been killed because he would not make peace with the Sioux tribe, and because he sold her to Crow Bird. The chief says that if he had Cloud Bird restored to life, he would gladly make peace forever. Then Kokohmo summons her to return with Gabena; the two are welcomed by the tribe, and Grey Eagle smokes the pipe of peace.

SINS OF PARENTS

Maria Dale Drama File No. 10078

UNABLE to account for her grandfather's urgent request that she accompany him to the Orient, Maria dares not bring on another of his heart attacks by questioning him. As their boat near Shanghai Maria returns from one of her solitary walks about the deck to find the old man deathly ill. With a cry she rushes out of the stateroom and bumping into a tall almond-eyed man who has been watching her all during the trip, she begs him to get a doctor. He assures her that he himself holds a degree from a accredited American medical school and offers his services. While he is working over the prostrate figure the boat crashes against the dock and Maria loses consciousness as she is flung against the wall.

She opens her eyes in a strange exotic room and gasps as a pretty Chinese girl Lein Song enters and explains she is a guest of Dr. Charles Tong. Freightened, Maria demands to see her grandfather and her host, the Doctor of the ship, admits her to a room where her grandfather is breathing with difficulty. Drawing her close to him he tells her that she is half-Chinese. Her mother was a cultured Chinese girl who, in love with Maria's father, had been deserted by him and before her death had made Davidson promise that her child should marry a man of Chinese birth who would respect her, instead of holding her birth against her. Dully Maria sees that the old man is dead and Dr. Tong leads her gently out of the room. Very slim and lovely in her grief, Maria prepares to go. But when she admits to Dr. Tong that she is utterly lost now, he tells her that he has been in love with her since first sight. He is himself half an American although in appearance he seems Oriental. With the full realization of her obscure birth, Maria accepts his offer of marriage and is accorded every consideration in the house of her husband. However, when Jim Walton, who has loved her at home, comes to Shanghai to find her, wondering why she has stopped writing, he is appalled to learn of her marriage. Dr. Tong receives the American graciously and seeing how the boy is tortured by his love for Maria, Dr. Tong retires to his own room. There he learns that the ancient enemy of his house is preparing to march upon the house of Tong. Fearing for Maria's safety, he summons her to his room and pretending a fit of jealousy asks her why she doesn't leave with her white lover. Infuriated by the attack, Maria accedes to Jim's plea that she come with him but before they can take a boat for the United States Jim realizes that Maria's heart is with her husband whose baby is already beneath her heart. When Maria learns that her husband's house has been attacked, moreover, she sees for the first time why he urged her to leave and she rapidly returns home to find Charles lying unconscious wounded by his enemy. Flinging herself at his side, Maria watches over him constantly summoning the best doctors from the continent. At last Charles recovers consciousness but Maria has gone away to have her child and as she raises her eyes, she sees Charles bending over her. at last convinced by Jim that his wife truly loves him. Tenderly he kises her white forehead and Jim withdraws.

AVERAGE FAMILY

D. P. D. Drama File No. 10088

AT school the Ranson girls always took the leading roles in class plays and at graduation when a small producer offered the girls an opportunity in a stock company, Sarah gleefully accepted while Mary married her John instead. Years passed. Sarah rose from obscurity to the limelight while Mary found her happiness in her husband's steadily prospering business and in her two children Frank and Margaret. Her beauty faded by hours over hot stoves, Mary cooked in the immaculate kitchen of their little cottage while her children received every advantages at the nearby college. Now a frown wrinkled Mary's forehead as she watched the pots to see that they didn't boil over while she was ironing with painstaking care Margaret's frock. The front door burst open. Margaret dashed in, flung her hat aside, and discontentedly exclaimed over her mother's lateness in getting her things out. A moment later Frank strode through the door and flinging a dirty sweater onto his mother's lap he asked her to sew his numerals on it, and hurry with his dinner because his team was playing the varsity at basketball to-night. In his shower Frank sang lustily, stopping to call out and ask it dinner was on the table yet. The two young people scrapped all the way through dinner paying no attention to their mother who silently served them and when John came in, they hurried off to their respective dates leaving him staring angrily after them. All the way through his dinner John complained about his spoiled children and determined to withdraw them from college and let them do something useful with themselves. When Mary dared to defend them John turned upon her and left her breathless with his denunciation of her as a millstone about his neck. Pointing to her broken nails and stringy hair he said he had always been ashamed of her. Mary sank to a chair with hurt eyes while John flounced out. When the telephone rang and Sarah who was playing the next town called, Marry agreed to come backstage and see her. "Millstone, millstone!" John's words echoed in her ears and drawing off her wedding ring she left it on her dresser while she went to see Sarah. Penitent, John returned an hour later and distressed by the strange silence in the house he sat down to wait for Mary. The children returned and his panic was communicated to them. Then they found their mother's wedding ring and with guilty looks each blamed the other as they frantically offered suggestions about where to look for her.

Meanwhile Sarah stared at her sister and horrified by her appearance began fixing her up. With the assistance of the wardrobe mistress and the maid, Mary soon looked years younger and Sarah, determined that her sister should not again slave for family urged the producer, a "particular" friend of hers to give Mary a character role. But with the easy familiarity of back stage life Mary had little patience and soon she left to return to her anguished family and as they embraced this new mother with the wave hair and manicured nails, Mary reached for her apron and sets about getting dinner. She was back. Home.

SIDE STREET

Paul G. Rimelspach Drama File No. 10157

ABOVE the small restaurant of John Hunter on a metropolitan side street lives Diok Baxter, newspaper reporter. Dick is jesting about Hunter's race horse ambitions when he notices at the opposite end of the restaurant counter, the drenched figure of Molly Day nervously emptying her pocketbook upon the counter. When, trembling, she admits that she is short of funds, Hunter loses his temper, but Dick flips a coin to the counter and offers to call a cab for the grateful girl. Forlornly she admits she has no place to go and Dick, appraising her shrewdly, offers her the limited hospitality of his room, assuring her she will be safe. For a moment she hesitates, but at thought of a wet park bench she accompanies him up the creaking stairs. Hanging a sheet across one corner of the room to assure Molly's privacy, Dick grabs a newspaper and attempts to read to distract his mind from Molly's silhouette upon the improvised screen. The next morning when Dick wakes, he finds Molly preparing breakfast and is about to vent his indignation at her for her temerity in planning economy measures, when Mary Cramer, small daughter of the invalid next door, comes in shyly to remind Dick that her birthday is approaching and he isn't to forget the signet ring he promised her. Molly offers her assistance to the helpless Mrs. Cramer and soon is immersed in soap suds giving little Mary a much needed bath.

Days go by. Only Dick is unaware of the equivocality of Molly's position, since his work keeps him busy at night and Molly is out futilely searching for a job during the day. Mrs. Cramer, despite Molly's tender nursing, grows worse and while Molly is out shopping one day, Mary comes in sobbing her mother won't answer her. Dick comforts the child and Molly devotes to the youngster all the intensity of her love.

Dick gives Molly money to buy the promised signet ring for Mary and while in the jewelry store, Molly cannot resist the temptation to look at diamond wedding bands. The clerk grows impatient and when two stick-up men arrive and rifle the trays spread about, the hysterical clerk incriminates his customer as having been an accomplice. Molly is arrested and Dick for one moment believes in her guilt only to realize that he loves Molly and will do anything to help her. The Child Welfare society arrive to remove Mary to a proper environment, and Dick instead of working toward the long coveted post of foreign correspondent for his newspaper, spends his time getting a lawyer for Molly. However, on the witness stand Molly refuses to divulge any knowledge regarding Dick fearing it will hurt his status and Mary Cramer's testimony is equivocal. Dick, sent out to cover an underworld story is unable to appear at the trial.

Meanwhile, Luke and Joe, the thieves, divide their loot. Blondie, Luke's mistress, demands her share and Luke brutually hurls her away from him, so that she is stunned as she crashes up against the wall. When she discovers that she has been deserted, Blondie attempts to drown her sorrows in drink and begins talking within earshot of Dick who realizes the holdup incident is one that concerns Molly. He rushes the girl to court where her testimony frees Molly. Dick's scoop serves to win for him the post of foreign correspondent and with his bride Molly leaves for a honeymoon, while waving to them from th dock, are little Mary and the gaudily dressed John Hunter, whose horse finally came in.

LITTLE SPORT

Harry Aldridge Drama File No. 10098

LONELY for friends since he is unable to wander far from the large Southern plantation his parents own, little Harold Johnston slips off frequently to hear the stories of Uncle Tim an old negro tenant of the Johnstons. Often he brings scraps of meat and bones for Uncle Tim's shaggy-haired pup Sport, and his face lights up as he hears the excited welcoming barks of Sport who leaps upon the lad and licks his cheek. Uncle Tim grins expansively as he sees Sport fetch the stick that Massa Harold throws to him but when he offers his only possession to his adored little white friend, Harold wistfully refuses to take the pup from its master, knowing moreover that his mother would never approve. With his arms about Sport, Harold hurls himself down at Uncle Tim's feet and asks for another tale, and the old darky's voice drones on until, suddenly he stops and clutches at his heart. For a moment beads of perspiration stand out on his forehead, but he smiles at Harold and through gritted teeth informs him it is nothing. A few days later, Harold comes up the walk and puzzled by Sport's failure to come dashing up the path to him, Harold goes inside and as he approaches Sport gives one tiny yip and is still again. Uncle Tim is dead.

That night Harold eats no supper. His father, leaving for a business trip asks him if he's ill, and his mother exclaims impatiently that it never was good for the child to be so friendly with Timothy. When they pass Harold's room that night, they see that his pillow is wet with his tears.

A few days later, Harold comes up to his house followed by Sport. When his mother discovers him feeding the raggedy animal, she frowns disapprovingly and demands that the boy take the dog away. Harold begs for his pup, but Mrs. Johnston is firm and warns him that if she finds that he has not gotten rid of the mongrel by the next morning she will have the dog catchers after him. Whistling a mournful little tune, Harold takes Sport away but he cannot bear the thought of parting with his pup and at last slips back with him and ties him up outside, cautioning the pup that under no circumstances is he to make any noise or else they'll take them away. "Did you get rid of that dog, Harold?" his mother asks at dinner, but the youngster is too busy trying to spear a green pea to answer and a noise from the kitchen distracts his mother's attention. That night the stillness is broken oy loud barking. Harold steals out in his nightie, but in the hall his mother confronts him and pulling him to her says, "You didn't take that dog away." The barking gets more frenzied. Mrs. Johnston loses her temper and cuffs Harold's ear. Suddenly a shot rings out. Petrified, she stands still and as the butler races to the door in his funny night cap, Harold rushes outside to his pup, lying with his leg shot. The butler's eyes roll in his head as he finds a bag with the family jewels and as Mrs. Johnston realizes the dog saved them from the thieves, she sends for a veterinarian, who bandages Sport's leg good as new. Even Mrs. Johnston pats the little fellow's head, and as she informs Harold that he can keep his pup, Sport, understanding, barks weakly but firmly three times.

FORGIVE THEM

Mrs. W. A. West Drama File No. 10117

AS the doctor conducts Betty to the hospital room where Mrs. West has been taken, he tells that she has a baby sister, whom she will have to look after, as her mother has only a few more hours to live. With tears in her eyes, Betty promises her mother to take care of this little sister, although she is only twelve years old herself, and to protect her from all harm. Her father is a salesman, and is often forced to leave his two daughters in the care of a house-keeper while he is sent out of town on business. When she graduates from high-school, Betty gives up plans of going on to college in order to remain at home with little Gay, as the baby is christened. She oftens stays up at night making dainty dresses for the child, and spends most of her salary on music and dancing lessons for Gay, as she grows older. Although Betty is included in invitations to parties among the young people of her town, she usually refuses, having little time, and preferring to buy pretty clothes for her little sister than for herself, but Jack, a friend from high-school days, calls on her frequently, and one day asks her to marry him. She refuses, saying that although she loves him, she cannot be free to marry until Gay's education has been completed. When Gay is fifteen, Jack is sent to South America to work for a rubber company; Betty refuses to go with him, but tells him she will be waiting.

Ralp, a young doctor, visits friends of Gay's, and is introduced to her at their home. He takes her for long rides in the country, unknown to Betty. She often climbs out of her bed-room window and meets him in the park, as she tells him that Betty would not permit her to stay out alone at night, thinking her a "baby." One day Betty finds Gay in her room crying bitterly; she finally confesses meeting Ralph secretly, and tells Betty that he left town without seeing her, after promising that they would be married. When Gay knows that she is to become a mother she threatens suicide, but Betty promises to go away with her. The two sisters leave for Chicago, where Sybil Vivian, Gay's daughter, is born. Gay pleads with Betty to give the baby to a suitable family for adoption, but she refuses, at last promising that she will take the child herself and return to their home with it. Gay finds a position as a stenographer and remains in Chicago.

Jack comes home on a vacation from South America, hoping Betty will now become his wife. He questions her about the baby, but she will only state that it is not hers. Doubting her, he returns without her. Mr. West dies at this time, leaving Betty alone with Sybil. Meanwhile, in Chicago, Gay falls in love with Ralph, her employer. She tells him of the little girl when he asks her to marry him, and says that she knows now she can never be happy without Sybil. They agree to ask Betty for the child; reluctantly she gives her to them. The following month a letter comes from Jack, begging Betty to forgive his distrust and come to him with Sybil. Meeting her at the dock at Buenos Aires, Betty tells him the true situation, and forgives.

A WIFE'S SECRET

Amedeo Cassone Melodrama File No. 10151

GUESTS at the chateau of Monsieur Claudet drink a toast to his daughter Viola and Maurice Dumont, when their engagement is announced at a formal dinner, agreeing that this will be an ideal marriage. But Peter LeBrun hastily leaves the table, without a word. Following him to the garden, Viola pleads with him to join in wishing her happiness, but he replies that he loves her too much to let another man have her. However, the wedding takes place and the happy couple move to Paris. Viola is alone in the house one afternoon when Peter comes to call. She welcomes her old friend and is showing him through her new home when he takes her in his arms and makes love to her. Pleading with him to release her, the girl struggles, but to no avail; Peter is carried away by his emotions. The child that is born to Viola, she knows, is Peter's son, but she does not tell her husband. Andrew Dumont, as the child is named, grows up to be a promising young surgeon. Late in life, Peter marries a widow who has one child, Gloria. He formally adopts the little girl, and, happy with his wife and child, forgets much of his old bitterness.

At seventeen, Gloria persuades her parents to send her to Paris to study art. She visits at her cousin, Clara's home. One afternoon Edward Chevalier, who is engaged to Clara, calls, bringing his friend, Andrew Dumont, with him. While the engaged couple talk, Andrew and Gloria become acquainted, and the four of them decide to visit the cafes and theatres of Paris together. Andrew confides to his mother that he has at last met a girl whom he loves, and she replies that she is glad, and hopes her son finds the same happiness in his marriage that she has found in hers. She invites him to bring the girl to dinner. On their way over, he tells Gloria that he loves her and that his mother approves, and she says that as she loves him, it only remains for her parents to give their consent. When Viola hears that her name is LeBrun, she questions the girl, who answers that her father is indeed Peter LeBrun, since she always refers to him thus. Refusing to explain, Viola states that she will never permit the marriage, and leaves the room.

Once more at her home, Gloria tells her foster-father what has occurred. He says that he does not understand the reason for this, but that the girl must simply put Andrew out of her thoughts. She replies that she cannot do this, and becomes thin and pale in the next few months, refusing to go out, or continue her studies. While he is hunting, Peter is overcome with a heart attack. Doctor tell him he has only a few more days to live. He sends for Viola and Andrew, telling her that as Gloria is not his daughter she and Andrew are not related. Viola confesses to her son, and Peter. dying, is forgiven. The young couple plan to marry, after receiving Viola's consent, but all agree to keep the secret from Maurice, for his sake. Maurice shares the happiness of his supposed son, blessing the latter's nuptial ceremonies, while Viola sees that her duty has been satisfactorily accomplished.

COMPROMISE

Wallace N. Bacon Drama File No. 10145

ENTERING the Legal Tender Cigar Factory, where she is employed as a tobacco stripper, Cynthia begins work when John Kelly, a salesman, comes over to her table and invites her to accompany him to the beach the following Sunday, which she agrees to do. As they are strolling down the boardwalk, Cynthia sees a photographer's shop, and has her picture taken. It turns out so well that the photographer puts a copy of it in his window, and here it is seen by Alfred Dixon, the son of the owner of the Legal Tender Factory. He asks the photographer who posed for such a charming picture, and, as the man knows Cynthia, is told that it is one of the girls in his father's employ. The next day he looks her up and introduces himself, commenting on the picture. She accepts his invitation to take her home after work, and invites him to call. In the following weeks they are often seen together. John warns her that Alfred is only amusing himself with her, and asks Cynthia not to see him again, but she replies that he has no right to make such a request. Losing his temper, John tells her that she is interested in Alfred because of his money.

Chuck McGraver, a former class-mate of John's at high-school, is released from the penetentiary, where he has served five years for burglary, and looks him up. When John tells him that he has lost favor with Cynthia, Chuck says that all that is necessary to win any women is a little ready money, Alfred Dixon tells Cynthia that his father has asked him to take charge of the office Saturday evening, to receive money and contracts from a representative of their chain of stores. He invites her to go canoeing with him earlier in the afternoon, saying that they must return by four-thirty to keep this appointment. Chuck over-hears this conversation and advises John that this is his chance to make some money. While they are on the lake, the canoe tips, and Alfred, in rescuing Cynthia, does not reach the office until five o'clock. Meanwhile, Chuck and John hold up the representative, but are seen by the police, and leave town in Chuck's car.

When Alfred learns that Cynthia's admirer is implicated in the robbery, he concludes that she must have told him of the whole situation and purposely fallen out of the canoe to give him a chance to commit the robbery. He questions her, and the girl, hurt by his doubts, replies that she has nothing to say to him. At his request, Alfred is sent by his father to their branch factory at Nashville, where he is made assistant manager. His engagement is announced to a resident of the city, and Cynthia reads it in the paper. Shortly after this, Chuck and John are traced by the police through the serial numbers of the bills they had stolen, and sentenced to prison. John writes to Alfred, explaining that Cynthia is entirely innocent of the affair, but that he has been afraid to say so before. Taking the next train, Alfred goes to her and apologizes, adding that he has broken his engagement as he knows Cynthia is the only girl in the world for him.

TRADING POST

Frank Hendricks Melodrama File No. 10144

FUR trappers living around the little trading post of Lucerne, in northern Canada report to the northwest Mounted Police that their traps have been sprung and the animals stolen from them. Officer Terry O'Neale is sent to investigate. As he is riding through the woods, he sees a young girl who calls to him to come nearer. She tells him that she is Grace Calbert the daughter of a French-Canadian trapper who lives two miles away, and that her horse has been frightened by a falling tree, thrown her, and run away. Terry offers to take her home, as it is late, and the two of them ride away. Introducing him to Michel, her father, Grace invites him to dinner, and the two men discuss the fur robberies. Just as Terry is leaving, Pierre Ricston, Grace's fiance, comes to call, and is presented to the officer. He acknowledges the introduction shortly, and later tells Grace that these mounted policemen are nothing but troublemakers. A sign is posted in Lucerne, offering a reward for information leading to the arrest of the fur thief.

Terry is making a tour of inspection of the traps when he hears someone slowly creeping away. Dismounting, he follows the sound, and discovers Pierre carrying a gunny-sack filled with fox furs, freshly trapped. The officer comments on the size of his catch, congratulating him, but Pierre only flushes darkly. That night Pierre forbids Grace to see Terry, explaining that the officer has accused him of robbery. When Terry calls to see her father, Grace asks him if this is true; he tells her what he observed, adding that he believes Pierre to be a thief. Angrily, the girl replies that she never wishes to speak to him again. However, Grace's father agrees with Terry, and they work out a plan to prove their theory.

At mid-night, a few days later, Grace is awakened by Pierre. calling her name outside the window. He tells her that he has heard that Terry means to arrest him, and that he must leave the country for a little while. Grace urges him to stay, saying that Terry cannot harm him as he is innocent, but he tells her that he knows best, and asks her to come with him to Lucerne, where they can be married; then they will go to Ontario until the real fur thief has been found. At last the girl consents, and, dressing hastily, goes in his dog-sled. Pierre does not stop at Lucerne, and orders Grace not to question him. Hours later, he turns to her and admits that he is the fur thief they have been hunting, but that it is now too late for her to turn back, although she begs him to let her go. Finally, as they speed over the snow, she springs from the sled. While he is attempting to capture her, they are over-taken by Terry and her father.

Examining the furs, Michel says that they were marked and placed in the trap by Terry, to prove Pierre's guilt. Grace is taken home. weeping, and Pierre is thrown in jail. The next morning, Terry calls to bid Michel good-bye; Grace begs him to pardon her, and he agrees, on condition that he may call on her when he comes back from making his report at head-quarters.

THIS ONE HOUR

Cortelyou O. Badgette Drama File No. 9999

LEAVING the bank from which she has just withdrawn her life savings, Marion hurries to keep the most important engagement in her life. Steven, her fiance, has requested her to turn the money over to him in order that he may close a business deal which will make their marriage possible. A slight collision between two cars delays her, and in battling her way out of the crowd, Marion realizes that her purse is gone. Distracted, she searches frantically for it, but it cannot be found. Later, she tells Steven that they must delay their plans. He realizes that she can no longer be of any assistance to him, and frankly tells her that he has no further interest in her. Sadly she returns home, feeling that she has lost everything in the world.

Several days later, a shabbily dressed man calls at her home. He returns the purse with the money intact, in answer to an advertisement she had inserted in the want-ads of a daily paper. He explains that he had found the purse thrown behind a pile of old boxes on the day that she had lost it. At first, he said, he thought of keeping it because of his need of money, but instead was now returning it. Marion's impulse is to turn him over to the police; she decides first to hear his story. His name is Allan Wayne; he is an architect but the firm he worked for failed and for months he has been without employment, he tells her. Desperate and discouraged, this money would have given him a new start and he was tempted. Understanding the situation, Marion agrees to drop charges. She offers him a reward, which he refuses. She does, however, secure a small opening for him in his chosen field, in her uncle's office.

Steven is a guest at a house-party given by Joseph Grant at his beautiful country estate. Here he meets Frances, the young daughter of the house, and tells her the story of the business deal he is about to close. Attracted to him and flattered by the thought that she can help him to success, Frances agrees to marry him. Steven then uses her money for a series of business speculations, and she soon leaves him. Allan, meanwhile, encouraged by Marion's friendship, advances rapidly. Hearing that Marion has recovered her money, Steven pleads with her to give him another chance, but she refuses. Angered, he then attempts to extort money from her, threatening to expose letters which she had written when they were engaged and she had promised to help him financially. Allan, calling to see Marion, encounters Steven in this attempt. He threatens to kill Steven if he does not return Marion's letters and promises never to annoy her again. Frightened, Steven agrees. Allan then tells Marion that he loves her, and she realizes the interest she has for him is more than friendship. They decide to face the future together.

A FRIENDLY ENEMY

Annah S. Remick Drama File No. 10086

IN the spring of 1815, Clyde Hunter builds a log-cabin on the shores of Cape Cod for Jennie, his bride. He goes out in his fishing vessel on short trips to earn a livelihood Jennie is walking home through the woods from her father's near-by cottage when she encounters a band of Indians, some of whom have had too much "firewater," doing a war dance. She hides behind the thick shrubbery in the forest, but one of the Indians sees her, and advances. With sign language he indicates to her not to be afraid, and beckons to follow him. Taking another trail, they avoid the Indians, and she returns safely home. The next day the Indian comes to her door; in broken English and sign language he tells her that his name is Fleetfoot, and asks her if there are chores he can do around the cabin. Clyde lets him help with the building of an additional wing to the house and tells him that he is always welcome to visit them. Fleetfoot relates that he is a captive from a western tribe and will some day return to his people, but until then he will come from time to time to help with the planting and harvesting in their small garden. When he returns the next fall Clyde and Jennie proudly show him their baby daughter, Mary. He builds a cradle for the child and watches over her as she plays.

A few years later there is an Indian uprising, and the band of natives surrounding the Hunter cabin is exterminated. A little boy is left by their front door during the fray, wrapped in a blanket which they recognize as belonging to Fleetfoot. They bring him up as a companion to Mary and name him Salvador. As he grows older he looks after the little girl, accompanying her on trips through the forest to gather berries and swimming in the near-by streams. Clyde teaches the boy to sail his vessel and haul in the nets; when he is grown he takes him along as a member of his crew, but Salvador says that he must find his own people. He is persuaded to make a last trip on the fishing vessel with Clyde; Mary accompanies them. A storm arises in which the vessel and all but three of the crew, including Clyde, are drowned. Salvador rescues Mary and swims with her to the shore. When she regains consciousness he tells her that he loves her, but has no right to marry her as he does not know who his parents are. She replies that it does not matter to her, but after he has taken her home, he leaves. For months he searches to trace his ancestry without success and finally is adopted by an Indian tribe a few miles away. They plan an attack on the white people in the territory surrounding the Hunter home; Salvador rides away to warn Jennie and Mary and help defend them. In the massacre which follows, the white people are victorious and Salvador is severely wounded. He is slowly recovering at the Hunter cabin when an old Indian comes to the door, whom Jennie recognizes as her friend, Fleetfoot. He tells her that he was again captured after he left their cabin years ago, and has been held prisoner until the present time. Salvador is a white child belonging to a family named Williams, whom he found besides his dead mother during that early uprising. A cousin of the boy's is found in a neighboring village who confirms this story, recognizing a birth-mark on his right arm. Salvador now asks Mary to become his wife and live with him on the shore of Cape Cod to which she agrees.

DECEIVERS EVER

Esther Helms Drama File No. 10103

WHILE he is hastily driving to his country home, Lee Wainwright's car strikes Mildred Turner as she dashes across the road in pursuit of her dog. He carries her into his house, a short distance away, and sends for the doctor, who says that although Mildred is not seriously injured, she must remain here a few days, in the care of Lee's mother. As she is convalescing, Mildred tells Lee that she is seventeen years of age, the eldest of a family of six, and that her ambition is to go to New York and become an actress. Lee falls in love with Mildred and persuades her to give up her plans, to become his wife, which she promises to do. Although Lee's mother warns him that this ambitious little girl will soon be discontented with the quiet life he offers her, they are married. A year later their daughter, Frances, is born. Mildred loves her husband and her baby, but she often tells Lee that she is bored and restless, and urges him to go to a larger city, but he tells her that it is impossible as his business interests are here. Robert Kane, an out-of-town buyer for Lee's firm, is a guest at their home, while going over plans for the next year with Lee. Alone with Mildred while Lee is working, he listens to her story of the desire to be an actress and to escape from this little town, and persuades her to come with him to New York, promising to help her. She consents, and runs away that night, taking little Frances with her, and leaving a note for Lee, telling him what she has done. She joins Robert in New York and he tells her that she cannot expect help from him as long as she keeps Frances, but she will not give the baby up, and returns at once to Lee, telling him that she has made a terrible mistake, and urging him to take her back. He refuses, replying that his mother was right from the beginning in her estimate of Mildred, and that he will begin divorce proceedings. The court gives him full custody of Frances; Mildred turns again to New York when Lee refuses to allow her to see her daughter, saying it is for her good to believe her mother dead.

In the year's that follow, Mildred writes repeatedly, pleading with Lee to allow her to visit Frances, but the letters are returned unopened. She accepts the help of Roy Bailey, a theatrical producer, and is given a small part in a Broadway musical revue, in which she wins favorable press notices. The star of the play is taken ill and Mildred is to be given her part when she receives a telegram from Mattie, the cook at her former home, telling that Frances has been thrown from her horse and is not expected to live. Mildred leaves at once, but Lee, receiving her at the door, still forbids her to see Frances. In her hotel room that night, Mildred attempts suicide, but is prevented from taking poison by Mattie, who comes to tell her that Frances is out of danger. Mattie relates this incident to Lee, who, relenting, sends word that she may see her daughter. Mildred tells him that life has not been worth living without Lee and Frances, and begs him to give her one more chance, saying that her career means nothing in comparison with her family. He forgives her, confessing that he still loves her.

HOSTAGE

Eugene S. Mintram Drama File No. 10130

CALLING his reporters together, Nathan Bradley, city editor of the Clarion, promises promotion to the one who can solve the series of crimes that have taken place recently on the houseboats at the edge of town. Arthur Roany makes a bet with the others that he will have the story in less than a week. Wearing an old sweater and cap, he waits in front of the house-boat owned by Bullhead Wrexel until he sees him leaving the boat. Approaching him, Arthur asks for a job, saying that he will do anything. Wrexel hesitates, then tells him to come around that night. Entering the house-boat, Arthur finds five men playing poker. He gives his name as Red Callahnan, and states that he was a member of Scarface Murphy's gang, all of whom were arrested last year for dealing in white slavery. To prove this, he produces a purple scarf which Slim Volpe, Wrexel's right-hand man, recognizes as belonging to his friend Pete. Wrexel tells him that he can stay here, and that later on in the week they will have a job for him. Someone knocks, and a young girl is admitted whom Wrexel carelessly embraces. She draws away, and he rudely pushes her toward the door, laughing, and saying he will be back later. Slim informs Arthur that the girl is Flame Fendotte, and warns him to leave her alone as she belongs to Wrexel. The next afternoon as Arthur is going toward the house-boat, he sees a drunkard attempting to kiss Flame. He releases the girl, pushing her annoyer away, and she thanks him, but he replies that she was hardly worth the trouble. Flame looks at him a moment, then bursts into tears and runs away. Following her, Arthur apologizes, but she asks him to please leave her alone, and goes.

Wrexel's gang reveal to Arthur that they are rum-runners. In the past month, they have been responsible for the deaths of three revenue officers. who discovered them smuggling cases of liquor into their house-boat. They are expecting a large "order" tomorrow night; after it is received they will start the motor which is concealed in the bottom of the boat, and leave for Florida; Red's job is to guard the life-boat from officers. After he has retired, Arthur hears Flame's voice in the next room, talking to Wrexel. She tells him she will not go with him on this trip. Stationed outside the house-boat next evening, Arthur breaks away and calls the police. He then sees Wrexel and Slim going in the direction of Flame's house-boat, and follows them, over-hearing Wrexel say that they must kidnap Flame. Encountering the two men when they enter Flame's home, Arthur has a hand-to-hand fight with both. Police arrive before they can over-power him, directed by Flame's cries for help. When the gang has been arrested, Arthur reveals his identity to the girl. She explains that her father, an invalid who lives here with her, was once innocently involved as a member of Wrexel's gang, and that Wrexel threatened him with death if Flame did not come to see him. Arthur asks Flame to forgive him, and the two decide to collect Arthur's bet for use in buying their own home.

SECOND GENERATION

Carl L. Zamjohn Drama File No. 10126

TWO young couples are discussing their future plans one summer afternoon in 1898. Charles Brewster and Ernest Dowling tell the girls, Grace and Sarah, that they are going to invest their small capital together, and start a woolen mill, which they will manage jointly on the principle of fairness and integrity both to workers and clientele, knowing that will lead to success. The following year the Brewster and Dowling Mills are established in a small Massachusetts town, and Sarah is married to Ernest, while Grace becomes Charles's wife, all four living in an old-fashioned duplex house. A son, Ronny, is born to the Brewsters, and four years later the Dowling announce the arrival of a little girl, Sally. Profits at the mill increase slowly, but steadily each year. The workers are well paid, and dealers testify that they can always rely on goods bearing the stamp BREWSTER and DOWLING, Inc. The mill is enlarged four times during the early years of the new century. Growing up almost as brother and sister, Ronny and Sally are thrown together constantly, until he enters Harvard and she is sent to boarding school.

When America enters the World War, Brewster secures a large contract from the government to make uniforms. Dowling urges him to be patriotic and take the assignment at a smaller price, but he replies that they have mixed business and sentiment too long, and makes a fortune off the deal to which his friend will not be a partner. At this time, Sally and Ronny, coming home for summer vacation, announce their engagement to their parents, and the families forget their differences when they know they will be related by marriage in the future. After the war, Brewster tells Dowling they are over-paying their workers, and cuts wages to a low level, as he has bought over the largest share of the mill. A few months later, Dowling hears that their woolens are being mixed with cotton; questioning Brewster, he finds that his partner has stooped to this deceitful practice, and at once resigns from the company. Unable to find employment in the depression years that follow, Dowling becomes ill, and commits suicide, his mind unbalanced by worry. Sally breaks her engagement to Ronny, refusing his offers of help, and tells him she never wishes to see him again. With her mother, she goes to Boston, and obtains a position as a secretary. Refusing to believe that his father is guilty of dishonest practice, Ronny enters the mill to learn the business.

A year later, workers in Brewster's employ go on a strike, demanding fair wages. Ronny pleads with his father to compromise with them, believing them to be right, but he refuses. One night, when Mrs. Brewster goes to her husbands office to take him home, a group of factory workers set fire to the place. The mill is burned to the ground, and Mr. and Mrs. Brewster killed by the fire. Reading of this in the paper, Sally sends Ronny a note of sympathy, and tracing her by the address on the envelope, he goes to Boston, and urges her to help him re-establish the mill, as his wife, on the old principles of their fathers. Both confess they have unfair to one another, and agree to try a new deal for the BREWSTER and DOWLING CO.

FULL PAYMENT

Helene C. Doman Drama File No. 10156

WHEN Mrs. Hunter asks the city orphanage to send her a nice girl to whom she will give a good home in exchange for a few light household tasks, Betty is chosen. As she is only four years older than Helene, Mrs. Hunter's eldest daugbter, she is regarded as a companion rather than a servant, and the two girls attend school together, but Betty often remarks that she cannot forget her position. The summer tbat Helene is eighteen, Walter Kramer, her father's old school chum, visits them, often taking the girl for long rides in the country. When it is necessary for bim to handle business correspondence for his firm, Helene offers to be his typist, and one evening when they are working together in the living room, he suddenly tells her that he loves her, and asks her if she will marry him the following year. She joyfully gives him her promise, confessing that she has loved him from the first. The engagement is announced, but the following day Walter says that his business deal is not turning out satisfactorily, and he will have to make a trip to California at the end of the week. He does not return for dinner that night, but several hours later, Helene hears him enter the house, and, going to greet him, discovers that he is intoxicated. She hastily withdraws from sigbt, and watches with horror when he enters Betty's room, and, lying awake, hears him leave just before morning.

After Walter goes to California, Helen becomes ill from worry, and her parents send her to a mountain resort for the summer, with Betty as a companion, against her wishes. When they are alone, Betty tells her that she is to become a mother, and at the end of the summer a little son is born to her. Visiting her in the hospital, Helene tells her that she knows that Walter is the father of the child, and she will break her engagement to him so that they may be married, but Betty replies that she is in love with someone else and that she wishes Helene to return to her home, saying the child is hers. Indignantly the girl refuses, until Betty states that she has evidence which proves that Mr. Hunter was involved in a murder which occurred a year before. Doubting this, Betty continues, stating that a gun which the police have been searching for is in her possession, as Mr. Hunter concealed it in his drawer and she discovered it while tidying up his room. Finding her with the weapon, he gave her a check, exacting the promise that she would not reveal her knowledge, which is still in her possession, Betty asserts. If Helene will take her child, this information will remain a secret, she promises—otherwise she will make a confession to police. Reluctantly, the girl consents, and returns to face her parents in disgrace. They receive her sorrowfully, but agree to take care of her and the baby, who is named Edwin, telling everyone that he is an adopted child. Worried and unhappy, Helene one day tells her parents she must make a new start somewhere, and goes to Philadelphia, where she finds employment in the office of an oil company.

Little Edwin, who is nick-named "Sonny," becomes a favorite in the Hunter home. Helene's parents decide they will write to Walter, whom they feel sure is the father of the child, and obtain his permission, to obtain the boy legally. When Walter receives the letter, he takes the next train to their city, and tells the Hunters that he has tried constantly to get into communication with Helene, with no success. He assures them that his relationship with their daughter was honorable, but confesses that one night, worried over his business, he became intoxicated, and entered Betty's room; she willingly received his advances, so it is evident that Helene is shielding her. Wiring to their daughter at once, the Hunters urge her to come home, wbich she decides to do. The trains stops over for a few hours in a small town, and the girl is seated in the waiting room when a shabbily dressed woman approaches her, and she recognizes it is Betty, who asks permission to accompany her home. There Betty confesses before them all that she is Edwin's mother, and that she lied to Helene regarding her father's guilt, as the gun she had belonged to a friend of hers who committed the murder, and the check had been given so that she might go to college the following year. Since then, she adds, her life has been ruined, as she has become a prostitute. The following morning, they find the girl has committed suicide. Helene and Walter agree to make up for these lost years by marrying at once, and to right a wrong by bringing up Edwin.

THE TRIUMPHANT PEOPLE

Elma Rivoli Drama File No. 10184

BIDDING farewell to his friends, Abraham Marcx, an American citizen of Jewish descent, sails from New York Harbor with his wife and three children, Max Isadore, and Yudeid, for Berlin, where they plan to make their future home. Their friend, Goldstein Rabei, welcomes them, and helps them select a villa at the edge of the great city, which is next door to the home of Herr Wolf, the mayor of Berlin. The Marcx children soon become acquainted with Yulius Wolf, the mayor's only son; at first he objects to his boy's friendship with a Jewish family, but finding them intelligent and charming people, changes his opinion. Abraham Marcx establishes a surgical supply house, which flourishes in the years immediately following the war. As time goes on, Herr Wolf sees that Yulius and Yudeid are in love, and tells his son that he cannot sanction his marriage with a member of her race; and Yudeid's parents giving her the same advice. They arrange an engagement between her and the son of Goldstein Rabei, but she will have no one but Yulius, who at this time becomes a secret service agent for the German government, appointed by the Haute Volee, a society composed of members of Kaiser Wilhelm's family, and is sent to Holland.

Telling her parents that she wishes to visit relatives in France, Yudeid joins her lover, and they are secretly married, before she returns to Berlin. At this time, Nazi leaders begin to injure Jewish citizens, and destroy goods which they manufacture. A delegation of Jewish merchants go to President Von Hindenburg, who promises to help them, but as they are returning, several of them are taken prisoners by the Nazis, among them Isadore and Max. Yudeid writes to her husband, asking his help. He pleads for their release before the Haute Volee, but is imprisoned for taking their side. Yulius's father discovers that his boy is married, through accidentally reading a letter from Yudeid, and tells the girl that it is because of her his son is now in prison. She writes to her husband, stating that their marriage has been a mistake, and she wishes to be free as she loves Goldstein Rabei's son, and he is relased from prison.

Hitler is made chancellor of Germany, and the persecution of the Jews continues. Abraham Marcx is thrown in prison, where he dies from neglect; Yudeid and her mother are left alone. During the Nazi reign of terror, their home is invaded, and the girl is seized, when Yulius, who has come to protect her, enters, and escapes with his wife and mother-in-law. He secures the release of Isadore and Max, through his father, who admits that he has influenced his wife to write to him. Renouncing his German citizenship, as he is ashamed of his country, Yudeid leaves with his wife's family for France. Mrs. Marcx and her sons remain with relatives there, but Yudeid and Yulius turn triumphantly toward America.

BIG BOY

L. Raymond Smith Drama File No. 10120

TENSE with excitement, Colonel Ralph and his daughter, Jeannette, take their places in the grand-stand to watch their horse, Big Boy, run in the Kentuck Derby. The horse gains steadily until he is almost across the line, then the jockey just behind him urges his steed on, and the two animals crash. The third horse in line is the winner, while the ambulance rushes to the two riders. Jimmie, Big Boy's jockey, is badly hurt, but the other rider, and both horses escape without injury. The next day, at the hospital, Jimmie is told that his fall has caused a paralysis of the muscles, and he probably will never walk again. It is decided at court that the crash was accidental, although it made Jimmie a cripple, and Colonel Ralph lost a fortune that he had placed on his horse. Impoverished by the race, he tells his daughter their only chance to regain their fortune is to mortgage their home, and run Big Boy again next year. They are forced to sell all of their other horses, and do away with all luxuries in order to provide for themselves and the jockey, Jimmie, whom the colonel insists must make his home with them. Jeannette secures a postion in the library. One day a young man asks for a book on the history of horse-racing. She replies that they have nothing on it in the library, but perhaps she can give him the information he wishes. In the course of the conversation, she tells him the story of last years' race, and he asks if he may call.

Colonel Ralph is pleased with Ray, his daughter's friend, and eagerly accepts his offer to help around the horses, although he says that he cannot pay him except with the hospitality of his home, which Kay assures him is quite enough. The colonel tells him that Silver Flash, a horse owned by a man in Louisville, will be their chief competition. A week before the race, Jeannette over-hears Ray attempting to bribe the jockey they have engaged to ride Big Boy. With tears in her eyes, she orders him to leave at once, reporting what she has heard to her father. The day of the Derby comes again, and once more the colonel and his daughter take their places, with Jimmy, who is carried to the grand-stand. At the last minute, it is announced that the jockey for Silver Flash will be re-place. Big Boy runs evenly besides Silver Flash, these two leading, and at the last lap, gains enough distance to win the race. In his excitement, Jimmie rises to his feet, cheering, and this victory has accomplished what surgery could not do for him.

Returning home, Jimmie tells Jeannette that Ray is the owner of Silver Flash. Believing the race a year ago had not ended in an accident, he had attempted to find out if Colonel Ralph's jockey was guilty, and finding they were not, discovered that his own men were planning a similar crash between the two leading horses. Hastening to the rail-road station, Jeannette finds Ray, and beg his forgiveness, which he gladly grants, telling her that the men who planned the "accidents" for this and last year have been arrested.

ONE'S ENOUGH

Michael Klavonich Drama File No. 10115

THE main interest in Frank's life is his younger brother, James, whom he had cared for ever since their parents died. He helps the younger boy with his lessons, and sets aside part of his small salary as a salesman each week, toward a fund which would provide a college education for his brother, advising him that he must take advantage of this opportunity that he had never had. James, however, often plays hooky from school, spending his time at pool rooms and at night, going to the Roseland Dance Hall where his engaging smile and quick humor made him a popular figure with the girls who serve as hostesses at ten cent a dance. His brother urges him not to waste his time in this manner, but he replies that he was tired of good advice, and would manage his own affairs in the future. Leaving his brother, James moves into a boarding house with a friend, and secured a position as chauffeur.

Katherine, a secretary, moves into the apartment next to Frank's with her invalid mother. She locks her key in the apartment one day, and as her mother is confined to a wheel chair and cannot come to the door, Frank, returning home at this time, climbs over the transom for her. After that, he spends many evenings talking to the girl and her mother, and they some-times go to the picture show together. While driving his employer's car, in an intoxicated condition, James crashes into another car, and is injured and discharged. He is taken home from the hospital by Frank, and while he is recovering, meets Katherine. She brings him delicacies to tempt his appetite and reads to him on the afternoons when she is not working.

When James recovers, he looks up his friends at the polo room. One of them persuades him to drive the car while he robs a bank the following evening. Police arrest the friend, and James drives to his brother's apartment, where Frank, hearing officers approach, changes clothes with him, and is indentified as the accomplice in the robbery, and taken into custody. He admits that he is guilty. Katherine, returning home late from work, is told of the arrest by James. She bursts into tears, and confesses that she loves Frank and cannot believe he has done such a thing. After a sleepless night, James reports to police head-quarters, saying that he is the criminal, and proves his point by explaining the entire plan of the robbery, and calling witnesses who indentify him as the man who rented the car. He is sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, and his brother freed. As he tells Frank good-bye, he relates what Katherine has confessed to him. Going to her, Frank says that he has always loved her, but tbought it was his brother who she cared for. She replies that she only loved him because he meant so much to Frank. The two of them visit James in prison, and he tells them that he could never have amounted to anything, but he is happy because he has brought them together, the only good thing he feels he has ever done.

MIGHTY NATION

Lee H. Drake Drama File No. 10196

STUDYING their history lessons together after school, Joe Gregg and his closest friend, Lloyd Kennedy, discuss the time when they, too, will do their share in making the laws and protecting the citizens of this mighty nation, as patriots of the past have done. Jeanne Franklin, a lawyer's daughter, and one of their play-mates, teasingly tells them that she knows one of the boys will become president of the United States, but she cannot decide whether it will be Lloyd or Joe. After their educations are completed, Joe becomes a newspaper reporter and Lloyd enters a law firm. Mr. Franklin is elected to the United States Senate, and moves to Washington with his family. When the boys bid Jeanne goodbye, both tell her that they are in love with her, but she repnes that she has always cared so much for eaen oi them that she cannot give an answer now, and they must wait until she graduates from college, which she is just entering.

In the electron three years yater, Lloyd is sent to the capnol as a congressman, and few months later, Joe is appomted a Washington correspondent by his paper. He is welcomed to the famous city by his old school chum and Mr. Franklin. Beginning an intensive mvestigation, he discoveres that many ot the dry senators patronize a popular boot-legger in the city, and writes an amusing column, mentioning them by name, for his paper. He brings to light the method by which votes are "traded" on the appropriations committee, in a penetrating series ot articles humorously called "Washington Fables," which are widely read, and lead to the dismissal of three committee members. Following this, he uncovers a number of income tax evasions on the part of prominent politicians.

Jeanne visits her father during vacation, and is greeted by her child-hood friends, Lloyd and Joe. Before she returns to college she gives her promise to Joe, telling him that she knows now he is the one she wishes to marry, although Lloyd will always be a dear friend. The wedding is planned for the following June. Joe begins a series of investigations concerning various members of the Senate and the House who are selling their votes to prominent politicians. He discovers that both Lloyd and Mr. Franklin have been guilt of this practice, in one incident, as they feared they would not be re-elected if they did not follow it. Lloyd pleads with him not to expose Jeanne's father, but he replies that it is duty, but before he publishes the facts, Mr. Franklin commits suicide, confessing his guilt, in a letter. Jeanne breaks her engagement, but Lloyd, who resigns from Congress, persuades her that Joe felt he had no choice in the matter, and that he is the only one who has kept faith. She tells Joe that she understands, and is proud of him.

THE GAY MARRIAGE

M. M. D. Comedy File No. 10200

FACED with the responsibility of bringing up his two motherless girls by himself, Peter Vilner, a Bohemian sea captain, retires from his active life, and rents a cottage at a fashionable sea-side resort, where his daughters, who attend an Eastern boarding school, join him for the summer months. He tells them that it is time they thought about finding a husband and settling down, but Edythe, who is nineteen, replies that she is much more interested in becoming an astrologist, as she believes she has psychic powers, while Petra, two years her junior, says that she is too fond of gaiety to wish to think of anything as serious as marriage. Peter decides that he will not allow Petra to become engaged until Edythe is married. He is introduced to Mrs. Polly Crane, a widow, vacationing at the same resort, and confides his troubles to her, stating that Edythe is so serious and intellectual that he doubts if any man will please her, while Petra is so full of fun that no one would think of proposing to her. Mrs. Crane promises to help him, and introduces his elder daughter to Mr. Brooks, an English scholar who specializes in the study of dead languages. The two hold long, erudite discussions and spend the afternoons in museums and art gallaries, until one morning when Mr. Brooks comes to call, Petra informs him that her sister is ill, and he stays to talk to her. Petra laughs at his stilted conversation, advising him that he is too serious, and teasingly nick-names him Puddle. He tells her that she is the most refreshing girl he has ever known, and by the end of the week, both admit that they are in love with each other.

Petra confesses this state of affairs to Edythe, who replies that Mr. Brooks bores her terribly, but the younger girl remembers her father's edict that she cannot be the first to wed. She explains the situation to Mrs. Crane, who hires an astrologist to tell Edythe that on the following morning she will meet a dark man whom she should marry. The next day, as the girl is going to the post-office, she encounters a gypsy musician, who picks up her scarf for her, and begins a conversation. When she returns home, she tells her sister that she has fallen in love, and that the gypsy, whose name is Andrey, has asked her to become his wife. Both girls admit that they feel their father will feel they have chosen unwisely, and decide that they must elope with their lovers. Accordingly, the four leave for a little mountain town, writing a note which explains their plans to Peter, which is delivered to him while he is dining at a hotel with Mrs. Crane. He starts out at once in his car after the girls, asking her to accompany him. They are caught in the storm, and forced to spend the night at a small road-side inn. Peter asks Mrs. Crane to marry him, not merely to avoid a compromising situation, but because he loves her, and she consents. Returning the next day with their new husbands, Petra and Edythe find their father so happy that he agrees everything has worked out for the best, and all six celebrates their nuptials with a gay wedding dinner.

DAUGHTER OF THE EARTH

Vivienne Hatter Melodrama File No. 10146

A PARTY of young people are driving through the Vermont hills when they see a gypsy camp. Bob Steele and his companion Jeannette Rickers, persuade the others to stop and inspect the camp. They have their fortunes told by Madame Alvarado, who predicts that a beautiful dark lady will cross Bob's life, whereupon they all tease Jeannette, who is fair. A gypsy girl dances for them, her brown eyes flashing, and long, black braids of hair moving in rythm with her body. Bob comments on her beauty and grace to Jeannette, as he helps her in the car, and they drive away. A knock is heard at the door of the Steele home that evening, as Bob and his foster-parents are having coffee in the living room, and the butler admits a gypsy girl whom Bob recognizes as the dancer he admired earlier in the day. She starts to speak, then collapses. The Steele's send for a doctor, who tells them that the girl is in a serious condition from nervous exhaustion and she must rest quietly for a few days. The next morning she tells them that she is Rosita Alvarado, daughter of the fortune-teller, and that her father beat her because she would not marry Sandro, a middle-aged gypsy whom she hated. Jaquita, her friend, made love to her father so that she could slip away. Promising to keep her secret, Mrs. Steele tells her she may remain in their home for the rest of the summer, and she and Bob ride and swim together when she is stronger.

Mrs. Steele tells Rosita that she realizes her son is in love with the girl, and that although she has come to look upon her as a daughter, she feels marriage to a gypsy will only bring unhappiness to both of them in the end. Agreeing that she may be right, Rosita promises not to marry Bob because she, too, loves him, and when he asks her to become his wife, she says that she must someday return to her people, as the gypsy wander-lust is in her blood and advises Bob to marry Jeannette. As she is dressing that evening, Mrs. Steele comes into her room, and notices for the first time a heart-shaped scar on the girl's left shoulder, which Rosita tells her is a birth-mark. After the family has retired, the gypsy girl leaves a note, thanking them, and telling them she is returning to her camp.

A cousin of Mrs. Steele, who she has not seen since childhood, visits her. The hostess, in telling her guest the story of the gypsy, describes the peculiar birth-mark. Mrs. Harvey, the cousin, turn pale, and tells Mrs. Steele that her only child, Shirley, who was kidnapped when a baby, bore a similar birth-mark. A long search is begun the next day for the gypsy band, and at last they are located. Breaking in upon them, Bob finds Alvarado threatening Rosita with a huge whip. Striking him, Bob takes the girl in his arms. Alvardo admits the kidnapping, and Shirley promises to marry Bob, while her mother weep with happiness.

FOUR LEAF CLOVERS

Eva Westlock Drama File No. 10171

FOR weeks June has gone longingly past the shiny teapot in the shop window. When at last she sells her first picture, the struggling little artist pays her back room rent, and by stinting on food manages the price. In the downpour, she runs happily home but at the corner her umbrella blows inside out and as she tugs frantically a man collides with her and the precious teapot crashes to the ground. Her sobs amaze the young man who follows and begs her to accept money for the damage. Coldly she refuses, but when he sneezes and she realizes for the first time his clothes are threadbare and he is offering all the money he has, she insits that he come upstairs to her fire. As they drink tea brewed in her one saucepan, June learns that he is searching desperately for work. They fall in love and when Jack at last gets a position as clerk for Edgar Pemberton, he dashes home to June and they are married.

Years pass. At June's insistence, Jack borrows money and opens a ten cent store. Within a comparatively short time, Jack has a chain of such stores. When he moves his family to a more fashionable neighborhood, little Barbara, their child is given a touching farewell by the Four Leaf Clovers, the club of which she is president and she weeps a little because her going is to leave her best friend Geraldine, the unhappy child of divorced parents, lonelier than ever. But success goes to Jack's head and now he meets again Dolores Pemberton, whom he had looked up to when he worked in her father's store. Attracted by his success, she plans a systematic campaign to win him from his wife and at last Jack overwhelms June by asking for a divorce. Set aside without warning, June returns to the little apartment where she and Jack had once been so happy. Barbara's little friends welcome her and prompted by the common sorrow of Geraldine and Barbara, the Four Leaf Clovers prattle of ways and means of restoring wandering fathers.

Soon enough Jack discovers his second wife has married him for his money and while he is kept busy to save his fortune from crashing with the others in 1929, Dolores openly appears about town with a notorious count. When at last Jack remonstrates, she sues for divorce demanding a high alimony.

Little Geraldine contracts pneumonia and Barbara slips into her room and is with her at the last. She sees Geraldine's parents reconciled by their mutual sorrow, but when she comes down with pneumonia, she murmurs deliriously about her sickness bringing her parents together. In the end it is just that that happens. June at first is irreconcilable with her former husband but at last she promises that if Barbara recovers she will take him back, and Barbara smiles happily as her Mummy and Daddy stand at her side. Outside the Four Leaf Clovers rejoice for it not their Barbara coming back to them?

OTHER WORLDS

Edwin Barry Speth Drama File No. 10139

ACCOMPANIED by his son, Ethram, William Baxter goes on a hunting expedition on a small, deserted island, owned by a friend, just off the coast of Florida. As they are resting in their tent at the close of day, they connect their radio, and are in the midst of a some news program when a report is given that a huge fog is sweeping across China, and thousands are dying in its wake. The same phenonema is reported in London, when all radio communication suddenly ccases. A little later, father and son perceive that this dense fog is approaching their island. It soon envelops them, and, gasping for breath, both are over-come. When they regain consciousness, they see smoke rising from a great fire in Florida, and decide to board their yacht, the Glamatis, and investigate the situation. By the time they the nearest port on the main-land, they find practically everything destroyed by flame, and no trace of another human being can be located. Discovering a car that has not been burned, Baxter and his son start out at once for their home in Savannah. On the way, some of the cities they pass have been completely reduced to ashes, others have not been touched by fire, but there are no people remaining in any of them. Savannah is burned to the ground, they find, and they search in vain for their relatives and friends, but can find no clue as to what has happened to them.

Ethram and Baxter continue in their search for a solution to the mystery, covering the United States by plane, when they discover a deserted air-port. They go to New York, then to Chicago, and west to San Francisco and Seattle, but find the same complete destruction everywhere. Both decide to fly to Europe, but after a complete tour of the globe they are forced to face the fact that they are the only two survivors of the terrible accident. They settle down on the coast of Brunswick with "Uncle Bob," a exploring their new home, they discover a strange-exploring their new home ,they discover strange-looking ship in the harbor, bearing the name, "The Iris." Swimming out ot it, the find it is manned by a crew of robots, and that it contains a powerful radio, which they bring ashore. One day, two years later, a severe earth-quake occurs, and a new island appears in the ocean, following this upheaval. Ethram and his father hear strange sounds over their radio, and at last a voice comes them, saying, in Latin: "Friends, we send help, be prepared."

The next morning a ship similar in appearance to "The Iris" is seen in the harbor, and a girl, dressed in white, wearing a helmet, signals to Baxter and Ethram. Swimming out to the ship, the girl tells them that she is from the planet Saturn, and that her descendants once lived upon the island Atlantis, Which they left when God warned them that it would be desrtoyed, making their exodus in rocket ships. As the island has re-appeared in this last upheaval, her people will return. She offered to take Ethram and Baxter to Saturn with her, and all three are soon sailing through the air in her strange conveyance.

Arriving at the planet, the girl removes her helmet, which she wore to accustom herself to the rarified air of the earth. Her people are a tall, handsome race, who receive the visitors cordially, but their leader warns Baxter and his son that it will be best for them to return to their world, as the inhabitants of Saturn believe they are responsible for the persecution of Christ, and may prove hostile. Ethram tells the leader that he has fallen in love with the girl who brought them here, and she confesses that she, also, loves him. He decides that the girl may return to earth with Baxter and his son if all three of them will agree to live upon the island Atlantis, and help to govern a new race. They agree to do this; Ethram and the girl are married, and, with Baxter, guide the rocket ship through the skies again to the newly re-created land.

THE LIFE SAVERS

Elisha Douglas Shaw Comedy Drama File No. 10102

BY "bein' verra careful o' th' siller," Archie Ross, recently from the farthermost hielans o' th' Land o' Heather works himself via the errand boy — bootblack — newsie — porter route to the position of manager of Gents Furnishings in a western dry-goods store. Until the coming of Fanny Calvert he is impervious to women's charms. The aristocratic Southern girl, impoverished and finding it necessary to support her mother, a dignified and somewhat imperious woman, is recommended by the family lawyer to the dry goods store and her authoritative knowledge of laces and cultured background wins her a unique place in the establishment. To Archie she is a comely lass, and what's more one eminently desirable. But his straight forward method of capturing the girl of his heart, a carry-over from his Highland ancestors, moves all who watch to mirth. Miss Fanny is at first astounded at his offer to take her out to a cheap lunch counter, but her refusals merely spur the indomitable Archie to more violent shows of gallantry. But after he has pummelled one of the store's employees upon whom the gracious Fanny has smiled, the matter ceases to be entertaining and the hotheaded Archie is fired, despite his claims that as a stock holder he has rights.

But Archie's campaign continues and he follows Fanny in the street until in self defence she ducks into a store on the pretense of buying a dress, and Archie, waiting impatiently below, is wheedled by the saleslady, into purchasing some outrageously colored stockings for his "ain lass." Undaunted, Archie at length contrives to secure lodgings in the same boarding house as Fanny and her mother and with great bluster and confusion breaks into Fanny's room assures the startled girl he is saving her life from a great fire. Fanny faints at his roughness and recovering sends the unwilling Archie back to rescue her mother. Although the resourceful Archie had added papers to a small blaze caused by a neglected iron, and the danger was at no time considerable, Mrs. Calvert looks more kindly upon the redoubtable hero who henceforth claims that since he rescued Fanny's life she belongs to him.

Nerves shattered by the persistence of her Scotch admirer, Fanny at length goes away for a rest attended by Alice Perkins, who closely resembles her. The change agrees with Fanny so well, that her mother invests their savings in a boarding house. Soon, however, Archie finds them and long, amorous letters come for Fanny on postcards. Her consternation increases as the entire vicinity becomes aware of her dauntless admirer and then comes Archie himself. To the dismay of the Southern girl, her would-be beau has wheedled her mother into giving him a room at half price and when Fanny expostulates, her mother calmly reminds her that after all they do owe Archie something for rescuing them from the fire. Fanny's cries are lost upon her mother and Archie, discovering that his former friend Ed Legale, a young lawyer, who like himself has followed the lovely Fanny here, is making greater progress than he, after an attack upon Ed, conceives of a kidnapping plan. To aid him, he gets his younger brother Tom, who is ready to do anything for the Chief of the clan o' Ross, regardless! — to kidnap Fanny. However, while Archie is being closely guarded, Tom, left on his own, abducts instead of Fanny — Alice Perkins. Dismayed by his brother's error, Archie goes about rescuing Alice with his old gusto and although Alice realizes that it is Archie's own key that has unlocked her dungeon, and overhears him rebuke her abductor before battling with him, Alice raising adoring eyes to her gallant, who enjoys the hero's role.

Ed plans a picnic, and Archie reluctantly parts with a deal o' siller to escort Alice, but his appearance in a dress frock coat, high silk hat and malacca cane occasions gust of hilarity. Only Alice regards him tenderly even when he claims he is above such foolishness as carrying a bathing suit. At the beach he is unmercifully teased until at length, carefully spreading newspapers about a row boat he steps in and Ed begins to teach him how to handle the oars. The others purposely rocks the boat until Archie, growing wetter and angrier loses his head, and when Ed and Fanny dive out, leaving him moving fruitlessly in circles, Archie raises himself in the boat and brings his oar down on the tormenting Ed's head and is himself dumped into the water frock coat and all. The kindhearted Fanny rescues the spluttering Archie, who cannot swim but the crowd on shore, moved by mob violence threaten to lynch him for causing the popular Ed's disappearance. Alice fights hysterically for her Archie and Ed comes up to explain his joke. Ed, Fanny, all are forgotten as for the first time Archie laughs at his own expense. After his former landlady enters and compels him to write a check covering damages caused by the "fire" to her house and temper, saying, "This little lass is the only life saver worth while among us all," Archie bends to Alice's lips.

THE BRASS IDOL

James Liberatore Drama File No. 10183

FORCED to support herself and her mother by working in a factory, Maizie Reade's life consists only of hours of hard labor, in surroundings made dismal by poverty. Mrs. Reade counsels her daughter that the only way to be happy is to marry a wealthy man, as she does not believe in love, and trusts no one. Following this advice, Maizie will not associate with anyone who does not spend lavishly, and exchanges her favors for luxurious presents, going about with men of questionable character while she is still little more than a child. Her mother dies, and the girl is on the point of a nervous breakdown from over-work and dissipation, when an aunt, Mrs. Grover, invites Maizie to visit at her summer cottage near California City. The train trip to the Golden State cheers the girl, and as she sees, for the first time, beautiful lakes and mountains, she smiles once more, and sings a little song to herself. Nathan Davenport, a fellow-passenger, introduces himself to the girl, telling her that he is a freshman in an Eastern university, going home for the summer. They discover that they will be next door neighbors at the beach, as his father's cottage borders on her aunt's property, and plan many happy days together.

In the hospitable atmosphere of Mrs. Grover's home, a new life begins for Maizie. She spends long days swimming and hiking with Nathan, and when he asks her to marry him, she consents. Nathan's parents, however, forbid the wedding, warning their son that the girl may only be interested in his money. Fearing that he may lose her, the boy persuades Maizie to run away with him, and the ceremony is performed secretly. Mr. Davenport investigates Maizie's past experiences, through the services of a detective agency, and summons the girl to his office. Explaining that he will do anything to prevent his son's life from being wrecked, and that he knows she will never be a suitable wife for him, he offers her a check for forty thousand dollars, if she will leave Nathan, and not return. Remembering her mother's advice, the girl accepts.

When he finds his wife gone, Nathan confronts his father, and the whole situation is explained to him. He refuses to believe it, until several months later the cancelled check comes in. In despair, the boy attempts to take poison, and is rushed to the hospital at the point of death, continually calling for Maizie. Doctors advise Mr. Davenport that she must be found, and detectives soon trace her, and bring the girl to the hospital. She begs Nathan to forgive her, when he regains consciousness, but he asks her what she has done with the check. Hesitating, the girl finally confesses that a daughter has been born to them, but she kept this fact a secret, as she did not want Nathan to take her back from a sense of duty, but only because he loves her. All is forgiven, and Mr. Davenport presents the young couple with a home in sunny California.

THE CHAINED SOUL

Rev. J. Kinder Barker Boyd Drama File No. 10143

WHEN the shrill notes of the whistle announce the close of the day at the American Paper Box Factory, Lucius Ross, a foreman, hurries to meet Arena Adams, one of the workers. As they walk home together, he tells the girl that he has just been promoted, and asks her if she will marry him. She replies that she wishes to travel, see something of the world, and not settle down, but he tells her they will go together some day soon, and at last she gives her consent. They are married, and live in a little cottage near the factory. Three years later, Arena complains that she is tired of the routine of her life here, and that Lucius has not kept his promise to her; he says that she must be patient and things will work out their way, but at present the factory has been greatly retarded in its development by the depression, and he is fortunate to have his position here. Rose Bergmann, one of the girls with whom Arena used to work, tells her she is foolish to live in poverty when she can easily secure the things she desires, and takes her to a party where she meets Bert Williams, a song writer. He mixes a cocktail for her, and takes her into the garden, where she soon admits that she is not happy with her husband, and hates her dismal surroundings.

Williams persuades Arena to come to his apartment, and easily wins her affections with gifts. She meets him frequently, leaving word for her husband that she had gone to visit Rose. Williams tells her one day that he no longer wishes to continue their affair, and she must not come to his apartment again. She telephones him continually, until he agrees to see her once more. Fearing that her friend may do something desperate, Rose goes to Lucius and tells him the whole story. He does not believe her, but she adds that Arena has told her of her intention of seeing Williams tonight, and advises Lucius to follow her. Half-crazed with anxiety, he goes, taking a gun. When he finds Arena in Williams' arms, he loses control of himself and shoots; for a moment he stands motionless, then goes to his wife, and discovers she is dead; meanwhile Williams escapes.

Lucius becomes a fugitive from justice, slipping into Canada on a cattle-boat. He finds work in a cannery situated in a small border town, but he is constantly haunted by the face of Arena, waking in the night to find her smiling at him, and hearing her scornful laugh in his dreams. Although he meets Eve Henderson, a music teacher who lives at his boarding house, and later comes to love her, he can never be free of this image of his wife. Finally, he goes back to his former home and gives himself up to police, only to find that he did not kill Arena, but Williams, who stabbed her as he held her in his embrace, was the murderer, and has been hanged. He returns to Canada, and tells Eve he is free at last to ask her to marry him, to which she consents.

CIRCUS KID, medicine showman, vaudeville artist, Barth Paxton thinks nothing of lying or cheating to get what he wants. When his show is stranded in Jefferson City, a tank town, he and Pat Kennedy, his partner, live from hand to mouth doing odd jobs about town. Then Barth gets a letter from a buddy in Seattle who is about to start a carnival for the season. He can use the team of Barth and Pat but hasn't enough money to send for them. Thereupon Barth induces a girl whom he has been playing to steal money from her father and blowing a kiss to her window, he departs in state. Pat has an attack of conscience about the source of their funds but Barth assures him he gave the girl plenty in return for the money and promptly forgets about it. Some years later, Pat, against the advice of Barth marries and when he is killed with his wife in a train wreck, Barth adopts their child, Myles. Unscrupulous, talented, in a few years Barth manages to cut a niche for himself as a director in Hollywood.

Myles, now twenty-one, through his foster father's influence and his own striking profile rises as an actor and falls in love with a wide-eyed little extra. Barth, learning that Myles is proposing to marry the girl loses his temper. Ugly words are exchanged as Barth exclaims the girl is probably trying to use Myles as a stepping stone. The boy tries to explain that he and Betty happen to love each other, but when Barth triumphantly demands to know why he has to give her a license then, Myles storms out of the room. Barth sends for the girl determined to pay her off and expose her to the boy whom he loves too much to see hurt by a woman. When the girl's mother comes, Barth sardonically pours himself a drink and warns Mrs. Rosler that he's wise to her game and nothing she says can induce him to raise his price. At that she loses her temper and tells him all she wants is to get him to break off the romance between the youngsters. she'd rather die than let her daughter marry an actor. In spite of himself Barth is convinced of her sincerity and he promises to aid. Suavely he prepares for Betty's visit but he gasps when Myles, his arm about her protectively, introduces her as his bride. Desperately Barth offers her money to go away and get an annulment. In the altercation that follows, however, Betty reveals that she was born in a Jefferson City prison and as Barth questions her further he learns that her father, an actor, had deserted her mother after inducing her to steal for him. Myles exclaims if he could find the cad he would kill him, but his foster father brokenly assures him that he, Barth, will make Betty's father suffer. To the two happy youngsters, too occupied with their own happiness to see more than the superficial change in Barth, he gives his blessing and after they have left, packs to follow Mrs. Rosler and make up to her for all the unhappiness he caused her these many years.

WOMAN'S SANCTUARY

Margaret Butler Drama File No. 10168

THE only escape from the drudgery of keeping house for her extravagant mother and broken willed father, Helen found was in the little fenced off portion at the end of the neighboring estate. One day as she sat there painting, a man approached and looking at her gasped, "Alice! Startled, Helen explained that Alice was her mother's name, and Mr. Bell explained that for a moment he had forgotten everything she looked so much like her mother once had. To her Walter Bell explained that he had loved her mother years ago, but she had married Harry Pinson and he had gone away to forget, and earn the money he didn't have enough of then.

Bell wouldn't hear of Helen giving up her little sanctuary and had a key made for her to insure privacy. At home Alice Pinson thoroughly approved of the friendship of her former lover and her daughter and urged Helen to get him to marry her. Helen turned her head from her cold hearted mother and as Alice pushed Alene, the younger child, violently, for being in her way, Helen picked up the youngster and dryed her tears. Later, her work done, Helen washed Alene's hair and her own and as they sat on the back porch drying, Mark Everett appeared. He had lost the main road and Helen directed him. He couldn't resist saying, "You and your child have the most beautiful hair I have ever seen," and when, blushing she explained that Alene was her sister, he had remained to speak until Alice had come, and sizing up the situation had ordered Mark from the grounds. But Mark had come back, because he knew he loved Helen, and at length she had consented to meet him in her sanctuary.

One day, soon after, Bell called Helen over and showed her the new will he had made in her favor. She had protested, but he begged her to marry him and Alice had answered yes for her. To Mark, Helen explained she would go back to Bell, explain she was in love with Mark, and he would release her. Mark paced restlessly in the sanctuary that night and at length, surprized at not seeing Helen come to him, had gone to Bell's house. A faint outcry caused him to enter, and he saw Walter Bell outstretched, his face ashen white. "Water," Bell begged. Mark held the glass to the sick man's lips and a moment later, Walter Bell dropped back dead. Believing that Helen had left the poison for Bell, Mark slowly lifted the receiver and told the police that he had killed Walter Bell. After a quick trial he was given a sentence of death.

Helen shuddered when she learned that she was the sole inheritor of Bell's estate, but when the butler seized her in his arms as she said she would close it up, she started violently. When she tried to escape him he went mad, told her that he killed Bell because he loved her and now she thought she could get away. Springing from the madman's grasp, Helen locked him in the pantry and called the police. They found the man, his leg broken from his jump out of the window, and his confession freed Mark.

In the sanctuary, Helen was painting a picture of a tall man coming through a gate, when Alene cried, "Helen, look!" "Mark!" Helen cried, and as she was seized in strong arms, little Alene scampered unnoticed from the sanctuary.

AGAINST WOMEN

Hannah Q. Mitchell Drama File No. 9821

NERVOUSLY fumbling a wedding ring and practicing before a mirror how to say, "I do," R. Elmer Wright is disturbed by the persistent ringing of the door bell and answering, at length, finds a messenger boy. Slitting the telegram, Elmer pales as he reads, "Sorry Elmer, I couldn't go through with it. Married Paul today. Here's your ring. Forgive." Elmer sinks heavily into a chair and murmurs, "I do . . . " then dashes the ring to the floor, hurriedly packs and runs all the way to the station.

In a distant city Elmer gets a position as a bus driver. The other men soon discover that he hates women and they kid him unmercifully. One day a lady is announced. She is looking for Elmer. Elmer sullenly announces that he's not interested but his sister Dot strides in, kisses his cheek before the astounded bus drivers, and tells Elmer she's been looking for him for months. There's to be no more nonsense. From now on she's taking care of him. Elmer keeps his fellows the handsome Kelly twins. George Passmore, and the other Beau Brummel drivers from his sister with a determination that makes them think twice before daring his wrath.

Then one day, running his route, Elmer is signalled by a frightened girl in a bridal outfit with a man's coat slung over her shoulders. "Quick . . . Please . . . " she cries, and Elmer stiffens at the memories of another bride who ran off. Driving savagely, Elmer jerks the brakes suddenly in response to a traffic signal and the girl slides limply to the floor. Elmer wrings his hands and administering awkward first aid mutters, "You ought to should have been a man." "Why?" she asks opening her eyes. "Why then I'd, then I'd, then we could be friends," he finishes lamely. At the depot the girl shows no signs of getting off and Elmer gruffly reminds her the bus isn't a hotel, but noticing she is weeping he softens and asks what the trouble is. As she explains she has no money or friends he hesitates, scratches his head for a moment and tells her his sister Dot would take care of her he guesses. Dot and Stuyvesant become friends immediately and when they decide to open a cake shop, Elmer gives a snort of rage at their enthusiastic plans and moves out of the apartment. Nothing Dot can do can get him back. Then one day there is a cry of fire. Dot's house is ablaze. Elmer rushes in carries out small children from various apartments and as Dot cries, "Stuyvesant is still inside," Elmer rushes through the fire lines and carries her out. They are both overcome with the smoke and when Elmer opens his eyes and sees Stuyvesant leaning over him in the hospital, he says bitingly, "It's all your fault."

The other drivers come to see him and some of them kid him because he has been hurt helping a woman, but when Elmer jumps at George, George soothes him asking, "You wouldn't strike a brother-in-law would you?" Why you . . . " begins Elmer, but the other boys calm him saying the two kids were in love why shouldn't they marry.

Elmer manages to avoid Stuyvesant thereafter since she is no longer with his sister but one day she climbs on his bus and sitting directly behind him invites him to sample some of her cakes and see how nicely her shop is coming on. Several days later Elmer steals up the back way and to his astonishment sees a thug holding Stuyvesant at the end of a gun while he rifles her cash box. "Duck!" cries Elmer as he leaps at the thug. The gun goes off, the thug is knocked out and Elmer is babbling to Stuyvesant's still white face when the doctor assures him it is only shock.

"That's the guy who hated women," his fellow bus drivers jeer as blushing he leads his bride from the Church.

WAS IT SIN?

SUMMONING her servants, Madame D'Hauteville instructs them that the De Sevignes, neighbors at the next chateau will be guests for Xmas holidays as they have been for years. During the guest's stay one evening after dinner. Madame de Sevigne, 'Granny' and Monsieur D'Hauteville talk seated before the huge fireplace while the children play in the game room. Madame de Sevigne says that Alice, thirteen, will enter St. Mary's Convent School, while Armand, fourteen, will attend a military academy near Paris. 'Granny' convinces her son that this would be a wise plan to follow for his motherless daughter, Jeannette, now twelve years old. It is agreed that the girls will go away to school together. This news delights them and days of feverish preparation follow. Homesick at first, they soon adapt themselves to this new life. The next four years both families spend their vacation months together, swimming and riding. Jeannette, who has specialized in music, oftens plays and sings for them.

Armand is determined to become a doctor, and is to leave for five years of study in Berlin. Before he goes he kisses Jeannette in the garden and tells her he loves her. She admits loving him too. With years of study ahead and away from home, Armand does not take the affair as seriously as Jeannette. It hurts her and she tries to forget in the quietness of the Convent. Only when she almost loses her life in a terrible accident ,which brings him rushing back from Berlin, does he realizes how deeply he cares. Being almost summer vacation he stays in Paris. Each day he visits her at the hospital. Weeks of delightful convalescence follow. After talking with his Mother Armand proposes to Jeannette, although they caanot marry for years. The engagement is announced in a brilliant reception. Jeannette now wears an heirloom of the De Sevigne family, a priceless ring. One night before returning to Berlin, Armand, seeming to doubt Jeannette's love, urges her not to wait and believing it the only way to prove her great love Jeannette yields to his presuasion.

The next day after driving him to the station she packs belongings and returns to her school. Alice having gone to England, Jeannette is very lonely. Soon. she discovers that her future plans will be ruined for she is to become a mother. She writes to Armand. then tears up the letter knowing that a marriage now would disgrace both families and necessitate Armand's giving up his dearest ambition. She is desperate. After careful planning, she leaves the Convent taking only a small suit case and boards the next train to Paris. There she finds a room in a cheap hotel where she hides until the following evening. She manages to get a newspaper "Her Absence Discovered," a picture and description of herself are on the second page. Penniless she wanders, then, decides to end it all. From one of the Seine River bridges she throws her suitcase and is about to follow when someone speaks to her. She is confronted by a kindly middle-aged gentleman who, through a ruse, causes her to change her mind. Later in his studio he promises to hide her from the police and help her. Police finding suitcase abandon the search for Jeannette. Weeks later Professeur Renault, Jeannette's benefactor, a prominent musician, introduces her to his friends as Diane Renoir a niece whose husband has recently been killed. That summer Roger her son is born. Encouraged by her benefactor Jeannette resumes her study of music under Maitre Cornelli and secures a small role in an Opera.

As Roger grows older his mother tells him that his father is an eminent doctor who will come for them someday, but she does not make herself known yet, afraid it might ruin Armand's career. She appreciates deeply but refuses Monsieur Renault's offer of marriage, knowing she will never love anyone but Armand. Later, through a trick of Fate Jeannette gets her big chance and sings the leading role in the Opera "Manon." During the third act where she lays her hand on Degrieu', her ring, which in her excitement she had forgotten to hide by turning it around as she always did in public places,. attracts the attention of a man in the front box. This man hurries to her dressing room to await the close of the scene and finds Roger there with a nurse. Roger talks to him and shows him a picture of "Daddy" which his mother always carries with her.

Jeannette enters the room finding her son clasped in the arms of the man who is Armand. That same night she refuses to sign an important contract. All three return to the Chateau where happiness will reign once more.

"YOUR SON AND MINE"

John F. Otter Drama File No. 10194

ALTHOUGH in moderate circumstances, Mr. and Mrs. Warren are able to provide their children, Harry and Dorothy, with everything necessary to their happiness.

When they return from school, at the end of the day, they help their Parents with their household tasks, and, after supper their parents assist them with their school lessons and problems.

Fred Carlton, Harry's friend, is rather more unfortunate, comes from a different sort of environment. When his father returns home at night, he quarrels violently with the boy, telling him he is lazy and worthless. When Mrs. Carlton urges him to do something, or study his lessons, he scornfully orders her to let him manage his own affairs, and Fred deliberately strikes his mother, and she falls to the floor. He is equally rough with his sister, Viola, but always apologizes afterwards. Mother realizes that it is her husband who causes him to be unkind.

Mr. Warren often remarks to his wife, that the Carlton children do not seem desirable playmates—they have many good qualities—but little chance to develop them.

When Harry graduates from High-School, he asks Viola to marry him. She accepts. Shortly after this, he obtains a position as an Office Boy, in the employ of a Mr. Standish, a Lawyer.

On his first "pay-day," Fred holds him up, and robs his weekly pay-envelope, hitting him on head, and leaving him unconscious. He escapes in a nearby hallway, is watched by an Officer, and finally arrested.

Five years later, Harry Warren graduates from College and enters a Law firm.

Fred, who has not continued his education, commits a series of petty "hold-ups.

Harry, by his clever defense in "court" cases, soon wins prominence as a capable Lawyer. He is shocked when he reads the morning paper, that Fred has been arrested, while attempting to rob a "chain grocery store." Mrs. Carlton visits Harry Warren's Office, pleading, that he help her son. He promises. For the first time in five years, Fred and Harry meet in the Court-room. Harry advises Fred that he must plead guilty. By his pathetic and true account of Fred s boyhood, he wins the sympathy of the jury, and a minimum sentence for his client, Fred, who faithfully promises to do better when he is released from prison.

Harry Warren clasps his hand, stating that he has faith in him, and he takes Viola and Mrs. Warren in his auto to their home.

In Honor of Harry Warren's success, an elaborate party is arranged, and the engagement of Harry and Viola is announced.

Dorothy Warren, after the Court scene, sympathizes and has faith in Fred, owing to his solemn promise to do better after his release, visits him, and promises to wait for him.

Upon his release, he visits Dorothy's Home, and, securing a position, soon marries Dorothy.

MEN LOVE ONCE

Edith Weber Drama File No. 10206

MORE than one doctor and interne falls in love with pretty Mary O'Brien, who is in training at the New York City Hospital, but she tells them all that while she values their friendship, her greatest interest in life is in winning the white cap of a graduate nurse. One afternoon, as she is filling in medical charts, Dr. Johnson, the head surgeon, introduces her to Jimmie Kingsford, his new assistant. Jimmie invites her to dinner, and to the surprise of everyone, she accepts. Following that, they are seen together constantly after working hours. The girls in the nurses' head-quarters tease Mary with the fact that she has at last found a man whom she regards as something more than a friend, and she admits that they are right. Doris Brown and Bess Scott, Mary's two closest friends, express their happiness at this news, but Lillian Lane smiles cynically. Mary and Jimmie announce their engagement, but decide to postpone the wedding until the girl receives her diploma, at the end of the next month. Piqued because the young doctor will pay no attention to her advances, Lillian follows Jimmie to the operating room, and finding him alone, throws her arms around him. At that moment Mary enters with a can of ether, and seeing them together, withdraws hastily. Throwing herself on the bed, she bursts into tears, and tells Nellie, the house-maid, that Jimmie is no more to be trusted than any other man. Nellie replies that Lilliam is the one who is not to be trusted, but Mary refuses to see Jimmie when he attempts to explain. Finding her alone as she is running the sterilizer, he tells her that if she loves him she will believe him, and they part angrily. On graduation day, Mary receives a beautiful rose, with a note from Jimmie, once again stating his love. She decides to hear his side of the story, but at that moment, Lillian enters the room, and tells the girl that Jimmie and she have had an affair, and now he must marry her. Heart-broken, Mary replies that she will not interfere, and sadly takes her place in line for the graduation exercises. As she discards her blue uniform for the white, she remarks to Bess that at least she has her work.

Jimmie asks to be transferred to the medical staff of a Wyoming hospital, and devotes himself to his profession, turning down the many social engagements that come to a young doctor in a small city, and devoting his spare time to the study of his chosen field obstetrics. Remaining in the New York City Hospital, Mary is transferred to the maternity ward, where she soon wins recognition for her skill and patience. She frequently sees Dr. Johnson, in her attempt to forget Jimmie, and at last promises to become his wife, although stating that the only man she can ever really love is Dr. Kingsford. A medical convention is held in New York, which Jimmie attends, but again, Mary refuses to see him. Late one night, a young woman is rushed to the maternity ward, with a convulsion case. Mary discovers the patient is Lillian. As he is a specialist on this trouble, the hospital sends for Jimmie, and with Mary, he works desperately, but the baby dies, and Lillian realizes she has only a few more hours to live. She confesses that she sought to make Jimmie take the responsibility for her child, later realizing that she must not do this, as he is innocent. Kissing her in forgiveness, Mary smiles a mute apology at Jimmie, and Lillian dies at peace. Dr. Johnson releases her from her promise, saying that he rejoices in her happiness.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY

Lucille Kelly Western File No. 10172

AT Rainbow Gulch Rosemary's horse suddenly reared as a man blocked the road. Helplessly, the girl watched the holdup man search for and find the $6,795 she had realized on the sale of her father's cattle, but as he advanced upon her, leering, she screamed. Hearing the cry, Chuck Evans, lone horseman galloped to the spot. The man holding Rosemary fired. Wincing as the shot pierced his shoulder, Chuck fired and with an oath the would-be abductor dropped Rosemary and fled into the hills while the girl, with trembling fingers bound the wound of her rescuer who had slumped to the ground. At length Chuck's eyes opened and Rosemary, despite his weak assurance that he could manage, helped him into his saddle and rode beside him into town where the doctor congratulated the girl on her first aid. Chuck noticed Rosemary's peaked look as his wound was being dressed and insisted that the girl rest before resuming her journey.

Recovered, Rosemary explained about the cattle rustlers who were driving her father to the wall, and now, she added discouraged, with the loss of the money, they would lose their ranch.

Several days later, having seen the sheriff's notice that in thirty days the O'Brien ranch would be sold at auction for taxes, Chuck rode up, With shining eyes, Rosemary introduced Chuck to her father as the man who had saved her from abduction, and Chuck begged for a chance to try to catch the bandits. Daily he made scouting expeditions into the hills. Once he rode back thoughtfully and asked Rosemary about the ranch far to the left. Ted Mullins was the sheriff's brother, Rosemary explained. Surely Chuck couldn't mean. . . "We'll need proof, of course," was Chuck's answer. Only a few days remained before the sale. O Brien had gone to town and Chuck happening on Rosemary drying her long black hair in the sun, drew in his breath sharply. "It's beautiful," he said awkwardly. Then with an attempt at nonchalance, "Do you ever braid it?" "I always said I wouldn't until I fell in love," she smiled. Later, when Chuck had gone to look after the cattle, a man crept up behind Rosemary and muffling her outcry sped off with her. Chuck returning called in vain for Rosemary and seeing signs of struggle, rode desperately to Ted Mullins. In a corner of a shack, Rosemary crouched while Ted Mullins cursed the man who robbed Rosemary for stopping to get the girl. "She's mine," was the dogged reply. That's my share." "Hold 'em high," commanded Chuck. A gun barked but Chuck kicked the bandit who slumped to the floor. Tieing up the pair, Chuck took the trembling Rosemary home. As they neared the ranch a shot rang out. Chuck pulled Rosemary behind a rock and O'Brien coming up, gasped as he realized how close he had come to killing his own daughter. At Ted Mullins' they recovered the O'Brien cattle and most of the $6,795. Moonlight bathed the canyon. Chuck had something to say to Rosemary. Dismayed, Chuck saw for the first time Rosemary had braided her hair. Stammering he wished the other fellow luck, but suddenly he was pulling her close, and as surprisingly she returned his kisses, "You mean . . . me?" He was overwhelmed. "Silly," she began but it was lost in a long kiss.

LEGIONAIRES

Juanita Addison Drama File No. 10210

CANTERING briskly along trails surrounding the Foreign Legion post at Morocco, Genevieve's horse becomes frightened at the sound of target practice in the distance, and runs away wildly with the frightened girl. John Anderson, a private in the legion, witnesses this, and, mounting his pony, pursues the run-away, bravely seizing him by the bridle, and transferring the girl to his own pony. Turning her horse over to the groom, the girl rides back with John, informing him that she is the daughter of Colonel Jean Baptiste Le Moine, of the legion. As he is only a private, John does not feel that he has the right to call upon this charming girl, but the following year he holds a fortress almost alone against a band of Riffs, and wins promotion to the rank of lieutenant. Receiving her father's permission, John is often seen in the company of Genevieve after this, escorting her to officers' balls at the post, and riding with her over the desert plains. When he subsequently asks her to become his wife she gives her promise, and her father approves, but the wedding is postponed until a fresh outbreak of natives uprising are settled.

Dr. Charles Summner, an American dentist whose home is in Morocco, returns after a visit with his relatives in the United States, and is warmly greetcd by his old friends, Colonel Le Moine, and his daughter. As they are chatting in the garden, Genevieve tells him of her coming wedding, and shows the doctor her fiance's picture. In amazement, he tells her it is identical with a picture of his niece's husband, which he saw at his sister's home in New Orleans. This man, he says, is called La Vergne. Tracing John's record through police channels, the the Colonel discovers that his true name is Louis Phillippe La Vergne. Heartbroken, Genevieve breaks her engagement, refusing to listen to John's explanations. Shortly afterwards, he leaves with his company for military duty at El Kazir.

Dr. Summner receives a letter from his niece, stating that she will visit him, with her husband and mother-in-law, and he is atonished when she presents Henri de La Vergne, who resembles "John Anderson" so strongly it is hard to believe they are, in truth, two different people. He explains that he had a twin brother who disappeared years ago, when their home was destroyed and his position in a bank lost, as a result of a crevasse carved through their city by a Mississippi River flood. With his mother, he went to New Orleans, and purchased a small farm on which oil was subsequently discovered, providing them with an adequate income, a share of which they have saved for Louis Phillippe. After a series of courageous exploits "John" returns to Morocco, and is welcomed by his mother and brother; he explains that he ran away in order not to be a burden upon them. Resuming his true name, he marries Genevieve in a beautiful ceremony at the Fort Chapel.

FLAMES OF LOVE

Cora Evelyn Shaw Drama File No. 10199

WHILE at Medical School, Dr. Howard Trent fell in love with Eileen Carpenter, sister of one of his fellow students. Upon his graduation, Howard proposed, but when Eileen learned he had only a small isolated cottage inherited from his father, she told him gently it would be too risky marrying now at the start of his career. When he had established his practice she would come to him. After a long kiss, Howard left and on the outskirts of a small West Virginia town, began the practice of medicine.

Young, handsome, Howard was socially in demand, but when the villagers became ill, they trusted the older practitioners. Only Eileen's letters saved Howard from despair. Then, one night, he received a frantic call from a Mrs. Stephens telling him her daughter Bonnie was burning with fever. Howard rushed to her and diagnosed the case as pneumonia. Here was his first real test as a physician and he tended the girl with a singleness of purpose that saw him in the sick room almost constantly. At last the crisis came and the heartening assurance that Bonnie would recover. But her case was only one of a great number and in the epidemic that raged in town, the young doctor found himself beseiged with calls. Mrs. Stephens explained that although she could not repay him immediately for his services, she could offer the doctor rooms and board in her house so that he wouldn't be forced to make long trips to his isolated house during the epidemic. Grateful, Howard set up temporary quarters and his friendship with the rapidly convalescing Bonnie strengthened. Mrs. Stephens, realizing that Howard's position was now established, determined that her daughter should win the young doctor as a husband and when Bonnie revealed to the sharp eyes of her mother that she was not unfond of their boarder, Mrs. Stephens urged her to be more assertive, Hotly Bonnie replied that she knew Howard was in love with Eileen but when at last Eileen came for a visit with her brother, looking superior, Eileen admitted to Howard she would never be content in this small town. Despite Howard's pleas that he could make her happy, she departed and Bonnie's heart ached as she saw Howard's dejection. A hurried call to deliver a baby stirred Howard, and Bonnie offered to go with him to help. It was an all day case and as they started back the storm broke. Fallen trees made the roads temporarily impassable and at last Bonnie and Howard were forced to take shelter in the Trent cottage. Bonnie was near to offer consolation, and soon they found themselves in each other's arms. Howard suggested an immediate marriage but loving him too much to risk his feeling that she had trapped him, Bonnie refused. When she discovered she was going to have his baby, however, she became panic stricken and Howard found her lying on the floor, a drained bottle of poison beside her. Frantically he worked with his stomach pump and as at last she opened her eyes, he kissed her forehead and whispered hoarsely that he never knew how much he loved her until he thought he had lost her. In their kiss, Eileen was forgotten.

LADY OF THE CHORUS

Maud Emerson Drama File No. 10224

THE casting director carefully ran his eyes over the chorus applicants and among the others chose the blonde little Nita and the dark girl with the eager eyes, Rose. In the chorus dressing room, during the next few days, Rose heard lots about Nita's childhood touring Europe with her toe dancer mother, about Nita's ambition to settle down somewhere in a swell home of her own that she could run as she saw fit, and about how soon Nita was going to rise from the chorus. The day that Rose was picked from the chorus after her clear young voice had singled her for attention, and was given a small singing role, Finch, the grinning angel of the show came up behind her and putting his hand on her shoulder said, "Good work." Deftly, Rose sidestepped his advances. For a moment he frowned, but Nita, seeing Finch with Rose hurried over and began talking as if she and Rose were bosom friends. An instant later Finch had forgotten the rebuff and Rose concealed a little ironical smile as Nita and Finch strolled off together.

The next day Nita was taken out of the chorus and given a dancing specialty. Everyone knew she was Finch's girl and Nita sweeping grandly past the girls of the chorus showed clearly that she wanted some respect. When Bobby, the hard working press agent brushed past Nita, almost knocking her over without paying any attention to the come-on smile she gave him, Nita got nasty. Finch began to hear that his show was suffering from insufficient publicity, and Bobby was released. Rose, passing when Nita wheeled Finch's promise to fire Bobby, grew indignant, but when she dared to speak to Nita about it, her own position grew insecure, and when Nita informed Finch that Rose was boasting she had turned him down, Finch demanded that Rose be dropped from the show. There was a lot of bitterness back stage, but no one dared say anything for fear her position would be the next to go.

At length the show closed. Finch, fearing his wife's threats of unsavory divorce proceedings, dropped Nita. In a speakeasy, Nita maudlinly sobbed that she would just drift and never get the home of her own she wanted, and a gigolo, noting the diamonds Finch had given her to insure her silence, played up to her. A day later, Nita was married, but her husband laughed at her ideas of a home and in a few months, having run through her money, deserted her. Desperately Nita searched for work, but she had grown puffy with neglect, and show business wasn't what it was once was. Bitterly, Nita laughed as she saw Rose's name up on the marquee of a theatre as prima donna. Using her last dime to bribe her way into Rose's dressing room, Nita hoarsely asked Rose to help her. Shocked by the girl's appearance, Rose listened to her plea to get her work, any kind, even as a maid, and Rose, feeling unaccountably grateful for Nita, who in firing her, had given her chance to meet Bobby again, and have him press agent her to the top, got Nita the job as maid in the theater. The next day on the arm of Bobby, her brand new husband, Rose, the celebrated prima donna left on a combination honeymoon and road tour, while Nita, from the wings, in a maid's costume, listened to the applause of Rose's audience.

OLD BANKER BEAU BRUMMEL

Penn P. Lewis Comedy File No. 10114

PROUD of his reputation as the town's Beau Brummel, August Truesdale, a sixty-two year old bank president, visits his barber each morning, instructing him that every hair must be in place, and his shave as close as possible. Mr. Truesdale makes a fine figure, dressed in his spotless grey winter suit, or his immaculate white summer linens, and stops to admire himself whenever he passes a mirror. Everyone assures him that he looks like a young man, but the whole town starts talking when he begins to pay court to Veva Lee, a girl in her early twenties, whose parents he has grown up with. Annoyed at the gossip this causes, Veva asks her father to speak to Mr. Truesdale, but he replies that they must not hurt this fine old gentleman who has been their friend for many years. When the first "horseless carriage" comes out, Mr. Truesdale purchases one, and learns to drive. Veva Lee is sitting on the porch, talking to Rosco Whipple when the banker invites her to go for a ride. Rosco advises her not to risk her life, and to prove her independence, she accepts. Enjoying the experience, she promises to go again.

Miss Lorna Lee, Veva's elderly aunt, comes for a visit, and the same train brings Raymond Truesdale, the banker's nephew, to see him. Miss Lee at once falls in love with Mr. Truesdale, senior, and Raymond tells Veva that she is the girl he has always dreamed of. Fearing that the banker's intentions are becoming serious, Veva agrees to meet him on the porch one evening, and accompany him on an automobile ride, adding that her throat is sore, and she will not be able to talk above a whisper. She then persuades Aunt Lorna to dress in her clothing and takes her place. While they are riding, Mr. Truesdale proposes, saying that if she will become his wife, he will change his will, leaving everything to her. Aunt Lorna, speaking in a whisper, promises to meet her escort again, tomorrow afternoon, and Veva herself keeps this appointment. In order to teach Mr. Truesdale a lesson, she promises to elope with him the following evening, if he will bring the money in cash, and have a minister waiting to perform the ceremony, in the next town. That night at dinner, the banker relates this conversation gleefully to Raymond, who, believing Veva really intends to marry his uncle, plans to leave town the next day. Veva instructs Aunt Lorna to carry out this plan, and after Mr. Truesdale has given her the money, and conducted her to the minister's house, she removes her veil, and reveals herself to be the girl's relative.

As he is able to appreciate the humor of the situation, and admires Miss Lee's audacity, Mr. Truesdale suddenly tells her that he realizes she is the woman for him to marry, and the ceremony is performed after all. Catching his nephew just as he is boarding the train, Mr. Truesdale explains the situation to him, and he hurries to Veva, who accepts his proposal of marriage.

THE GAY NINETIES

C. E. Dauma Drama File No. 10127

THE time is the Nineties. Betty Green, in love with Jim, a reporter for the Journal warns him that if he continues to drink she will break her engagement with him. Meanwhile in the bachelor apartment of Tom White, Betty's employer, five men are playing cards. A waiter is serving drinks and an air of good fellowship prevails until Wilson, one of the guests who has been losing heavily and drinking too much suddenly sways to his feet and accuses White of cheating. The other players prevent the two men from rushing at each other and Wilson leaves, the others following shortly after. Sobered, Wilson realizes the force of his accusations and returns to apologize to his host. Meanwhile, Pete, a boy driven by poverty to stealing, has entered White's apartment, seeing the door open. When he hears sounds of someone entering, he desperately picks up White's gun to defend himself and as Wilson enters, shoots and escapes. When White, hearing shots rushes to his bedroom he finds Wilson lying dead and he is himself held for the murder. On the testimony of his friends that he and Wilson had quarreled earlier in the evening and the fact that the murder was committed with his own gun, White is sentenced to hanging. Jim gets the story but on his way to bring it to his office, he stops off for a drink and gets so stewed that he hands in a garbled account and is fired. When Betty learns that he has lost his job through drinking, she tells him she is through and Jim, failing to dissuade her, returns to the saloon and begins drinking in earnest. Meanwhile, Pete, tormented by the knowledge that an innocent man is about to be hanged for his crime comes in to drink and getting into a brawl with one of the desperadoes, is shot and falls to the floor. Before he dies he begs someone to take his sworn statement that he and not White killed Wilson. Jim excitedly takes the message and prepares to take it to the Governor, but his legs are unsteady from drink and at last he collapses. Betty coming along, passes in disgust, then, because she loves Jim, takes him to her room to sober him up. As she comes upon the statement, she shakes Jim, and opening his eyes he explains to her they have to halt the execution. There isn't time to take the message to the Governor, get his pardon, and return in time to save White, so that Jim takes the note to the Governor and Betty rushes off to the Jail where she manages to make the warden see that Jim is getting the Governor's pardon. "Orders are orders," insists the warden stubbornly and White is prepared for hanging, but at last Betty wins the warden's consent to stay the execution for fifteen minutes.

Jim at last wins an audience with the governor and the execution is halted. The most enthusiastic well wisher of the newly married Betty and Jim, is the bride's former employer Tom White, free man.

THEME SONG

Keith Holbrook Drama File No. 10124

STROLLING together over the shaded paths of their college campus, Jack tells Mary that in one more year he will receive his degree from the School of Engineering, and they can be married. But when he goes home for the summer months, he discovers that his father's business is failing; Mr. McNeil is forced into bankruptcy, and shoots himself after this, but Jack consoles his mother as best he can with the promise that he will take care of her. Through reading the advertisements in the daily paper, he secures a position as orchestra leader in a night-club on the edge of town. He offers to release Mary from their engagement, but she replies that he is the only man in the world for her, and she does not wish to return to college, but to remain with him. They are married, and as she watches him direct his "Hill-Billy Band," he often dedicates songs to her, and writes one entitled "Life," which proves to be a popular success. Mary urges him to continue his plans for becoming an engineer in his spare time, which he promises to do. The following year their son, Carter, is born.

The manager of Jack's night club decides to engage a singer to accompany the Hill-Billies, and introduces Jack to Sonia, a former star of a musical revue. He composes a song, "Don't," which she presents with great success on her opening night. A little party is held in her honor, to which Jack is invited. As they see that the singer tries to win Jack's attentions, the other members of the Hill-Billy Band jokingly warn Sonia that it is useless, as he is devoted to his wife. On the pretext that she is ill, Sonia contrives to bring Jack to her apartment, and, alone with her, he cannot resist her attraction when she tells him that she is fascinated by him. Mary's friends advise her that Jack is having an affair with the singer, but she refuses to believe it, until one night when his mother is ill she goes to the night-club in search of Jack and finds Sonia in his arms when she enters his dressing-room. The next morning he asks her to forgive him, and she agrees, but the singer continues to make advances, and taunts Jack that he is afraid of her, and he soon continues his relationship, as before. Jack begins to drink heavily, and neglect his work; Mary pleads with him to consider her and their son, but he replies that he is tired of her, and wishes to marry Sonia. Heart-broken, she finally goes to Parker Calvert, an attorney, and an old friend, and files divorce papers. He helps her to secure a position as a secretary, and often takes Mary and little Carter riding in his car in the evening.

Sonia refuses to marry Jack, and the money that he has saved to complete his education is quickly exhausted by her demands. He loses popularity with his public, as he oftens directs the band while he is in intoxicated condition, and one day is discharged; following this, Sonia tells him that she no longer wishes to see him. He tries to find Mary, but cannot, until they accidentally run into each other downtown. Telling her how sorry he is for his treatment of her, he begs her to come back to him, but she answers that is impossible, as she is now Mrs. Calvert. A few months later, as Mary and her husband are listening to the radio, she hears Jack singing his new song, "I've a Broken Heart," which is dedicated to her. The next morning Mary finds a letter from Calvert, stating that he has gone away, and she must return to Jack, as he realized from her expression last night that she still loves him. Mary goes to him at once.

BACHELOR TROUBLE

Walter Hendricks Comedy-Drama File No. 10238

BOTH in love with the same girl, Kate Katage, Harry Lane and Bobbie Horn vie with each other in attempting to win her love. Breakfasting together in the drug store, the two friends are given a small complimentary box of chocolates apiece. Harry bets five dollars that his box is larger than Bobbie's box, and wins when he places his under a vest pocket magnifying glass. Encountering Kate in her roadster, they both present their candy, saying it was purchased especially for her, but she notices a stamp on the bottom of the box which states that it is a free souvenir. The three decide to raise some additional money for their coming vacations by putting on an original interpretation of an organ grinder, but in this case, as they have no monkey, one of them must dress in a gypsy costume and wear roller skates, so that he may be towed along in the car, while the other plays the organ. The two young men draw straws, and Bobby is elected to this position, for the following day. That night, Harry calls on Kate, and tells she must decide which one she loves; she replies that he is her choice, and they are married. The following morning they announce this to Bobby, but he will not believe it, and goes into his bed-room to don his gypsy costume. In order to convince him, they telephone the minister who performed the ceremony to come; he enters just as Bobby appears, in costume. All four drink cocktails in celebration of the event.

Determined to be a good sport, Bobby plays his part, skating while Harry grinds the organ, but afterward, he hires two men to rob his friend when he carries his firm's payroll to the bank the next day, in order to frighten him, and return the money after he has had his revenge. They agree to do this, and at the appointed time, Bobby hides behind a post to watch. He is pleased to see the look of dismay on Harry's face as the money is taken, but when he observes that the men are preparing to run away with it themselves in place of turning it over to him, he springs upon them, and fights for the money. The thugs escape, but both Bobby and Harry are taken into custody by the police. The judge refuses to believe their story and sentences Harry to jail as an accomplice, while Bobby is placed in the hospital to recover from his damages. Both young men try to take the blame for each other, protesting their guilt to free their friend, but to no avail. Harry is planning a jail break, when the warden notifies him that the thieves have been caught, and he is free to go.

Calling on Bobby with his wife, Harry brings a bouquet of roses with him to the hospital, first sprinkling them with pepper. This causes the nurses and the patient to sneeze repeatedly, but the boys again shake hands, as friends. When a son is born to the Lanes the next year, Bobby presents the baby with a joke book, but adds, seriously, that they can probably soon retalliate, as he has decided to end his bachelor trouble by marrying Kate's cousin.

SUNSET TRAIL

Frank Purdes Western File No. 10192

INFORMED by his physician that he must give up his work and go West to save his lungs, Bill Fleming sits in the library of his home, his head bowed in his hands. His daughter, Virginia's laugh is heard outside and as she dismisses the two collegiates who have escorted her about the town all evening, she pauses, alarmed at the library door. Sitting on the arm of her father's chair, Virginia insists that he tell her what the trouble is, and after jerring his insistence that he has no right to take her from the city gaiety, Virginia gets an idea. Under her enthusiasm, Fleming begins to expand and in a short while they have moved West and Virginia is gaily tacking a sign on the front gate, "Dude Ranch." Extensive advertising soon brings results, and Virginia, an excellent horsewoman, is busy running things briskly while her father's health noticeably improves.

At the station one day, Virginia drives her bus to call for two guests, Jack White, a young mechanical Engineer, and Jim Fluer, a middle aged lawyer who has thought it advisable to take a vacation in the west until the ambulance chasing scandal in which he was involved, dies down. From the first Jack and Virginia seek each other out and once when Virginia is going riding at dusk, Jack meets her at the fence and she permits him to accompany her along her favorite riding path, The Sunset Trail. Meanwhile, Jim, bored at the ranch, dares not return. Then he notices a glitter in a stream, and examining the stuff, recognizes gold! Returning to the ranch he offers to buy Fleming out but is rejeoted. Realizing he must work fast, Jim hires men and while Virginia and Jack are riding the Sunset Trail, Jack is struck from behind and Virginia kidnapped. Aghast at the ransom note demanding $75,000, Fleming wavers when Jim Fleur repeats his offer for the ranch. Jim Fleur arouses Fleming's suspicions of Jack and Jack leaves determined to find the girl he loves.

When one of Virginia's captors tries to kiss her, Jim Fleur draws his gun and orders him out, saying the girl is his. Resentfully, the outlaw goes into town and recognizing Jack as the fellow they knocked out to get the girl, surreptitiously informs him where Virginia is being held. Jack rushes to the shack and hearing Virginia cry out against Jim's advances, rushes in. A .44 barks. Red shows on Jack's sleeve. He fires back wounding Jim Fleur and as Virginia rushes to him, Jack slumps to the floor. The sheriff takes over Jim while Fleming carries the wounded boy back to his ranch. Tenderly Virginia nurses Jack back to health, and her father apologizes for his suspicions. Jack, well again, rides the Sunset Trail with Virginia and as they stop to tell each other of their love, Jack rediscovers the vein of gold, and they return in time to prevent Fleming from selling out to one of Jim's Fleur's agents. The gold makes Fleming rich, and again Virginia and Jack ride the trail—this time on their way to be married.

DACOITS OF INDIA

Cathrine Owen Ward Drama File No. 10237

FRIENDS of James MacGuire, Commissioner of Police, are presented to Sirwa, a beautiful Hindu woman, when they visit him in his Calcutta office, and told that she is the ablest detective on his force. As they are incredulous, he offers to tell them of her exploits, and later, as they are gather around a jungle camp fire, he relates the mystery of the Great Tiger of the dacoits, asking them to go back with him a few years. He has just dismissed Ian McNeil, a young Irishman, who held an important position on the force, because of complicity with the dacoits, a band of outlaws who terrorize the law-abiding citizens of India with their plundering and murder, when even more dacoitics are committed, particularly in the Central Provinces and Orissa. Convinced that a master mind is operating behind these people, MacGuire is at a loss to check their outrages, when the young girl, Sirwa, presents herself at his camp and offers her services, which are readily accepted. Wearing many jewels, she lures a band of dacoits into a zenana, the women's quarters in the homes of high caste Hindus and Mohammedans, where no men may enter, but as nothing is sacred to a dacoit, they follow. Police, disguised in saris, the robe of Hindu women, seize them, but discover that their leader is not among this group.

Sirwa next disguises herself as a dancing girl, and attracts Ram Krishna, a powerful dacoit, who takes her to his cave, promising to throw her to his captive python if she reveals his secrets. She succeeds in imparting this information to the police, and is given a basket of carrier pigeons which will fly to headquarters if she releases them when in danger. Ram Krishna goes to her house, accompanied by another leader, Hakim Shah, who recognizes Sirwa as a traitor to their cause. She sends one of the pigeons through the air before Hakim Shah takes her to the python pit, and is rescued just as the snake is ready to spring, by pellets of red pepper which officers shoot at the animal eyes. They capture many of the dacoits, but Ram Krishna escapes. Sirwa is kidnapped by Ram Krishna, and forced to witness the death of her younger sister, also a prisoner, who is tied to the back of a crocodile. Stealing away in the night, the girl at last reaches police headquarters and reports the incident. Ram Krishna is captured as he is leaving a bazaar, and confesses to MacGuire that he is a dacoit, but not the Great Tiger, and tells where this supreme leader may be found. As Ram Krishna is being conducted to jail, he is seized by a rival band of dacoits for his treachery and tied to the top of a huge tree, smeared with syrup, and left to the mercy of the insects.

Following his clue, police capture the Great Tiger, who is none other than Ian McNeil, and find Sirwa with him. She explains that she is his wife, and that she wished to destroy his enemies, the rival bands of dacoits. At his request, she shoots her husband. Since then, MacGuire concludes, she has regarded the police as her own people, and served them faithfully, adding that she has consented to become his wife.

But Fred, in love with Hilton's daughter Betty has only a few more weeks to wait until she is of age and able to be married without her father's consent, and unable to find employment for miles of the vicinity, Fred risks the hazards of the work to be near her, and Fishscales remains on with his friend. Hilton, suspecting his daughter's fondness for Fred drives him unmercifully. Wilfred Jones, sullen and shifty eyed takes the place of the injured worker and when Hilton, as usual finds fault with Fred's work, the newcomer grumbles under his breath. The sharp eyes of Hilton detect Jones' error in slipping another variety of fish in with the whiting, and his words lash the offender. The next moment, however, Hilton turns to Fishscales and urges him to work faster until a pan slips, catches the overworked Fishscales, and lays him out unconscious on the floor. With a bitter imprecation on the slave driver, Fred carries his friend home and hovers over his bed while the doctor bandages the nasty wound. Fishscales assures Fred it is nothing, but Fred blames himself for getting his friend into it. The next morning a detective raps at Fred's door and arrests him for the murder of Hilton. Gasping, Fred tries to explain his innocence but nobody has seen him enter his boarding house and his quarrel with Betty's father is general knowledge. Betty stoutly asserts her belief in Fred's innocence as do too Fred's sister Maria who comes to his aid, and Fishscales, who, moreover, falls in love with Maria.

Determined to catch Hilton's murderer, Fishscales goes to the Cold Storage plant to search for a clue, and sees a flashlight inside. Knowing that the fireman should have long ago passed through, Fishscales cautiously admits himself and in the freezing room stumbles over the dead body of the fireman. Aghast, he hears footsteps and in the dark rushes up behind the murderer. With superhuman strength, the murderer gets a strangle hold on his neck at the same time laughing fiendishly. On the slippery floors of the freezing room, the two men struggle for life while the sis-sis of the ammonia heralds approaching doom. Numb, battered, Fishscales manages to escape the clutching fingers, run desperately toward the alarm, and with his last bit of strength hang on the loop. Whistles blow loud. Moments later, rescuers rush in. They find Fishscales lying on the cement floor, the whistle cord looped beneath him, while frozen stiff in the freezing room, lies the body of Wilfred Jones, escaped lunatic, who has come to work in the plant to escape his keeper's vigilance. Fred is freed to marry Betty, and Fishscales, recuperating in a sunny hospital room, gratefully turns to Maria who has come to thank Fishscales for saving her brother's life,—and for a more personal reason.

FREE BEER

Br-r-r-r-rrr! Again and again the alarm clock sounds but the two figures lying side by side in the huge bed slumber peacefully on. In the next room their wives wake and holding their hands to their ears rush into the room, arouse the dormant Laurel and Hardy, and dragging the two woebegone figures out by their ears, begin the nagging which continues through breakfast. "Why don't you get jobs . . hlah . . blah. . ?" At length the two women pull hats over their heads and with shopping bags under their arms, go out leaving the house to he cleaned up by their two sorry looking husbands. For several minutes the pair clean up in silence, then placing their brooms carefully in a corner, sit down and tell each other they are losing their self respect and as men of the world have every right to leave their nagging spouses. Carefully composing notes of farewell, the two rebellious husbands put derbies on their heads and arm in arm saunter off "toward Mexico and Freedom."

Days later, travel dusty, and somewhat less defiant, they cross the border into the land of romance. In a Mexican cafe, they sit down and smile feebly as lovely charmers join them at their table. For several rounds of drinks all goes well. Then the bill is presented. Laurel's face screws up. Hardy swallows hard. "No money," they gesture. The next moment they are forcefully and unccremoniously ejected and they lose their taste for romance. An American newspaper headlines, "3.2 BEER IN UNITED STATES." Thirsty, unhappy, the pair long for home and Laurel wistfully recalls his uncle Henry Schnurhart of Chicago, was a brewer in the old country. Broke, the pair decide to raise money and go to him for help, but employed by a farmer they plant rows of flower beds with the blossoms in the ground and the roots in the air, and the hick kicks them out. They apply for work on a ranch, but Laurel is chased up a tree by a lowering steer and Hardy coming to his rescue, only escapes with his life by running up another tree. The cowboys howl with glee, but the adventurers weep. At last, blackening their faces, they get work on a plantation with negro cotton pickers, and as the hot sun causes the shoe black to run, they learn that the cotton is going to Chicago and climbing into bales, are shipped to the Windy City, only to learn there that Uncle Henry is on his way to Hoboken. Crestfallen, they ride the rails to the beer city and at length, weary and dusty, stare incredulously at a sign that says, "GRAND OPENING. FREE BEER TODAY." At at a table, they look up and groan as they catch sight of their own neglected spouses a few tables away. But as they are escaping, Uncle Henry himself, catches at their coats and heartily greets them as he explains he came here to get them and their wives said they had just gone out for a walk. The wives wink at them, and understanding that no word has been said of their running off, the two adventurers join the celebrants as Uncle Henry invites them to help him run his beer garden and all join in singing, "Ach du lieber Augustine."

THE GREEN EYED MONSTER

Mrs. Mederic Guerin Drama File No. 10158

UNHAPPILY Nona Strongin sees her father's estate Golden Oaks sold to cover the debts he left. As she walks alone, for the last time through the well loved gardens, Martin Groves, wealthy and ruthless, begs her to marry him. Despite his assurance that she is a fool not to accept his wealth now that she is penniless, she tells him she loves somebody else. "Ramon Armstrong?" he asks bitterly and as she remains silent, overcome by his feelings he seizes her in his arms and kisses her wildly. Fighting him off desperately, she orders him to go. Minutes later, still shaken, she sees Ramon, who has come from New York, hurry to her and in his arms she forgets Martin's vindictiveness. After a quiet ceremony, Ramon leads his bride to Golden Oaks and as her eyes widen with amazement he explains that it was he who bought the estate knowing how much it grieved her to lose it. Nona weeps a little as she realizes how much of his savings the gesture has cost.

So happily begins the married life of Nona and Ramon and a year later Gloria is born to them. Martin, in an attempt to show his indifference marries a show girl who dies in child birth and taking the child with him, he leaves town. Years pass. Ramon works hard to keep up the vast estate. One day at his club, Martin comes up to him, prosperous looking and assured. Pumping Ramon's hand he asks about the wife and daughter. Ramon mentions Martin, but Nona changes the subject. It is Martin who takes Ramon to a gambling house and shows him how easy it is to win money at the tables. Soon, giddy from the immediate returns which make possible luxuries he has long denied Nona, Ramon begins to play recklessly and when his luck changes, Martin, who controls the table play, assures him he will again recoup. One night, worried by Ramon's absence, Nona waits up for him with Gloria. At dawn they see him come dazedly down the walk and as they rush to him he collapses. Later, when a note comes to her husband, Nona learns that Martin is threatening prison unless Ramon meets his debts in a week. Nona pleads for more time, but Martin laughs harshly and tells her he has been anticipating this moment for years. Whereupon, Nona arranges for the sale of all her jewelry and effects and reduced to doing her own housework, she manages to raise enough money to pay Martin back. Ramon's eyes follow his wife adoringly, but she assures him any woman would have done as much.

At a college prom Martin's son Clive sees Gloria and crossing the dance floor he cuts in on her. As they escape from the dance together, they find themselves in love, but when Clive tells his father he wants to marry Gloria Armstrong, Martin lies that it was Ramon who caused the death of Clive's mother, and tries to induce the boy to disgrace Gloria. Tortured, Clive keeps his meeting with Gloria but his resolution fails him and despite all evidences of the truth of his father's statement he returns and tells Martin he cannot harm the girl he loves. In his rage as the last of his plans for revenge collapse, Martin paces the floor agitatedly. The rug slips and he crashes heavily against a cabinet. The butler locates Clive who returns as his father, dying, tells him to marry Gloria and be happy and Clive returns to Ramon and Nona at Golden Oaks to marry the girl he loves.

THE ISLAND OF REGENERATION

J. Frederic McCall Drama File No. 10203

DISBARRED from the medical profession because he performs an operation while under the influence of liquor, which results in the patient's death, Dr. Percy Premblington wanders about the streets of London in a drunken stupor. Eloise, his fiancee, breaks her engagement when she hears what has happened, and Percy soon exhausts his meager savings at the various bars of the city. Having no money and no object in life, he becomes a stoker on the liner Carmania, bound on a cruise around the world. The first port is New York City, and here Percy tries to leave the crew, but is forcibly brought back by the captain, Arthur Vogelslang. An American girl, Joan Ellington, who is boarding the ship with her father, smiles at him sympathetically when she sees him roughly dragged on board. When they are approaching the South Sea Isles, Percy discovers a bottle of whiskey in the engine room and quickly consumes it. He steals up to the ball-room, and watching the guests as they dance, is overcome with bitterness as he reflects that he was a member of this strata of society so short a time ago. Hardly realizing what he is doing, Percy decides to delay them, and pours a bag of emery dust into the propeller shaft, which causes it to break, and burns out the bearing. The ship is forced to anchor at sea; a storm arises, and all of the passengers and crew are drowned except Joan and Percy. who escape to a small island on a raft which he constructs from the pieces of the wrecked Carmania.

Alone on the desert island with Joan, he explains the whole story of his inherited tendency to drink excessively, his disbarrment from his profession, his criminal act in crippling the motor and its fatal results. She replies that they must think of the future, not the past, to which he agrees. As Percy has made a previous visit to the tropics, he knows how to start a fire by igniting the porous spongewood with friction against the rocks, and that candlewood, when lighted, furnishes a slow, glowing flame, without smoke. He builds a bamboo hut for Joan, and one for himself, and they feast on the delicious fruits of the island, drinking the white fluid of the milk-bulb plant. Together they explore the coral reefs, and he explains that they are composed of polyps, skeletons of minute marine aminals. A tropical storm arises, and Joan, frightened, seeks protection in his arms; both confess they love each other. The next day a deserted ship, the Star of England, drifts close to shore, brought by the storm. Swimming out to it, they discover it is equipped completely with food, merchandise, comfortable room, and a small hospital, where Percy carries on experiments which he had begun when a student at the Royal Academy of Medicine and Surgery, to perfect a cancer cure. He finds a cabinet stocked with choice Bourbon whiskey, but Joan realizing his great weakness for it, locks it and throws the key away.

Experimenting on wild animals, he announces that he believes he has discovered the cure; shortly after that he and Joan are taken captive by a band of natives, and brought before their chief, Montcherro, who Percy realizes is afflicted with cancer. Injecting his solution, which is composed of extracts of native vegetation, he cures him, and in reward, is presented with gifts of rugs, beautifully dyed with cochineal and juices of the divi-divi plant. A native wedding is held, and Joan and Percy decide to plight their troth at the same time, afterwards returning to their home on the deserted ship. A few months later an English boat, headed by Lieutenant Commander Bruce Hemingway discovers them. In his excitement, Percy forgets his promise, and breaks into the cabinet, drinking heavily. Joan sadly returns to her home with the English boat. When he discovers she is gone, Percy decides to rid himself of his curse, or die, and prepares an extract of cobra venom, which effects a cure. After her son is born, Joan persuades Bruce to take her again to Percy, and he tells her what he has done. The British government drop charges against him in recognition of his great service to humanity in discovering a cancer cure, and Percy erects the Joan Premblington Memorial Hospital in London, providing free treatments for this dread affliction to needy cases. He also builds a beautiful summer home for Joan and their little son, on the island where they found happiness.

THAT KID FROM DIXIE

Murwain H. Brittain Western File No. 10209

EAGER for adventure, Jim Burke leaves his home on a farm in the Mississippi Valley and goes to a small western town near Denver. Registering at the Good Eats Hotel, he inquires where he can find his boyhood friend, Gene Lawton, who works on a ranch in the neighborhood. The girl at the desk does not know, but tells him if he seeking work her uncle, Silas Ward, may be able to use him on his ranch, the Circle Bar. Introduced by his niece, Julia, Silas employs Jim as a cow-puncher, and he discovers that Gene is his fore-man. As the two boys hold a re-union, Gene tells Jim that some of their cattle have been stolen, and they suspect Pete Lange, who owns the next ranch, of taking them. Jim is attempting to ride a wild horse the next morning, encouraged by Slim, Shorty, Jump-Up, Chuck and Chink, the other cow-punchers, when Julia appears. He tells her he can handle any horse, but just then he is thrown, and the girl remarks that she is afraid a cow-boy's life will be too hard for him.

Hearing noises of cattle moving one night, Gene sends Jim and Jump-Up to investigate; they see riders disappearing in the distance, and follow their trail, which leads through the Bad Lands to Pete Lange's camp. Jim holds the men at the point of his gun, while Jump-Up goes for the sheriff, and all are arrested except Pete, who escapes when his horse leaps to a point below the trail. The next day a bullet whizzes past Jim's head; placing his hat on a bush as a decoy, he creeps in the shrubbery until he encounter the man who fired, and shoot him in self-defense. As he is dying, his assailant confesses that Pete Lange hired him to commit this murder. Jim encounters Lange in the Golden Ball Recreation Parlor, and challenges him to a pistol duel the next day, but Pete fails to show up at the appointed place. Relating these incidents to Julia and her uncle, Silas tells the boy there must be some mistake, as Lange is engaged to his niece. Following him when he leaves the room, Julia tells Jim that she does not love Lange, but he holds a mortgage on their ranch, and it is the only way she can help uncle.

Jim is riding toward town on pay-day when an elderly stranger stops to ask him the direction of the Ward Ranch. As they are talking, the man states that Silas Ward and his brother, Bill, at one time owned all of Green Valley, but that Bill was mysteriously killed and their government claim stolen. Pete Lange and his partner, Sam, were suspected of the crime, as Pete obtained a claim the following year, and Sam disappeared. Disguising himself as Sam, Jim visits Pete's ranch, and is shown the claim papers. He suddenly pulls a gun, and holds Lange while he telephones for the sheriff. Lange is convicted, and Green Valley awarded to Silas, who rewards Jim with a share. Convinced that he is quite a cow-boy after all, Julia promises to become Mrs. Burke, at Jim's request.

THE WHITE LIE

Nell P. Stuckey Drama File No. 10167

HIS fortune assured by the huge steel plant he has inherited from his father, Charles Cunningham lives a gay life. His current interest is Mary McClellan, the neglected wife of a prominent attorney. To the love starved Mary, Charles brings the romance and glamor that her husband, occupied in making business contracts, has denied her. When news comes to Mary that her husband has been killed in an automobile accident, after unsuccessful speculations have swept away his fortune, Mary believes that Charles will marry her. But now that she is free, he suspends his visits until Mary, hungry for love, informs him desperately that the child she is bearing is his. Not until Charles informs her that he about to be married to a woman of his own set and offers to pay her handsomely to keep their affair secret does Mary realizes to what kind of a man she has given her heart. In her moment of disillusionment, Mary's love for Charles dies, and wearily she tells him to go.

Struggling to support herself and her baby son, Lester, Mary's whole life becomes absorbed in the boy, but she wisely refrains from ruining his life by too much interference. At his graduation exercises, she swells with pride as she sees him carry off all the honors, but to her confusion she sees that Charles and his wife are also present, and she manages to escape without being seen hy her former lover. Lester finds work in the steel plant of Charles Cunningham, who, since his marriage, has settled down. Charles recognizes Mary's boy, and, in an attempt to make reparations, advances the boy to a managership. But, when Lester meets again Charles' daughter Margaret who has graduated with him from college, the two young people fall in love. Once, seeing Lester leave his house, Charles urges Margaret to find other friends. He does not suspect the serious turn of events, however, until the day Lester appears in his office to ask permission to marry Margaret. Charles refuses, but when Lester resigns and threatens to elope, Charles brutally tells the boy Margaret is his half-sister. Aghast, Lester proceeds home. For days he wrestles with his desire for the girl while Margaret grieves over Lester's inexplicable absence. At length, unable to stand the torture, Lester attempts suicide. Mary, who has attributed her son's actions to puppy love and has waited for his customary confidences, comes home to find Lester about to drink poison. Sobbing she stops him and when he tells her about his love for Margaret, she sends for Charles and confesses that Lester is her dead husband's child. She had loved Charles and had, in a desperate effort to hold him, told him the baby was his. Many times she had wanted to tell the truth but had felt it wiser not to reopen wounds she thought were healed. But Lester is already in his car on his way to Margaret. In the garden he finds her, and, taking her in his arms, kisses her again and again. Nothing can ever come between them any more.

SIMPLY WON'ERFUL

Gertrude Grimes Gibson Comedy-Drama File No. 10219

LAZILY stretching himself and yawning, Carter Dearborn the third rolls out of the hammock swing and leisurely strolls to The New South Luncheonette, gathering place for his gang. Ordering a lemon cocoa-cola, or "dope," in the vernacular, he exchanges local news items with Smokey Ellis, the proprietor, and idly glances through the collection of Western and Movie magazines. Runt Myers drives up in an ancient Ford, and joins him, advising him of the fact that Sally Reeves, a girl from Knoxville, is visiting his girl, Mary Lou Coles, and she wants someone to take her guest to the Country Club dance this evening. Harry Davis and Julie King enter while the boys are discussing this point; Carter flatly refuses to escort Sally, remembering Runt that when he obliged by taking the last visitor, Grace Pendlis, she turned out to be very unattractive and he was "stuck" with her all evening. Julie is offended by this remark, and reminds Carter that Grace is a friend of hers. As Runt and Carter drive recklessly down the main street of the town, both boys agree that Julie may cause trouble by repeating their conversation to Sally. Finding Mr. Carter, senior, sipping legalized beer on the wide porch of their home, and working a jig-saw puzzle with his mother Carter tells them he is going to the dance, and is informed by Mrs. Dearborn that she has arranged for him to take Sally, at Mrs. Coles' request.

Reluctantly he presents himself at the Coles's home, and is presented to the guest who takes his breath away with her beauty. She greets him coolly, saying that she is sorry to impose, as Julie tells her he is performing an unwelcome duty. Carter blushes and apologizes in great confusion, but Sally only laughs at him, and carefully avoids the boy at the dance, where she is surrounded by men. One of the most attentive is Frank Grosvener, a lawyer, who has just divoreed by his third wife. Taking her home, Carter tells Sally that he is a student at Trent Academy, but she is unimpressed. The next morning the boy receives a telephone call from Mary Lou, who informs him distractedly that Sally has left a note, saying she is eloping with Frank on the morning train. Carter hurriedly jumps into his father's car and drives to the station, where he is greeted by Sally, Mary Lou, Julie and Harry, laughing hilariously at his confusion, and admitting that the whole affair is a practical joke.

During the rest of Sally's visit, Carter carefully avoids her, but they meet at a picnic which he does not know she will attend. Everyone is swimming, when Sally suddenly calls for help, and Carter saves her. Lying in his arms after she is revived, she tells Carter that she is sorry for her behaviour, and when he replies that she is only laughing at him, she convinces him with a kiss that she thinks he is "simply won'erful," which at last re-assures him. Happily, Carter returns the compliment.

SOMEBODY

Dorothea Ernestine Winter Drama File No. 10208

A FRIENDLY rivalry exists between Darion Hughes and Carter Tracy for the affections of Constance Laremy, whom both have known since grade school days. In the hours when they are not serving as air-mail pilots, both call frequently at her home and invite her to sail through the air, Darion devotes much of his time to the creating of a new type of plane which will operate without a propeller, motivated like a bird by the motion of the wings. This, he declares, is the airplane of the future, which he will build in the present, but Carter ridicules the idea, telling Constance that it probably will be covered with feathers, according to this plan. Constance urges him not to tease his friend, but agrees that the present type of plane seems more satisfactory to her. At last perfecting the plans. Darion seeks somebody to give him the necessary capital for developing them, and tells Carter that he will approached Constance's father, who is a banker. Angrily, Carter replies that he is taking an unfair advantage of the girl's friendsbip, and for the first time in their lives, the two quarrel and separate. Constance, likewise, urges him not to involve her father, as the bank is in precarious condtion, and they cannot afford to lose money, but he says that it will net a fortune for them, as well as advance aviation.

Enthusiastic over the idea, Mr. Laremy invests all his savings, although he does not disclose this fact to Darion, and advises some of the investors in his bank to do likewise. The plane is completed, and a crowd gathers to witness the virgin flight. Pilot by Darion, the little craft soars swiftly through the air, breaking records in speed, and turning as easily as a bird, with its fluttering aluminum wings. For a moment, it lands with perfect ease on the small top of a water tower, sailing away again. Then suddenly, the wings stop, and the craft falls straight downward. Quickly taking off in his parachute, Darion escapes shortly before it crashes to the ground, in ruins. The next day. Constance tells him that he has caused her father to lose everything, and she does not wish to see him again. Sadly Darion tries again to build his plane, but doubts if anyone will finance him in a second enterprise. Saving all he can spare from his salary, he makes another model, which he enters in the air races, the following year.

One of the other entries is a motorless glider, capable of great speed. Constance and her father are inspecting it, accompanied by their five year old cousin, Jimmie, when Carter speaks to them. The child climbs into the glider, but at that moment, the ropes holding it the ground break, and it is swept away at tremendous speed. Darion sees this happen, and jumps in his plane at last over-taking the child, and crashing into the glider as he lifts him to safety. His new plane is thoroughly tested and sold at a great profit shortly after this. Constance asks his pardon. which he readily grants, and Mr. Laremy's faith is rewarded.

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD

Richard Bowler Drama File No. 10161

IN spite of the advice of his friends, Larry Evenay, a young minister, marries Carol, a singer in bis choir, and a son, whom they christen Harry, is born to them. The first year of their marriage is happy; then Carol becomes restless and spends much of her time in gay cabarets with friends. Larry remonstrates with her. Carol refuses to listen. One day she is brought home intoxicated. Picking up her little son, she stumbles and throws him against the hot kitchen stove. The burn leaves a scar on his arm, that he will carry through life.

Gordon Randall, an entertainer at one of the places Carol frequents, secures an introduction to her and makes love to her, finally persuading her to run away with him, taking her little son. Failing in every attempt to find them, Larry devotes his life to his work and in time, becomes the pastor of Chicago's largest church.

A young man Harry Randall is accused of the murder of James Highwood a banker, the father of fiancee, Mary. As they are both members of Evenay's church, and very good friends of the Reverend, he is convinced of Harry's innocene, and influences Longfield, a noted attorney to take Harry's case, volunteering to help in any way possible.

A gun identified as Harry's is found on the scene of the murder, but the finger-prints did not correspond to his. Harry was requested to earry a revolver in his work as messenger in Highwood's bank.

No one knows that Harry's parents live in a notorious part of the city near a dive known as "The Bucket of Blood." Harry lives in fear that some day Mary and the bank officials will find out where his parents are. This comes out now and Harry's parents were called to the trial.

Longfield feel, Harry has very little hope. His mother will not say anything in defense of her son. She seems to be shielding someone. Longfield can not understand why a mother should do this.

Rev. Evenay volunteers to do some detective work. He received no information of any value until he finds Nellie, a girl of the streets. She asks him to come to her room, in the Randall home. He promises to protect her, and she reveals that Randall's step father is the leader of an underworld gang composed of four well known ex-convicts. Mrs. Randall is the manager of a rooming house frequented by girls like Nellie, and adds that she is a very kindly woman who lives in terror of her husband.

Nellie tells him that the gang are in conference this very night and helps him to a place where he can listen in. They are quarreling over the Highwood murder. One of them commited the deed but he could not find out who.

Evenay goes to the police and the place is raided, the gangsters arrested. He then visits Harry. Evenay drops his note book, Harry stoops to pick it up and reveals his arm, burnt. Evenay sees in the boys face the likeness to his wife Carol; can this be bis long lost son?

Longfield opens the defense by calling Mrs. Randall to the witness stand. She is wearing dark glasses. She refuses to tell who was the father of her boy, and then Rev. Evenay, although he knows it would ruin his reputation arose. The dark glasses could not conceal her from him. "She is my wife—Harry is my son."

Mrs. Randall told her story. She ran away with Randall regretting it almost at once, but fearing to leave him as he threatened to expose her past and she feared this would ruin her husband's career. The wholesome influence of the church, she said saved her boy.

Finger-prints prove Gordon Randall's guilt and Harry is free to return to Mary.

Larry begs Carol to come back to him and weeping, with happiness she consents.

Sacrificing his position as pastor of his church, to which he has devoted his life, Larry and Carol find LOVE is the Greatest Thing in the World, as they return to a rose-covered cottage in the suburbs.

HONEYMOON

E. C. Brown Drama File No. 10193

ENJOYING the peace and quiet of the farm where he lives with his parents, Billy tells his sweetheart, Gladys, they will marry and settle down to a life like this someday, but she replies that she wishes to see something of the world, and is going to visit her cousins, Tony and Maria Riccardi, in St. Louis. He begs her to stay, but she takes the train in spite of his protests. A few months later Billy's father and mother both die, as a result of the influenza, leaving the sixteen-year-old boy alone in the world. He resolves to seek his fortune, and Gladys, in St. Louis, and, taking the few dollars he has in the world with him, sets out on foot. Tired and penniless when he reaches the city, he sinks down wearily on a park bench and falls asleep. He is awakened by a man shaking his shoulder, and smiling at him. Introducing himself by his nick-name, "King," he offers the boy food and lodging. Billy accepts gratefully, and is taken to an apartment, where he is presented to a group of men, and offered whiskey. At first he refuses, as he has never tasted intoxicants, but they prevail on him. King and his aide, Tony, then tell the boy they wish him to come with them tomorrow night and serve as a watchman while they rob a bank. He refuses, and prepares to leave, but King holds him.

Tony orders King to release Billy, but he refuses, and draws a gun. Someone extinguishes the lights, and two shots are fired; overcome by drink, Billy loses consciousness, and awakes to find himself alone in the room with the body of one of the gangsters. Police break in, and he is arrested. In order to save Gladys from being involved in the case, he gives a ficticious name at head-quarters. In the trial that follows, Billy is convicted of the murder of the gangster, since no one else can be found who was present at the apartment, and he is unable to state their names. The judge sentences him to be electrocuted for this orime. Newspaper reporters are unable to discover the boy's identity, but print a photograph of him, which Gladys sees. Hysterically, she shows the picture to her cousins, Tony and Maria, telling them that this is her sweetheart, and that she is sure of his innocence. Tony then admits that he is a member of King's gang, and knows who committed the murder. He promises to bring him to justice.

Searching the city, Tony discovers King, disguised as a taxi driver, and, summoning Gladys, forces the gang leader to hasten to the penitentiary in his cab. They reach it just as Billy, who still refuses to state his true name, is being conducted to the death ohamber. Confessing his guilt, King is imprisoned, and Billy's execution stayed. Tony is given a light sentence, and Billy and Gladys promises to help him, as soon as they return from their honeymoon.

COBRA

Paul McC. Hallam Drama File No. 10154

OPENING a small package which his fiancee, Eleanor, has given him, Bud Shaw discovers an electric fan with an attached motor, which he shows to his friend, "Scoops" Lewis. A card enclosed with it states: "I hope you find some use for this." The two young men examine it, smiling, then trace the route they will take to reach the Titan Oil Company, in upper Kashmir, where both of them have been sent to write feature stories for a New York paper. The last lap of their journey is made on a small river boat. One of the other passengers is a beautiful, half-caste native woman, who keeps a huge cobra in a cage in her state-room, explaining that it is her pet. A sudden storm arises, and the boat is forced to anchor near a small village, where the passengers take refuge at a little hotel. As the accomodations are inadequate, Lewis and Shaw are seated at the same table with the woman, who introduces herself as Leota Lawson. When the two men retire to their rooms that night, Shaw confesses that he is deeply fascinated with Leota; Lewis reminds him of his engagement to Eleanor, and warns him not to lose her by forming an alliance with this woman. He agrees that his friend is right, but says that he cannot resist Leota. The river floods its banks, and they are marooned at the hotel several days. Shaw and Leota become infatuated with each other and are together constantly during this time.

Resuming the journey, the two men leave Leota when they reach the Titan Oil head-quarters, and are conducted to the home of the director, Frank Lawson. He invites them to be his guests during their visit here, which they gladly accept. Joining their host shortly before dinner, they are presented to his wife —Leota. All three conceal the fact that they have met before, although Lawson remarks it is strange they were not on the same boat, as Leota had just returned from a visit with her sister in upper Kashmir. When they are alone, Shaw urges his friend to finish his work as soon as possible, so that they can leave, but both agree it will take at least a week. A new well comes in one night while Lawson and Lewis are returning home, and they are delayed. Finding Shaw alone, Leota pleads with him to take her away, but he refuses, telling her how much he admires her husband, and despises her. She theatens to kill him.

Lawson and Lewis return to the house at midnight, when they discover that Leota's cobra, which she keep in a cage in the hall-way, is gone. Searching the house, they find him coiled on Shaw's bed. They dare not move or speak, as it would startle the snake, and cause him to strike, but at last Shaw awakens, and moving his hand toward his night table, hurls his electric fan at the cobra, severing his head. In the morning he discovers that his hair has turned completely white. Returning to America, Shaw is greeted by Eleanor, at the dock. Embracing her, he tells his fiancee that she has saved his life by her thoughtfulness.

THE REDEEMING VIRTUE

Mae Hanley Drama File No. 10252

FRAIL, alone in the world, June Maddern is carried away by the impassioned oratory of Fred Brent and when he leaves town she goes with him as his bride. Soon, however, the gallant little wife discovers that Fred is not the newspaper editor he represented himself as being, but a tramp printer, and discouraged by his inability to find work, Fred begins drinking and his brutality breaks down June's spirit. When, one night he tries hysterically to induce her to enter into a suicide pact and then violently demands that she accompany him on a carouse, June escapes and with a few dollars in her purse, take a train back home. Her health broken down, June fears that Fred will again claim her as his wife, and fearfully she leaves again to find work in a restaurant as a waitress. There she is discovered by a rancher, Mr. Cole, who with his wife, a woman twenty years older than he, induces June to come to his isolated ranch as helper to his wife. June, who has been warned by the doctor that she must get out into the open and gain weight, accepts but even on the journey she realizes that Cole is a despicable character and that his wife accepts his peccadilloes sadly but without protest . June searches desperately for some means of returning to town, but they pass no other caravans along the way and at last they arrive at the ranch. There June's life is a succession of escapes from the leering Cole, and one day after a terrifying experience, Jim Thornton, a hired hand who always avoids people and retires whenever an outsider chances by, locks his horrible employer in a barn, and snatching up the ill and wasted June, rides furiously toward the west. June is so tired and unhappy it scarcely matters to her what happens, but when at last she can ride no more, he stops, gently wraps her in a blanket, and leaves her to drop off into an exhausted sleep. The next morning, June gratefully asks him to bring her to a station so that she can proceed home, but Jim assures her that she is too weak to travel and continues the trail. Rebellious, June weeps that she doesn't care what happens to her, she wants to be left alone to die, but Jim resolutely assures her she is going to build up her health, and at last they stop in a deserted cabin that seems to stand only because it doesn't know which way to fall. When June awakes the next morning, Jim and the horse Dan are gone. Forlornly she believes he has deserted her, but by noon he returns with provisions and clothes and begins to rehabilitate the shack to make it livable. He also provides it with a trap door which serves June in good stead when a bear stumbles into the cabin one night. Jim returning, shoots the prowling, sniffing animal, and his anxiety shows June that Jim loves her, but, remembering her marriage, she continues her ungracious attitude. In the days that follow, Jim teaches the unwilling girl how to swim, and as she glows with vitality and restored health, unable to conceal his feelings, he brings her a diamond ring. In town that day, a startled June sees Fred Brent, reeling down the street and trembling she leaves Jim, who, a fugitive, dares not press her to stay. Years pass. Fred drinks himself to death, but not until, long after, June is seriously hurt in a railroad accident, and her name appears in the newspapers, does Jim come back to wrest her from death. Amazed, she learns for the first time that he was a prominent doctor who had given up medicine, feeling he was responsible for the death of a patient. Now, confidence restored through June, he again begins practicing medicine, and he takes June back to the little cabin, for a honeymoon the more precious for being so long put off.

CLOSING her desk and dismissing a roomful of restless children, Mildred Morey prepares to walk home to her boarding house when she hears a knock on the door, and looks up to find Hugh Van Tassle, a young doctor in the community. He informs her that he has just been cleared of desertion charges against his wife, and asks permission to call on Saturday night, which the young woman rather reluctantly grants. Returning home, she greets Mr. and Mrs. Becker, with whom she makes her home, and, encountering Violet Becker alone in the kitchen, tells her that Hugh is coming Saturday. Shortly before it is time for him to call, Mildred says that she has received word from her brother in Emburgh, asking her to drive over this evening on urgent business. Clarence Becker offers to take her, inviting his wife to accompany them, but Violet refuses, and they drive off without her. A few minutes later, Hugh calls, and expresses his annoyance at not finding Mildred. Violet reminds him that she is here, alone, as her only daughter, Beatrice, is spending the night with a little friend. The two reminisce of the time when they were sweethearts, twelve years ago; Hugh confesses that after Violet married Clarence he persuaded Eleanor Steele to become his wife merely in order to spite Violet, and both admit that they have still loved one another through the years, although separated by seas of matrimony. Carried away by a flood of sweet memories, they embrace tenderly.

After Clarence has driven a few miles through the woods, Mildred admits that her brother has not really sent for her, but that she wished to avoid Hugh's visit, as she felt that he would propose to her, and she loves someone else. In surprise, Clarence asks her who she really cares for, but turning away with tears in her eyes, she will not tell him. A crash of thunder is heard, breaking the peace of the night; frightened, Mildred instinctively seeks refuge in Clarence's arms and he kisses her, telling the young woman that he has loved her since the first day she came to their home, seeking lodging. Confessing, that she, too, loves him, Mildred reminds him of his wife and child, and both are undecided as to what course of action they must take, debating the question as they drive home.

Entering the sitting room, Mildred is confronted by Violet, in Hugh's arms, and expresses her surprise at his actions. Violet hotly charges her boarder with having pre-arranged the whole evening, saying that she has known of her infatuation for Clarence from the first. At this moment, Clarence comes in from the garage, and is indignant over the whole situation, but as the four frankly talk over the state of their emotions, all agree that the best plan is to face facts and "unscramble the eggs in the love nest" by a trip to Reno. Driving there together, Mildred becomes Clarence's wife, while Hugh and Violet are wed after the Becker divorce. Laughingly, Violet assures Mildred that she is a capable teacher in lessons in love, as well as the three Rs.

UNWANTED WIFE

Edna Hansen Drama File No. 10067

EVER since James Travers had been a very little boy, his father had drilled into him the fact that as the last Travers in the long line of the famous book collecting family, it was his duty to marry some day and carry on the name. His father dying when he was in his teens, James found himself left with a heavily mortgage estate, and an enormous library, in which he was only vaguely interested. But Lillian Cane, a young literature student, had gained the elder Travers' permission to use the library, and after Mr. Travers' death a swift love affair developed between Jamey and Lil. Mrs. Cane, knowing something of the elder Travers' harsh disposition, and the son's inheritance of his father's temper, strongly disapproved, but her pleas were useless. Swept away by the intensity of the ardent Jamey, Lil eloped with him, and on the way back to his home their car was struck by an auto.

For several months Lil lay in the hospital, the seriousness of her injury erasing her mother's displeasure because of the elopement. Jamey, through it all, was a devoted companion, often cheering Lil by telling her that soon they would be settled in a cottage, with babies of their own. Knowing Jamey's desire for a son, Lil could not bring herself to tell him that the doctor said she could not have children, Jamey and Lil bought a vine-covered cottage in a small Connecticut short town, and for several months were blissfully happy. One of their closest friends was Tod Ackerman, who had rented the cottage to them, and it was he, together with Lil. who conceived the idea of putting in a library on the front porch. Jamey, who had been idle, was not over enthusiastic, but Lil made the library a paying business, and soon the whole town got the habit of dropping in on the Travers for a book.

The return of Frances Holden, one-time sweetheart of Tod, excited the town, for it was said she was always an expert at breaking up homes. Soon Lil heard that Jamey was stopping in for frequent visits at Frances' bungalow, but when confronting Jamey with this knowledge he suggested that perhaps if they had children, he would stay at home more. A month passed, and when Jamey hinted that the frequent visits of Tod were perhaps not entirely for books, Lil, raging ordered Jamey from the house. That day she discovered she was to become the mother of Jamey's child.

Two months later, a drunken, ranting Jamey returned home from a prolonged stay at Frances', and just as Lil was about to tell him her happy secret, Tod, who knew about Lil's condition, came through the hall saying, "He's still at Fran's so he won't have to know" Misunderstanding and infuriated by Tod's presence, Jamey attacked Tod, and struck by one of the metal book cases, was killed. And when little Neil was born, Tod said quietly to Lil, "This will be our child."

STORY WITHOUT A VILLAIN

Hattie Bassett Drama File No. 10125

GRADUATING with high honors in all her studies, Ethel Ernestine, a young woman of twenty, secures a position as an expression teacher in a small town, a short distance from her home. Making her residence at a boarding house, the girl is presented to other guests when they assemble at the dinner table, and joins in the conversation readily, to the accompaniement of the jingle of silver and dishes. Attracted by her quick intelligence and serene charm, Paul Patrick, a young revenue officer, who is seated across the table, invites her to go walking with him in the surrounding country. She accepts, and the two of them spend many happy hours together after that, exploring spots of beauty. During her vacation months, Ethel Ernestine goes to a small resort in Virginia, to rest and recover from nervous strain which has weakened her. Securing her summer address from a friend at the boarding house, Paul Patrick follows her, but he finds Jean Justus, a young woman to whom he has previously devoted a great deal of attention the summer before, at the same hotel. When she greets him affectionately, Ethel Ernestine is convinced that the two are secretly engaged, and informs Paul that she will not see him again. Securing a position in Oklahoma, the girl leaves, but later receives a letter from Patrick which encloses the announcement of Miss Justus' marriage to someone else.

In answer to an advertisement the following year, Miss Ernestine is employed as a governess by Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose for their two children, and sails with them to a foreign port across the Gulf. Ater his mother passes away, Paul Patrick realizes that Miss Ernestine means more to him than anyone in the world, and writing to her alma mater, secures her present address, and boards a steamer, soon arriving at the Ambrose' residence. The girl receives him cordially, and he is invited to attend a picnic with her employers and herself the following day. Swimming beyond her distance, Miss Ernestine calls for help, and Patrick goes to her rescue, reaching her just as she is sinking for the third time, The young lady is brought to the shore, but all efforts to revive her seem futile until Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose pray for her recovery, accordingly to divine laws and she regains consciousness. They tell her that they had faith in God's power to restore her, and as she shares their belief in the days to come, the girl finds her health and strength greatly increased. She establishes a church center in this tropical city, and instructs its member in Christian healing. Enthusiastic over this work, she advises Paul when he asks her to becomes his wife, that she must devote her energies at present to the church. He replies that he is doubtful as to the success of their marriage when she is so absorbed in an undertaking that he cannot share, and goes to live with his widowed sister, Mrs. Bryan, on their family estate.

Engrossed in her work, Miss Ernestine opens a studio, and helps the poor and sick of the community, as well as the more fortunate. Unable to forget Ethel, Patrick returns to visit her, bringing his sister, who is charmed with the young woman, and helps her in her work. Mrs. Bryan confides to Miss Ernestine that she hopes her brother will succeed in winning her hand, and she replies that if he could only share her faith, she is sure they would be very happy. A man who had worked with Patrick when he was a revenue officer persuades him to take a drink of whiskey which he has seized in a raid; it turns out to be poisoned because of improper distillation, and Paul is brought home in a disgraceful and serious condition. Miss Ernestine prays for his recovery, and when at last he is himself again, does not condemn him, but he assures her that he has found a new spiritual, as well as physical strength. She replies that she is overjoyed to hear this, and consents to become his wife.

The wedding day is set, when Ethel Ernestine, overcome by exhaustion, succumbs to sleeping sickness which is prevalent in the community. The Ambrose family, Paul and his sister, and her hosts of devoted friends join in prayer for her recovery, which is at last effected. Taking her in his arms, Paul tells her that he is quite ready to accept the faith which he believes has given her to him, once more. In the presence of her friends, Ethel Ernestine becomes the bride of Paul Patriek, at a quiet ceremony in her flower-decked ehurch.

MURDER CHARGE

Ed J. McCue Drama File No. 10226

ESTABLISHED as a country doctor, John Beverly is summoned from his supper by the insistent ringing of the doorbell, and an excited messenger informs him that Mrs. Mansfield, a patient on an isolated farm, is in labor, the nurse summoned having failed to get through the storm blocked pass. Although his own wife is expecting a child, at the insistence of his wife who assures him she is fine and has every confidence in his trained nurse, the doctor consents to go. Several hours later he delivers a fine baby girl and returns wearily home only to find that during his absence his wife has died in giving birth to a son. Depressed, miserable, Dr. Beverly gives up his general practice and moves to the city where he opens a hospital.

Eighteen years pass. To the prosperous and well equipped hospital of Dr. Beverly comes Dorothy Mansfield, the child he delivered the night his wife died. She explains that she wishes to go into nurse's training and the dootor admits her. Some time later, Doctor Beverly ill humoredly scans the bills his son, a senior at Medical School has been accumulating, Tom enters singing a ribald song and his father turns upon him angrily lecturing about endangering his career. Meekly Tom listens but as soon as his father gets out of breath, he cajoles him into a good humor and whistling leaves the room with ten borrowed dollars he has wheedled. Proceeding to a night club, Tom and a party of friends are ostentatiously received, but as the party is leaving, Tony Franco, the racketeer owner, takes Tom aside and asks him to settle his I. O. U.s. Tom hasn't the money but he promises he'll raise it somehow. On the way home, a tire blows out, Tom's car turns over, and he is taken to his father's hospital with a broken arm and lacerated scalp. Under Dorothy's care, Tom falls in love with her and when Tony Franco visits him and tries to date Dorothy, Tom heatedly resents the gangster's attentions to his pretty nurse and orders Franco out. Dorothy lectures him for losing his temper and looking up at her adoringly, Tom promises to drop night life and pay his I. O. U.s. Upon his recovery, he goes to Franco's club, is led to the owner's private office, and coldly pays his debts and gets his I. O. U.s back . As he is leaving, a masked man enters the window via the fire escape and covering Franco with a gun, takes the money and exits. Franco grabs his own gun and fires. Wounded the stranger shoots back and Franco drops to the floor dead. Startled by the shot, Tom turns back and when the waiters and bouncers rush in is held for murder. Although he claims that he was down the hall when the shots were fired, his I. O. U.s are found in the dead man's pocket, there is no trace of the money he says he paid for them, and there are witnesses at the hospital to prove that the men quarreled Dorothy visits Tom in his cell and assures him she believes in his innocence.

Meanwhile a new patient is admitted to the hospital. Dorothy, taking the man's case history finds him dying of an infected gun wound. Realizing he hasn't a chance, the fellow confesses that he killed Tony Franco. He had been working as a musician at the night club and Franco had cheated him out of his wages. He had sworn to get even and had frequently climbed the fire escape but until the Beverly kid had brought the money, had gotten nothing. Dorothy excitedly gets a sworn statement and rushes to court in time to convince the jury of Tom's innocence. She and Tom are married and on the door to Dr. John Beverly's office is added the name Dr. Thomas Beverly.

YE WHO STUMBLE

Mrs. J. Sprague Drama File No. 10116

BENEATH the lilac blossoms Myrna's eyes shone with happiness as David Arnold kissed her little red mouth again and again. But now it was winter again and David had left with the other medical students, and as Myrna walked, head held high, into the village sharp eyes watched her and prim faces huddled together to gossip. At home Grandmother Gray peered at her from under her spectacles and bustling about scolded she didn't know why the Lord chose to bring upon her head such dongs. Myrna's mother had come to no good and now her daughter who had been raised righteously had transgressed. It was late one night when a knocking sounded at the door, and Myrna shutting her grandmother's door to keep from waking her admitted Will Harbin. "I only just heard, Myrna," he whispered, "Let me look after you." Myrna's eyes were wet as she looked up at the strong face of the boy who had always looked up to her at school but she knew she could never put her burdens on his shoulders. "I couldn't come to you like this," she answered, "The one who is responsible is the one I love." And when Myrna went down into the Valley of Shadows, there was only Granmother Gray, complaining endlessly, to lend an unwilling hand. Luckily the baby cried but little and Myrna adored the little mite and took courage in the face of the universal disapprobation of the village. Then Granny, always ailing grew more feeble and more querulous and at last took to her bed entirely. At the end she pleaded with Myrna to forgive her for having been too harsh and as Myrna lifted her child so that the old woman might look upon her, the room became suddenly still. Thereafter it was more lonely than ever in the cottage, and Myrna studied and played with her child as one in a dream. Once, shopping in the village, Myrna and the baby were caught in a sudden storm. Her jacket thrown over the baby, Myrna hurried down the drenched lanes. But that night the child got a fever and as Myrna watched in agony, the little life was slowly snuffed out. It was the village doctor who urged Myrna to go to a hospital and study nursing and armed with a letter to Dr. Borden, Myrna dully arrived in the city to begin her work. Untiring in her efforts, Myrna soon became a favorite with the doctors for her patience and endurance. One day Dr. Borden introduced her to the new laboratory doctor, Arnold. Myrna's stiff lip tried to move but with a nod she hurried down the white corridor and Dr. Arnold remembering her and the lilac blossoms, stood looking after her. However, when he tried thereafter to stop Myrna, she always managed to elude him and in his own room he remembered broken promises he had made. Then the influenza epidemic broke out and every one at the hospital was driven to his utmost. In vain Dr. Borden begged Myrna to take some rest, and once as he stayed her in the hall, she suddenly pitched forward. It was Dr. Arnold who begged to be allowed to treat her, and as her heavy lids fluttered open he pleaded with her to live. He knew now he loved her. A wan smile came to Myrna's face and with great effort she placed her hand in his.

SKY BIRD

Stella Belcher Drama File No. 10187

SADDENED in his old age because he can find no trace of his daughter who eloped years ago, Daddy Gray finds comfort in his adopted child, Carlo, now a girl of seventeen. The two of them take long walks together through the woods surrounding his mountain home, returning at night to a delicious meal prepared by Black Mandy, their devoted housekeeper. A stranger comes to their door one evening, and introduces himself as Phil Richards, a writer, adding that he has taken the cottage next to them. Daddy Gray invites him to call as often as he wishes, and he often comes after that to take Carlo horse-back riding. When they are seated together by a mountain stream, resting, he asks the girl to marry him, but she replies that she cannot leave her foster-father alone in the world. A storm comes up before they reach the cottage, and Carlo instinctively takes refuge in Phil's arms, admitting at last that she is glad of his protection. Returning home, she relates the day's experiences to Daddy Gray, who tells her he is an old man and cannot live much longer; he will be very happy to know that a fine man like Phil will take care of her, and wishes them to be married before he dies. That same evening Carlo reads a story in the newspaper of a young doctor who has been forced down in his plane a few miles away, and as she looks at his handsome picture, she almost falls in love with him, but remembers that she is to marry Phil, and hides the paper in an old chest.

Shortly before the wedding day, Phil and Carlo are riding together in the woods when he is thrown from his horse, seriously injured. Daddy Gray remarks that there is no doctor in several miles, but Carlo remembers the newspaper account, and sends for the man, whose name is Don Leedin. Phil has fractured his skull, and it is necessary to perform an operation; after that Dr. Leedin calls every day. Carlo is greatly attracted to him, but assures Phil that she will marry him as soon as he is well. In spite of Dr. Leedin's expert care, Phil is told that he cannot recover. He sends for Daddy Gray and Carlo, asking Dr. Leedin to remain in the room, and confesses that he is the brother of Leo. who married Daddy Gray's daughter. They had one son, Don, whom they loved dearly, and were planning to visit Daddy Gray with their baby when both were fatally injured in an automobile accident, and, dying, left all their possessions to Phil, asking him to care for their little boy. Instead, he put the child in an orphanage, and spent their wealth on himself. His purpose in coming to Daddy Gray's home was to obtain funds from him, in exchange for information concerning his grandson, but the love and trust Carlo and her foster-father gave him caused him to abandon this plan. Proving that Daddy Gray's grandson is none other than Dr. Leedin by pictures the young man has of his parents, Phil dies.

Dr. Leedin tells Carlo that he is in love with her, and, shyly, she shows him the picture she clipped from the paper. As they embrace, in the garden, Daddy Gray watches happily, concealed by the rose bushes.

THE MOON WORSHIPPER

Herbert Duplessie Mystery File No. 10185

THREE students, Wilbur, Paul, and Barry, are making an automobile tour of Canada when a heavy storm breaks. They take refuge in an old-fashion country inn, near St. Corix, and are conducted to their rooms by the proprietor, Felix de Valois, who introduces them to his daughter, Diane. At dinner they are presented to the other guests, Madame Beaudette, a spiritualist, Kingsley Robertson, an authority on jewels, Helen Thurmond and her aunt, Mrs. Henderson, and Morton Rollins, a prize-fighter, all of whom have come to this secluded spot for a rest, they state. After dinner, Monsieur de Valois informally joins his guests, and tells the boys that he is a direct descendant of Baron de Valois, who built this as his chateau. When the family fortunes were lost in the war, he was forced to open his ancestor's home as an inn, and adds, smiling, that the Baron's ghost is supposed to haunt the place, as a result. Madame Beaudette persuades them to hold a seance in an attempt to conjure up this shade, at which Helen Thurmond excuses herself, but the other guests form a circle, and extinguish the lights. Tiring of this, Diane goes in search of Helen, and finally discovers the girl, murdered, in the garden.

At the police investigation, Diane states that Rollins often made love to her, and threatened to kidnap her; possibly he mistook Helen for her, and, realizing his mistake, killed the girl to silence her. Mrs. Henderson states that a valuable crucifix, which her niece had told the guests was paste, is gone. The only one who could have appreciated its worth is Robertson. Both men are questioned thoroughly, but there is no evidence brought to light which will convict them. Barry tells the police that he wishes to test a theory, and persuades them to ask Madame Beaudette to hold another seance, which all must attend, secretly instructing Diane to leave shortly after the lights are turned out.

These instructions are followed, when suddenly a cry for help is heard in the garden. Police rush forward, and seize a white-clad figure which they find is Monsieur de Valois, carrying Diane. He tells them that he must sacrifice her to the moon, as she is not his own daughter, but a girl whom he adopted and brought up for this purpose. After he is arrested, Barry explains that he became interested in de Valois' story of the ghost, and read a history of the family, which he found hidden in the library. He discovered that there was a strong vein of insanity, and that the de Valois family belonged to a cult known as the Moon Worshippers, who made human sacrifices to their goddess. Alone with the frightened Diane, he takes the girl in his arms, telling her that he wishes always to protect her, as he loves her. Drying her tears, she replies, that she is willing as she, too, loves him.

WALKING DOWN BROADWAY

Rosa Sheffey Drama File No. 10240

NOTORIOUS for the cruelty that had sent his wife to an early death, John Phillips discovered that his daughter Betty had been dancing at a Church festival with Bob Hall and as she came in he beat her until exhausted, she ran from the house. At the foot of the hill Bob was waiting, and drawing the disheveled girl into his car he drove in silence toward New York. It was almost morning when Betty dazedly saw Bob stop before a hotel, but when he seized her in his arms, she recoiled. "But we're not married yet," she pleaded. "Married!" Bob laughed, and realizing for the first time what he was thinking, Betty ran from the room. As Bob followed, cursing, she dodged into a room. "What the dickens do you think you're doing? a gruff voice demanded. Nerves snapped, Betty broke down and sobbed while Ira Radcliffe, prominent young attorney watched her cynically and wondered what sort of a game this one had. Weakly Betty explained and as Ira at last believed her story, he promised to help her, telling himself he was a sucker to believe a wild story like that. Buying clothes for her, he told Betty that if she were really on the level she'd look for a job. It was a dubious Ira who came every now and then to see how Betty was getting on, but for Betty those visits meant everything. Ira struggled for a long time against falling in love with the little "nobody" but at last, one night, he asked her to marry him. He didn't like her working in a night club, and in her heart Betty knew he never quite trusted her. When her picture appeared in the newspapers as the fiancee of the rising young attorney Ira Radcliffe, Bob Hall, who had never forgiven what he called her running out on him, came to her apartment, Betty gasped as Bob walked in, but when she tried to put him out, Bob, who had been drinking, muttered thickly that she belonged to him and nobody was going to take her away. The telephone rang. It was Ira telling her he had just come back to town from trying a case and was coming right over. Betty gasped as she saw Bob stagger toward her a gun in his hand, and snatching the telephone he called out, "Shtay away. We don't wan' you aroun'" Frantically Betty tried to explain, but Ira slammed the receiver down. Sinking into a chair, Betty suddenly became aware of Bob reaching for her and as she tried to beat him off the revolver exploded and Bob fell to the floor dead. Bewildered, she watched the police charge her with murder. The circumstance of the man in her room prejudiced public opinion against her and she was held up by the newspapers as an unprincipled murderess. But Ira, unable to see the woman he loved so tortured, came to her defense and convinced the jury of Betty's blamelessness. As the verdict, "Not Giulty" was brought in, Ira begged Betty to forgive him for doubting, and as the court room cleared, he took her trembling figure into the shelter of his arms.

RIVAL LOVERS

Rochelle Burch Drama File No. 10058

ALONE, carefree, for years Willard Lee had been content roaming the country at his ease and writing the exquisitely lovely bits of poetry that won him praise from the critics but little money in his pocket. Then one day, attracted by the beautiful magnolia blossoms on a well tended estate, he had flung himself in the grass and was busy creating another of his lyrics when embarrassed he looked up into the smiling face of one of the prettiest girls he had ever seen. Scrambling to his feet, he apologized for his position but interested, she had him tell her about himself and as the butler came out to ask her if she wanted tea served in the garden, Nell asked him to stay. For hours they spoke together and when, a tribute to the afternoon, Willard kissed her, they were both shaken by the realization that they were in love . Willard met Nell's newly rich father who had little patience with poets and it was he who dashed Willard's soaring hopes by asking him frankly whether he'd be happy living on his wife's money. A new respect for the money he had always scorned came to Willard now that he had Nell to think of and after a poignant farewell, Willard left to work desperately hard on a ranch that Mr. Jones sent him to. It was soon evident that Jones had given his foreman instructions to break Willard's spirit but, realizing that Willard remained on uncomplaining until Nell's letters suddenly stopped. When his own letters came back unopened, Willard returned to find the house boarded up and the occupants vanished. In his discouragement, Willard typed a sensational and cheap novel which to his own amazement sold and the money he had never been able to earn with his fine poetry flooded in. The sensation of the moment, women began to bid for his favor but always in his mind there was Nell. At last his persistence in subscribing to her home town papers was rewarded as he read an announcement that the Jones mansion had been reopened in preparation for Nell's wedding to a titled foreigner. Whereupon, refusing the invitation of the beautiful and weathy Pauline to week end at her estate, Willard returned South and in the garden, under the magnolia blossoms, found Nell. With a cry she ran into his arms and explained that they received a telegram telling of Willard's death fighting cattle rustlers. Believing that, she had gone abroad and now after several years had finally been induced to marry her father's choice, Lord Frederick. Nell promised to elope with Willard that evening but after hurried preparations, Willard waited in vain at the appointed spot in the garden and hours later, in desparation applied at the door only to learn that Nell had given orders that only her fiance Frederick was to be admitted. Feeling that Nell had made a fool of him, Willard prepared to leave town. Suddenly there was a noise at the door and breathlessly Nell told him that her father, determined to have her marry the title, had locked her in her room. It was he who had the telegram sent. Nell found, and if Willard still wanted her, she was his. With a cry of joy he swept her into his arms.

HIS OWN MASTER

Henry Brandes Western File No. 10026

WHEN his brother Jim is sent to prison convicted of a series of holdups, Sheriff Bill Tiger is subjected to the distrust of his county. As he walks down the street he catches suspicious glances and at the door of the saloon a reeling cowboy begins calumniating all Tigers. Bill's hands clap to his gun and the cowboys gather closer expecting a fight, but Bill does nothing. Too well he knows that Jim would rather steal a dollar than earn a fortune and no jail is strong enough to hold him. Riding alone, Bill discovers the express being held up. However, the lookout spies him coming up and shoots his horse from under him. Bill makes a dive for the gun but the other masked bandits soon overpower the lone sheriff and ride off. Dazed that he has not been killed, Bill raises himself from the ground and as the train starts he makes a flying leap and clambers aboard to stare into the muzzle of a six shooter. With great difficulty Bill, who has lost his star in the fight, convinces the conductor that he is the sheriff. He learns that $100,000 has been stolen and the mail clerk has been wounded in the shoulder. A pretty girl helps Bill render first aid but she demands to know exactly what Bill was doing on the scene and in a suspicious voice asks if Bill Tiger happens to know that his brother just broke jail. Annoyed with her and with the obstreperous conductor, Bill strides off when the train pulls into the station and marches down to the saloon. When he asks for volunteers for a posse, one of the cowhands spits on the sawdust floor and remarks that he wouldn't join a posse led by one of the thieving Tigers. Bill's fist hooks his chin and quietly he repeats his request for volunteers. His men rounded, Bill orders them to search in different directions. To Walt who accompanies him, Bill, confesses that he fears it was his brother who held up the train. At Haunted Canyon they meet two riders, one the girl of the train. Her uncle, a rancher inquires sarcastically if the sheriff has sent his posse on a wild goose chase while he went to divide the loot with his brother. Bill binds the rancher and tells him he and Josie can come and help search for the bandits but Josie whips her quirt across Bill's face, taunting him.

Approaching the cabin where his brother is hiding, Bill advances boldly and demands that Jim surrender or be shot. A shot from the cabin kills his horse and whipping out his gun, Bill fires. On the floor of the cabin he finds his brother who grins crookedly and says, "You sure did your duty and I'm proud of you," then is silent. Josie enters while the other bandits are being led off, and gently lays her hand on Bill's sleeve as she tries to comfort him. And Bill's hand folds over Josie's in understanding.

A HARSH FATHER

William G. Doerr Drama File No. 9901

WHEN Walter Colt, president of the Colt Automobile Co. discovered that his daughter was in love with one of his own mechanics, his fury left him speechless. Without further ado he fired Ted Brooks and when Alma pleaded her love asked her sarcastically if she thought she could be happy with a jobless husband. Ted assured Alma that he could find other work, but it soon became apparent that other manufacturers dared not risk the hostility of Colt by hiring Ted, and for several months he found himself jobless. At last picking up work in a factory, Ted began working nights on an idea he had for revolutionizing heavy trucks. Meanwhile, his distinguished service had won him recognition and before long he had gotten a raise. Again Alma pleaded with her father to give his consent to her marriage, and when she assured him that Ted was earning enough for the two, Colt seeing that his daughter was determined to get married with or without his consent, withdrew his strenuous objections, not before, however, he had warned Ted that he could expect no financial assistance whatever from his father-in-law. At the small wedding, Mr. Colt was conspicuous by his absence and the young couple tried to hide from each other their hurt. Months passed. Alma found happiness cooking for Ted and sitting by quietly while each night he pored over the blue prints for his ideas. The night that Ted realized it was practicable they celebrated together and the next day Ted called on his father-in-law. Before her could explained Colt sneered that if Ted was coming to him for help he was wasting his time and when Ted assured him he had come to offer Colt an interest in his idea, Alma's father laughed at the subterfuge. It was then, thoroughly infuriated that Ted took his idea to another concern and having aroused their enthusiasm over his invention, affiliated himself with them in the manufacturing of a new kind of truck. Soon the Colt trucks which had long led the field gave away to a new and better truck. In a desperate effort to recoup his losses, Colt took a flyer in the stock market and at last, dazed, closed negotiations for the sale of the Colt Automobile Co. His last creditor paid, Walter Colt looked hopelessly at the ten dollars left to his bank balance and staring dully down the many stories to the street entertained the idea of jumping from the window and leaving this life. It was then that Ted and Alma came to offer the old man a place with them. Ted secured a sinecure for his father-in-law in the firm of which he was now head, and in the shelter of his children's home, Walter Colt begged forgiveness for having been such a hard-headed fool.

BIG BUSINESS

Mrs. Reese Watkins Drama File No. 10059

AS long as the Poole family was wealthy everything at home ran smoothly. Plans were already under way for the masquerade party that was an annual custom when George Poole, wealthy manufacturer came home worriedly to explain that to prevent his great plant from going under during the period of economic stress, he had been forced to borrow large sums of money. At the party the Pooles pretended that everything was as it always had been but when Frank Smith, the middle aged financer of Poole's loans began to take an interest in Helen Poole, a new idea struck the manufacturer. After all, he reasoned, if Helen married Smith, the Poole property would remain in the family. But Helen, bored by Smith's labored compliments made up her mind to have nothing to do with him and despite of the urgings of her father, to whom Smith had shown that he was of the same mind concerning a marriage of their interests, Helen pleaded for the right of choosing her own husband. The quarrels at home over Smith became more frequent and at last Helen left home.

For the first time on her own, Helen sought employment and finally began working on a large farm. There she met Bernard, who, like herself was entirely different from the other labors. Every spare moment Bernard studied to improve himself and soon Helen and he were spending many hours together. At last he asked her to marry him, telling her he had money enough saved to purchase a farm of their own. They would have to work hard to make a go of it but because they were so very much in love, it didn't seem so difficult. Helen wrote to her family inviting them to the wedding, but they wrote briefly that if she chose to throw her life away upon a pauper she could expect no help from them. Bernard's kisses alleviated somewhat the pain in Helen's heart as she explained they had never been that way before, it was because they needed money so badly. Months passed. Months of long drudgery and then one day Helen struggling to clean the dark stains in Bernard's work clothes cried out. Bernard came running, and as Helen cried, "Look, Bernard. It is oil!" he stared for a moment, then threw his arms violently about her. In a few short weeks they were rich. They had everything they wanted, but Bernard often saw Helen sigh as she glanced over the home papers, and knew that she longed to be reconciled to her family.

It was the last masquerade that the Pooles were to give. The next day the Poole factory was to be taken over by Frank Smith. Among the guests were two whom nobody could recognize. But when while dancing, the pair overheard Poole plead with the adament Smith for an extension of time, Helen and Bernard interfered. Revealing their identity, they offered the astounded Poole the money he needed to meet his obligations. Smith left, his plans to gain the Poole factory by foreclosure frustrated, and Helen looked adoringly into the eyes of her husband who was arranging to go into business with her father. She had everything she wanted now, Health, wealth, and love.

KID SISTER

Frances C. McIlroy Drama File No. 9997

DRESSING hurriedly before his mirror, Robert Durham frowned as he picked up the telegram telling him his kid sister, Joan was coming from boarding school to live with him. What, he asked himself, was he going to do with a nineteen year old kid around the place. Taking up his high top hat, and drawing on his white gloves, he smiled approvingly at the tall lean figure that looked back at him from the mirror and getting into his limousine said, "To Miss Thomas," to the sleek chauffeur.

Perched atop the grand piano, lovely, coppery-haired, little Joan Durham smiled at her classmates and friends who were giving her a farewell party. Roddy, tall and blond, made his way through the dancers and lifted her down. As they walked out on the terrace, he kissed her eyes and lips and murmured he was going to miss her terribly. "Someday," he said. "Someday," Joan echoed softly and, as for the first time she realized the rain was drenching them, they turned and went inside.

Pressing his hands to his aching head, Bob groaned as his butler reminded him that Joan was coming in on the ten o'clock train. He called Lil and told her he would have to break their luncheon date but he would see her in the evening. At the station Bob stared at sight of Joan looking so beautiful and grown up but that evening when she came down for dinner, she found Bob had left for the evening and she invited the astounded maid to dine with her.

The next two weeks Joan learned what it was to be left alone every night and when she begged Bob to take her with him, he finally agreed. That night she met Lil Thomas, sleekly blonde and an immediate antagonism awakened between the two women. Joan had to help Bob to bed he was so intoxicated, and in her heart she blamed Lil. But when, a few days later Bob introduced his wife, and Joan realized Lil had gotten Bob drunk so he would marry her, Joan tried to forget her dislike. Lil, however, interfered with everything Joan wanted to do and when Roddy arrived and Lil learned that he was a newspaper reporter and that Bob was ready to let the youngsters get married and settled a good sum of money on them, she began poisoning Bob's mind against Roddy. Joan was certain her brother would change his mind and out with Roddy she thrilled to his confidence that he had been sent to track some confidence men. Once when Roddy tried to get the goods on the racketeers, he heard raised voices telling a woman she couldn't back out now, and a moment later she informed them that her husband was leaving town the next night, they could come then. To his amazement, however, the woman who came out of the room was Lil. Joan and Roddy persuaded Bob to return from the depot and with a deadly white face, Bob stepped out of the darkness just as his wife opened his safe for her friends. Lil tried to bluff it out but the police came and Roddy got his scoop, omitting Lil's name.

Because he loved Lil, however, Bob refused to press charges, and with tears in her eyes Lil promised to make herself worthy. "Do you think," she whispered, Roddy and Joan would like to have a home wedding?"

BIG HORN CAVE

Jennie H. Birdsall Drama File No. 10195

PAMPERED, beautiful, Jeanette Smith has so long been accustomed to luxuries that she is bored by everything. Languidly she pins on the orchids Carl Morgan has sent and in the drawing room, he gasps as her loveliness as she sweeps into the room. In his roadster he asks her for the tenth time to marry him, but Jeanette flings her cigarette away and sighing, asks Carl not to mentioned marriage just for one evening. At the dinner party, Jeanette is immediately surrounded by admirers, among them Robert Sullivan recently returned from the continent. When, amid the excitement, Blanche and Tom announce their engagment, Carl miserably congratulates them as he tries to forget that for an hour Jeanette has disappeared with Robert, On the way home Jeanette pats Carl's cheek as he reminds her bitterly that he scarcely saw her all evening, and promises to lunch with him the next day. But when Carl arrives for her, the maid informs him that Jeanette has taken a plane to Florida leaving no message. The fact that Robert had spoken of a trip South last night, seems to the lovelorn Carl significant, and he presents a woeful picture when his lovely cousin Dorothy drops in. Finding her sympathetic, Carl takes her to the show to which he had gotten tickets for Dorothy and Blanche, seeing them, reports to Jeanette upon her return that her Carl seemed easily consoled. Repressing her impluse to call Carl and apologize for having broken her date to attend a convention with her father, Jeanette sullenly agrees to meet Blanche for tea at the Waldorf. Carl enters with Dorothy and Jeanette's smile of greeting is icy. Restless, unhappy, Jeanette, confiding only in Blanche, leaves for a vacation on a Dude Ranch in Wyoming. Carl's efforts to locate Jeanette at home are fruitless, and when Blanche and Tom, after a lover's quarrel, decide to rush their marriage, Carl acts as best man. Too happy herself to leave Carl so miserable, Blanche tells him where Jeanette is and in a few well chosen words tells him that the trouble with him is he has let Jeanette walk all over him. Jamming on his brakes, Carl returns home, packs a few things, and proceeds to Wyoming.

Viciously riding her horse as she tries to forget how lonely she is, Jeanette is suddenly confronted by a masked, unshaven rider, who sweeps her onto his own horse and carries her to a mountain cave. In three days Jeanette's indignation at his treatment has reached a high pitch, but when a rescue party of cowboys arrive and prepare to string up her captor, she finds herself pleading for his life. Blushing scarlet, she sees a mischievous grin on her captor's face, and suddenly she realizes where she has seen that jaw before. "You. . . " she says, but Carl has her in his arms. "Are you sufficiently tamed young lady, to enjoy a wedding at St. Paul's?" "You . . . " she repeats, but as he crushes her in his arms, she sighs, "Yes, dear." The relieved Smiths welcome their prodigal daughter, and she looks accusingly at her bridegroom as he father explains that if not for Carl's telegram, they would have been worried to death about her disappearance. It's a good thing she's marrying such a capable young man. And Jeanette remembering Carl's kisses, nods.

PHANTOM OF THE MANSION

June Thomas Melodrama File No. 10123

THE long peal of the doorbell sounded ghastly in the dead of night. Amazed, Lionel admitted the shivering figure of his brother Arthur whom he not seen since the night, fifteen years ago, when Lionel, refusing to accede to the eccentric demands of their father, owner of the grim Brandenburg mansion, had been disowned. Arthur's words tumbled distraitly from his white lips as he told of the increasing vagaries of the Colonel culminating in the mad marriage he had arranged between his cruel but beautiful nurse Elsa and Arthur. In the sinister vaulted room of the old Brandenburg mansion, the dying Colonel had smiled mockingly as he informed the newly-weds that according to the terms of his will, whichever of the two should try to free himself from the other would forfeit his right to the inheritance. Lionel gasped, "And you consented?" A paroxysm of coughing seized Arthur who explained what a fiend Elsa turned out to be, and how, fearing poverty, Arthur had remained on. Only the kindness of Ann who took care of little Rosamunde, child of the ill-mated Elsa and Arthur, had kept Arthur from committing suicide and ending his torment long since. Another fit of coughing took Arthur's breath away and pulling his brother down close, with his dying breath, he made Lionel consent to a strange scheme for revenge upon Elsa.

When Lionel wrote to Elsa of her husband's death, she arranged for the burial of the body and wrote back that Lionel needn't think he could claim any of the inheritance. Lionel shivered at the thought of Ann and Rosamunde, whom he felt as though he knew, under the same roof with such a woman.

A storm was raging when a cloaked figure rowed across the lake to the turreted Brandenburg mansion. From then on strange noises were noticed. One night the butler, Elsa's current paramour, fell in a dead faint and later babled that Arthur's ghost had come back. Harshly Elsa ordered him to pull himself together. These days Rosamunde cringed before the set face of Elsa and Ann dared not leave the child to the untender mercies of a half-mad mother. However, one night, certain she heard footsteps in the deserted attic, Ann climbed up and found Lionel searching for the hidden money Arthur had begged him to find. As she was about to scream, Lionel called her softly by name and explained to the astonished but sympathetic girl that Arthur, his brother, had begged him to appear as a ghost to stir the remorse of Elsa, who had driven him to his grave. In league with Ann, Lionel continued his "haunting" until the butler, crazed with fear, threatened to confess to the police how he and Elsa had slowly poisoned Arthur. To stop his admissions, Elsa stabbed him. That night, unable to sleep she looked up and in the moonlight saw Lionel. Thinking her husband had come back, with a shriek she darted down the long corridors and set fire to the mansion to destroy her husband's memory. It was Lionel who rescued Rosamunde and Ann and, having recovered the money, the trio went far from the horrible mansion in which Elsa perished. And at last, Lionel asked Ann to marry him and together they adopted little Rosamunde.

CHALLENGE

Harry W. Paul Drama File No. 10239

ALTHOUGH Marcia Druten is fond of Peter Willis, she refuses his proposal of marriage, attracted by the lavish gifts of Taylor Ames, a racketeer. Once Peter tries to warn her of the life she is mixing herself up with, but she weeps that she is too involved to break away from it. Peter assures her that he can take her far from Taylor Ames' reach but that night Marcia's body is found, riddled with bullets, victim of a ride. Peter, broken-hearted, vows revenge but he has no way of proving Ames' guilt. In his rash desire to get the man who got Marcia, Peter decides to ally himself with Ames' gang and pin the rap on the powerful racketeer. Accordingly he begins hanging out in a speakeasy to which Taylor used to take Marica and pretends to be out of work and desperate. Over a whiskey one night he becomes confidential with one of the members of Ames' gang and as the hours pass and Red slaps Peter's shoulder and calls him a great guy, he agrees to fix Peter for easy money. Peter's heart beats faster as Red leads him to Ames' quarters and introduces him as a guy who wants to join the gang. Distrustful but needing men, Ames sends Peter out with four other men to hold up a restaurant. They enter and hold up the cashier and a girl who is having a doughnut and a cup of coffee. Pluckily the girl tries to sound an alarm, but as she slips out, one of the men shoots her and the others flee. Only Peter remains to take care of the girl and as the police come Peter explains that he was standing in the doorway when the gangsters came up, pushed a gun in his back, and forced him to enter. The chief, in love with Peter's sister, knows that Peter isn't a gangster and accepts his somewhat implausible story while Peter, tending the girl who was shot, learns that she is out of work and has no place to go. He brings her to his sister and entrusts Helene to her care, meanwhile, more determined than ever to get Taylor Ames and his men behind bars. Returning to the hideout, he pretends that he was captured by the police, made his getaway, and is desperate for fear of recapture. Under Ames' long stare as he tells his story, Peter's blood runs cold, but at length he is given protection. He learns that Taylor is planning a bank robbery and knows this is his chance to catch Marcia's murder. But his own movements are so closely watched, he is unable to notify the police and as the deadline for the crime approaches, he meets Helene, and begging her to trust him, tells her to have the police ready to thwart the holdup of the First National bank at 4:30 on Friday. "Then you are mixed up with those gangsters," Helene cries, but Peter begs her to trust him and tells her briefly about Marcia. Helene notifies the police and when the robbers line up outside the bank they find police in plain clothes ready for them. Ames realizes he has been double crossed and in his fury he shoots Peter who slumps to the floor but cuts off Ames' escape. The whole gang is rounded up, and one of them turning state's evidence squeals that Ames killed Marcia Druten because she knew too much.

The wounded Peter is brought home to be cared for by Helene whom he has once helped similarly, and the police Chief, with his arm around Peter's sister, informs Peter that there is a reward of $25,000 for the capture of Taylor Ames, alias Silky Watson, and that he'd better decide what part of it is to go to Helene. But that hardly presents a problem because Helene agrees to marry Peter and share all his worldly goods.

WHAT IS LOVE?

Mary E. Caler Drama File No. 10228

ABSORBED in the task of creating a home for her husband, Tom Malcolm, and their two children, Eveline and Adeline, the days pass happily for Violet. After the birth of her sons, Frankie and Raymond, Violet discovers that he husband is taking to drink and spending many hours in gambling; she pleads with him to abandon these vices, but he replies that they must have additional funds. When he suggests that they invite Stephen Mallory to their home so that Viola may blackmail him, she is horrified, and refuses indignantly. Tom then says he was not serious, but the seeds of doubt are sown in her mind. Persuading her to accompany him to a dance at the home of his friends, Viola is introduced to Mabel and John Harris, an attractive young couple, and Chester Harrington, a bachelor, among other guests. She spends most of the evening in Chester's company, as he listens with interest to stories of her children, and her future plans for them, and, in turn, he tells her many colorful experiences that have come to him in his career as an engineer. During this time, Tom and Mabel are alone in the garden, confessing their mutual love.

Chester calls at the Malcolm home frequently, making friends with the children, and joining them in their games, at times. One day he tells Violet that he would not be a bachelor today if he had met such a woman as she is. Attending a party with Tom, Violet discovers Mabel in her husband's arms. Deeply hurt and embittered, she pretends not to care, and takes her first cocktail. Unaccustomed to liquor, she does not realize what she is doing, and consents to drive with Bobby Abbot to his cottage in the country. When she awakens the next morning, she tells him she must return to her children at once, although he urges her to stay, professing his love. At home once more, she finds a note from Tom, saying that he has filed divorce proceedings against her, and wishes to marry Mabel.

Learning indirectly that Tom has left her, Chester goes to Violet and protests his love, saying he will do all in his power to make her happy. She replies that she, too, loves him, and promises to marry him, but during the divorce proceedings, the evening she spent in Bobby's company is revealed, and Chester cannot believe in her innocence. However, he leaves her a sum of money to be used for the children's benefit. She accepts it as a loan, and attempts to find work. Returning from a trip to Bermuda, Bobby at last hears of Violet's divorce, and again asks her to let him provide for her, but she refuses. Realizing that she loves Chester, he tells him that she has done nothing wrong. Tracing her through a check which she sends in payment of her debt, Chester goes to Violet, and persuades her to forgive him and become his wife.

TWO KINDS OF LOVE

L. Raymond Smith Drama File No. 10255

TO Jane her brother Richard, reported missing in the World War, was just a faint childhood memory, but her father, the Reverend Morley, brooded over the death of his only son until his health, never too robust, failed entirely. Once, during a storm, Jane hurried down Main Street, her arms full of bundles, and as one dropped she paused in dismay. "Could you please help me?" she asked a pale man passing her, and the next instant dropping her packages she cried, "Richard, oh why didn't you write Dad and me you were safe?" The man started, but as he asked cautiously, "Did you—and Dad think I was dead," and she explained tremulously how they had grieved, how they needed him, he accompanied her home, explaining haltingly that he had been shell shocked in the war and was very slowly recovering now. Through dim eyes, the Reverend Morley welcome home his son. Only Jane's friend Jack stared at the long lost Richard disapprovingly and reminded Jane she had no proof this man really was her brother except the resemblance to Richard's pictures. To Jack Richard's paleness looked like nothing so much as prison pallor, and besides it seemed very strange that Richard could remember thing only when the Reverend or Jane asked eagerly, "Do you remember how you used to love to swim in the creek?" and to escape questioning, Richard claimed recurrent fits of dizziness from shell shock when asked to remember the past. Jane, watching her father's rally since Richard's return quarreled with Jack for his animosity toward Richard and at last Jack left angrily. A few days later, the Reverend Morley died of heart failure and Richard comforted Jane through the dreary days that followed. Jack tried to express his sympathy but in her grief Jane blamed him for raising doublts in her father's mind and hastening his death. Then, a few days later, she saw Richard slipping out of the house and as, astonished she ran to him, he held her off with a gun and claimed he was sick and tired of living in this dump and he was going. Thinking it was a recurrence of his shell shock, Jane ran to him and wrested the gun from his hands. To her horror it was loaded and as it exploded, Richard sank to the floor dead. Dazed, Jane sent for the police and a confessed murderess of her own brother, was led to prison. Everyone turned against her but Jack who insisted she was not to blame. But as he heard public opinion condemn the girl he loved, he left town and began to investigate prison records. At the trial, Jane could offer little in her own defense. She admitted she knew her brother was ill and it was her own fault. But just as the jury was filing out, Jack returned and triumphantly exhibited to the court the police record of Richard Morley, alias Pete Smith, a killer who had escape from the death house and had accepted the role of Richard Morley, whom he happened to resemble, to throw the police off his trail. It was the discovery that Pete was an imposter that had killed Jane's father, and Peter was planning the holdup of the bank when Jane stopped him. The jury freed Jane who crept to the shelter of Jack's strong arms, there to forget the bitter past.

VANISHED HANDS

Emily Sellers Drama File No. 10033

WHISTLING a gay tune, Dr. Rudy Manners, a young and prominent physician hurried up the steps of his home to greet his sister Ruth, who kept house for him. They were the children of a young couple who had come to Michigan, twenty-five years before, but shortly after their arrival, Marie, their mother, had died, and their father had disappeared. The kindly interest of the neighborhood doctor, Theodore Manning had led to their adoption by him, and his training the young boy for the medical profession.

As the brother and sister sat at dinner together, Rudy confessed, when repeatedly questioned by Ruth, that there was something worrying him. At first he vowed that it was because he feared he was soon going to lose her, since she had become engaged to another doctor, Larry Hastings, but finally he admitted that a very difficult case had come to his attention. Visting the hospital with Larry the next day, Ruth saw her brother's "case"—an old man, who had suffered a lapse of memory, and who had no desire to live. In vain did the girl try to draw him into conversation; he muttered incoherently and turned away.

That night, at dinner with Larry, she learned that Mrs. Hastings, one of the city's prominent society leader intended giving a masquerade. Delighted, Ruth told her fiance that she would wear the Juliet costume belonging to her mother. Then, saddening, she said, "I wish I knew where father was. How happy our marriage would make him."

Meanwihle, Rudy, believing home environment would help his patient, brought the man home, and he improved considerably, taking an interest in Ruth's engagement. Yet, he seemed burdened with a secret, and Rudy knew he had not long to live. The night of the masquerade, as Rudy sat with him, his patient grew worse and catching sight of Ruth, garbed as Juliet, he called out hoarsely, "Marie!" Ruth disappeared, and he told his story to Rudy. . . Thirty years before, as a boy in South Carolina, he had seen Marie Welling, an orphan living with a harsh guardian, as Juliet in a school play. The young couple eloped, married, and had two children, Rudy and Ruth. A position in the distant state of Michigan cause the little family to move, and there, Rudy, finding his earnings meagre, was enticed into gambling by his friends. Struck on the head with a beer bottle one evening, he came home dazed, to find Marie accusing him of being a worthless cad. His mind unbalanced by the blow an infuriated by the insult, he strangled Marie, then rushed from the house, to wander many years hoping for atonement in death. . . As he finished speaking, Ruth returned, and the old man, hearing Rudy call out, "Our father!" grasped his arm, looked at him pleadingly, pointing to the sweethearts. Understanding, Rudy, said, "This man saw our father killed honorably in the war." And as Ruth kneeled beside him, with a tender smile for both children, Rudy, Sr. passed away.

NEW COUNTRIES

Stefan Christoff Drama File No. 10221

AFTER the death of his step-mother, Stefan and his father are alone on their little farm, about seventy miles from Bulgaria. The boy tends sheep all day, leaving the cottage in the early morning, while his father sees after the crops, and in the evening they share their simple meal together, talking over th events of the day and plans for the future. Anna, a young girl who lives a few miles away, takes her sheep near Stefan's pasture. One of them leaps across the low fence, and Stefan quickly catches the truant in his arms. He returns the animal to Anna, who smiles shyly, as she thanks him, then runs away. The same thing happens again, and both of them laugh over the incident. Their friendship begun, they meet every day after this, sharing the choicest bits of their noon-day meal together. The girl tells him that she, too, is an orphan, living with her cousin. They are racing down a hill covered with wild-flowers, when Anna slips and falls, spraining her ankle. Stefan comes to her, and takes her in his arms, then kisses her. The girl tells him that she loves him, and he replies that he knows now he has always loved her. Returning to his home hours later, Stefan is questioned by his father, but replies that he was searching for a stray sheep, as he is afraid to explain this strange new emotion.

Later, Anna tells him they must be married, as she is expecting a child. Stefan goes at once to his father, telling him the whole story, and he gives his permission, but asks his son first to make a trip to Bulgaria to arrange for the sale of several of his sheep. The boy goes, first stopping to see Anna, but as she is not at home, he cannot wait. His business completed, Stefan starts home, but finds his purse has been taken, and is forced to make the journey on foot. Believing he has deserted her, Anna runs away from home, as she knows her cousin will never forgive her, and also goes to Bulgaria, passing her lover on the road, but not seeing him, as she is in a carriage. She finds work at a rooming house, and here their son, Tom, is born. Stefan tries in vain to find the girl, but no one knows where she has gone. In the spring, a year later, Stefan and his father go to Bulgaria to sell their crops, and just as they are preparing to leave the city, the Turks begin their invasion. Both of them join the army, and are sent to different companies. After the invaders have been repulsed, father and son search for each other, in the midst of the ruined city.

While walking among the dead and dying, Stefan sees a deserted baby, whom he takes in his arms. As he goes down the road with the child, a woman stops him, saying he has her son, and he turns to face Anna. Explaining what has happened to each other, they search for Stefan's father together, and return with him to their home, which is in ruins. The marriage is performed only a little while before Stefan's father dies of exhaustion, giving them both his blessing. With the little money that is left to them, they decide to sail for America, together.

THE CURRENCY OF LOVE

Mary Clouse Drama File No. 9726

WHEN Tom Draggett, a soldier in the King's Army, obtained his first leave, his devoted mother arranged for him to spend his vacation far from London, in the parish of Kirby where Tom's cousins lived a peaceful and orderly life. Glad of a chance to relax, Tom, used to the tense excitement of London life, soon was bored, until anxious to amuse their handsome visitor, who looked so distinguished in his smart uniform, his cousins took him to a dance in a neighboring village. Among the guests was Violet Crea, a lovely young woman, whose parents were very anxious for her to marry Dr. Burton James, an eminent London practitioner, whose country home was next to Violet's. Instantly a keen rivalry sprang up between the two men, and Tom, with his charming manners and youthful enthusiasm soon won Violet's heart. Disobeying her parent's wishes, Violet slipped out of the house night after night to meet her soldier lover, her secret known only to her devoted young sister, Belle, who staunchily defended Tom when Mr. Crea compared him with Burton James. But continuing to regard James as a dear friend, Violet often went walking with him, and was very disturbed when Tom, blinded with jealousy, accused her of infidelity. A sudden notice from his regiment called Tom back to the front, and all his distrust was swept up in his love for Violet, and he parted from her with deep sorrow, her promise to wait for him singing in his heart.

For two long years Violet waited for Tom, receiving only short notes from him, which did not cheer her. But it was Dr. James, to whom she had confided her love for Tom, who gave her hope and encouragement. When at last, Tom was granted a leave, and wrote to Violet to come up to London and stay with his mother, Violet, visioning her happiness, reached London only to find Mrs. Draggett antagonistic towards her. Too proud to stay where she wasn't wanted, she sought out Dr. James, who generously offered her shelter in his large home. Meanwhile, Tom, back in London, swept Violet into an exciting round of social activities, but Mrs. Draggett always managed to include Natalie Stone, the daughter of a rich London merchant in the party. Seeing that Tom was annoyed with Violet, who did not seem to care for his pleasures, it was easy for Mrs Draggett to convince her son that Violet was carrying on an affair with Dr. James. Again jealousy was reborn in Tom, and without affirming Mrs. Draggett's insinuations, Tom retaliated by spending a hilarious evening with the infatuated Natalie, and then coming drunkenly to Violet to announce that he was going to marry Natalie. Utterly crushed, Violet returned to Kirby, as Tom, after a hurried wedding, again left for France, leaving the field clear for Dr. James, who finally persuaded the heartbroken girl to marry him.

Three years later, Violet, the wife of Dr. James, and the mother of his son, met Tom and Natalie at a London charity ball, and the love which she thought dead flamed up again. Tom, captivated anew with Violet's beauty, and already bored with Natalie, almost succeeded in winning Violet. Realizing that Tom did not mean to divorce Natalie, and that he was still the same jealous, irresponsible lover, Violet's last spark of love for him was killed, and standing before him defiantly, she said proudly, "I am going back to my husband." And home once more with her devoted husband and child, she realized that stronger than infatuation was the deeper bond between husband and wife.

THE GREATER POWER

Mary Clouse Drama File No. 9726

EVEN as a little boy, Pat Kierney was filled with a desire to become a great physician and help the people of the small, Irish village in which he lived. As he grew to manhood, he looked with disfavour upon the countless superstitions of his townspeople, especially their customs of paying a doctor while they were well, to keep them well. But, despite his inherent belief that this practice was harmful, Pat's father, a poorly educated, but kindly man firmly followed this rule, as did his neighbor Sean O'Hara, who owned a large cattle herd. The only one who shared Pat's dreams was Megan O'Hara, and it was partly through her winning persuasion that Tim Kierney allowed his son to go to medical school, although it meant sacrifice and privation.

Through the long years away from home, Pat wrote constantly to Megan, and through her letters learned that a stranger, claiming to be a doctor, had established a home near the village, and winning the confidence of the village folk, by his domineering personality, was extracting all their savings. When Pat, fortified with his diploma at last reached home, he firmly resolved to break the spell which Dr. King had cast over his ignorant patients. With Mary as his ally Pat went from cottage to cottage arguing eloquently against the methods of Dr. King, which he had discovered to be careless and slovenly. His youthful earnestness moving the people of the village, one by one they ceased going to Dr. King for help, although in their hearts they believed him to be possessed of supernatural powers.

For a few months nothing unusual occurred to make Dr. Pat Kierney's new patients lose faith in him, and Pat was hopefully planning his marriage with Megan, when the news that there had been a number of deaths among the neighbor's cattle, reached him. Suspecting nothing he continued his work, until Tim O'Hara, coming to him in a great rage, hotly informed him that his cattle were dying by the dozens, and that undoubtedly Dr. King, angered by the town's action, had cast an evil spell over the produce. In vain, Pat gave logical reasons for the cattle's death, for the people of the village, learning of the misfortune, came to Pat, and accused him of inciting Dr. King to revenge. With Megan the only one to believe in him, Pat begged to be allowed to examine the dead cattle, but his plea was met with cold refusal, and when he demanded to know why the village did not seek out King, O'Hara answered, "You dinna touch one who hae the evil eye!" Flaunting his disbelief in such pagan superstitions, and confident that his faith would guide him, Pat rode to King's cottage, a short distance from the O Hara home. Refused admittance by King, he overpowered him in a fight, and then, searching the room, found, as he had expected, samples of strong poisons. Fortified with this proof, he rode back to Tim O'Hara's and forced him to let the cattle food be examined. Convinced that King had use medical, and not supernatural methods to kill the live stock, the town stormed King's dwelling, and a month later, when King had been sentenced to a lengthy jail term, a man and woman who had proven their faith in each other and in God, pledged renewed devotion with a softly whispered, "I do."

THE BEAUTIFUL OLYMPIA

Giuseppe Biscotti Comedy-Drama File No. 10153

ONE afternoon in Naples, during the latter part of the seventeenth century, Balia, a nurse, tells Anasita, servant, that her young mistress, Olympia, has fallen in love with Limpido a law student whom she met while visiting her aunt in Salerno. Senna, Olympia's mother, has betrothed her to Captain Traslilo, but the girl plans to send word to Limpido, requesting him to impersonate her brother, who, with her father, was taken prisoner by the Turks years ago and has never been heard of since. In this way, Balia adds, he will gain admission to the house and fore-stall the wedding. Anasita leaves, and Balia is confronted with Mangione; she is chiding him for the weight he has gained because of his perpetual appetite, when they are joined by Olympia, who asks Mangione to carry her message to Limpido, instructing her lover to appear at her home as Anastasio, son of her dead father, Giulis. Traslilo, meanwhile, is celebrating his engagement with wine, in an army camp, telling his men how fortunate Olympia will be to marry such a brave warrior as himself. Receiving Mangione's message, Limpido at once leaves Salerno, accompanied by Protodascolo, his friend, who warns him against this dangerous undertaking. Senna gladly recives Limpido, believing him to be her son, and approves as he embraces Olympia.

Squadra, a soldier in Traslilo's company, visits Anasita, who tells him of this deception, and he carries the news to his captain. In a rage, Traslilo plans first to kill Limpido, but later decides to expose him, instead. He offers gold to two poorly clad men whom he encounters on the street, if they will go to Senna, claiming to be her lost son and husband, respectively, which they promise to do. As soon as Traslilo leaves them, they exclaim in astonishment that this was exactly what they were going to do, as they are in reality, Giulio and Anastasio, recently escaped from a Turkish prison. Senna refuses to admit their claim, and Limpido denounces them as imposters. Hearing that his son left Salerno, Filastardo, Limipdo's father, comes to Naples in search of him, and sees him entering Senna's home. He presents himself, but Limpido says that the man is unknown to him. Sali, a page in Senna's home, tells her that Olympia is conducting an illicit love affair with her "brother," whom he saw enter her room after she had retired.

Giulio and Anastasio bring about the arrest of Limpido, charging that he is an imposter; he likewise has them thrown in prison on the same count. Upon learning from Squadra that Olympia has received Limpido in her room, Traslilo breaks his engagement to her. His plans defeated, Limpido confesses his deception and his love for Olympia to Filastardo, who visits him in prison. His father forgives him, but he is now held on the charge of violating Olympia. Filastardo tells Senna that Limpido felt this was the only way he could prevent Olympia's marriage with Traslilo, and that his son wishes to marry the girl. Senna gives her consent; Giulio and Anastasio are sent for, and, pardoning Senna for her mistrust, they also approve the wedding plans for the beautiful Olympia.

MASKED BALL

Rita Johnstone Comedy-Drama File No. 10207

PREPARING to go to their apartment, at the end of a hard day, Mildred Dunscombe and her friend Florence Britnell, two saleswomen in a large Canadian department store are stopped by Arthur Rolfe and Edgar Winters, floormen in the same concern. They ask the girls if they may take them to dinner, but are refused, courteously. As they continue on their way, Mildred remarks that she would love to go to a nice summer resort and meet a different class of people, if only for a week. Florence agrees, and they decide to spend their vacation at the exclusive Bigwin Inn, in Ontario. Full of the spirit of adventure, they purchase a few smart dresses, make their reservation, and take the train. After they are conducted to their rooms, the maid, Hannah, tells them there is to be a masked ball the next evening. Dressing carefully for dinner, the girls are greeted in the hall by Clare Brookes, the receptionist, who introduces them to Dr. and Mrs. Ramsey Jones, Dr. Ernest Malcom and Mr. Harold Bamford, a barrister. After exchanging a few pleasantries, Ernest and Harold invite the girls to dance, but they refuse, pleading fatigue, promising, however, to be present at the masked ball.

The next morning, all six meet; Dr. and Mrs. Jones excuse themselves, but the others decide to have a swim, the two men instructing the girls, who are inexperienced in the water. All four spend a happy afternoon canoeing together. Attired in the lovely costumes of Marie Antoinette's day, the girls appear at the ball. Malcolm draws Mildred aside, and, taking her to a little balcony, tells her he loves her, but at that moment a group of Indians in costume enter the ball-room, uttering war-whoops. Excusing himself, Malcolm goes to see who they are. The manager of the inn is told by their leader that they are Indian students at a neighboring hotel who wished to join in the festivities; whereupon they are allowed to stay . While Malcolm is gone, Edgar Winters, who has followed the girls to the hotel, confronts Mildred. When she refuses to dance with him, he says he will tell her friends what she is. Malcolm over-hears this conversation, and interprets it to mean that she is Edgar's sweetheart, although all that he implies is that he will disclose her occupation. In their room, Malcolm confesses to his friend, Harold, that he has fallen in love with Mildred, but he found her with another man, who appeared to be her fiance or husband. Her Harold, in turns admits that he loves Florence, but when he asked her to be his wife, she replied that the difference in their social stations was too great, and as he had been a poor boy, he supposed that was what she held against him.

Both girls, weeping, confess that they are hopelessly in love outside their social strata, and must return to the department store. Packing their things, they prepare to leave in the morning. Harold and Malcolm are in the billiard room together when Edgar encounters them, and tells them their friends are shop-girls. Pushing him aside they seach for Mildred and Florence, and over-take them just as they are leaving. With many assurances that their social position is of no importance, if only they will say "yes," the four joyfully celebrate their double engagement.

RACE HORSE

Loverne M. Compton Comedy-Drama File No. 10163

EVER since childhood Walter has been in love with Audrey and more than once her jealousy has tried his temper sorely. Now he is in receipt of a letter from his eccentric Aunt Hattie who tells him she is sending Marigold to him, since she is about to die. Aunt Hattie's letter explains that she has been devoted to Marigold since the latter was a year old and although somewhat timid, Marigold is a beauty. Audrey coming along in her jaunty little roadster urges Walter to jump in and as they ride she questions him about the letter he is holding. He turns it over to her and her eyes darken as she reads that Marigold is arriving Saturday on the 7:15. Walter is perplexed but regards the whole affair as a joke while Audrey, jealousy aroused, fancies that Walter is looking forward to the coming of his aunt's beautiful ward with too much zest and sulks until the pair quarrel.

Furiously, Walter returns home and finds that his mother expects Lila, daughter of an old school friend, who has recently been married and is, during her husband's brief business trip abroad, coming to stay with Walter's mother. "Women, women," Walter groans, and his mother, learning the circumstances, sympathizes with the youngsters but asserts with some vehemence that Audrey had better get over her jealousy before their marriage. On Saturday evening, Walter dresses in his best clothes and goes to the station to meet Marigold. To his astonishment he learns that Marigold is a throughbred horse. Excitedly he calls up Audrey and tries to explain to her, but as soon as he mentions Marigold, she storms that she doesn't want to hear anything about the other woman, and hangs up. Walter spends a miserable weekend, and when Lila arrives she proves to be a very modern young lady with an excellent sense of humor. Discovering Walter in the throes of puppy love, she comforts him breezily, and assures him that if Audrey is so jealous it's a good sign that she loves him, and if she loves him she'll come to her senses soon enough. Feeling brighter, Walter shows Lila the town, and Audrey seeing them together, weeps. Walter is about to run after her, but Lila stays him, telling him to wait until Audrey has had her lesson.

However, Marigold becomes a genuine problem to Walter who has no suitable accommodations for a horse and Lila, laughing at his dismayed attitude, shows him a clipping about a derby and asks why he doesn't enter his horse. Accordingly Walter makes his plans. Audrey, meanwhile has spent a miserable few days and when she reads that Walter is entering a horse named Marigold in race, she is overcome with curiosity and attends. She sees Walter and Lila at the paddock, but downhearted as she is, she bets upon her lover's animal. When Walter sees her, she is jumping up and down shouting, 'Come on, Marigold," and as Marigold leads on to victory, Walter and Lila join Audrey, and as she reminiscently wishes them luck, Lila explains that she must hurry to meet her husband's boat, and so leaves the two young people together for explanations and kisses.

ALLEGIANCE

William Diener Drama File No. 10259

EVER since the first Reneid came to America from Alsace Lorraine in 1683, members of that stout hearted family have served their country faithfully. Through the years of the American Revolution, the Civil War, the pioneering of the great West, they have been in the front line and now Richard, youngest of the Reneids is born during the World War. Growing to maturity during the years of disarmament and international dissension over war debts and disarmament, the youngster takes an active interest in political economy from the first and is the youngest representative elected to the House. Arriving in Washington he is appalled at the continued scrapping of United States defense resources at the dictation of the other nations, but when he rises on the floor of the House and passionately calls upon his country to save herself from destruction, he is shouted down by pacifists, among them Catherine Kims, like himself a product of the earliest settlers. Actively interested in politics, the lovely Catherine, representative from another state, meets Richard's statements in the House of Representatives, and speaking as the representative of the women of America and all those who like herself have lost a father and an older brother in the World War, she pleads for her nation to set the paee in laying down its arms. Rarely do the statesmen whe represent us in Washington allow themselves to be swayed by oratory, but the combination of Catherine's vibrant young beauty and her impassioned speech has its effects upon the doddering politicians and Richard's constituents are rapidly outnumbered. Outside, Richard corners Catherine and begs her to listen to reason. Other nations are increasing armaments while we quixotically lay down arms and shout, "Peace and Good Will." In her turn Catherine argues for peace and the two young people find themselves falling in love. On every other score they are in harmony, but always when they are about to speak their love, national issues make them fly at each other. At last Richard begs Catherine to give up politios and become his wife but she scorns him claiming he thinks he can silence her politically by marriage and they quarrel violently. At the next election, Richard is defeated. Catherine begs him to climb on the band wagon of universal peace, but Richard, despairing for his country retires to the northwest and outfits a secret laboratory where the greatest chemists of the country may experiment with explosives and death rays.

Meanwhile the other nations mobilize against the weakened United States. Horror reigns as foreign forces demolish our greatest cities. When her state is attaoked, Catherine returns to care for the wounded while daily reports come in of barbarous attacks upon defenseless women. Meanwhile Richard, recruiting an army of the countless unemployed, breasts the foe, armed with an all-powerful death ray which destroys the air forces of the invaders. America rallies, disperses the foe, and Richard leads his forces to Europe, pauses only to kidnap the heads of each country, forcibly bring them to Washington, and there dictates a treaty whose success is insured by the invinoible and dangerous army of the United States. This time there is a promise of cessation of war, and hailed as the great hero, Richard returns to find Catherine at last willing to give up politics and leave the ruling of the nation to the man she loves.

LUCKY LOSSES

Joe A. White Drama File No. 10212

ALTHOUGH graduated from an Engineering school with honors, Frank Packard's weakness for gambling and drink made his father, a millionaire, limit him to a small allowance. Rebelling against his limited spending money, Frank would boast to Hazel Dix, daughter of a contractor, that as soon as he got some money they could be married. Then Mr. Packard took ill. Calling Frank to him he informed him he was willing his fortune to his son, but begged the boy to cut out the fast company he had been keeping. Regarding his father's warnings of fair weather friends who would desert him when they had milched him of his fortune, as the prattling of a very ill old man, Frank mourned his father's death briefly, then began an orgy of fast living. Purchasing a yacht he invited his friends for a long trip and one night, reeling from the effects of too much champagne, he seized Hazel in his arms and kissing her wildly asked why she wouldn't marry him. Hazel detached herself from Frank's arms, and informed him he was throwing aside a promising talent for engineering, a fine body, and a good mind on drink and dissipation, and unless he was willing to give up all this, she waved toward the drunken hilarious couples, she was breaking her engagement. Angered at what he termed her moral zeal, Frank told her he wouldn't give up his friends for anybody, even her. In her cabin Hazel wept because she loved Frank and was giving him up, but when the yacht landed they parted.

There followed two years of riotous living for Frank. Years that saw his investments, careless at best, wiped out by the declining stock market, and the rest of his fortune soon followed in drink and gambling. At length, faced with a call from his brokers for more margin, Frank, his bank account exhausted, appealed to his friends. But one by one they turned him down until discouraged he realized he was broke, friendless; his father and Hazel had been right. Discouraged, he wandered down toward the river, scarcely conscious of the automobile horn that honked from the street. At last, looking up he saw Hazel. "Frank," she called. Hesitating, he accepted her invitation to climb in, afraid to meet her clear young eyes. But after an it wasn't contempt she was regarding him with, it was appeal. Her father too was in dire straits. He had contracted for an engineering project and unless he could meet the terms, he would be lost. Setting his shoulders, Frank agreed to try to help. For days and nights he worked unceasingly. It wasn't only Hazel's father's fortune that was in the balance, but Frank's self respect and in the days that followed, he accomplished what seemed impossible, completing the construction on time. The money earned, sufficed to save his stocks, and now, part of his fortune salvaged, Frank dared to ask Hazel to marry him. Rejoicing in her acceptance, he found his former friends, now that he had money again, ready to welcome him back, but Frank had shut them out of his life, and with Hazel left for their honeymoon.

TO THE GIRL BABY

Jack Ordwin Short Subject File No. 10277

ENCOMPASSING all the hopes, the struggles, and joys of parenthood, this story opens with a bride and groom laughingly fleeing down the Church steps in a shower of rice. The scene changes. Now they are in the little cottage of their dreams, working hard but happy in the knowledge that they have each other. A year passes and to them is born a wisp of a baby girl. Now begins a life of devotion to their little one. Where before there always was money for a movie, a soda, a new suit, now the money is carfully set aside to buy ribbons and tiny shoes and dresses for the littlest one. When Jim comes home, weary from long hard hours at the office, he finds dinner not yet done because baby has been cross and Janet has had to give her attention to her, and when, head splitting from unsolved problems, Jim and Janet finally retire, it is to be awakened at two in the morning when little Glory has the colic. At the office, Jim hangs his head sheepishly as his fellow workers tease him about the patches that are beginning to show in his clothes, and urge him to come out with them for one good time like they used to have before he was married, but Jim, thinking of Janet and Glory shakes his head, and when he returns home there is little Glory to run to meet him with a cry of, "Daddy!" and as he swings her up into his arms, he walks proudly into his house where Janet awaits him with her gentle kiss of welcome. The leaves of the calendar drop off faster and faster. Jim's familiar path to his home. It is a grown up Glory step is a little less jaunty as he comes up the who comes down to the supper table radiant in a frock, and as she dances over to kiss her Dad's forehead lightly, she toys with her food until oustide the honking of an automobile horn causes her to jump up, her supper untouched, and with cry, of "Darlings, you won't mind if I go now," she is lilting down the steps and being tucked in the front seat besides together before their hearth. Hours pass. It is two a shining eyed young man. Jim and Janet sit fondly when Glory comes in to find her worried parents waiting up for her. The next day a shy but resolute Johnny comes to receive the blessing of Glory's people, and as Jim protests, "But she's so young. We can't give her away," he reminds them that it was just so that Jim took Janet from her people, and with a sigh of surrender, Jim gives his little girl up. The next few weeks are a whirl of preparations and at last the day comes when dazedly he walks down a Church aisle, and while the organ swells he gives his Glory to another man to "love, honor, and obey." After the last guest has gone, Jim puts his arms around Janet's shoulders and in the again the leaves drop from the calendar, and Glory house, intolerably lonely now, they weep a little. But and Johnny come to visit a gray haired pair and as the little grandchildren play in the garden where their mother grew up to womanhood, Janet and Jim's eyes meet across the rich and happy years.

HOME WALLS

Beulah Hill Drama File No. 10275

ALL her life little Nina was to remember the beating her mother gave her when she refused to deliver a note to one of her mother's lovers. But with the realization that her daughter was old enough to realize what was going on, Mrs. Lake became a little more discreet in her affairs. Then one night at a gay party, sitting next to a handsome younger man, Mrs. Lake became giddy from the effects of too many cocktails. Jim Walton, himself not too sober, took her home and when she staggered up the stairs, he laughingly helped her inside. But when her lips clung to his, he remained on. The next morning, leaving, he looked somewhat abashed as the grey eyes of Grace Lake's daughter regarded him gravely. "I didn't know," he explained to Grace when she perched on the edge of his chair in his private office a few days later, and when he went on to warn her how she might be endangering the happiness of the child forever, Grace, tongue in cheek, played the role of the repentant Magdalene, unable to give up her wicked life because of economic necessity. Touched by her trembling lips, Jim promised to help her, and when some weeks later, Grace confided wistfully that she was going to have his child Walton, thinking of the little girl with the grey eyes beautiful in spite of her years. For a while Grace who would suffer, agreed at last to marry Grace, still regarded her husband fondly while he brought home knick knacks each night for their house and insisted that Nina be sent to an exclusive school, but after the baby Samuel was born, Grace began to tire of domesticity and within a short time was once again going to gay parties and sitting next to handsome younger men, drinking too many cocktails. Then, one night, after Jim had remonstrated, Grace ran off with another man. At her finishing school Nina was exposed to the contempt of her snobbish classmates and at last she returned home. She found Jim, head bowed in his hands, in the library and as she comher and he said, "They made it hard for you at forted him for Grace's desertion, his eyes raised to school?" She assured him it was nothing and he added sadly, "It was from this I wanted to save you." And staying home, Nina began to care for little Samuel. Together she and Jim played with the youngster, bought wooly dogs for him, and laughed over his antics until a bond grew up between them that began to frighten them. Once Nina fancied she saw lost her in traffio. Jim shuddered a little when Nina her mother ride by in a taxi, but giving chase she told him, and Nina hated herself for realizing her mother was old, worn, while Jim was not many years older than she. Then one night a telegram lovers when she tried to interfere with his other arrived. Grace had been shot by the last of her affairs. At the hospital Nina and Jim hovered over the pain-wrecked body of the once beautiful Grace, and when at last they brought her home, she would never be able to move her legs again. But it was Grace's note, after she had committed suicide, that told Nina and Jim what they themselves had never dared admit, that they loved each other. Grace, old, disillusioned had seen it, and her last note begged them to get married and bring up little Samuel as their child.

CIVIL MARRIAGE

Augusta E. Tuttle Drama File No. 10292

IN the excitement of packing to go to America, it had not occurred to Paul Sand that his daughter Lucie would so far defy his wishes as to have the legal notice of her marriage to Pierre Gervais posted. today, Paul rushed furiously to the City Hall and Now, learning that the civil marriage was to place seeing Lucie and Pierre standing together, struck the boy a heavy blow on the head, explained to the crowd that the fellow had insulted his daughter, and rushed the protesting Lucie into a taxi . Hurrying his plans, Paul proceeded immediately with his wife and daughter to Havre and when Lucie insisted hysterically that she was married to Pierre, her father scoffed and demanded a marriage certificate for proof. All the way across the ocean Lucie was too ill to think and her mother dared not risk her husband's anger by openly sympathizing. At Ellis Island the Sands were met by Paul's friend Jean Silvestre who to Lucie. The jabbering of an alien language, the brought them to his home. Everything was strange caring for the Silvestre's twin infants and two older children while Mrs. Silvestre took her friends about. Then an excursion boat sank and among the numberless victims were Lucie's mother and father and Jean's wife. In her agony, utterly alone, Lucie brooded over Pierre Gervais. He had said if she left France he would follow. Had her father's blow killed him? Had he found another girl? Jean finding her dully weeping, put his arm about her shoulder and promised to take care of her. When matter-of-factly he explained his children needed someone to take care of them, Lucie haltingly told him of Pierre, but while her four step-children screamed lustily, Lucie Jean shrugged. This was America. In the hot flat, listened uncomplainingly to Jean's eternal comparisons with his former wife who could so well manage the squirming children that were Jean's pride and joy. And when her own baby was born, Lucie felt at last she would have someone of her own again to love, but in a few days the tiny wailing child gave up the struggle to stay alive, and Jean's silent look somewhat blamed the frail Lucie. How could Lucie know that all this while Pierre, having followed her to America was exhausting his resources in a futile search for her and was even now working at the pier, hopefully searching every face. But Fate is whimsical, and Jean decide, at last, to return to France. It was at the dock that Lucie stumbled against piled luggage and as a workman helped her "Lucie!" "Come Lucie," said Jean, and dully she to her feet they stared at each other. "Pierre!" her but, unable to go on, as the ship cleared the hurried after her husband. Stunned Pierre watched dock, Lucie leaped overboard. Pierre watching, saw Jean wring his hands, saw the bubbles, and dived in. Later, with a police officer and a priest standing by, Lucie explained between sobs she was married to Jean, but as Pierre protested she couldn't be, she was his wife, and produced evidence, the Priest interceded. To-morrow he said, Lucie and Pierre should be rightly married at the altar. Everything should be explained to Jean, Impulsively Lucie's hands grasped for Pierre's and the Priest's, and a great Peace flooded her soul.

But the revolver he has surreptitiously obtained explodes prematurely and Harry is killed. In her griel, Marcelle blames herself for not having been with the boy constantly, but Gustave investigates and discovers that the great-grandfather of the boy had died in England on the gallows, a convicted murderer, and the strain had cropped up in the boy. Finally, moreover, Marcelle discovers that she is at last to have a child of her own, and surrounded by Gustave and her grandmother, Marcelle holds her own child close. This son shall bring them happiness.

THE HAND IN THE MIRROR

David E. Brown Drama File No. 10164

BLACKMAIL, thought James Huxley, was the most profitable business. Accordingly he had gone into it with spirit and ruthlessness that soon made his bank account swell. His victims rarely informed the police and when they did it was not easy to prove a case against him. Occasionally desperate souls had dared to shoot him but Huxley was handy with a gun himself and in every case but one he had managed to disarm his victim and convince them of the folly of attempting violence. Once, however, he had not been quick enough and had received a wound in his left hand. Luckily he had been able to stop his opponent before any further damage could be done him. The affair had come before the police. Huxley had pleaded self defence and without his victim to answer back he had been released. Afterwards he deemed it advisable to leave the neighborhood.

In London he organized anew. His agents were in many aristocratic houses working as valets and lady's maids. They were amply remunerated for their services and none of them knew for whom they were working. He could long ago have retired from business but outside his adventurous career life held no interests for him, until the day he met Leona Stanway, pretty actress. Immediately he had become attracted to her and the orchids he sent her gained him entree to her dressing room. When he urged her to be his mistress, however, she laughed at his assurance that he could have anything he wanted. Furious with her and with himself, Huxley had gone home and as he reached his door a sudden weakness made him stagger. The butler helped him in and called a doctor who informed him tactfully that it was his heart and he had better slow up in his business. The frequency of these attacks of late, helped Huxley to make an important decision. Before the performance that night, he appeared in Leona's dressing room and with supreme effrontery informed her he was doing her the honor of asking her to be his wife. She laughed mockingly and told him if he read the papers that night he would read of her engagement to Lord Kircaldie, whom she happened to love. Huxley returned home. His agents were rounded up and in a few weeks Miss Stanway received a summons to appear at the office of James Huxley about some imprudent letters she had written once.

Grimly Huxley looked in the large mirror above his desk as Leona entered. She was pale he noticed in a pleased fashion. "I want a thousand pounds for the letters," he said. She gasped, "Where would I get it?" "There are means that should suggest themselves to a very attractive young lady." Tears darted to her eyes. Huxley looked over his papers, glanced in the mirror and saw that she realized the ruse wouldn't move him. She opened her bag, extracted a small automatic. A vertigo seized Huxley. He staggered to his feet, whipped out his gun and fired. "He slumped on the floor dead. When the police came, Leona explained he seemed to have gone completely mad, took out a gun and fired at the mirror. She had been holding a compact shaped like an automatic. It was a lucky thing he fired at her mirrored reflection. The shock to him had induced heart failure. Alone, Leona applied a match to some imprudent letters she had removed from Huxley's desk. A moment later Lord Kircaldie rushed in and Leona sighed happily in his arms.

BECAUSE she loved Terry Gorman so, Charlotte gave up a fine secretarial position to get married. From the first Terry and Charlotte found their marriage beset with economic difficulties and as the children, Babs, Gene, and now Wynne arrived, the situation became more acute. Then Charlotte met Janet, who had worked with her. Janet, married to a man of wealth, sighted lugubriously over Charlotte's wan look and insisted that she and Terry come up to one of their parties. It was a tired and discouraged Terry who came home that night, but Charlotte begged him to put aside his worries just once and take her to Janet's party, and putting his arms about his wife's slim shoulders, Terry blamed himself for making her so unhappy. At the party Charlotte, radiant in a made over dress abandoned herself to gaiety and Terry's eyes lit wistfully as he saw how lovely she looked dancing with Donald Winton, suave young guest. But in the days that followed, while Terry tried in vain to salvage his business from his creditors, Charlotte spent more and more time with Janet's crowd, needing more clothes than Terry could afford, when one night, at a party, Donald asked Charlotte why she was so glum, she explained that he husband's business had been taken away from him and they were on the rocks. It was Donald who offered Terry a job importing contraband liquor. Terry refused, but as Donald held out the promise of rich returns, explained that everyone was doing it, and wound up by telling Terry he had no right to keep a girl like Charlotte in rags, Terry weakened. That night when Wynne cried and Charlotte stormed her husband wasn't even able to provide properly for his children, Terry accepted a job with Donald. Although he hated the work, Terry soon was making money enough to give Charlotte the clothes she craved, present the children with a collie they adored, and as Charlotte hugged him, Terry tried to still the protesting voice of his conscience. Meanwhile, Donald laid steady seige to Charlotte's heart and arranged to send Terry to Canada to personally bring in a shipment so that the field could be cleared for him. Charlotte left alone, succumbed to Donald's telephoned invitation to supper, and when he suggested a drink in his apartment, with a new bravado born of their reckless living she accepted.

Meanwhile the children at home alone cried for their mother and Babs maternally tucked in the two younger ones and fell asleep watching over them. It was the dog that first smelled fire. Barking furiously he awoke Babs who dragged Wynne to the street and running back for Gene was overcome with smoke. Charlotte, remorsefluly returning saw the fire, ran into the burning house and carried Babs to safety, but Gene and the faithful dog who tried to save him perished. Meanwhile, Terry was caught and Charlotte recovering from her burns refused Donald's offer to provide for her, and as Terry was led to his cell, she sobbed her promised to wait for him so that upon his release they and the children might yet find happiness.

THE NATURAL

WHEN the football coach of State University, Wallace Wade walks off the field, the president reconsiders and permits him to grant athletic scholarships. Immediately Wade begins scouting and finds Tommy Webb, a fine looking boy working on an ice route. Playing on the frosh team, Webb show fine promise but on the campus is impervious to the charms of the co-eds. Fay Roulding, pretty and wealthy, accepts a bet to get Webb and is humiliated by his indifference. That winter Webb turns to journalism on a local paper, and returns in the fall to run a smashing interference for his pal Buck Kilroy, who gets most of the glory. But Kilroy turns his ankle and the coach despairs as they lose a big game. In the game with Ohio, Webb is so furious that the players he runs interference for fail to keep behind him, that, losing his head, he tears the ball away and runs for the touchdown. Although they lose the kick and the game 14-13, Wade is jubilant at finding a man who can kick as well as block and Webb is moved into the backfield. The closing game of the season, Webb and Kilroy run wild together and are both accorded All-State honors. By this time Webb's indifference to women is the talk of the campus, and then, dragged to a prom, Webb meets Virginia Rusk, an off-campus girl and falls hard. Webb loses all interest in everything else until Virginia cuts their dates down to one a week and watches him practice. That season they are in line for the Tournament of Roses, and it is a blow to the entire campus when Webb accepts the sport editorship of the local paper, quits college and marries Virginia. Fay Rouling comes in for her share of riding at the sorority house and she determines to show them. Pretending frienship for Virginia, Fay manages "innocently" to bring Virginia on the scene when Tommy "seems" to be in a compromising situation. Like a thorough-bred Virginia passes off the incident, but Fay manages to widen the breach by taking Virginia around and when football season comes around, Virginia taunted by the hang dog expression on Tommy's face, flares up and tells him to go back, she doesn't care. They argue irrationally, and like wildfire the news spreads that Tommy Webb is coming back. Running and blocking like a fury, Tommy is a sensation. But it wears off. He misses Virginia. His game slumps. State loses to Army and their Rose-Bowl chances are beaten. But Army loses to Pitt in a sensational upset and State has its chance in the game with Pitt. Realizing where the rub is, the coach fakes a telegram to Tommy from Virginia wishing him luck and Tommy plays like a superhuman, winning the game practically singlehanded. He is named captain of the All-American with Kilroy placed as fullback. The team is wild with joy as they leave for the Rose Bowl Tournament. But Tommy has discovered the trick and the heart has gone out of him. Dully he awaits the game.

Meanwhile Virginia, aching for Tommy comes to the game. She is surprised to see Fay and is coming up to her, when she hears Fay boast loudly that she is to be the second Mrs. Webb. Roused, Virginia watches restlessly, as State is taking a merciless licking, due to Tommy's half-hearted performance and at last runs to the coach and begs for a few words with Tommy. Two minutes later, a new Tommy runs out on the field for the grandest work of his career. Suddenly they rushed him. Down he went with a wrenched knee, but Kilroy fired by Webb's performence whipped the team, "FOR WEBB!" "A natural!" the crowds roared and in the dressing room, while the surgeon worked on his knee, Tommy held Virginia for a long kiss, "a natural!"

And several months later, another "natural" is being celebrated, with Tommy, Jr. touted as a coming lineman.

LOVERS AT DAWN

Sue Menges Drama File No. 10370

AUTHOR of a recent book lampooning women, Raymond Griswald finds himself surrounded by chattering girls at a literary tea. Dismayed he tries to elude them as they beg for his autograph and fire questions at him, and across the room he sees a woman of thirty smile in amusement at his desperation. At last he manages to break away and returning to his own room he indignantly writes several pages of his new novel When his publisher calls to tell him of another publicity tea he has arranged, Raymond indignantly refuses to be paraded before admiring women.

Some days later at his club, Raymond meets again John Osbourne an old friend and their relations are cordial until John asks whatever became of Laura, that girl whom Raymond was so fond of. Raymond's face becomes drawn and in a scarcely audible voice he replies she married and went to Paris to live. John realizes immediately he has made a blunder and he tries to cover it up by speaking of other things. It is a long time before Raymond becomes his old self again but before they leave John has managed to exact a promise that Raymond will come to his apartment for dinner. Friday evening Raymond arrives and John begs forgiveness for not having told Raymond he had a wife—smiling as he adds he was afraid Raymond wouldn't come if he knew. Somewhat to his surprise, Raymond finds John's wife. Rose a charming woman, and gradually the feeling of strain is eliminated. At John's home Raymond meets Elizabeth Brady, the woman he noticed across the room at the literary tea. They smile at the memory of that afternoon and soon they are conversing easily together. With the publication of his new book, an even greater success than the last, Raymond grows more and more impatient with the empty-headed women who flock about him. Only in Elizabeth's company does he feel at peace, and the Osbournes are always present. Then one day Rose suggests a picnic and at the last moment is unable to come. Rather than disappoint Elizabeth who has prepared lunch, Raymond goes alone with her. In a daisy field they set down their lunch cloth and that afternoon they are as two children. Raymond watches Elizabeth's poise, her graciousness, and as he leans back against a tree they discuss their mutual literary interests. Back in his own room, however, Raymond paces the floor disturbed by the memory of Elizabeth's radiant face above the armful of daisies, and once again he takes from his drawer the letter that had made him bitter against all women, the letter from Laura, whom he had loved desperately, telling him she had eloped to Paris with a wealthier man. He He clenches his fists as he remembers the vow he made never to love another woman.

Suddenly he climbs into his car, determined to get away, alone to think. Night falls and his car crashes. For days he is delirious. Raymond calls constantly for Elizabeth and the doctor finding her address in Raymond's book, sends for her. Elizabeth enters, and through her tears calls out playfully, "Raymond, Raymond." Through his fever, Raymond smiles faintly. "A miracle," the doctor exclaims as Raymond starts to improve, and when he leaves them alone, "I love you," Raymond whispers, and Elizabeth bends for his kiss. The morning light comes through the window.

EASY MARK

Cecil Herbert Drama File No. 10304

COMING out of a restaurant, Bill Downs catches a glimpse of his fiancee riding by in a car with another man. Unhappily he proceeds to her house but Doris, having seen him, has prepared an alibi and she disarms him by her story of having met a friend who gave her a lift home. Relieved, Bill returns home, but when the next night he gullibly accepts Doris' excuse that she cannot see him because she has a headache, he goes to the library to draw a book. Emmy Hubbard, the pretty librarian, mounts the ladder to get the book he wants, but slips and if not for Bill's aid, would have had a nasty fall. Bill catches her, but she is shaken up a bit, and he gets a glass of water for her. Emmy flushes at the trouble she has caused, and Bill notices how lovely she is when she blushes. On his way home, he is held up and at the point of a gun forced into a car and driven by masked men to a shack on the outskirts of the city. Bill laughs as he is ordered to sign a note asking his father to pay $10,000 to a man who will meet him at the corner of Brige and Terrence Streets. But his kidnappers soon convince him that they mean what the note says. If the money is not paid or if the wealthy Downs Senior communicates with the police, they will kill Bill.

On her way home from work that evening, Emmy sees Peter Flynn, whom she recognizes as an underworld character, whose picture was recently in the paper as wanted by the police, drop a note in the Down's mail box and flee down the street. She walks on with the book Bill has forgotten, but after supper that night, she decides to deliver it in person.

Meanwhile, Doris, who is playing Bill as an easy mark, sees her brother come in furtively. She stops him and he confesses desperately that he has gambled and lost heavily and has been offered an alternative of assisting in the kidnapping of Bill Downs or being bumped off. The boy puts a gun and is about to shoot himself, when Doris smiles crookedly, tells him she's never loved Bill anyway, and that this is a swell opportunity to doublecross the gang and get the money.

Meanwhile, Emmy is admitted by Bill's father who is summoned to the telephone. She sees a picture of Bill on a table, and goes to see it, only to read the ransom note. She gasps and when Downs comes back she tells him she recognized Peter Flynn. It is she who induces the distracted Downs to take the police chief into his confidence. Downs delivers the money to Doris' brother and walks rapidly on as directed. Meanwhile, Doris parks in the road and when the car her brother is riding in comes up, asks for help for her stalled motor. Two men get out to help, and she dashes into the car and drives off with her brother. The outwitted gangsters shoot at the tires, capture the doublecrossing pair and take them to the shack where Bill is being held. However, Emmy and the police follow, capture the gang and Emmy unbinds Bill. The next day Bill calls at the library for a book. Emmy starts up the ladder, but Bill lifts her and lowers her in his arms for their first kiss, the beginning of a lasting love.

PHANTOM HOUSE

John Mason, Jr. Drama File No. 10302

MONEY, thought Lee Staunton, was only scorned by those who had enough. For himself, he felt he would do anything in the world to be able to scrape enough money together to marry Harriet. Poor kid! All day long she worked in an office for a pittance and he couldn't get a job that would pay sufficient to be able to support her. Then Harriet suddenly was stricken with appendicitis. Her employer who only awaited an excuse, fired her, claiming he could afford only to have well girls around. Bravely Harriet tried to smile through the pain that caused beads of perspiration to stand out on her brow, but an operation would cost money, and she didn't have any. And Lee couldn't, even after he had pawned his coat get enough for her. Then, in desperation, he applied to the traveling circus for work and when he told them he would do anything, just as long as he'd get paid for it, they gave him a job feeding the animals. To Lee, who winced at the sounds of growling and whining, the work was torturous, but Harriet could have the operation she needed so badly, and when the circus traveled to another town, Lee went with it, so Harriet could have decent food at the hospital. Bewildered by the roustabout life, Lee helped pitch the tents, feed the animals, and wash the cages. Then one night some of the animals mysteriously disappeared. Lee swore that he had locked the cages, but he was fired ruthlessly and in a strange town, now, he was worse off than before. Now he wasn't even near Harriet. The circus people posted a reward for the animals, dead or alive, and moved on, leaving the little town to worry for several days that a lion would pop up in their back yard or a bear in the cellar. Hungry, desperate, Lee overheard a drunk in the hotel lobby wave a bill in the air and proclaim he would give it to anyone who would spend a night in the "haunted house" down the road. Quietly Lee came forward and that night, in a terrific storm, an escort of the heaviest drinkers in town pointed out a desolate house to him and warned him he must stay until morning, and Heaven help him. As Lee walked up the porch, a rotten board gave way and his foot pushed through. Yanking it out he turned the knob and entered the pitch black house. A rat scampered across his feet and he shuddered. Something white loomed ahead. With fast beating heart he clutched it but it was only a sheet. Braver now, he started at the mournful sound of a screech owl. It was bitterly cold and he longed for matches. Suddenly there was a piercing scream from downstairs. His hair stood on end. A crash of glass was followed by a strong draft that whipped his hat off his head. Suddenly a panting sound aquainted him with the fact that he was not alone. In the doorway was a creature whose eyes gleamed like fire. His hand reached back and grabbed a bookend and as the thing leaped at him he crashed it into the gleaming eyes and stumbled into a closet. At last morning dawned. Cautiously opening the closet he saw on the floor the circus partner, dead. Searching the house he found the dissected remains of the other animals. A madman had let the house and was carrying on gruesome animal experiments. Through Lee he was captured. Lee got a reward for each of the animals, got the fifty dollars from the now sobered drunks, and returned to Harriet. With the money they were able to open a business of their own and at last, get married.

PASSING FANCY

Frances M. Moritz Drama File No. 10306

HASTENING home through the rain, Ruby Lane is offered a ride by a young man. She hesitates, but as the downpour increases, accepts. Her chauffeur introduces himself as Guy Waters, and invites her to have dinner with him, which she refuses, but grants him permission to call the next evening. As she is lonely and unemployed, and he is kind to her, she accompanies him to the home of friends, where they play bridge. On the way back, he persuades her to accept twenty dollars when she finally confesses that she has very little money. Advising her that he only wishes to be her friend, Guy suggests that they may be able to do business together, and trusting his honest, boyish face, she agrees. He tells her that there is a great deal of money in the operation of a massage parlor, and they decide to pool their resources, rent an apartment, and go into the business. Signing the lease as man and wife, to avoid suspicion, they select their site and place an advertisement in the paper. Attracted by Ruby's youth and beauty, they have many customers, and build up a flourishing clientele, but one day when Ruby is alone in the parlor a patient attempts to attack her. Guy returns, and quickly throws him to the floor; he leaves, threatening to bring about their arrest, and, as they have no license, they decide to go to Montreal.

Their business is running smoothly here when a woman calls at the apartment, and introduces herself to Ruby as Mrs. Waters, Guy's wife, and the mother of his two girls. Confronting them, he admits this is true. Mrs. Waters tells Ruby that he has opened these massage parlors with girls before, but that each one has proved to be only a passing fancy, and that she has always traced him through advertisements in the paper, and brought him back. Unwilling to give him up, Ruby accompanies Guy to Washington, D. C, where they apply for a license for their business, and he takes out a patent on a new airplane model on which he has been working. Mrs. Waters has the two arrested, but the girl tells Jack Kramer, the sympathetic judge presiding at the trial, that her relations with Guy have been purely of a business nature, and the case is dropped. Jack wishes to help Ruby, and advances her money to go to her sister in Pittsburgh.

Months pass, with no word from Guy, but Ruby is unable to think of anyone else, and he is constantly reminded of her. Jack comes to Pittsburgh on his vacation to visit Ruby, and takes her to a masquerade ball, which she attends, disguised as a boy. Someone dressed in a very feminine costume dances with her, and, unmasking, proves to be Guy. Taking her alone in the garden, he tells her that his two girls were killed in an accident, and his wife was so overcome by this tragedy, he dared not leave her. He was forced to send her to a sanitarium because of temporary insanity, and here she died. His airplane model had been purchased by a leading company, but his fortune meant nothing to him, as he feared Ruby no longer cared for him. Assuring him that she does care, Ruby and Guy drive away together, at last sure of their love.

GIRLS WANTED

Mrs. A. M. Severt Drama File No. 10309

WEARILY tramping the streets of Chicago in search of work, Gladys sees a sign: "Girls Wanted—Seven Dollars a Week and Room and Board," in the window of a restaurant on Twelfth Street, and enters. She finds the cafe deserted, its cheap, wooden tables untidily set with tin knives and forks, and paper napkins. Someone whistles, and, turning, the girls sees a middle aged man, wearing a white apron, looking at her, and motioning to her, but she remains at the door until he advances, then states her desire to fill the position. He agrees to give her a trial, and when the four-thirty whistle of a nearby factory blows, tells her to go behind the counter and serve the employees, who soon come pouring into the restaurant. Hastily, she fills their orders, ignoring personal remarks which many of the customers direct at her, but one of them, a young man, hands her a note which warns the girl that she is in a dangerous place. When her duties are finished, Gladys steps outside to wait for her employer, and the young man approaches her, introducing himself as Jack Nugent, and advising her to quit her present position as it is unsafe, but she tells him that will be impossible, as she has no money, and refuses his offer of a loan.

Conducting her through the streets of this drab district, the girl's employer takes her to a shabby, old-fashioned house, a few blocks away, and presents her to Mrs. Risdale, the landlady. She is conducted to a poorly furnished room upstairs, and notices a large, blond woman with a coarse expression, standing in the doorway across the hall, scantily clad. Mrs. Risdale and the woman exchange nods as they leave Gladys. The girl sinks wearily to sleep, and dreams of a ballroom, filled with rough men, who are annoying her. She is awakened from this nightmare by a muffled cry, coming from her closet, and opening the door, she finds the floor has been cut away, and a girl is lying, bound, several feet below. Making a rope of blankets, and throwing a knife to the girl, so that she may free herself, Gladys pulls her into her room. The girl states that she is Mary Wilson, and was brought to this place by answering the restaurant advertisement, only to find it was a house dealing in white slavery, and when she refused to play her part with men who came here, she was thrown into this closet, and was soon to be taken across the border. Giving Mary her dress, Gladys wraps a blanket around herself, and the two girls steal down the stairs, past a ballroom identical to the one Gladys pictured in her dream, but before they can reach the second landing Mrs. Risdale and two men see them, and start in pursuit.

Motioning her friend to follow, Gladys slides down the balustrade past them, and they open the front door, but are caught before they can escape further. Jack, who is passing, hears their calls for help, and struggles with the two men, while the girls summon the police. At headquarters the next day, the girls are rewarded and placed in suitable positions in offices, while Jack receives a kiss and permission to call, as his thanks from Gladys.

THE DEMI-GOD

Drake Temple Drama File No. 10321

NO inkling of disaster had troubled John Cartwright, son of the honored bank president, as he danced in the gay throng with Sybil Mason, only child of the millionaire financier. But that night when Sybil had thrown her arms about her father as he sat gnawing his underlip, Geoffrey Mason told her he was over-worked, needed a rest, and asked if she'd come with him immediately to their mountain lodge, to get away from everything and everybody for a few weeks. Sybil remembering her appointment with John hesitated woefully, but at sight of her father's nervousness, she hurriedly wrote a note to John that she had to go away, and signing it with love, was ready in an hour with camp clothes.

Meanwhile John had returned home, rejoicing in the memory of Sybil's kiss and promise to meet him on the morrow. In his own house he found ominous quiet and in the library he stumbled upon the body of his father—a suicide. Stunned he read the note on the desk saying that Cartwright, driven to the wall by the ruthless Mason, had been ruined. He had disposed of his fortune so that his depositors might not suffer losses, but he was unable to go on living. The whole account of Mason's hounding, the indictment against the father of the girl he loved, was there. Frantically John tried to call Sybil but the butler told him she had left town without a message—her father having destroyed her note lest she find him out. Then John's mother, always sickly, died from grief, and John turned into a hollow-eyed maniac. After the sale of his house, the desertion of the woman he loved, John disappeared. In his place a fever-eyed man who gave his name as Shaster, turned up in a real estate office and forced them to give him a trial without salary, on a commission basis. Heart and soul Shaster went into business. High pressure methods made sales for him that gave him remarkable commissions. Everything he touched seemed to turn to gold. Even the stock market trembled as he took a hand. With uncanny fore-sight he predicted the trend of securities and as his capital increased his activites took the form of flooding and draining the market until he could control the movements of stocks. Even governments tottered under his ruthless manipulations. The vice-presidency of his firm, the presidency, all steps to his vaulting ambitions. The name Shaster was one to cause trembling, yet the man himself remained a mystery. A pointed beard added to the illusion of Satanic powers, but Shaster's public appearances were few. Even Geoffrey Mason, ensconced behind his desk learned to fear this illusionary Shaster. Ten phones reported the movement of his securities. Suddenly one reported the market was flooded with Consolidated Oil Ltd. Dully Mason hung up. He had bought every share he could get hold of, trying to check the drop by getting a controlling interest, only to learn that Shaster had held more and had unloaded violently. Geoffrey Mason was ruined. Suddenly he stiffened. A stroke the doctor pronounced. Over-excitement. Sybil with the ruse that she was Shaster's fiancee, gained admittance to his private office. Looking beyond the gun she leveled at him, Shaster cried, "Sybil!" Uncomprehending, Sybil regarded him, puzzled. "I am John Cartright." The gun clattered to the floor. She rushed to him. Feverishly she explained how she hadn't known her father's part in his parents' trouble until she returned from the lodge and then he had disappeared. Shaster was dead. In his place was John Cartwright again, who with Sybil, was to forget the whole bitter past.

WELCOME PRODIGALS

E. A. Eason Drama File No. 10281

EAGER for adventure and excitement, David urges his father to give him his share of the estate, so that he may leave the little Canadian village in which he was born, and seek his fortune in New York. With tears in her eyes, his mother pleads with him not to go, and his father advises against this move, but he is determined, and at last is granted his wish. David bids farewell to his parents, his brother, Leonard, and Rosemary, his sweetheart, telling them he will soon return to them. Alone in the great city, his money soon attracts a group of associates who readily spends his money, and introduce him to the night life of New York. He readily sponsors their various schemes to make money, investing in fraudulent stocks and bonds which they offer him, and lending freely without security, as he believes this people will deal with him in the same fair way that his friends at home employ. David writes glowing letters to his brother, urging him to join him in this exciting life, but Leonard replies that his father needs him to help him manage the farm, and he will remain where he is. Rosemary watches eagerly for his letters, and tries bravely to hold back the tears when they become less and less frequent. One day he is taken to a night club by Frank Pierson, a political ward boss who is spending his money on a campaign for one of his men, and is introduced to Leida, a dancer. He is instantly infatuated with her, and delighted when she agrees to meet him in a speakeasy, the next afternoon. He calls frequently at her apartment, and she becomes his mistress. David writes to Rosemary, telling her that he has met someone else, and in fairness to everyone, they must break their engagement, as he wishes to marry this girl. Finding Rosemary in tears, as she reads the letter in the garden, Leonard tells her that he has always loved her, and she consents to become his wife, although her heart will always belong to David, as she states. Calling upon David at his hotel, Leida tells him she must have fifty thousand dollars, as she has overdrawn her bank balance, and contracted debts, thinking her investments would make them good, and is faced with prison if she cannot pay at once. He readily promises to bring the money to her the next morning, but shortly after she leaves, is able to deposit it, as his father sends him a final installment of his estate, and hurries to her apartment. As no one answers his knock, he enters, to see if everything is well, and finds Leida in Frank's arms. She confesses that Frank is her lover, and she has merely been using him as a means of financial support. Heartbroken, David turns away; in the days that follow, he finds his investments all valueless and his "friends" uninterested in helping him, now that he has no money. Bitterly, he leaves the city, and secures work feeding the swine on a farm in the country. David wanders into a little village church one Sunday, and hears the parable of the prodigal son. Filled with hope, he decides to return home, and ask forgiveness.

His family receive him joyful, assuring him that he will always be their son, and Leonard releases Rosemary from her promise, as he knows she still loves David. They are wed, and he promises to live always near his home, where his parents have welcomed him, in their wisdom.

MISPRINT

THE scene is a hospital room. Heavily bandaged, Oliver Hardy begs the nurse and doctor to let him see his friend Stan Laurel but the meeting is permitted only after both patients have solemnly sworn to avoid any reference to the automobile wreck. Once together, however, they are unable to keep from malicious references and Hardy blames Laurel who drove, while Laurel, screwing up his face reminds his pal that "back-seat-driving" confused him. Meanwhile in the nurses room the nurses are kidding pretty Emma, who takes care of both patients and when they show her a newspaper article about the accident mentioning that Laurel, a war hero, receives a monthly pension aggregating $200, Emma decides to win her patient as a husband. Meanwhile, Laurel alone in his room, wheels his chair over to the water pitcher and discovering it to be empty rings the service bell. Receiving no answer he claps his hands importantly. Impatient, he inverts the tumbler over the bottle, puts it between his knees so that it makes a noise like a miniature siren when he moves, and gathering momentum drives recklessly down the long corridors of the hospital, throwing patients into a panic as he knocks at doors and rattles his glass bottles. Confusion reigns. Around and around he goes top speed while the hospital staff vainly try to police his movements. At last Hardy stops him and with his tongue hanging out Laurel explains he wants water.

Hardy happening upon Emma making love to the abashed Laurel vainly tries to induce his friend that Emma is a worthless, scheming woman, but as Laurel wistfully demands to know what she can get from him, Hardy is stumped. However, when at the time of their dismissal from the hospital Emma makes an appointment to meet Laurel at eight on Tuesday, Hardy does his best to confuse him into believing she meant Wednesday and conducts a dummy conversation over the telephone to verify the Wednesday appointment. To his consternation, however, Emma calls up Laurel at their apartment to be sure he'll keep the date, and when Laurel returns home he finds a note under an empty whiskey bottle saying, "Since you are going to marry Emma, I've decided to end it all." Laurel weeps convulsively, but Hardy, ossified, steps out of the closet to explain triumphantly that he did end—the whiskey. Laurel looks at the empty bottle and as realization comes he smiles wanly. Emma continues to win the bashful Laurel, and Hardy in desperation bribes a fortune teller to warn his friend. but before each revelation the seer demands that his palms be crossed with silver, and Hardy's purse gives out. The truck with which they collide brings suit but when the comic giant of a driver admits under fire that he returned to work for ten days before he was fired for drinking, the case is thrown out of court since his loss of a job could not be attributed to the accident. The day of the wedding arrives. Hardy, resigned, decides to dress Laurel in an improvised bridal costume composed of a curtain and sheet, so that he can practice. Emma comes in. Laurel shamefacedly shows her about the disordered room but when he shows her his discharge from the army she reads that he gets $20 a month pension. The $200, Laurel explains, was a misprint. Emma disappears and when later her telegram arrives saying she has eloped with another man, Laurel falls weeping into the arms of the comforting Hardy. Even as he swears he is through with women a pretty chambermaid appears, and both perk their heads.

CALL OF THE SIREN

Jack McKnight Drama File No. 9972

FROM the day that Howard bought his farm he gave himself heart and soul to his work. Good-looking, young, the neighbors often asked him why he didn't go to the dances in town and one day, hair combed carefully back he went. From the instant he saw Jane, his heart started pounding fiercely and when finally he had her in his arms dancing, he thought she must surely hear it. For a year he saw her regularly and when finally she consented to be his wife, Howard thought he was too happy to live. The once lonely farm took on brightness. Kept scrupulously clean by Jane, it became the center for the social activity, for the neighbors looked to Jane as a leader. When the children demanded their goodnight kisses it was a ritual for them to ask muvver and daddy to kiss too, and daughter rang out. Then one night in a terrible storm, Jane's pale face contracted with pain, and although she claimed it was nothing, Howard bundled her into the car and took her in to see the doctor. Little whimpers of pain escaped Jane's tightly closed lips and when the car broke down, Howard carried her the rest of the way. Grimly the doctor took out his instruments, but when Howard learned that his wife was no more, he rushed into the street, like a man berserk. It took all the neighbors to hold Howard down and convince him it was all for the best. For the sake of the two children, Howard came out of his terrible grief. At first he tried to manage everything, but realizing the children needed a woman's care he hired an old woman. Others followed, but Howard dismissed them all for being ungentle to the little ones and at last, feeling that a young girl would be more understanding he got Marie. Nights he used to hear her send her boy friends away before they came near the house, and once he told her she could invite them in for a cup of coffee. One night Marie had a party in the kitchen and hearing the laughter, Howard watched them. But he was young and he had not been gay for years. One girl, Helen, came to him and soon Howard was joining in the fun. He asked her to come back, and now there was more and more parties and the neighbors frowned. But Howard had gotten a taste of gay life again and he was lost to every thought but pleasure. When his mother came and asked if she could take the children since they were looking pale and unhappy later, Howard raised no objections, for he wanted more and more of Helen. Drawing all his money from the bank he bought the ring that Helen had admired for her, but when he asked her to marry him she sat down her glass of gin and laughed until he shook her. Then she told him that she was paying back her debt to men. They were all soft when you were hard. she said. Then she went and Howard sat alone amid the debris of whiskey bottles.

Slowly he brought himself back out of the mire. It was a hard fight winning the neighbors respect again, but with Jane's children about him, Howard regained his self-respect and the children looked up to their daddy.

PAID TO LOVE

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 10291

CONVENT bred, Alix Payton is, at the age of twenty-one given her inheritance. Dazed by the prospect of wealth and unlimited freedom, she chances to meet Laura Walsh, childhood playmate, whom the intervening years have turned into an ultra-modern young lady. Laura, learning that Alix is entirely alone in the world save for her brother Don, who has early shown signs of profligacy and has consequently been given his share of the family fortune in small allotments until his twenty-eighth birthday, assures Alix that she can show her in a few days all there is to be seen in New York. One of her first surprises is to take Alix to Mrs. Ellsworth's Rendezvous. At first Alix sees nothing extraordinary about the place save that several very personable young men are dancing with middle aged and jewel-dripping women. But when Laura explains that Mrs. Ellsworth supplies the very highest type of gigolos, Alix gasps and asks that they go. Laura chides her for being afraid of adventure and sends for Richard, a young Princeton graduate who is in every sense cultured and well read but is doin this sort of work because he is up against it. Interested in spite of herself, Alix looks around and seeing a fine looking young man speaking to Mrs. Ellsworth, signifies that he is her choice. Mrs. Ellsworth laughingly explains to Stephen Henry, who has come about the lease, that one of her patrons has mistaken him for one of the gigolos, but when Stephen looks over at Alix, he decides to accept the commission as a lark. From the first Alix and Stephen hit it off splendidly, and as, after a long evening, Stephen kisses Alix, she returns dazedly to her apartment, and sleeplessly tossing on her bed chides herself for believing that Stephen's hired kisses were real. She determines not to see him again, but her resolution fades and again she goes with Laura. To her consternation she sees her brother Don, whose restless conduct has been marked lately, dining at another table with a middle aged patron. Concealing her relationship she questions Richard and learns that Don is one of the gigolos here. Richard also tells Alix that Don is in love with Grace, an office girl, but, having squandered his current share of his fortune, he is being kept by Sara, an aging society woman. Alix makes her excuse and leaves, realizing the cheapness of her own love for Stephen. Determined to free herself and her brother from the mire, she refuses to see Stephen again despite all his efforts, and tries to get in touch with Sara, who, however, is unapproachable. At length, Alix appeals to Grace, who is ready to forgive Don for his escapade, and hiring Grace as her social secretary brings her into her home. Don, seeing her, is remorseful but does not know how to rid himself of Sara who has been so good to him. Alix at last explains and the society woman agrees to release Don, while Mrs. Ellsworth calls upon Alix and at last succeeds in convincing her that Stephen is not one of her gigolos, but her landlord who had accepted the whole thing as an adventure. Stephen and Alix look at each other ruefully for a moment, then their lips meet in complete understanding.

HINDU LOVE

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 10291

THE illness of his father a wealthy importer, causes the postponement of David Sherwin's marriage to Elenor Vince, popular debutante. After a touching farewell, David leaves for India to look after his father's interests. While returning from a trip into the interior, David hears a clear voice chanting native music, and pauses to listen to a beautiful native girl, Lowa. When he presses on, she follows devotedly and in his camp she takes over the cooking and managing, seeing that he is always comfortable. He is moved by her devotion and accepts the love she lavishes upon him. At last his business over, he prepares to return home. Lowa sees him put tenderly into his trunk the picture of his fiancee, and realizing that he is in love with one of his own people, she does not tell him she is bearing his child.

Upon his return home he finds his father much improved. The interim has changed Elenor into a jazz mad society butterfly but there has never been any one other man for Elenor and the plans for the wedding proceed. After a brilliant society affair, the young couple settle down to matrimony, but David finds Elenor always running to this or that cocktail party or bridge. Her thoughts are shallow, her health is being broken down, but caught up in the superficial whirl, she refuses to readjust her pace and when night after night she comes home drunk, David decides to take a hand. Kidnapping his bride, with the aid of his stuttering right hand man, David brings her to India, away from marble bathrooms and breakfasts in bed. In the tropics David once more sets out to win the love of Elenor, but she grits her hatred of him and refuses, although he can see signs of yielding, to show that she is really happier than she was on Long Island. Elenor is forced to wash her own clothes and cook for David, while he remains tender but masterful always. However, when, after a stubborn night spent out in the rain, Elenor contracts a tropio fever, David is dismayed. He sends his man servant after Lowa who arrives with a beautiful child in tow. Lowa faithfully nurses Elenor back to health but at last she herself succumbs. David and Elenor try everything, but the girl declines gradually and Elenor calls David to see Lowa. Dying, Lowa tells him how much she has loved him and explains that the child is his. Stunned, David holds her hand and as it grows cold walks slowly outside. But Elenor has heard all, and softly she joins David and tells him they will adopt Lowa's child as their own. Incredulously, David searches Elenor's eyes, and as he realizes she has changed completely, he holds her to his heart and kisses her gently.

STREETS OF THE WORLD

J. Manuel Mayer Drama File No. 10298

A TORRENT of rain beats upon Gregory Mendelsohn's desolated shack. It lights up and shakes to its foundation with every crashing thunderbolt. Ruth Mendelsohn haggard and worn rocks the cradle of her frightened youngster, Theodore. Gregory, her emaciated husband, covered with a tattered quilt is suddenly seized with a spasm of coughing. He tosses about in his ricketty bed and curses the day of his birth, as he hacks and spits. Ruth rushes to his aid with a tumblerful of medicine. Tears stream down her sunken cheeks as she looks upon her husband who is a shadow of his former self. Tenderly she wipes away the beads of perspiration that gather on his forehead, tucks him well up under the covers, puts her hand in his. Gradually her own head sinks upon the pillow. The rain ceases. It is daybreak. Suddenly Theodore shrieks. Ruth awakens. She beholds Gregory's ghastly drooping face. She screams at the top of her voice. Peasants on the way to market rush in. Gregory is dead.

Theodore, now a blue-eyed youngster of five, is the target of fun making. The boys lift him high up in the air or they roll him in the grass and he melts away with childish laughter. One day Theodore takes notice of his mother's plight lifting heavy bundles of wool from the huge boiling cauldron. He is seized with sadness. He runs to her but stumbles and falls into a nearby cauldron of black dye, and ruefully emerges, black as a pickaniny.

John Feraru, the childless blacksmith, takes Theodore under his wing. He hovers over him and heaps great affection upon the little fatherless boy. On the tenth of May, the Independence day of Roumania, the little city of Roman is astir with people and marching soldiers. Theodore with a group of children worms his way among the multitude. Towards the end of the day, an enraged antisemitic student mob descends upon the Jewish ghetto and Theodore is found wounded in the gutter. John Feraru is appalled when he finds the boy crumpled up in a heap, bleeding. Tenderly he lifts him in his arms and rushes with him to the hospital. He gives his own blood to save the child's life. When fully recovered Theodore is placed through Dr. Henick in Mr. Goldschleger's printing shop. Coming in daily contact with manuscripts he gets the urge for education. His pockets bulge always with reading material. Dave, the foreman, makes his life miserable but Mrs. Goldschleger takes a keen interest in him and inspires him by giving him good books to read. Dave too gets the urge for more education and both become good pals. Dave, hopeless as to his future in Roumania, leaves for Paris. Theodore, realizing that he cannot be admitted to High School due to 'numerous clauses" enlists with a group of immigrants who start out to migrate on foot toward America. His mother is heartbroken on the day of his departure, but he promises faithfully to send for her as soon as possible. With the immigrant group he reaches the city of Falticeni, close to the Austrian border, Theodore is billeted in the house of Clarice. Although she is engaged to Alfred, she gravitates to Theodore who falls madly in love with her. During the short stop at Falticeni Theodore suffers an injury to his ankle. The immigrants depart leaving Theodore in the care of Clarice's people who nurse him back to health. With difficulty he finally breaks away from Clarice in quest of the group of immigrants whom he expect to rejoin in Paris. On coming out of the station at Paris Theodore discovers his friend, Dave, now employed on a Paris newspaper. Chokingly they clasp one another as they are rejoined. After spending a night with Dave who speaks volubly of his future in Paris and his Vivian, they both go to the Alliance Israelite in quest of the group of immigrants. At the Alliance Theodore is told that the immigrants have already sailed and that he will have to make the journey alone. Receiving the good wishes of Dave he boards the ship. Homesick and lonely down in the smelly hold of the ship Theodore becomes violently ill. Loneliness seizes him for mother and Clarice! Seven days out at sea he clatters up the stairs of the swaying ship. Forlorn he remains holding on to the rail, his eyes rivetted upon the wide black sea. "Look, there is a twinkle of light out there in the distance," some one shouts. Theodore's eyes widen. His face lights up. The following morning he lands in America. Several days after landing in Ellis Island, the Sheltering Immigrant Aid Society place him with Reb Sander. Sydney, Reb Sander's son blackens his eyes and calls him "foreigner" but later they become pals. Together they join the "Y" where they build both their minds and their bodies. Theodore finds a job in a basement printing shop and at night plugs at his books. He completes his regents and is admitted to Medical School. While other students cower before the stiffs, the tedious memorization, Theodore's eyes are filled with the glory of service to the suffering. Here at last he is nearing the goal on which his eyes have been set. Then at last comes the day when with another interne he dashes up the steep steps of a tenement on his first ambulance case. As a lovely young girl, Rhoda, opens the door for them and motions them in an inner room where her sister lies in labor, Theodore's eyes hold hers. Hours later the ambulance chimes down the narrow street. But Theodore comes back and through Dr. Markanaly, gets the blonde Rhoda a place in the nurses' training.

Time passes. Now Theodore is a respected practitioner in the Ghetto, refusing fees from the needy, adored by those he has brought back to health. His mother, whom he has brought over, rejoices in his success. It is 1917. While talking with Reb Sander and his family, cries of "Extra! Extra!" stir them. Louder grow the cries. "War Declared on Germany." Theodore enlists in the Medical Department, Syd Sander as an Army chaplain.

At the front Theodore works through hellish nights, patching ripped and torn bodies, severing blackened limbs. At last the night-mare ends. Over war-torn Europe Dr. Theodore Mendelsohn unwilling to return home with his shattered nerves, travels returning to the Roumania town in search of Clarice. But the entire city has been laid waste. Gone are John Feraru, his fellow workers in the print shop. Where his own hut stood now there is charred ash. Brokenly he returns to New York, to find that his mother has died. All his friends in the ghetto have moved on to the Bronx, to Brooklyn, and his memory has been effaced by younger doctors. It is Markanaly who finds him wandering outside the hospital, and sees that he is received as a patient in the hospital where once he served on the hospital staff. And then Rhoda, now a nurse, comes. Finding him tired in mind and body, she hovers over his bed, instilling her own healthy thoughts in him and gradually the days make the searing memory of war-torn France less vivid. Then one day, with Rhoda at his side, Dr. Theodore Mendelsohn leaves the hospital to begin again the practice of his beloved medicine among the poor who need him.

ALIEN BLOOD

Harry L. Palmer Drama File No. 10287

TO Mollie O'Grady who has married in the hope of freeing herself from her cheap environment, the desertion of her husband when she refuses to make money for him in the way he suggests, comes as a crushing blow. Placing her little Ann with sisters in a home, Mollie goes back to singing in a Wabash Avenue Cafe. On her frequent visits to her little chubby-faced child, her heart aches at sight of the drab regulation dress, and when the sisters tell her that a visiting banker and his wife have taken a fancy to the child and expressed a willingness to adopt her, Annie refuses fearfully. However, when they point out that her child will grow up in luxury, free of all contact with the cheap cabaret crowds that Mollie loathes, she turns her baby over to them.

In the months that follow she longs for her baby constantly and the realization that she may never see her again eats at her heart like a canker. Then, one day, she sees the child ride by in a handsome carriage, and she calls out wildly. The carriage moves on through the crowd, and Mollie returns dully to the cafe.

Twenty years later Ann, now known as Jessie Van Zile is in love with Harold Osgood, young attorney of an excellent family. Van Zile, since the death of his first wife has taken another wife, beautiful, snobbish, and grasping. As Harold calls for Jessie, he sweeps her into his arms and tells her jubilantly that his election to the senatorship is assured and asks her to marry him. Happily she gives herself to his kisses and as he jests, "It's a good thing I have nothing to hide in my past, they're trying to rake up muck to defeat me," she looks at him proudly.

However, Van Zile suffers a stroke, and dying leaves his fortune to Jessie, having seen through his second wife's calculating nature. When her stepmother realizes that Jessie is to get all the money, she turns upon her and shouts that Jessie has no right to it, she is just a waif that was picked up in an asylum. Stunned, Jessie looks at the adoption papers, and realizing that the publicity of her origin together with her marriage to Harold now, may ruin his career, she turns the money over to her stepmother and realizing that the unscrupulous woman, sooner or later will tell all, disappears for Harold's sake.

Alone now, she longs for the mother who had given her up and she finds employment as a social worker. In the cafes of the city she tries to find some clue to Mollie O'Grady, but the name is a common one and many years have intervened. At last one night she sees a woman push a drunken sailor from her and hum sadly an old-fashioned ballad. Jessie goes to her and when the woman urges her to go away while she is still young, Jessie remarks sadly that this is where she belongs. Mollie's eyes widen as she learns that Jessie is her daughter and the two embrace each other tenderly.

However, Harold reading Jessie's note of renunciation, decides he can't live without her and begins a long search for her and at last, finding her, persuades her to marry him. Political positions would be empty without Jessie, and, taking her in his arms, and holding Molly close, he adds, he can always practice law.

THE BITTER CUP

Mary S. Nye Drama File No. 10257

ENDOWED with a superficial beauty and brilliance which attracts men, Mrs. Bradley, a young widow, is incapable of sincere feeling, in spite of these assets, and has no real affection in her heart even for Clare, her sister, refusing to provide a home for the motherless young girl. When she graduates from school, Clare finds employment in a middle western city, while Mrs. Bradley goes to Chicago. Roger, a young doctor whom Clare has secretly adored since childhood, comes to see her frequently, and the two plan to be married. The doctor's closest friend, Ed. Hewitt, writes congratulating him on his good fortune, and states that he hopes he will find the same happiness in matrimony that has come to him since his marriage to Marie Louise, stating that she hopes they may soon have an opportunity to know one another, Marie Louise encloses a little note for Clare, inviting her to visit them, with Ed. In appreciation, Clare thanks her, and the two young women begin a friendship by correspondence. When a little son is born to Marie Louise, Clare sends a gift, and receives a picture and lock of the baby's hair in return, from the child's mother.

Shortly before the wedding, Roger is sent to Chicago to attend a convention of physicians, and, while assisting one of them, is introduced to his patient, Mrs. Bradley. Becoming infatuated with Roger, and discovering that he is her sister's fiance, she decides to visit Clare in order that she may see more of the young doctor. In spite of himself, Roger is attracted, and when Clare finds Mrs. Bradley in the arms of her lover one evening, she tells him, in tears, that she will not marry him. Roger pleads with her, but she feels that he now belongs to her sister. In despair, he goes to the home of Ed and Marie Louise Hewitt, where Mrs. Bradley follows him. The Hewitts receive her coldly, but Roger, feeling that he alone is to blame, resents their unfriendly attitude toward her, and is again seen in her company. She turns him against the Hewitts, and he no longer comes to visit these devoted friends, and their little baby, whom they have affectionately named after him. As Mrs. Bradley's persuasion, he accompanies her to Chicago, and enters into the gay social life of the city. Here he meets May Brown, an actress, but soon discovers that neither she nor Mrs. Bradley are interested in him except in a mercenary way. Sadly, he writes to Ed and Marie Louise, telling them that he longs for Clare, while at the same time, she confides her desire to see him again, in a letter to Marie Louise.

Mrs. Bradley becomes ill, and goes to Clare for rest and care, which she willingly receives. Roger is injured in an accident, and at Marie Louise's suggestion, sends for Clare, but Mrs. Bradley reads the letter and destroys it before her sister sees it. She then advises Clare that Marie Louise has received letters from Roger about her, and at the same time, tries to persuade Ed that his wife is in love with Roger, causing much unhappiness. In order to discover the truth, Clare visits Marie Louise, and is shown the correspondence. On the same impulse, Roger, when he is able to leave the hospital, comes to the Hewitt home, and a complete understanding of the situation is brought about. Roger and Clare decide to marry at once, to make up for the happiness they have lost through the jealous plans of Mrs. Bradley, forgetting all past bitterness in the joy of the future.

NEW DAY

Thomas Chafins Drama File No. 10289

ARRIVING at his bank early, president John Russell frowns as he sees his employees gathered around Martin Wallace, young teller who is cheerfully lecturing on the new era of prosperity that is to follow the depression. The workers quickly disperse and at nine each is in his place working industriously. At his desk, Russell looks over gloomy reports and at last issues a statement that there is to be another ten percent cut in salaries. Murmurs of dissatisfaction arises, but at lunch when some of the employees grumble they are going to quit, Martin asks them where their loyalty is, reminding them that during good times their salaries were handsome. For his own part, Martin wonders how he is going to manage on his reduced salary and as he walks home dejectedly he is struck by a car driven by Russell's daughter Leona. A crowd quickly gathers, but Leona takes one look at her handsome victim and vetoing the suggestion of an ambulance, brings Martin to her own house and calls her family physician who diagnoses internal injuries and advises that Martin should not be moved for several days. When Russell comes home he is furious to discover his daughter is nursing Martin, the young orator, but Leona reminds him that if not for her Martin would be up and about. So Martin remains on but when a few days later Russell discovers his daughter is in love with the young whippersnapper, he fires Martin and forbids his daughter ever seeing him again. The result is that the independent Leona induces Martin to elope with her and her father disowns her. Martin struggles along on temporary positions and Leona cheerfully learns how to cook . When Russell hears his son-in-law speak in favor of the beer bill he turns away in disgust, but eventually the beer act is passed. Slowly a process of readjustment begin. Following the economic crisis, prices slowly begin to rise and Russell's bank once more regains its stability. Now, however, his loneliness is keener than ever. Once, he bumps headlong into a young man and regains his breath only to realize he has collided with his son-in-law. Martin greets him cheerily, but Russell, blaming Martin for taking Leona from him, only growls. At length Martin induces him to come for dinner and after several minutes, Russell agrees. Blithely Martin phones Leona that he is bringing a guest home for dinner. Russell pants as he climbs night after flight of stairs but as he enters his daughter's apartment, he is astonished at the cheerfulness of the tiny rooms, and Leona, coming out in an apron, throws her arms about her husband and then her father. As they eat of the dinner Leona has prepared, tears come to the eyes of the bank president who realizes that this is the first time he has ever seen his daughter so happy. Martin, poor as a church mouse, has brought her love. A changed Russell offers Martin his old job back, and under the approving eye of his father-in-law, Martin rises in responsibility. And when Russell learns he is soon to be a proud grandfather, he casts aside his dignity, and sings joyfully, "Happy days are here again."

CURIOSITY CENTER

H. G. Raven Comedy Drama File No. 10314

STOPPING in for a cool glass of beer, George Smith's eyes widen happily as Tad Brown tells him about a vacation spot where the trout bite and wild geese and partridges fly plenty-like. Together they make plans, and at peace with the world George staggers home. As he sits down to his corned beef and cabbage, his wife Lil beams sweetly and tells him she has decided that this year they'll spend their vacation at the seashore. She can if she wants to, George replies, but he's going away without his family for once. Then starts a fight. Lil shrieks she was a fool to marry a man who considers her and Junior millstones about his neck. George retorts a man is entitled to some peace sometime, and they stand shouting at each other. Hurriedly Lil packs her bags and says she's going home to mother. Junior docilely puts his hat on. He's heard this story before. Calmly George continues to eat. "Another cup of coffee, my love," he asks. Lil stamps her feet and moves toward the door. "Another cup," he repeats firmly. With a sob she puts down her bag and gets it for him, weeping freely into the cup. Junior shrugs and removes his hat, while George cradles his wife in his arms and murmurs soothing words. "And now will you come to the seashore?" she asks sweetly, and the battle is on again. But in the end they compromise. Lil takes two weeks with Junior and the day they return, George is to go off to the woods. It is George's victory but soon he begins to miss Lil and Junior. Wistfully he washes dishes. All his shirts need buttons, his socks mending. The telephone rings. He answers and receiving no connection begins worrying that it is long distance, that something has happened to Lil, or Junior. "Hello, Hello," he shouts and as an ambulance screams by, trembles violently. Just as he is about to tear his hair in anxiety a woman's voice apologizes for not calling earlier to tell him —"Yes, yes" prompts George, beside himself at thoughts of two still corpses, but it develops that it is his neighbor going to tell him how to make bisquits, and in anger and relief, George slams the receiver down. It is a wild-eyed George who welcomes Lil and Junior on their return, but Lil reminds him he is to take the next train out, and weakly George permits her to send him off. For days George tries to convince himself he is happy. But the trout don't bite and when Tad clumsily burns the steak to a crisp, George can stand it no longer and returns home. To his dismay Lil and Junior are out. Stripping off his camp clothes, he blissfully climbs into the shower. The door bell rings. Abruptly his song stops. He ignores it. It rings again, again, and again. Swearing, he grabs a towel and strides to the door. His mother-in-law looks, gasps, and flees. George laughs until his sides ache but when Lil comes in, she evades his embrace, and storms that she was never so humiliated in her life, her mother has gone home and refuses to come back, ever. George sighs, "Good riddance," and another fight rages. Junior philosophically picks up his hat and waits for Lil to say she is leaving—for good. George tells Lil what he thinks of her meddling mother anyway and the neighbors listen with baited breath through the night. . . .

The next morning, however, Lil is all sweetness and light. George is dumbfounded when she kisses his bald spot and talks baby talk. But when Junior smugly presents a box of sticky chocolates —birthday present for mother, George begins to understand. Dashing out for a gift, he returns to present it, and Lil kisses him warmly. Junior hums, "Papa love mama," and again Peace reigns in the Smith home—for five minutes.

Sent to Mr. Darrow's room to tidy up when he is ill, she decides suddenly to start screaming and when Darrow runs over to silence her, she tells the police, that he assaulted her. At the trial, Mary breaks down when she learns that Johnny is defending Darrow and hysterically she tells her story and admits she is lying. Frank and Ted comforts the weeping Mary and as the case is dismissed, Mary is led out where Ed is waiting. Mrs. Gordon has run off with Rodney and is getting her divorce, and Frank, arm through Ted's says she is happy that Mary is to be her stepmother.

THE POINT SINISTER

Julie Stecher Drama File No. 10311

ALL her life Jane Miller, daughter of the well known banker, has had everything she wanted and the years have given to her beauty an imperious cast that makes women as well as men fear her. Now, looking over her bills for the month, she sees one she cannot account for. Doggedly she investigates and learns that her butler, Dan, has forged her name. Two red spots appear in her cheeks as she sends for him and tells him she is going to turn him over to the police. For a moment he tries to deny everything, then, throwing himself upon her mercy confesses he has been convicted three times already and a fourth offense will bring a life sentence. At first unmoved, Jane at length tells him she will let him go—for the present. Outside the maid throws her arms about Dan and tells him she is afraid for him, being in the power of the unscrupulous Jane.

Jane, meanwhile, climbs into her roadster and goes to her father's bank to demand more money from her indulgent parent. As she swings past the gate, her father's new secretary, Tom, tries to stop her. She laughs at him, but suddenly her smile fades, her eyes narrow slightly and glancing at him provocatively she tells him who she is. For a moment he stands his ground, but when Jane comes out of her father's office she tells him that as penance for his mistake he is to take her to lunch. Tom protests he has work to do, but she says she'll square it with her father, and Miller shrugs his shoulders and warns Tom it's no use trying to cross Jane. At lunch Tom attempts to be formal, but Jane drives him out to the country insists that they go dancing, and later, when the moon is high, lifts her lips for his kiss. Tom, holding out desperately against the invitation in Jane's eyes, at length yields, and kisses her fiercely. She nods. That was better. The next day Mr. Miller insists that his secretary come up to his country estate for the weekend on business, and Tom, recognizing Jane's touch, smiles grimly. But at the lake, Tom meets Mary, Jane's social secretary and the two fall in love. Jane is peeved by Tom's failure to respond again to her advances but when she sees Tom and Mary locked in an embrace, her mind begins working in a sinister direction. All week she watches Mary until the girl is on the verge of hysteria, not suspecting the cause. The next weekend Tom is again requested to come to the lodge. Jane corners the butler and giving him a dagger tells him he is to kill Mary when she comes down the path. Dan refuses but when Jane reminds him that she will send for the police and turn over her forged checks, he agrees reluctantly. However, the maid, in love with Dan, overhears, and running to Mary tells her that if Jane sends her to the garden, she is not to go. Puzzled, Mary agrees. Jane tells Mary she has left her purse in the summer house and sends her for it. Mary, instead, clings to Tom and tells him she is going to quit, she is afraid of Jane. He comforts her with a kiss and tells her he has found a job elsewhere and they can be married.

Meanwhile, Jane, waiting impatiently for Dan's return to tell of his removal of Mary, runs down the path to see what is delaying him, and in the darkness, the terrified Dan mistakes her for Mary and drives his blade home. Jane dies. Dan escapes with the maid. And Tom and Mary leave for a new life together, shutting out all memories of Jane.

GETTING ACQUAINTED

Peggy Ann Shaw Drama File No. 10258

IN spite of her parents' disapproval, Peggy Horton secures a position as private secretary to Mr. Penworth, president of a large foreign importing company, and devotes most of her time to this career, rather than following the gay life of the social "set" to which she belongs. While her employer is away, Mr. Rush and his daughter, Elsia, call at the office. She informs them that she has been authorized to transact his business, and they invite her to call at their home, but the evening is spent in conversation, as they decide to postpone their planes. Attracted by their charming manner, Peggy lunches and visits with the two often. After she has accepted them as friends, Elsia and Rush disclose a plan whereby she can make a large profit by investing money in "Steel Bonds," which they are selling, as they have watched her, and know that her parents are wealthy. Trusting them completely, Peggy turns over a legaey of thirty thousand dollars given to her by an aunt, to them. She invites her new associates to her home, Mr. and Mrs. Horton dislike them, and order the girl not to see them again. Angrily, Peggy informs her parents that she will not comply with their wishes, and leaves them, taking Dink, her dog, and making her home with Mr. Rush and his daughter, at their suggestion. At the gay parties which they frequently give, Peggy learns to drink, and neglects her work, until Mr. Penworth is at last forced to discharge her.

Peggy discovers that Rush has a wife who is mentally unbalanced, and an invalid mother. Both of these women are sent home from the sanitarium, and their care falls to Peggy. In rebellion, she plans to leave, but Rush tells her that her money is still tied up in the bonds, and cannot be withdrawn. A friend wills ten thousand dollars to the girl, but the will is contested. Rush secures the services of a lawyer for her, giving Peggy his mother's diamonds to use in advance payment, and then tells her that she must turn the money over to him when she receives it, in return. Over-hearing a conversation between Elsia and Rush, Peggy learns that the "Steel Bonds" are worthless, and they have taken her money under false pretenses, but she is powerless to help this. Taking Dink, she returns home, but her parents will not admit her. After many days, she finally secures work, assisting as housekeeper on a farm, and plans to save her money so that she may take up the study of nursing. One day she reads in the paper that her father has killed a girl in an auto accident, and is fatally injured himself. She goes home at once, but he dies before she can reach him, and her mother is left penniless by the law-suit caused by the accident. Peggy gives her all of her small savings, and goes to her old friend, Mr. Penworth, for help.

Delighted at seeing her again, Mr. Penworth at once hires a competent lawyer, and secures the ten thousand dollars' legacy for the girl. She sees Rush and Elsia in a car, and follows them to a night club where they are entertaining a young girl, and attempting to interest her in "Steel Bonds." Peggy orders their arrest, and they are convicted of fraud in the trial that follows. Mr. Penworth helps Peggy to write her experiences, and secure work with a film corporation. He asks her to marry him, and telling him that her past unhappiness has taught her the value of his love, she promises to become his wife.

CARIBBEAN

Isabel Erskine Drama File No. 10326

WHILE walking along the beach on the island of Jamaica in the West Indies. Philip Weldon, young New Yorker stops in amazement at sight of a lovely girl walking along with an older companion. When he learns that she is Seldona Mansfield, daughter of the Lord of the plantation, he tells her that he has come to seeure a position as overseer, and Seldona induces her father, who has been troubled by recent native unrest, to hire him. Philip falls deeply in love with Seldona but to his dismay learns that her father is anxious to marry her to Lord Shalway, a hawk-nosed English nobleman, who offers to take the girl far away from the native trouble. For a time with Philip in charge, the natives calm down, but Lord Shalway discovers through his spy, Bugs, one of the negroes, that Seldona is spending much of her time with Philip, and attributing Seldona's indifference to his attentions to the arrival of the overseer, ruriously reports to Lord Mansfield that his daughter prefers a hired hand to a Lord. Distracted by Shalway's ranting, Mansfield questions his daughter and when he learns that she is in love with Philip, an impecunious American, and intends to marry him, Mansfield fires the boy.

When Seldona learns what her father has done she despairs but she dares not run away with Philip lest her father have the boy killed. Miserably, Philips goes on to the port to await the next steamer back to the states. However, to his amazement, he runs into Ronny Hawkins, an aviator whom he has met several years ago at college. The two greet each other fervently, and Ronny repors that he has flown the first plane to Jamaica and is on his way around the world. Ronny decides to remain on a few days with Philip. Meanwhile, on the Mansfield plantation things have reached a crisis. Lord Shalway, in his efforts to win Seldona has bribed Bugs to incite the negroes to revolt so that Mansfield would be forced to send his daughter back to England. However, he has not calculated upon the effect of the liquor with which he has paid Bugs off. Filled with the fiery liquid, the ignorant and superstitious black gets it into his head that if they killed all the whites the negroes could have the whole place to themselves. Going out among the other workers he has persuaded them to leave off their work and march on the whites. Goaded to a high pitch by Bugs, the negroes, trembling but temporarily courageous, begin to set fire to the huts and surround Coralwreather Hall. The cravenly Lord Shalway tries to escape but he is seized by the blacks and meets a violent death.

Reports of the revolt reach Philip. Appalled by the danger Seldona is in, he realizes that armed force will only increase the hazard to the Mansfield family. Suddenly he hits on an idea. The blacks have never seen an airplane and their superstitious character is well known. He induces Ronny who always excelled in college dramatics to dress in a devil's costume and getting into the plane, has Ronny land amid the terrified blacks. He steps out of the plane. At sight of the devil coming out of the skies, the blacks tremble, but Philip assures them that as long as they go peaceably back to their work, he will convince the devil not to molest them. Ronny with a wave and a grin, flies on, and Philip remains on as re-instated overseer of Coralwreather Hall and as the respected bridegroom of Seldona Mansfield.

NEAR HOME

Dina Calandro Drama File No. 10327

ARRIVING at Ellis Island from her home in Naples, Italy, Nita dreams of her life in this new world, and wonders what it will bring. The girl goes to make her home with her sister and brother-in-law, and secures a postion in a factory. She is not happy, as her sister's husband feels that she is intruding, until the day she meets handsome Pedro, a fellow worker, at a picnic given for the factory employees. He calls to see her often, and two years later they have saved enough so that they can be married. Buying a little cottage, they settle down near the factory, happily planning the future together. Nadine, Pedro's sister-in-law, who secretly loves him, tells him many untrue stories about Nita, saying that she is unfaithful to him, but he refuses to believe this. One day she offers him five thousand dollars to leave his wife, but he angrily refuses. Going to her husband who is a foreman in the factory, Nadine has Pedro discharged. Nita urges him to go away with her to Boston, to make a fresh start away from this unscrupulous woman, and he agrees . A few days after they have moved into their new home, Tony and Joe, two gangsters, call at the house. Pedro and Nita receive them courteously; Nita, in order to discover their purpose, invites them to dinner. They admit that Nadine has given them one thousand dollars to kill Pedro, and, shamed by Nita's civil treatment of them, turn the money over to her.

Four children are born to Nita and Pedro in the years that follow; their happiness is marred only by the death of their baby, yet this tragedy brings them even closer. Shortly afterward, Pedro is injured in an automobile accident, and Nita leaves a sick child with a neighbor to hurry to him. As it will be many months before he can work again, she decides to start an ice factory, and helps to load the heavy pieces of ice onto cars, herself, ignoring the hard work in her desire to take care of those dear to her. A negro throws a quarter on the ground as she is reaching for it in payment for a piece of ice, and insultingly tells her to go after it. Determined that no one shall take advantage of the fact that she is a woman, she strikes him with a club, and calls an officer. Newspapers feature the story of her courageous and successful attempt to manage this business, and she if offered forty thousands dollars by a rival company, but refuses, wishing to keep the warehouse for her husband and children. Her customers increase in number, and Leonard Steele, and editor, who has become interested in her story, tells her that he is in love with her, but she replies that she cares only for Pedro. When Pedro is able to leave the hospital, he insists on going to his home in Naples.

Nita discovers that Nadine sailed on the same boat with him, and as weeks go by and she does not hear from him, she worries, but tries to hide her feeling from the children. Her eldest son helps her as she bravely carries on the business. Six months later Pedro returns; he tells her that Nadine attempted to kill him when he refused her love, again hiring two men to stab him. He at last recovered, and she took her own life, in remorse. Pedro and Nita carry on the business successfully, together.

BEHIND THE WALL

Jesse Trent Drama File No. 10310

SEARCHING for employment in New York in order to help his father pay off a mortgage on his farm in Dixie, Don Warden finds work driving a truck for Ed Johnson, at a modest salary. While dining alone in a restaurant, Dan "Speed" Stevens introduces himself, and tells Don that he can earn all the money he needs if he will drive his truck for John Peterson's gang, of which Speed is a member, but, upon learning that they are rum runners, the boy refuses. His employer increases his salary and invites him to a party at his home; here he meets June Peterson and Joan Wilson, who is escorted by Speed. The two girls are school chums. Don escorts June to her home, while Joan and Speed, who are engaged, occupy the back seat. Receiving permission, Don often calls on June, and asks her to become his wife, but she tells him that she has promised to marry Mark Philips, a friend of her father. Mr. Peterson informs the young man that his daughter is accustomed to every luxury, and he believes it is for her best interest to marry a man who can provide her with all that money can buy. June agrees to meet Don again, and they spend many happy, stolen evenings at the Colbart Club. The girl confesses that she would gladly elope with Don, but Mark Phillips is, in reality, her father's enemy, although she cannot explain the situation further.

Relating this incident to Speed, Don's friend tells him that Mark Phillips is the leader of a rival gang, and has forced Peterson to become a rum runner in order to throw suspicion off his own trail. Years ago, Peterson was president of a bank in Baltimore, and Mark persuaded him to invest some of his depositors' money in a proposition which he misrespresented. A friend loaned Peterson money to refund them, but Phillips could send him to the penitentiary if he exposed the situation, although Peterson acted in good faith. Agreeing to help Don, the two young men plan to force a confession from Phillips, but agree they must act cautiously, as he is a powerful figure in the underworld. Discovering that June is meeting Don secretly, Mark becomes jealous, and orders two of his men to kidnap the boy, and chain him to the floor of the cellar in his shack in the country. Finding that his friend is not at home, Speed searches for him, and releases him. They relate this incident to Mr. Peterson, who decides that his daughter must not marry Mark, even if he is sent to prison, but Speed and Don persuade him to hold the ceremony the next afternoon, as he had planned.

Mark arrives at the Peterson mansion, and the wedding ceremony is about to begin, when Speed steps forward with a gun, and holds Mark. Two of his gangsters seize Speed from behind, and are about to shoot him, when a bullet from behind a secret panel stops them, and Don appears. Officers take Mark into custody, and both Speed and Peterson are cleared of all charges in the trial that follows. Mark and his gang are sentenced to life imprisonment, and Don is rewarded for his bravery in capturing this desperate criminal. With this money he is able to pay off his father's mortgage, and marry June, at a double ceremony in which Joan and Speed also are wed.

SINNER'S CRY

Rose M. Bonanza Drama File No. 10297

SECURE in the love of her parents, fourteen year old Rose has her first glimpse of tragedy when she and Anna MacCarthy, her adopted sister, sees their fried, Louis Dunlap, a crippled newspaper seller, killed as he saves a child from the wheels of a truck. Charles Livingstone, an attractive young boy, takes over Louis's business, and Anna becomes infatuated with him, but Rose cannot bear to pass the news stand, as it reminds her of Louis. One night Rose overhears her Uncle James tell her father that Katherine, his wife, has a lover, and he is so insanely jealous that he fears he may kill her. A few days later he carries out this threat; Rose's father tries to keep the news from her, but she buys a paper from Charles, and weeps hysterically when she reads of this tragedy. Deeply touched, Charles takes the girl home. Her parents spend their last cent in an attempt to win an acquittal for Uncle James, but he is sentenced to death and electrocuted. Anna secures employment in another city, and leaves them. Disgraced by his brother's scandal, Mr. Sangster, Rose's father, losses his position, and is desperate, as all his savings have been exhausted by the trial. Charles' father is a foreman on the farm of Mr. Lamb, several miles outside of the city; he secures employment for Rose and her mother during the summer months, in the fields, and Mrs. Coal, a neighbor, helps them pack and depart.

Although the work of cutting and picking beans is hard, the change and fresh air benefits mother and daughter. Charles leaves his news stand to take charge of the weighing and loading of trucks on the farm, and helps Mrs. Sangster and Rose with many little kindnesses. He tells Rose that he loves her, but she reminds him that they are both only children, and becomes angry when he kisses her. Later, she forgives him, and consents to go swimming with him; as they are resting on the river bank she confesses that she, too, loves him. Mrs. Sangster has a paralytic stroke, and is taken to the hospital near their home, in Utica. The doctor orders her to be removed to another climate, so her husband sells their home and prepares to go to Rochester. Unwilling to leave, Rose finally confesses her love for Charles to her father, but he tells the girl that she is too young to think of marriage, and Charles is not sufficiently well educated to become her husband. She must promise not to write to him.

Mr. and Mrs. Foster, her father's friends, help the Sangsters establish their new home in Rochester, and through them she is introduced to Victor Sherwood, who soon asks her to become his wife. Her mother, who is still partially helpless, begs her daughter to accept him, as she feels she has not much longer to live, and wishes to see her settled. Reluctantly, the girl promises, but Charles traces her through Mrs. Coal, and pleads with her to marry him. However, she refuses, and becomes Victor's bride, going with him to a cottage which her father has built on the lake. Two children, Charles and Netty Jane are born to them. Victor refuses to support her, and forces her to take in Walter Sterns and Conrad Comes as boarders. Walter notices her Aunt Kathleen's picture on the mantel. He protects her from Victor's cruelty, and persuades her to divorce him. Later, he is shot by police as he robs a filling station in order to provide funds for Rose, and dying, confesses that he was Aunt Kathleen's lover. Charles reads of the sad affair in the paper, and comes to her, again asking her to become his wife. This time, Rose joyfully consents.

PRIMA DONNA

Edith M. Turner Drama File No. 10324

ALL her life Alice had taken care of her father, the beloved but poorly paid minister of the small New England town, had seen that her older brother finshed high school, and had kept the house clean and pleasing when her mother took to her bed with one of her frequent sick headaches. But from the daily grind there was one escape for her —music. Her rich young voice filled the house as she worked and brought inveterate sinners to her father's Church to hear her sing at Sunday services. It had always been Alice's ambition to have her voice trained some day, and with this in mind she saved every dollar she could get. But when at last she had almost reached the necessary sum her brother pleaded for an opportunity to go to college. A girl's career, he said, was to be a wife and mother, but a boy, an ambitious boy, had to have a college education. In her room Alice wept bitterly as she arrived at the conclusion that Henry was right, he was the older, the man of the family, he hated small town life, and she after all was a girl, needed at home. So her hard saved money went to Henry, and with a warm hug, he left her.

In the days that followed, Alice sang as she had never sang before. All her heartbreak, her denied ambition, surged in her voice and her father's voice caught as he looked over the heads of the capacity congregation. But another heard Alice's voice. Paul Van Elton, renowned New York music critic, had in his zeal, overworked himself and his doctor had warned him that unless he left the city and went somewhere where there would be no mention of arpeggios and da capos, he might lose his mind. At first Paul had scoffed but at length, worried by his inability to concentrate, he had stuck a pin in a map and selected an obscure small town. But, passing the small Church, he had heard a voice whose timbre was vibrant, splendid, and with bated breath he had crept in back of the Church and listened. At the conclusion he came to Alice and with bright eyes had told her she was a genius, that he would arrange to bring her to New York and have her voice trained by the masters. Alice trembled, but her father surveyed Paul distrustfully and her mother pleaded she was needed at home. It was a bitter decision, but at last Alice felt that despite the misgivings of her family, she owed it to herself and to them to go.

With Paul's aid she began studying and months later appeared at her first concert. The musical world raved. A new star had risen. Alice's fame spread, but as society turned out to hear the new star the gossip columns, eager for copy, began making allusions to the "protege" of the famous critic Van Elton. Alice, going home for a visit, found the townspeople snubbing her, and her mother and father looking at her with hurt eyes. Brokenly she returned to New York to sing the leading role in an opera. But just before the curtain went up, Paul came dashing into her dressing room, and seizing her hands told her he just found out what they were saying. Would Alice marry him? And as she nodded, she went out on the stage and that night her voice reached new triumphs. She could provide properly for her folks now, and Paul loved her.

SILK STOCKINGS

Roy Luther Thayer Drama File No. 10323

DAUGHTER of Supreme Court Judge Warren Rockwell, honorable and respected gentleman of the old school, Nan Rockwell repulses the attentions of James T. Matigan, son of a former Ward Heeler. Realizing that Matigan is planning to insure his own social and political position by becoming son-in-law of the Judge, Nan assures Matigan he is wasting his time, and furious at her contemptuous attitude toward him, Matigan leaves planning revenge. Through his political affiliations, Matigan captures the post of District Attorney, and the Judge shakes his head as he reads the news in the paper. Nan kisses him lightly as she teases, "Not everybody is as honest as you, dear," and while her father's eyes follow her admiringly, she goes shopping. Suddenly the store detective grasps her wrist, and whispers to her to come quietly. Color flushes to her cheeks as she accompanies him through the gaping crowds to the manager's office and in her handbag is found a pair of silk stockings which she is accused of having shoplifted. The case is turned over to the District Attorney for Grand Jury consideration and Matigan triumphantly sends for Nan. In his office he turns to her suavely and repeats his offer of marriage—despite her disgrace, adding that he can drop the whole case. When he has finished, Nan turns upon him and accuses him of having framed the whole matter and walks quickly out. At home the Judge finds Nan sobbing and proceeds directly to Matigan's office and warns him he is going to begin proceedings to disbar Matigan. Whereupon Matigan calls in his stenographer and dictates the story JUDGE'S DAUGHTER CAUGHT SHOPLIFTING, which he is to release to the newspapers. At Matigan's sketch of the attendant notoriety, the Judge breaks down and Matigan informs him that if he resigns from the Supreme Court bench, Matigan can be appointed his successor and the whole matter will be dropped. At length Rockwell agrees and a year later dies. Nan, who has tried to save her father by offering herself, too late, to Matigan, now studies law. Two years later she is admitted to the bar, and with her beauty and connections she rapidly rises to power. Backed by women's political organizations as well as all those who had supported her father, she runs opposite Matigan for re-election to the Supreme Court and is swept into office. Matigan returns to private practice but his prestige gone and his lack of ability apparent, he turns to the underworld. Matigan is blackmailed by Lila, the girl who had planted the stockings in Nan's bag and at last he consents to marry her. Less and less scrupulous now, Matigan decides suddenly to reopen the case against Nan and sends Lila to demand ten thousand dollars for the return of the police records accusing Nan Rockwell of shoplifting. Matt Howard, financier, who loves Nan offers to thrash Matigan, but Nan pretends to comply with the demands. The extortionists are followed and arrested. Lila turns state's evidence and Matigan is sentence to a long term. On the wave of popularity that follows the sensational case, Nan is elected Governor of the State, and as she leaves her offices for a brief honeymoon with Matt, she pardons Matigan, who has taken desperately ill in prison. Brokenly Matigan thanks her and returns to his sharp-tongued wife, while Matt lifts the Governor's face and kisses her fondly.

NEVER AGAIN

Josephine A. Bay Drama File No. 10068

WHEN Hanka returns late from a solitary trip to the movies in a vain effort to forget how lonely she is, she is startled to discover a man lying unconscious on the steps of her house. Bringing him inside, she bathes the cut forehead and as he opens heavy eyes to thank her she remains there through the night looking down at the handsome face. The next morning, Patrick has a splitting headache and as Hanka prepares a bromide and some breakfast for him he is touched by her kindness. Thereafter he is a frequent caller and when at last he asks her to marry him, telling her some day he'll come into all his father's wealth, Hanka hesitates. It is only when Patrick promises never to drink again, although as Hanka smilingly admits if he hadn't fallen on her steps she should never have met him, that she promises to marry him. At the wedding the bridegroom shows up drunk, and his father, turning in disgust tells him from now on he can get along without any financial assistance from home. Patrick is bitter but Hanka soon assures him they can get along. Bitter years of struggle follow and Patrick more and more relapses into states of intoxication, but Hanka carries on and her whole life is bound up with her son Russel who brings splendid marks home from school. When Patrick's father dies, he leaves his inheritance to Hanka for her courage, and the little family move into the Reagan mansion. Once Russell comes home with a blackened eye and he admits to his mother he got it fighting one of the schoolboys who called his father a common drunkard. Hanka holds the lad to her and Patrick, entering, is covered with shame. Once again he promises to give up drink and in his remorse he endears himself more than ever to Hanka.

Russell grows up, studies law, and falls in love with a girl Mary, who stands by him staunchly in his political aspirations. A few days before election, Russell is to make a speech. He has come out strongly for prohibition and his political opponents have planted hecklers in the audience determined to break up the meeting. Russell begins an impassioned speech and his mother and Mary look on proudly until one of the hecklers utters a derisive cry and calls out that Russell is only insisting on prohibition because his father is a notorious drunkard. Other voices take up the cry and when a man arises next to Patrick, whose senses are befogged with the drink he has taken to celebrate his son's speech, and gives a eatcall, Patrick strikes out with his fists. In a moment all is confusion. Men fight each other, hats are torn off and women scream. One man raises a bottle to bring it down on Mary's head, and with a sudden leap, Patrick puts himself between and the bottle crashes on his own head. Mary is saved but the blow is fatal to Patrick. As Russell, Hanka and Mary hover over his body, Patrick wistfully begs for forgiveness for having started all the trouble. He urges Hanka to stop crying, saying she'll be better off without him, and smiles to see Mary is safe for his boy. "This time, you win," he adds with a flash of his old charm, "I'll never drink again, Hanka."

TINSEL WOMEN

Louise Gree Drama File No. 10225

HELD closely in the arms of Lee Norris, Alice feels her resistance slowly overcome and despite the misgivings of her parents, she consents to marry him. Within a short time, however, Alice realizes that to Lee the chase is all-important, the prize once won, without interest. More and more frequently he phones in that business keeps him from coming home to the dinner she has laboriously prepared, and when once, after she has wistfully put the dishes baek, too disappointed to eat alone, Alice calls Lee at his office she discovers that he has already left. Until the small hours of the morning she lies awake, eyes staring into the darkness, but when Lee tiptoes in, she pretends to be asleep. When her child Lorice is born, Lee becomes more restless than ever, abhoring the chores and losing his temper when Alice holds up his supper when the baby is sick. To her parents, Alice writes cheerful letters, explaining that they can't come again this Christmas because Lee is so busy, but that they are very happy.

It is Sunday. Alice and Lorice are at Church. Lee is conspicuous by his absence. The minister announces a violin solo by Mrs. Lee Norris, and as Alice steps forward and begins to play, her music seems the apotheosis of all the struggle and gallantry of soul that characterizes her. Lorice's eyes are fixed adoringly on her mother, and as Alice returns softly to her seat, an impressive silence fills the room until the minister begins his sermon. Outside Alice receives the commendation of the other Church-goers and at last she and Lorice laughing gaily enter the house. Alice goes to the closet to put Lorice's little coat away, but as she notices all Lee's things are gone, her eyes widen in amazement. On the table she finds a note. He has tired of this quiet life and has gone away with someone more suited to him. Like a statue Alice remains rooted to the spot and Lorice, frightened, calls, "Mamma, mamma, look at me." Slowly Alice lowers her staring eyes to her child and gathering her in her arms, weeps despairingly. The telephone rings. Mechanically she answers it and learns that Lee and a girl with him have been killed in an automobile aocident. Alice's hands smoothe the soft golden hair of her child, and she knows she must go on for Lorice.

It is Spring again. Alice, more mature, still beautiful, is back with her parents, and as they see her gentleness, her gravity, they urge her to go for a vacation somewhere, where there will be nothing to bring back old memories. With Lorice, Alice goes to Lake Arrowhead, where there is just such solitude as her soul cries for. She is playing her violin, and the hills echo the beautiful music. A man stops at the sound and, unable to resist, follows the strange music to its source. He starts at sight of the beautiful musician with the child beside her, and begging forgiveness for intruding says softly that only one who has suffered could play like that. He learns that her husband is no longer living, and softly asks if he may come again—soon. Then one night, when Alice has put Lorice to bed, Norman comes again, and as they sit alone, overlooking the lake, he tells her of his life, of the girl he was engaged to, who had left him waiting at the Church—thought it was a good joke, and how he had sworn never to trust another woman—until he had met Alice. Gently he kisses her, and as he plans the future—just Lorice and Alice and he, a great peace comes over Alice.

LIFE IS SWEET

Etta Sanders Drama File No. 10128

FOR years Mrs. White, still beautiful in spite of her white hair, had been living on the money her late husband had left her. Neither she nor her daughter Betty had given a thought to money until, without warning, the town bank crashed. Like hundreds of other depositors, the Whites found themselves bereft of their fortunes and faced with the immediate need of money. Betty, with the easy adaptability of youth, left school and despite her mother's protests set about getting a position. At the office of Judge Nyles whom she had once interviewed for her college paper, Betty explained that she had had no previous business experience but, given an opportunity she would make good. The Judge looked across at Betty with twinkling eyes and smiling at her spirit replied he thought she would too. Mrs. White sighed at the thought of Betty in the business world but her daughter assured her the Judge was a darling and she loved to work. Each night Betty would come home with a new story about how handsome of her employer was and Mrs. White sighted at her youth.

But, released of the worry about money, and feeling independent now that she was earning a regular salary, Betty began running around with a new crowd. When dark circles began appearing under her eyes from dancing all night, Mrs. White remonstrated. To her the smoking and freedom was unwholesome and despite all Betty's assurances that her mother was just old fashioned, Mrs. White worried. Even the Judge notices Betty's peaked look and insisted that she go home early and get some sleep. Once Betty exclaimed to her mother that she thought that the Judge was more than a little interested and looking up was astonished to see that her mother thought she could do worse than marry the older man. Laughing, Betty seized her wrap, and kissing her mother's cheek, ran out to join Fred Warling, captain of a college football team.

Then Betty began to repent of the many evenings she left her mother alone and when the Judge asked if he might come over some night, Betty thought it would do her mother good to have company for dinner and spend one evening at home with her. Friday night, however, when Betty finished her work, she saw Fred waiting outside with a new painted flivver and at his insistence that she be the first to drive in it, she forgot about the Judge and her mother. At home Mrs. White spent hours of anguish over Betty's neglect to come home or call and it was the Judge who comforted her and assured her there could be nothing wrong or they would have been notified. It was almost dawn when Betty, yawning, came in to state sleepily that their car had broken down on an unfrequented road and the Judge signalled Mrs. White to say nothing to Betty of her fears. Thereafter in the anxious watching of Betty throught all the quarrels and hurts of puppy love, it was Judge Nyles who gave advice and comfort and the day that Betty sent home a painfully brief telegram explaining that she and Fred had eloped, it was Judge Nyles who gently took Mrs. White hand and asked, now that she didn't have Betty to worry about any more, would she consider marrying him?

AIN'T LOVE WONDERFUL

Ucebe Sansouci Comedy File No. 10082

AFTER four years at college Tom Johnson is returning home to his father's ranch and elaborate preparations are in progress to celebrate his arrival. His father and mother in hilarious new clothes climb into the old Ford and John blinks at sight of their outfits. Ma cries a little and Pa blows his nose violently at the sight of their son. But John, the hired man hops up and down as he waits for the Ford and starts after his girl Rosie. The roads are bad and poor John gets stuck. He gets out to push but when he bends forward, Rosie shifts into reverse and when John pushes back, Rosie jumps the flivver forward so John leaves her sitting there and patiently plods back to get the mules, and thus they arrive grandly. Tom helps Rosie from the car and she trips landing with her arms about his neck while John is so mad that he tears a bale of hay to pieces in the privacy of the barn.

There are many speeches at supper and Rosie sits down coyly next to Tom whose discomfort is increased when the indomitable swain, John inserts himself amazingly between. After supper they dance and Rosie seizes Tom who at sight of John's dismay decides to have a little fun at the hired man's expense. Accordingly when John tells the objecting Rosie it is time to go home and resolutely plunks her down in the flivver. Rosie sulks at being taken from the dance so early but about a mile on a masked man jumps on the running board and at the point of a water pistol takes Rosie from the terrified John. However, Tom begins to repent of his joke when the flattered Rosie throws her arm about his neck and tells him he is a hero to rescue her from John. Tom tries to put her straight and at last, infuriated, Rosie allows him to take her home. Meanwhile John too excited to start the flivver jumps out and runs all the way to Rosie's house, excitedly tells of fifteen armed men who kidnapped Rosie from him with cannons and long knives and Mr. and Mrs. Smaekover in old fashioned nighties begin a search led by the now courageous John. After alarming the entire neighborhood the Smackovers return home only to be greeted by an enthusiastic Rosie who blithely informs them that Tom was so much in love with her that he carried her off by force. The Smackovers thereupon override Tom's explanations and prepares for an immediate ceremony, returning to the Johnson ranch to reassemble the guests for the wedding. Tom's distress is as nothing compared to the forlorn John's and at last Tom gets an idea, asks for an hour to dress properly, and informs the elated John that he's going to let him marry Rosie. Tom dressed the awkward John in his clothes, shaves him clean and trims his amazing hair. The rest of the precious minutes are spent instructing the awkward hired man how to walk without tripping over his own feet. The wedding is executed without too many slips and the bride and groom leave. Rosie lifts her curtain serving as a wedding veil and a little gasp escapes as she recognizes her bridegroom as John not Tom, but to his great relief she throws her arms about his neck philosophically and breathes, "Ain't love wonderful!" And it seems to be!

THE DOUBLE TRAIL

Elsie Hobbs Merrill Drama File No. 10229

FOR a moment Harold stared speechlessly at his fiancee as she informed him that she had fallen in love with another man. Then, hopelessly, he returned home. For days his family, the wealthy Browns watched him narrowly. It wasn't like Harold to be so quiet. Something was going to break soon. At last it came. Saying nothing to anybody, he got into his roadster and set off grimly, it didn't matter where. He just wanted to get away from everybody who knew anything about him and Mary. Hours passed. Harold's car flew over the winding roads. Never stopping for food or rest, he pressed on. At last, sharply rounding a horse shoe bend in the road, his car turned over. Hours later, his body, crushed by his car, was found by Althea Bartlett, daughter of the country doctor. Running back for help she led her brother and father to the spot and they gently lifted the broken body and brought it to their home. Dr. Bartlett shook his head over the boy's condition but operating in his little office, he looked relieved as the pulse grew stronger. In the days that followed, while the boy remained in a stupor, th Bartlett's searched his clothing and car for some sign of indentification, but beyond unmistakable evidence that he was wealthy they could find nothing. Even after Harold regained consciousness, he groaned when they asked him whom they could notify, and insisted he didn't want to see anybody. It was Althea who remained with him long hours each day, smoothing his pillows and bathing his hot forehead when the pain of his crushed ribs made beads of perspiration stand out on his brow, and at last, finding her sympathetic, Harold poured out the whole story of Mary's betrayal. How he had loved her desperately, and she had pretended to return his feelings. He would never loved anybody again, Harold cried, while Althea, knowing in her heart that she was hopelessly in love with him, nodded. But when at last Harold was able to sit up, restlessness again seized him and in his longing for Mary, he suddenly stopped Althea as she read, and taking her in his arms kissed her. Dazed at the show of affection, Althea, who had never loved before, returned the kiss with child like ardor, and as he pushed her from him and ran his fingers through his hair, realizing it wasn't love for her that prompted this gesture, she ran into the house. In her own room, she sobbed, while Harold, realizing something was wrong, weakly tried to make amends. Then one day, Harold realized that it didn't hurt him any more to think of Mary. In a New Yorw newspaper which Althea's brother Philip brought home, he read of Mary's marriage, and to his own amazement, felt only relief that he was free from bondage to her. That day he thanked the Bartlett's for all they had done for him, and prepared to return home. Only when he tried to say goodbye to Althea, did he realize what a fool he was. Of course he didn't care about Mary, because he loved Althea. When he tried to kiss her, she drew back sharply, but this time Harold meant it and when he returned to New York it was with Althea whom he was soon marry. And the Browns, rejoicing to have their son back, happy again, fondly took Althea to their hearts.

WORLD SERIES

Frank Miros Drama File No. 10261

"HI FELLERS!" Spike Martin crossed the baseball field and as he watched the remarkable playing of the two strangers his mouth fell open. One of them was a girl! Jack Gordon introduced himself and his freckled twin sister Betty. It was some time before Spike could get used to playing with a girl, but with the realization that she was at least as good a player as he and Jack, resentment of her quickened to admiration and then to puppy love. Years passed. Spike moved. From time to time from different campuses arose tales of the baseball prowess of Spike Martin at Southern State, and of Jack Gordon at Yale. But it remained for them to be reunited when the scouts of the Chicago Cubs picked from the many campuses of the country two players, a catcher and a pitcher, Spike and Jack. Pumping each others hands in delight at the meeting, Spike inquired after Betty and learned that she had grown into a personable young lady who had, through the years continued to pride herself on her ability to give her twin a stiff workout on the baseball field. When Spike met Betty again, he stared at her incredulously. Impossible this well built tall young lady should be little freckle-faced Betty Gordon. And in the days when Betty came down to the field to watch her brother play, to criticise, and to take a hand now and then, Spike fell in love with her again. Meanwhile Jack, the pitching hope of the Chicago Cubs fell in love with Margery Lane. Brilliant as a player, Jack showed a regrettable tendency to show up late for practice, throw out his pitching arm by defending Margery against a brutish admirer, or othewise prove erratic. At length Pop Beck, gray haired manager of the cubs warned Jack that if anything happened to him in the World Series, he wouldn't be signed for the next season. It was the last game of the World Series. They had lost the one before to the Yanks, 5-2 through the poor pitching battery. There was only one good man left to the Cubs, Jack. If he failed them their chances were over. The night before Spike dancing with Betty in the hotel grill asked her to marry him and she replied flply, "If you win the World Series," while Jack dancing with Margery was planning their honeymoon after the game and telling her his prospects were a job with the Cubs again next season. Pop Beck came by smiling, asked his boys to retire early, and with a playful prod warned Jack his threat still held if anything happened to him, he'd be dropped.

But the next morning as Betty hovered about her brother and reminded him of a few of the tricks they had practiced together for getting an unexpected jump on the ball, the telephone rang and a white faced Jack dashed from the room before Betty could stop him. "It's Margery," he cried, "auto crash." The hour for the game approached. Spike and Betty assured each other Jack would come back, but at last, in desperation, Betty pulled her brother's cap down over her eyes, and striding to the pitcher's box struck out player after player while the stands marvelled. The fifth inning, Jack came back pitched out the game and turned the tie score to 3-2 favor of the Cubs. Then rushed back to Margery's hospital room. Pop Beck found out about Jack's remissness, but with the World Series theirs, and Betty's brilliant playing, he agreed smilingly to give Jack and his bride the new contract for a wedding present, and Spike, alone, pressed to Betty's lips her reward for her spectacular playing.

THE PHANTOM OF THE AIR

H. Allen Snowden Drama File No. 10315

THE office of Fred Parker, general manager of the Trans-Air Flying service operating between Washington, D. C. and the West is astir with the latest outrage—a mail plane, fuly equipped and flying a precious cargo, has disappeared. No trace of the plane or its passengers can be found. Agents of the Postal Department are sent to investigate, and gritting his teeth, Parker offers every co-operation. To add to his worries the hard-boiled hostess on one of his planes resigns claiming she isn't going to work in a plane that's liable to dissolve in thin air any moment. Chewing fiercely on his cigar, Parker phones an agency and critically surveys pretty Phyllis Lunt who has come to apply for the position. She has never done this sort of work before, but she is desperate for a position, and Parker's eyes lower imperceptibly as he hires her. The first trip finds her returning enthusiastic about travel through the air and as she lilts across the field, her high heels catch in the ground and she turns her ankle. A newly-hired field attendant saves her from falling, and laughingly her ankle twinges and Al Cummings offers his assistance. Leaning heavily on his arms, she hobbles to she thanks him. As she tries to step down, however, the lunch counter, and as she assures him that a moment's rest will fix her up, he suggests they have something to eat. Like two children they laugh together over the plain food, and over hot baked beans they fall in love. From then on they meet frequently and at last Al tells her he is afraid for her, and wants her to quit the air service and become his wife. Held tightly in his arms, she laughs at his fears for her safety but at last agrees. When she tells Parker of her plans to quit, however, he looks at her levelly and asks her to stay on for one more flight, until they can get another hostess to replace her. Al begs her not to go, and they have their first quarrel over how much loyalty she owes the company. All night Al waits for news from her but she doesn't telegraph, as he has begged, that she is safe. Returning miserably to the field, he learns that the plane has disappeared. Al is appalled. At the airport frantic investigations proceed, but the mystery remains baffling. At length Al climbs secretly into the mail ship. Out of the night a phantom ship, apparently aflame appears. The pilot loses control. Al jumps using a parachute. The phantom ship rides the mail plane to earth by bringing its wheels down on the upper wings and suddenly lights flash on dazzlingly revealing an airport below. As the ship lands the lights as suddenly are extinguished and the mail plane passengers are captured before their eyes can become accustomed to the darkness. Al lands, makes his way through the brush to the mouth of a natural cave on time to prevent the killing of the passengers. Freeing the pilot and the others, he attacks the bandits and finds they have killed all the previous prisoners with the exception of Phyllis, whom was being held for the leader—Fred Parker.

They discover the phantom plane to be a fast motored ship painted with phosphorus to give the startling effect, and complete equipment for receiving messages in code from general manager Fred Parker, who on discovery, jumps to his death. Al reveals himself to be a United States agent, and the mystery solved, he takes Phyllis in his arms and warns her he's going to be an orgre of a husband but no more plane rides for her.

NO APOLOGIES DUE

Annie Mae Hamilton Drama File No. 10276

SINCE the death of his wife, Donald had given his whole life to his child Helen and as she had grown into maturity a bond of understanding and love had sprung up between them that was rare between father and daughter. There was no thought they did not share until one day, bringing her father to his office in her little roadster, Helen met Bob Lawhorn, young salesman who had come to induce her father to sell modernistic furniture in his conservative store. Donald had insisted that his firm had no use for these new fangled gadgets and Bob, disappointedly had left. Helen smiled at his enthusiasm for the furniture which he had designed himself, and somehow they were going out to dinner together. From the first Bob had fallen violently in love but when he begged her to marry him and come to live in Grand Rapids, she had looked out the window for a long time, then holding his hands tightly had explained that she couldn't leave her father. At first Bob had scoffed, but Helen was very serious. It wasn't as if Donald had anything else. He had never belonged to clubs, made friends even. His whole life had been given over to Helen and if she left him alone now, he would have nothing. Bob had tried to induce her to have her father live with them, but Donald couldn't give up his store any more than Bob could give up the business that was just beginning to succeed in Grand Rapids. And so at last, Bob had gone on alone. And Donald, noticing Helen's unusual gravity had asked about the Lawhorn young man, Helen's eyes darkened as she explained that she and Bob had quarreled, and when, half-suspecting the truth, had tried to interfere, she had begged him never again to mention Bob Lawhorn to her.

Years passed. Helen never went out with any one else despite Donald's urging. Then one day Donald met Grace Calhoun, a splendid business woman, and Donald who had never thought of other women since his wife died, fell in love with all the intensity of the late forties. But when at last he could conceal it no longer from Grace he explained to her that he was not free to marry because of Helen. "Nonsence," Grace exclaimed. "She's young, she'll marry and have babies of her own," but Donald remembering the Bob Lawhorn affair shook his head. Grace, grown desperate over this denial of their love, pleaded they had only a few years left to them, that it was folly to go on this way, setting aside a feeling that was fine and true. And Helen, from whom Donald's thoughts were never kept, realizing that she stood in the way rode her car with an abandon that terrifed Donald. But it was Grace at length who, learning Bob Lawhorn's address, sent for him. "Now Donald, you can tell her about us," Grace urged, but still Donald hesitated. It was a white-faced Bob who came and Helen, coming up the steps, stopped and stared. His arms opened to her and with a cry she ran into them. With flaming cheeks she looked at her father, but he was pressing Grace's hand happily. "You didn't tell me," she cried, and the night was filled with gaiety.

AT THE STROKE OF TWELVE

William Schneider Mystery File No. 9955

MORTIMER FENSHIRE, retired criminal lawyer, now owner of the Wise Owl Inn, twenty miles outside of London, cryptically rereads the black parchment note predicting his murder. Expecting Dhu of Scotland Yard, Fenshire impatiently opens his door to several unexpected tourists and unconsciously regards each one with suspicion. At the stroke of twelve, while rereading again the note, a hooded figure enters the French window and buries a huge knife in the inn keeper's back.

The next morning there is confusion at the discovery of the murder. June Hailey, private detective takes charge of the investigation, volunteers the reason for her coming and requests each of the guests to do likewise. Morrison admits that, knowing there was a fortune hidden in the hotel, he had come to buy the inn from the unsuspecting owner. His candor is astonishing but when he says he believes the other guests all came for the same reason there is a protest. The militant female, Mrs. Godman says that she wanted the hotel as a sort of summer home and her meek husband, as always, agrees with her. Dr. Franz Wilhelm claims he was passing through with his patient, the bundled up Mr. Elsworth. It is agreed that nobody leave and June sends for the police. Another threatening note is received, but after midnight the guests retire. Elsworth, receiving a note descends to find the promised treasure, but the clock had been set ahead and, unprotected, he meets the same fate Fenshire did. Crestfallen the Doctor admits that Elsworth was his son traveling disguised to escape recognition by Fenshire. June, however, informs Morrison that she suspects the Doctor and although she reconstructs the crime, cannot find a good motive.

That night Morrison gives Holmes, the clerk, drugged wine and propping up a cushion in a chair, to resemble a man, hides. At the stroke of twelve the cloaked figure emerges and buries the knife in the cushion. Morrison leaps up but the murderer escapes to the roof and in the storm loses footing and plunges to the ground. Morrison uncloaks the figure and reveals June Hailey, the murderer of Elsworth. Holmes, has previously recognized Morrison as Detective Baynard and now Baynard explains that for years he had trailed the Weasel. He had discovered him in association with June Hailey, a former circus knife thrower. The Weasel, wishing to avenge himself upon Fenshire who had once sent him to prison, had murdered the inn keeper, after kidnapping the Doctor's son and posing as Elsworth. June, however, had murdered her accomplice to get the treasure for herself. The Doctor learns his son is still alive. Baynard retires, and the young Holmes looks admiringly after the clever detective, who winds up his explanation by saying that he, like the Doctor had learned of the treasure hidden in the hotel, and had come in place of Detective Dhu. June had pierced his disguise and was planning his death next and Holmes, drugged by the wine June had prepared, was to have been suspected, while she escaped with the money.

GLOWING EMBERS

Mrs. Frank G. Gross, Jr. Drama File No. 9719

THERE had never been any love lost between Don Carson and Grace Brent's aunt Jane. The night that Don kept Grace out until quarter past eleven celebrating her birthday, Grace returned to find her grim visaged Aunt waiting up for her. For hours Aunt Jane ranted about what a useless fellow Don was and how he'd come to no good dringing and keeping late hours, but when Aunt Jane ended by forbidding Grace to see Don for a month, Grace rebelled. Life without Don for a month would be insupportable, and when Don learned of Aunt Jane's decision, he induced Grace to elope with him. After all she was of age, and he could manage to support her.

Like children, Grace and Don planned their elopement and in their first few months of marriage life knew greater happiness than even they had dreamed. Aunt Jane forbade Don to set foot in her house and sent a curt note to her niece informing her she would live to rue her marriage, but Grace and Don forgot everything but their own bliss in being together. In the woods back of their cottage, Don taught Grace his favorite sports. Soon, dressed in a hunting outfit over which they both rocked with laughter, Don was teaching his little wife how to cast a fishing line and how to manage a canoe. But Don's greatest sport was hunting and Grace was such a little person to handle a rifle. It was only after considerable pleading that she induced her husband to teach her how to shoot and soon he was complimenting her upon her marksmanship and Grace was glowing with pride.

Then Don's great business opportunity came as a Junior partner in the firm of Trevelyn and Company. Grace rejoiced with Don until she discovered that late hours were a necessity. Once, while she waited in the outer office for Don, she saw a lovely young woman come out, and discovering that she was Miss Pearl Trevelyn, Grace bit her lip. Don resented her inference, and the next time he called to say he would be retained, Grace, tired from preparing a special dinner for Don, sarcastically asked if Miss Trevelyn were at the conferences. It was one o'clock before Don came home and Grace lay staring into the darkness as the fumes of Don's drink tainted breath reached her. Don explained that business required that he keep a bottle handy, but when Aunt Jane, suffering from her rheumatism sent for her, she suffered at the probing questions of her thin-lipped aunt. Then, one day, the doctor told Grace she was going to have a baby. Scarcely able to suppress her excitement, Grace planned to tell Don after supper, but he flew through his meal then dashed from the house claiming he had to see Trevelyn. Ugly doubts arose, and when hours later Don returned Grace furiously informed him he was making a fool of her carrying on an affair with Pearl. Higher and higher her voice rose and when Don tried to stop her Grace gasped as he put his hand over her mouth. Then it was that Grace told Don their marriage was a mistake and she returned to her Aunt Jane.

When Don called, Aunt Jane ordered him away and Grace nursing her bitterness became so ill that when the baby came they barely managed to pull her through. Aunt Jane never told Grace that Don had tried to see her, and Grace, in desperation went into the woods with the rifle that Don had taught her to use. It was there that Don found her, and as he wept at how close she had been to suicide. Grace realized their love had never died. Together they went back to find happiness.

WISDOM OF WOMEN

Ada H. St. John Drama File No. 10222

EVER since the first legend had been told her, the slim and lovely Ko-koh-mo, betrothed to the Chippewa Chief Grey Eagle, had heard tales of the cruelty of the hated Sioux. Now, as she beached her canoe and gracefully stepped into the forest, she drew back in terror at sight of an enemy brave lying upon the ground. But a moment later she realized that the young chieftain was still and could do her no harm. As she stepped fastidiously aside, a pity made her turn, and bending over the still figure, she heard the faint beats of his heart. One glance at the swollen leg showed her that the young warrior was dying of snake bite. She shivered as she thought of him here alone, breathing his last, and carrying him to her retreat in the woods, she lay him upon her bed of furs, made medicine of forest roots, and each day returned secretly to watch the progress of her patient as the poultices restored life to him. From his bed, Black Hawk watched her in wonder and as love filled his heart he begged her to come to his people. But even as he spoke both knew the impossibility of which they dreamed. Black Hawk, son of the Sioux chieftain, could not bring home a Chippewa bride, neither could he hope to disappear into the forest with her, since the call of his people was strong upon him, and already the ceremonies of marriage were beginning for Ko-koh-mo. At last, panting from her long run, Ko-koh-mo came to Black Hawk and begged him to go lest her people find him on their land and kill him. One long moment they held each other close, then parted.

Years passed. Ko-koh-mo, still young and straight left her place in the forest to come to the council ring, and a little smile touched her lips as she saw her son, Swift Arrow rise in all his young strength before his elders, and with bated breath he told them how he and two other boys had chased deer to the hunting ground of the Sioux. When they realized how far they had strayed they started for home, but ere long they were surrounded and taken captive. Swift Arrow alone had escaped. The others would be punished for the crime of trespass by having their feet burned by a slow fire until they could never walk again. Horror gripped the Chippewas. Only a handful remained in camp, the others having gone North for the winter supply of meat and skins. They were helpless to save their own. Then Ko-koh-mo sent Swift Arrow for two ponies, and with her boy she rode across forest and streams until dawn found them at the camp of the Sioux. As the two riders dashed into the midst of the warriors preparing the torture fire, a murmur of protest arose. Knives were drawn, arrows fitted to bows. Black Hawk himself came foward with lowering brow, but Ko-koh-mo swept her son's protective body from her, and facing Black Hawk asked him if he had forgotten Ko-koh-mo who had many, many moons ago saved his life. Memory flooded over the aging warrior, and dropping his arms, he ordered the captives released, and two riders fled. While Ko-koh-mo and Black Hawk softly spoke across the barrier of the years, Swift Arrow's eyes followed a lovely Sioux maiden and it was to happen at last that peace was made between Chippewa and Sioux through the love of a man for a maid.

GIVE AND TAKE

A. G. Gregory Drama File No. 9655

IN the traditional manner, George carried his bride over the threshold of their new home, and as she clung to him they planned their years of happiness together. Each night after his work in the steel mill, big George would come up the front path, kiss his wife while she giggled at the smudges left on her cheek, and then proceed directly to the shower from which he would emerge clean and still whistling, to partake of the delicious dinner Jane had prepared. But then came the bridge club. One day Jane met Lora, a former school mate who had married before her and was now back in town with a brand new divorce. For the first time, looking at Lora's chic little hat and carelessly worn silver fox furs, Jane felt shabby and as Lora affectedly remarked that Jane was prettier than ever, Jane began to feel that perhaps her home life wasn't as happy as she supposed. That night when George returned from work, Jane scolded him for spoiling her makeup, and despite all his efforts to cheer her up Jane remained sullen through dinner. George laughed aloud when she asked why he couldn't give up his position and get a white collar job, and he explained he was lucky to have work at all these days. Besides, he added, he was making a much better salary than he could sitting behind a desk.

Through Lora, Jane began to join bridge and other women's clubs where extra-marital philandering was the main topic of discussion. Once Laura stopped to introduce Jane to a "friend" and seeing Jim's eyes light up as he informed the "little housewife" that anytime she wanted to break away from matrimony she could be sure of at least one companion, Lora frowned and reminded Jim they were late for the tea dansant. Jane watched them drive off in Jim's long red roadster. That night she evaded George's embrace and when he came down to supper he found Jane busy applying eye shadow before a mirror. "We're dining out to-night," Jane said and George whistled in amazement. Thereafter there was no further dining at home. Jane informed George she was tired of being a slave to a stove. Their marriage was a mistake. What they needed was excitement. Grimly George asked if she were very sure of her decision. But Jane had made up her mind. They could still be friends, she said, but they ought to go out with other people for a change.

All night George pondered over their shattered marriage. The next night he was apparently reconciled to Jane's decision. Jane was very modern about it. They would go to a party together and there separate. George started to protest at Jane's daring dress but he held his tongue. As they entered, Jim, dancing with Lora, recognized Jane and rushed over with a cry of welcome. Biting her lip, Lora looked at them, then walked over to George, handsome in the tuxedo he had not worn since his wedding. From across the room, Jane looked over Jim's shoulder and saw Lora look deeply into George's eyes. She began to wish she had never come. But George seemed to like this life. Nights he dashed off and once, noticing Jane staying home called, "Aren't you going out to-night, dear?" Desperately she held back her tears. Meanwhile Lora unable to make George kiss her, called him one evening to see Jane in Jim's arms. George saw Jane struggle, rushed in, knocked Jim out, and as he carried the weeping Jane off, he said, "No more running around, honey?" Jane nodded and as he kissed her sobbed, "I thought I had lost you, darling."

THE JIG SAW SURGEON

Frances N. Braly Comedy File No. 10263

FOR a half century John Smith and his wife Julie had lived as typical mountaineers in an isolated little cabin. To them the progress of civilization was a rumor and the coming of the automobile a herald of universal doom. But when a government representative arrived at the little farm and offered them $5,000, a veritable fortune for the land, John and Julie hesitated, and at last, at sight of the money, yielded. Immediately they became the prey of high pressure salesmen, and one, more enterprising than the others, at last sold them a shiny if somewhat balky flivver. In the hills John learned to drive, and finally, with the assurance of the salesman that he was a natural born chauffeur, ventured to seat his wife besides him and for the first time in their lives, the Smiths braved the city.

Down from the hills drove the Smiths and with heads held high drove into the city traffic. At the first red light, John bumped into a luxurious limousine. A crowd gathered, The radiator of the flivver resembled a folded up accordion, and both John and Julie bore upon their faces the masks of shattered glass. The policeman, taking in the situation, scattered the crowd, and shooed the badly frightened pair up a nearby stairway to a doctor's office. With considerable trepidation, the pair made their way into the doctor's waiting room and gingerly awaited the coming of the doctor. From the inner office floated a musical girlish voice, "That's wrong, doctor, you've got that nose on the wrong man." John gulped. A gust of laughter sounded. "He looks so funny," squealed the girl. "I'm going to pick out Jackie's other eye now," a deep bass uttered. Julie clung to John. "The wretches," she wailed, but John only gripped the arms of his chair speechlessly. "Maybe we oughtn't to have come," he managed at last, but as he rose, the man's voice swore, "Now I've lost his other ear. Look for it in the waste paper basket, won't you?" and mopping his brow, John fell back helplessly. As the laughter sounded again and again and ejaculations of mirth echoed after each error, John whispered, "It oughtn't be allowed, I'm going to heave that door down." Julie's trembling hand on his shoulder restrained him and as the poor country folk turned to slip from that terrible place of carnage, a tall man with a satchel blocked the entrance. "Waited long?" he asked cheerfully. Julie winced and John stoutly replied, "Yes sir, but we're going now." Then as Doctor Latimer studied their injuries he motioned them into the inner room. "I'll have you all bandaged up in a jiffy," he smiled. But as he reached for the knob, John and Julie tumbled headlong down the stairs, into the street, and clinging to each other for support, vanished in the direction from whence they had come. The doctor, amazed, shrugged his shoulders and threw the inner door open. The operating table, desk, chairs, and floor were covered with small pieces of a jig-saw puzzle and as his nurse and interne brother looked up inquiringly, Doctor Latimer, realized now what had terrified the Smiths, and with a roar of laughter tried to explain. But back in the hills, Julie and John comforted each other and assured themselves that henceforth they would spend their days among their own people.

HUMAN FREIGHT

Carl F. Anderson Drama File No. 10317

WINCING as she glances into the water front cafes, seeing ribald merrymakers drinking and eating, Bessie Marlowe turns as she hears the faint cry of a woman. Pityingly she picks her up and helps her to her home nearby. Once inside the house, however, she is grabbed by strong arms and violently thrust into a room where girls with despairing eyes welcome her.

The scene changes to the notorious "Black Ship" wharf saloon. A sailor accidently reels against Captain "Bull" Larson. Enraged, Larson grabs him by the throat and strikes him a terrific blow. The man falls and several others move to defend him, only to reconsider and fall back. Larson continues to drink. The swinging doors open and Jim Brandon enters. Seeing the inert body, he bends to aid. Larson roars his displeasure and as Jim eyes him, unwincing, at the other's threats, the two close. There is a terrific battle but just as Larson is getting the worst of it, one of his mates crashes a bottle on the head of Jim who sinks heavily to the floor. Recovering consciousness, Jim finds a girl bathing his forehead. Without glancing at her he sits at the table and orders two drinks, but as she pushes hers away he turns to look and exclaims, she doesn't seem to belong here. Nancy tells him she has come to find her sister Bessie who left home a year ago after a fight with her father over her sweetheart. They had received one letter from her, postmarked Frisco, and after the death of her father, Nancy had begun a vain search aided by the police. Jim sees Nancy home.

Meanwhile in the hold of a sinister looking ship, Larson orders his mate to Shanghai six men for the stoke hole and as the fellow leaves, orders him to get that Brandon fellow. When Jim returns to Nancy's boarding house, her landlady shows him a letter purporting to have come from Jim, telling her to come to him at the Seaman's hospital. In Nancy's room Jim notices the picture of a man, then dashes off to help Nancy. Suddenly he is felled from behind and carried aboard Larson's ship. Larson grins vengefully as he sees Jim and has him put in the stoke hole. Pity rises in Jim's breast for the fainting stripped men forced to feed the furnaces and as he picks up a shovel and begins work he starts in recognition of the man next to him as the one whose picture he has seen in Nancy's room. Meanwhile in another part of the ship barrels marked "glassware" are unloaded and helpless girls dumped out, to await sale.

Jim, watching his chance for escape, orders Steve to take a hit, and as the guards rush to him, Jim strikes out, gathers the guns and gives one to Steve. On deck, Jim discovers the human freight locked in the hold and hears a cry. To his horror he sees Larson assaulting Nancy in his stateroom. But Larson wheels, using Nancy as a shield and Jim is attacked from behind. Helpless he endures Larson's insults. A chinese junk is sighted, and Larson immediately attends to the business of selling his girls, planning to keep Nancy for himself. Watching his chance, Brandon escapes, jumps into the sea, and as he is fired upon, apparently sinks, only to climb aboard a junk, make his way back to Nancy and Steve and escape with them to the bridge. The alarm is given. They fire bravely and Jim knocks down every man that tries to scale the bridge, meanwhile setting off rockets to attract a ship. He sees Nancy firing valiantly while she supports the head of the wounded Steve. Larson climbs up and in single handed battle forces Jim over the rail which breaks. The two men fall into the sea, and when the rescuing American ship which has pulled up alongside tries to find Jim they see only shark fins. Among the girls freed is Bessie who is restored to Nancy and Steve.

Two years pass before Nancy sees Jim and cries out incredulously. He sees her child and explains that he didn't come back to her because he knew she loved Steve. But at last Nancy convinces him that it is Steve and Bessie who have married, and as Jim falters a proposal, Nancy laughingly interrupts and answers, "Yes."

LOOPHOLE

J. W. Murphy Mystery File No. 10288

WHEN the respected Mayor Jenkins of Myrtleville, and his wife fail to return from their summer cottage or respond to the ringing of the telephone, the alarmed citizens call the 'Cain' Detective Agency. Captain Cain being out as usual assigns Jack, a sleepy detective, and Pete, a newcomer afire with correspondence school methods to investigate. All the way up Pete asks questions and theorizes until when they reach the boarded up place he has worked himself up into an acute state of nerves. Pete creeps up to the windows in the rear and a shriek summons Jack. As they stare in horror, Pete runs to the car, gets a hammer and breaks in the door. A cat runs out, and Pete, terrified shoots three times in rapid succession, his bullets lodging close to the ceiling. Inside the still house lie the two murdered bodies of the Mayor and his wife. Shaking with terror they phone Captain Cain who arrives with a shrieking of breaks. A long search reveals no fingerprints. Although no powder marks are discovered, the coroner at length makes out his certificate as a suicide pact. Only Pete is dissatisfied, and the Captain and Jack laugh at him for trying to make a big case out of it. To make sure he won't lose his job, Pete takes on the duties of a janitor as well and the Captain grunts as he sees Pete industriously waxing the place. He is somewhat less pleased when he discovers that with greater thoroughness than judgment, Pete has applied his wax to the desk and chairs as well. Days pass. Captain Cain, noticing Pete's study of the details tells him if he still feels that he can show it is murder, Pete should go home and have dinner, then secretly search the Mayor's summer home for workable clues. In his excitement over his instructions, Pete forgets he hasn't had dinner, and rushing out to the estate begins investigating. While examining a bullet he has found, he hears a faint ticking sound in the davenport and uncovers a time bomb set for one o'clock. Disconnecting it, he searches in earnest, discovers fresh putty on the window pane, and a bucket of putty hidden under shrubbery in the garden, all of which bear the same finger prints as the infernal machine. Returning to the office, he makes photostatic copies of the finger prints and when Captain Cain arrives, excitedly turns over the evidence to his chief. At the trial a suspect is grilled and he sobs his innocence despite the incriminating finger prints. However, when Pete comes to the stand he accuses Captain Cain of the murder. His chief had killed the Mayor and his wife, set the hasp night lock, then removed a pane of glass and reputtied it to make his escape, covering the putty with loose lime to cover its freshness. He had set the time bomb to destroy the cottage and the suspicious Pete and when Pete had turned over the finger prints to him had substituted those of an innocent man. But Pete had his photostatic copies which were identical with those the Captain had left imprinted on his waxed desk.

Pete is given a forty thousand dollar reward and is proposed as the new chief of detectives. But in his cockiness he falls in love with Cain's beautiful wife, induces her to get a divorce to make his triumph complete, and gives her his forty thousand dollars as evidence of his trust. Whereupon, Hattie Cain has skeleton keys made to the jail and the alarm, smuggles them in to her husband, and escapes with him. Pete, blown up with pride reads the Captain's note of farewell, sees the empty cell, and as he realizes how "smart" he has been, collapses.

THOSE THAT HAVE LOVED

Mildred Englehart Drama File No. 10279

STARING dully at the wasted figure on the hospital bed, Wanda heard Janie beg for forgiveness. She hadn't wanted to take Jimmie away from Wanda. She had wanted a baby and was going far away so that nobody would know. But Jimmie found out and followed her to the boat and they were married. Janie's thin voice insisted that Jimmie loved Wanda, that she would get a divorce so they could be married. The weak voice droned off and suddenly was still. For minutes Wanda stood there weeping sorrily. She remembered how when they were children together and Janie had all the toys, she had wanted to share everything with Wanda. Now Janie was dead. Wanda stopped crying and walked down the hallway. A nurse came toward her and she crumpled to the floor. Weeks passed by and the baby was still in the hospital but when Wanda went to adopt the child she learned that the mother's brother and his wife had taken the child. Wanda knew that Janie never had a sister or brother, and when she saw that the man who adopted the child was Janie's lawyer who wanted to get at the money by getting the child, Wanda begged the doctor to recommend her as nurse. She didn't know anything about babies but the Ganlies were going to Europe and Wanda went too and learned fast. For a few years all went well. Then one night Mr. Ganly informed her they wouldn't need her any more. She could go back to America or remain in Europe. Wanda sailed for America, the Ganlies thought, but Wanda returned to the house and hearing voices, hid behind a door. Mr. Ganly wanted to leave the baby in Europe, Mrs. Ganly wanted to take the baby back to America, and Wanda learned that Ganly knew she suspected something and that's why he had dismissed her. They were going to leave the baby with a family in Europe so Wanda slipped out of her hiding place with the baby. On board the boat one day the baby got lost. Wanda looked everywhere and saw a man holding her. "What's your name?" he was asking the child and Wanda whispered, "Jimmie—she's your baby." He stood up with the baby in his arms, looking at her.

"Regrets Talking Picture Magazine is not on Public Sale!"

Trinidad, B. W. I.

Talking Picture Magazine arrived a few days ago, for which I thank you heartily. I read all the stories and liked them all. What a pity we aren't privileged to buy it monthly!

M. W. A.

Wanda told him how Janie's lawyer posed as Janie's brother to get the child and through her the money and how she had stolen the baby because they were going to leave her in Europe. "Do you want her, Jimmie?" He beamed with pride, but she wouldn't accept Jimmie's offer. "I'm married, Jimmie." She went back to her cabin. Janie cried for Wanda so he took her to Wanda's cabin. "I couldn't take her from you, Wanda," he said when she had put Janie to sleep. "You keep her." She didn't want him to go and suddenly he was kissing her again and again. "I love you," he said and was gone. That night Wanda couldn't sleep. She went to Jimmie. She knocked. There was no answer so she entered and found Jimmie mixing something in a glass. A bottle marked poison was on the floor. She touched his arm. The glass fell out of his hand. "It won't happen again. I didn't want to live without you. I'll be as brave as you, I'll learn as you did to go on." He turned. "Jimmie," she said, "I'm not married. I thought you offered to marry me because you pitied me for having to go on without Janie." He held her to him, kissed her mouth again and again. They were together.

LINER BREMEN

Leon Ray Toburen Drama File No. 10251

ON his second night back from an African hunting trip, Jack T. Scott, Jr. heir to a huge fortune, visits the current musical comedy success with his fraternity brother, Ted Parker, a brezzy, slangy lad who has done everything from selling soap to running a gossip column on a Broadway newspaper. The show is tuneful, but from the moment Jack sees Beverly Day, the star, he is lost. Firing questions at his cynical friend, Jack demands to know everything about the girl, claiming that's the girl he's going to marry, Ted shakes his head, sighs, and refuses to have anything further to do with his crazy friend. Whereupon, Jack goes outside after the show, hails a taxi and waits just outside the stage door, in the rain. As he expects, Beverly hurriedly calls a taxi and gets in with her friend Myrtle Carlyle, a Southern girl who rooms with her. Jack pretends surprise at her hailing his cab, but gallantly offers to take the two girls where they want to go. After one brief look at the downpour, they accept, and while Myrtle sits back, tapping her foot, Jack asks Beverly if her may see her again. The next night after the show he takes her to a night club, and as they drive home he kisses her and asks her to marry him. Ted thinks his friend is crazy and to save him from what he thinks is a temporary infatuation, writes a long article in his column about the spotted past of the well known Jack T. Scott, Jr. The result is that when Myrt, reading Ted's column, shows the paper to Beverly, she hangs up on Jack, and changes her mind about resigning from the show when it goes on its European tour. Jack tries frantically to get in touch with Beverly, and at the last moment, realizing her plans, he too books passage on the Liner Bremen on which the troupe is sailing. Beverly curtly snubs Jack, who pursues her all during the trip. At last in the ship's swimming pool, he threatens to hold her under unless she forgives him, but after a blissful reconcilation, Beverly sees Jack in a compromising postion with the jazz mad daughter of his father's friend, a girl who has always set her heart on Jack, and Beverly manages to elude Jack thereafter arousing his jealousy by being seen with a Count who is madly in love with her. In Europe, Jack follows the show, but Beverly is adamant. His powers, gifts are returned, and at last in Paris, after triumphs in seven world capitols, the show is given a rest. Jack at last manages to corner Beverly. Meanwhile Myrt has eloped with the irrepressible Ted Parker, and she forces from him the truth about the article that has broken her room mates heart. It is a gusty letter of explanation she makes her somewhat tamed spouse write, and Beverly, who has just about decided past or no past she loves Jack and nothing else matters anyway, scolds him for his bad associations and together they send a cablegram to Myrt and Ted telling them to join them for a double honeymoon in Monte Carlo.

SALLY BE GOOD

Ruth Lomen Koefod Drama File No. 10254

RECENTLY elected county attorney Jerry Brownell watched from his window an armored car containing furtive eyed men. Demanding to know how much longer these gangsters were to be tolerated he bristled at the sheriff's shrugged, "As long as they don't pull anything." The armored car proceeded past the town through the forest and pulled up before High-House, a hideout for wanted men conducted by Blondie O'Dell, a gangster's widow. Here too came Silver Slade, confidence man who, closely pressed by the police, had robbed a warehouse, killed a policeman, and locking his wife in a closet, had escaped in her clothes leaving her vindicative and almost dead of suffocation, to be discovered next morning by the renting agent.

When Jerry, busy in plans to rid Eagle River of High-House declined the invitation of Sally Porter his very wealthy and very spoiled young fiancee to drop his work and come riding, she drove home like a cyclone and appalled her mother's dignified bridge guests by remarking with ominous sweetness, "Bridge and gossip, gossip and bridge," just as the dignified president of the literary society delivered herself of a choice tid-bit. As the women whirled, Sally strode to the hall, took down her fishing reel and dissipated her anger in trout fishing. Her skillful performance was watched with admiration by Silver Slade who, having sat in on a poker game at High-House and been caught cheating, had escaped being knifed only by the intervention of Blondie, whose current gigolo he was. Suddenly Silver lost his step, and Sally laughed at his splashing and gasping until she realized he was fighting for his life. Instantly her line whipped out and with bated breath Sally struggled to drag the now inert figure out of the water. Minutes later Silver came to and Sally sobbed with relief.

Soon, thinking to "show" Jerry who thought more of his work than of her, she began running around with the fast set. One night Silver kissed Sally. The next night when Sally lit a cigarette Jerry threw it into the fire. Sally lit another, and Jerry threw the whole pack in and laughingly kissed her. Sally's slap amazed Jerry and as she ran away he caught up with her and begged her to give up that crowd. A violent quarrel followed and as Jerry turned to go, Mrs. Porter called him in to be assured the money she had drawn from the bank, rumored to be closing, was safe. Meanwhile Sally's crowd and Silver gaily descended upon the house bent on a party. As a great joke, the lights went out, a girl screamed, and her missing pearls were discovered in Jerry's pocket. But in the general laughter, Jerry recognized Silver, and sent to Chicago for his wife. Meanwhile, however, Silver persuaded Sally, hurt by Jerry's contempt, to elope with him, and then, claiming he was temporarily embarrassed for funds, suggested they "borrow" the money Mrs. Porter had withdrawn from the bank. When Jerry, warned by the man shadowing Silver, arrived, Silver sped off, leaving the remorseful Sally to follow silently with Jerry. At High-House, Jerry cornered Silver who, in desperation seized Sally and began shooting using her as a shield. An oil stove upset, High-House went up in flames, and Jerry captured Silver.

Next evening Jerry came to return Mrs. Porter's money. Sally lit a cigarette but Jerry seeing her mischievous twinkle flung it into the fire. Sally reached for the pack, threw it into the fire, and herself into Jerry's arms, outstretched to her.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE

(TRADE MARK)

VOL. VI OCTOBER, 1933 No. 5

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Talking Picture Magazine is not available to the general public. DANIEL O'MALLEY CO., INC., *United States Post Office Bldg., 20 West 60th Street, New York, Publishers; Daniel S. SIREN SONG

Pauline B. Simkins Drama File No. 10346

AT a musicale the lovely voice of Leona Conway impresses Adrian Bernard, millionaire, and arranging an introduction to the young singer, Adrian soon discovers that her lifelong ambition is to be an opera singer. The following afternoon, Adrian comes to her small room and begs for permission to sponsor her musical career. When Leona persistently refuses his offers he amazes her by asking her to be his wife, telling her that he will free her to quest for all the glamor of the stage. Only when she has tired of the glitter will he be there to take her on a glorious honeymoon.

Two weeks later Adrian Bernard escorts his radiant bride to his sumptuous residence but Leona's great shock is to come when she meets Adrian's boy and finds Lawrence no stripling but a laughing-eyed young man with all the persuasive characteristics that make his father attractive—plus youth. Adrian induces the youngsters to try their voices in a duet, and as they sit at the piano together, Adrian falls asleep. Later, boating, he tactfully eases out that it is time for his siesta and induces Leona and Larry to remain on. They explore a pirate's cave and their young voices ring in their game of make believe, but on the return trip Larry sombrely warns Leona that he sees breakers ahead for her as the wife of an old man. It is a sleepless night for Leona and the next evening in the moonlight Larry confesses he is madly jealous of his own father. Head erect, Leona sweeps back to the house but in her own room she writes a note of farewell to Adrian and promising to remind the two thousand dollars she has borrowed from him, leaves behind trunks and jewels and escapes.

In Italy she pursues her studies and wins the enthusiastic acclaim of Professor Salvini. In a few months she appears in an operetta composed by Rossi Dupre, Neapolitan tenor, and triumphs opposite him. Blazing eyed, Rossi pours forth his love but Leona flares angrily and thereafter his impassioned feelings are revealed only before the footlights. Now leading soprano, Leona returns the two thousand to Adrian, carefully mailing it to an American friend who forwards it but refuses to give Adrian any clue to Leona's whereabouts. Accordingly, Adrian gets his divorce on grounds of desertion and Leona's friend mails her the newspaper with the notice. In it, however, Leona reads of the wedding of Mr. L. A. Bernard and Miss Sylvia Van Dusen, and her exultation changes to despair. She tries to drive all thoughts of Larry from her mind, and when Rossi continues to plead his devotion, she permits him to take her driving and dining as long as he omits all words of love. When she receives a flattering offer from Paris, Rossi begs her to marry him, and she promises to give her answer. The second evening she writes a note of acceptance, intending to mail it in the morning. While she is singing her breath catches at sight of Larry out front. Trembling she finishes her encore and in her room Larry is waiting. He explains that Sylvia is the wife of his cousin, L. A. Bernard, and that he had at last found her through the water-mark of an Italian manufacturer on her note paper. Upstairs the letter to Rossi rustles unnoticed, but Leona is clasped fast to Larry's heart.

LOST AND FOUND

Helen Sather Drama File No. 10371

IT seemed incredible to Rosemary Clayton that her employer Gerald St. Pere could love her. For months now Rosemary had been helping him with his interior decorating business and seeing his keen appreciation of beauty, she had despaired of his ever thinking of her as a woman. Rosemary knew her own shortcomings. She knew she was sweet, charming, but not in the true sense of the word beautiful, and when she saw the magnificent women who swept into Gerald's office, her heart sank within her. But Jerry held her close and told her how understanding she was, how much he needed her, and Rosemary tried to forget her fears as the day for their wedding approached. Then Viviene Borne, exquisite society girl called upon Gerald for aid with her foreign chateau. Gerald's eyes shone as he pointed out to Rosemary what an opportunity this was, and as he kissed her lips, a shudder ran through her slender body. The weeks that followed Rosemary tried to believe Gerald's notes that he was too busy to write, and then came the black moment when she read the letter that told her he loved Viviene. He had fought against it, but he couldn't let her go and Rosemary would understand. Bleakly Rosemary wrote back that she wished Gerald and his bride happiness, then all went black. It was Dr. Jameson who brought her to, and Dr. Jameson who informed her gently that she was with child. Long in love with Rosemary, Dr. Jameson pleaded for the right to give her child a name, but Rosemary, still in love with Gerald, shook her head and with the money she had saved toward her trousseau took a trip abroad. With the birth of her child, Rosemary began to take a renewed interest in life, and continuing her studies of music, began to publish songs which soon made her popular. Her son Richard grew up, proud of his white haired courageous little mother, and after his graduation from West Point, took up commercial aviation. Meanwhile, through the years, Gerald, long conscious of his mistake in marrying the beautiful but shallow Viviene, had applied himself with greater zeal to business. Now, head of a large organization with many branch offices, Gerald formed the habit of flying between his New York and Chicago offices. Piloted by Richard, Gerald learned that the plane had lost a wheel and to land would be hazardous, but impatient of delays, Gerald ordered Richard to bring his plane to the ground and in the resultant crack-up, both were injured. Rosemary coming to see her son, heard the delirious man occupying the adjacent bed call constantly for Rosemary and beg for forgiveness. Her heart leaped when she recognized Gerald, but as his wife swept in pompously, she held her counsel. It was the little nurse, Nona, who begged Mrs. St. Pere to leave, and as the doctor shook his head over Gerald, Rosemary came forward and gently started singing one of the old songs she had written for him when they were engaged. Gradually the troubled look was replaced by one of peace and as Rosemary stroked his hand Gerald dropped off to sleep. Appalled at the turn of events, Gerald's wife started immediate suit for divorce naming Rosemary as correspondent, but Richard and Nona, whom he had grown to love, remained faithfully on Rosemary's side. Rosemary's name was cleared in court after her own straightforward explanation, and as she turned to go, Gerald called her softly, and taking her in his arms asked if she might forgive him and—perhaps—marry him now, and in Rosemary's shining eyes he read his answer.

THE VANITY WOMAN

Eddie Frendo Drama File No. 10214

ELDEST son of the fabulously wealthy Lord Horton, Eddie's face had appeared in the rotogravure sections of several continents as he played polo, swam at Lido, and captured international regatta cups. When, however, he learned that his father was completing arrangements to marry him to the stolid but aristocratic Nancy Chesterfield, he rebelled. After a stormy scene with his stubborn father, the handsome youngster booked passage for America.

On the boat his attention was caught by a girl so breathlessly beautiful, that forgetting all his anger, everything, Eddie stared shamelessly. The girl looked up from her book, laughed and crossed swiftly to her stateroom. That night moonlight flooded the decks. The girl was standing alone near the rail. Breathlessly he came to her. She smiled in recognition. "You're Eddie Horton, aren't you?" It hadn't occurred to him she might have read about him. "And you?" he asked eagerly. A tiny smile touched her lips. "Doris," she answered, but her last name she would not reveal. For the remainder of the voyage the two were inseparable. The last night, Eddie, driven mad by her alternate yielding and unattainable attitude, drew her into his arms and asked her to marry him. For a moment she considered him gravely, then putting him off returned to her room. The next day despite his anxious efforts, she eluded him. Frantically Eddie continued her search, while Doris, whisked away in a luxurious limousine returned to her own apartment, and as she brushed her shining hair, told Smithy, her very efficient manager and closest friend, that she was a fool. She had set out to get that young Horton, but he had been so earnest, had wanted to marry her even, that she had run away. Smithy's eyebrows lifted.

Several days of frenzied pursuit followed for Eddie until one day, he stopped in amazement before a gigantic billboard on which was displayed the unmistakable face and body of Doris Gloray the girl he loved. Trembling he bought tickets to the theater and flushing at the tremendous ovation that greeted the dancer, bribed his way backstage. Doris greeted him coolly. "I thought you'd find me," she murmured, but as he reached for her hand and kissed it fervently, she bent over his dark head and smoothed his hair. He begged her to come to dinner with him and when she accepted, he was transported. All evening, after the show, they drove and when after a breathless kiss, he begged her again to marry him, told her how much he loved her, Doris accepted. Wasn't this just what she had always wanted, she asked herself and Smithy, marriage to a man of wealth? Eddie accompanied her about town, gave her free rein to buy whatever she wanted, and together they sailed for the continent on their honeymoon. Soon, however, the fortune in his own right, that had seemed so considerable vanished under Doris' extravagances, and his father, reading of Eddie's marriage to an actress cabled furiously that he had cut him off. When Doris' bills began mounting, Eddie at last was forced to confess that he had no money left. Eluding his embrace, she grew hysterical. "Broke," she cried and as he explained she turned on him and said he had deceived her she never would have married him if she hadn't believed he was rich. Long after Doris flung out of the room, Eddie remained sitting there brokenly and at last rising blindly, he reeled to the street. A horn sounded sharply and the next instant he was struck by a car. They carried him up to the hotel room. Doris seeing the crowd hurried back. Rushing to him she flung herself on the broken body and as she pleaded with him to get well, she

THE WEB

Mrs. Lloyd Bernier Drama File No. 10419

BECAUSE he loves Janet Noble more than anything else in the world, Thomas Gray gives up his ambition of studying law and settles down to work in a small store so that they can be married. Buying a tiny home, Thomas carries his bride over the threshold, and as she looks at him through wet eyes, he assures her again that he will never be sorry for any sacrifices he makes for her. The years pass. Thomas continues to work in the store and two children are born to the Grays. When the son, Walter grows up he decides to be a lawyer, and Thomas holding Janet's toil-worn hands, smiles happily. In his son's career he will know the realization of his own ambitions. Walter falls in love with Helena Williams, daughter of a wealthy manufacturer, and although her father is inclined to believe that his daughter can do better than wait for Walter to graduate from law school, and encourages her to go out with other men, Helena promises to wait for Walter.

After Walter has left for school, Thomas and Janet sit together before their fireplace and plan how much they will have to put aside each year so that Walter can graduate and their daughter be able to go to college. However, the depression sets in and instead of the bonus Thomas has been anticipating, his employer regretfully announces a general cut in salary. Thomas trembles as he informs Janet that they will not be able to send Walter back to school next year, and both of them weep a little as they read his cheerful letters in which he thanks them for giving him his great opportunity to study law.

Meanwhile the Pioneer Electrical Company sets up its offices in town. With the idea that they will be able to provide for Walter's further studies, the Grays, together with many others in town entrust their savings to the high pressure salesmen, and Mr. Williams, impressed with the promoter, Frank Lawrence, urges his daughter to go out with his new friend. When Walter returns home for his vacation, Mr. Williams tells him that Helena is not at home. Learning that his fiancee has gone riding with Frank, Walter makes inquiries and as he finds out the details of the Pioneer Electrical Company, fear grips his heart for Helena. Following the car in which she has gone with Frank, Walter arrives in time to rescue Helena from the drunken embraces of her father's friend. Silently he drives Helena home.

However, another shock awaits him when he learns that among the victims of the decamped Frank Lawrence and the Pioneer Electrical Company scheme which he represents, are his own parents. He sees one poor widow removed to the poor-house, and as he studies the whole scheme he realizes that Frank's one slip up has been using the mails to defraud. With his legal training he helps to bring Frank and his confederates to justice. Mr. Williams comes over humbly to thank Walter for saving his daughter, and as Walter takes Helena into his arms, Mr. Williams explains to the happy Grays, that he will himself arrange for the continuation of Walter's studies after his marriage to Helena.

MARRIAGE FOR ONE

Henry Spenle Drama File No. 10362

IN an effort to assure his fortune to Lucie, whose father had done him a great favor, the dying Count de Trebes, fifty years old, arranges a marriage with the young girl. One half hour later, Lucie is a widow. For some months she travels then returns to her villa, attended by the Baron de Servere, an admirer. Lucie receives a visit from her school friend Suzanne Beauchamps, who is overcome by all the splendor of Lucie's new life, and becomes dissatisfied with George Ballu, a young student of medicine who has loved her since they were children together. At a ball given by Lucie, Suzanne meet Albert Le Roux, dissolute but handsome nephew of the Baron de Servere. Albert is struck by Suzanne's untouched young beauty and unable to win her any other way, at length sweeps the impressionable young girl off her feet and arranges a secret marriage.

Meanwhile, however, the Baron de Servere, tired of Albert's extravagances, cuts him off with only a very small inheritance. To his dismay, Albert realizes that the sum will not even cover his debts and determines to win Lucie for himself. Lucie, however, continues to regard him with an unmistakable indifference and realizing that she is in love with his uncle, Albert decides to expedite matters by engaging the services of Madame de Ballard, a woman who will do anything if sufficiently well paid, to occupy his uncle otherwise. Then seeking out Suzanne he tells her it will be necessary to divorce her. Paling, Suzanne cries out that he cannot do that since she is soon to have a child, but Albert cruelly shrugs his shoulders and instills the idea of suicide into the despairing girl's mind. Suzanne returns to her own humble dwelling realizing for the first time what a beast she has married and in the shelter of her own room she writes a long note of explanation to her father, telling him how much wiser she would have been to marry George, but that now it is too late and she is going to end her life.

Meanwhile, Lucie, surprized by Suzanne's failure to make her regular call, decides to visit her friend. She finds only Monsieur Beauchamp who apologizing for his illiteracy asks her to read to him the note Lucie left. Appalled by her quick appraisal of the note, Lucie hastily reads an imaginary note to the trusting old man and hurries to the home of George Ballu to acquaint him with the disaster. George clenches his fists at thought of Suzanne's treatment and tells Lucie he thinks he knows where Suzanne went. On the way they stop some woodchoppers who explain they picked up a girl who had fainted and were restoring her when a man and a woman, both well dressed, claimed the girl and carried her into the woods. With greater haste, George and Lucie proceed and in a hut find Albert and Madame de Ballard bending over the prostrate body of Suzanne to whom they had administered poison lest she expose their schemes. George hastily administers an antidote. Albert realizing the game is up, commits suicide and Madame de Ballard is incarcerated. The story concludes with the marriage of Suzanne to George and Lucie to the Baron de Servere.

HELLO SUCKER

Joseph F. Harding Drama File No. 10436

WITH a contemptuous smile Beatrice pauses at the head of the stairs watching the men drink and paw her girls. Suckers. All men were suckers. Then seeing a clean looking lad of about seventeen sitting at a table with a group of drunken fellows who are having a good time at the kid's expense, she makes her way to the table and tapping him on the shoulder motions to him to follow her. Blushing the lad accompanies Beatrice to a luxuriously furnished room. She looks at him levelly for a few seconds and asks him what he is doing in a place like this. He tells her he is a messboy on an oil tanker, and rebelliously adds that they said he'd come to no good at home and he's showing them. Betrayed by sentimentality, Beatrice urges the boy to steer clear of this life and when he sullenly replies he has no money, she peels off a twenty dollar bill from a roll she has about her knee and hands it to him. The door bursts open. Bill Stone looks at the two knowingly and sympathizes with the boy who has let her charge him twenty dollars. He tells the boy to go and when the youngster stammers in attempting to explain, Beatrice cuts in sharply and tells him to go. A moment later, white faced the boy darts in telling them the police are here. Beatrice urges them to get away and indicates an exit. "What about you?" Bill asks. "I've been in jails before," she replies without emotion. Bill flings a wrap over her shoulders and takes her with them. The three separate at the docks, Beatrice explaining that she'll find a hideout until this blows over. However, when, a few minutes later Bill unties his launch, he is dismayed at finding Beatrice huddled perilously close to the wafer. Lifting the white faced woman to her feet, Bill motions to his boat and tells him she might as well come with him. The boat carries them to a cabin on an island where for a short time they live together. Finding herself falling in love with Bill, a novelist of good family, one night Beatrice kisses him and steals out while he is sleeping. The next morning Bill finds her note and the launch which she has set adrift, and, at the moment he believes she has drowned in the bay, he realizes that he has loved her.

Beatrice gets a job in a chorus only to be forced to leave when her child, Jean is born. Years pass. Beatrice makes money by operating a gambling joint and to all but her daughter, she is as tough as nails. The girl, Beatrice sends to Europe and when Jean returns she explains she is engaged. As Jean explains how "understanding and considerate" William is, Beatrice gasps as she learns her daughter is speaking of Bill Stone. Hoping against hope it is some other William Stone. Beatrice goes to his home and pleads with him not to go through with the marriage, at last revealing that Jean is his daughter. Bill realizes now why Jean attracted him—because she was Beatrice's daughter. He tells Beatrice he has always loved her but she refuses to marry him lest she lose her daughter's love and respect,—without which she cannot live.

Beatrice sells her gambling joint and starts on a "round the world tour" with Jean. On their way to the station their car is wrecked and Jean is seriously hurt. She calls for Bill and Beatrice the two people in the world she loves most, and holding their hands whispers, "Be happy without me," then is still. Bill's arm creeps around Beatrice's grief-shaken shoulders, and she cries. Together they walk up the path to the cabin.

THE SURVIVOR

James E. Griswold Drama File No. 10390

IN his office Martin Pelliter groaned as he stared at the letter from his broker. It had been his energy and the money of his silent partner Haines that had built up their business and now, having speculated with the firm's trust fund on what had been a "sure tip" Pelliter had ruined the firm. Pacing the floor he drew from the safe some documents and he paled as he read the clauses of the Joint Life Insurance policy that was to pay the surviving member of the firm of Haines and Pelliter, fifty thousand dollars. The telephone rang. It was Haines inviting Martin on a deer hunting trip. Astonished by the cordiality from his partner who had always, by virtue of his wealth, been contemptuous of the self made Pelliter, Martin refused, but as Haines' voice persisted, Martin toyed with the policy and accepted.

Early the next day the pair set out in Haines' powerful car for the ranch. Greeted by the jovial owner, Jennings, the men were shown their cabin and later in the mess hall met the rest of the party. To Martin's agreeable surprise, he saw Doris Sterling, a girl he had met before in the city. Despite his business worries, Martin found himself enjoying the weekend immensely. The following night, however, a dance was held in the mess hall and unable to contain himself longer at sight of Haines, drunkenly pressing unwelcome attentions on Doris, Martin interfered. Furiously Haines swung on his guest, and Martin's face blanched as Haines' drink-loosened tongue revealed what he thought of his partner. Hastily the other men drew Haines outside to cool off. The next afternoon Haines surlily explained that for a long time he had been suspecting Pelliter of robbing the firm and had invited him on this trip to give his auditor, Coutts an opportunity to check the books and wire the result. Meanwhile Haines continued menacingly, Pelliter was to keep away from Doris.

The plan for the deer hunt was for them to cover, in pairs, definite areas. That night gaily they met again at the barbecue but Pelliter noticed strained relations between Haines and Doris who hunted together. Shortly before they set off again, Martin bit his lip as he saw Haines receive the telegram he expected, and despair seized him as he set off with Jennings.

On the road Haines again tried to force Doris to marry him, but wheeling her horse she told him she didn't believe his innuendos against Pelliter, whom she would marry if he asked her. Before Haines could stop her she had spurred away and returned to the ranch. Haines started to follow, then furiously went off in search of Pelliter. Out of breath he came to a stop at the edge of a rim rock overlooking a canyon. Directly beneath him he heard the crack of Martin's rifle and as he felt the rock quiver and saw Martin directly below he lunged with his full strength against it. To his horror he realized his cartridge belt had caught and with an unearthly scream was carried along, missing Martin by inches. Shaken by the narrow escape from the boulder, Martin and Jennings gasped at sight of the crushed body of Haines. Jennings returned to the ranch for help, and Martin, weak kneed, slowly regained his composure. Noticing the broken belt, he realized that perhaps the fall of the boulder was not accidental and as he drew from the dead man's shirt the message, "Sorry cannot audit now. Illness. (Signed) Coutts." Martin heaved a great sigh. He was free now. And there was Doris. . . .

THE DIVINE MELODY

Tancred Tonna Drama File No. 10330

"AUTHOR! AUTHOR!" Again and again Romero bowed in acknowledgement of the tumultuous applause and as the curtain lowered on the opera stage for the last time he retired to his suite where a host of well wishers awaited him. Gladdened by the extravagant praise, Romero suddenly discerned a woman of breath-taking loveliness and as she told him softly how splendid his music was, his eyes held hers. Oblivious to all others save her. Romero invited Julia to a dinner at his home and in a few short weeks he had placed a marriage ring on her finger.

Disillusion was swift. Romero soon learned that Julia was a shallow pretty woman who had married him so that she could share his fame, but was keenly jealous of it. Resentful of the hours Romero spent in composition, Julia would drive him mad by humming a cheap popular tune at the moment when he was just capturing an elusive melody. Petty, sarcastic, Julia found cause for bickering in the fact that Romero, promoted Director of the Royal Academy of Music, criticized and had removed from his teaching post one Arnaldo, a rival composer who had sought to better his own position through flattering the impressionable Julia. Vain were Romero's assurances that he was unaware that Julia had any interest in Arnaldo who was just a cheap opportunist, and Julia, in an effort to "show" her husband, cultivated the attentions of Emilio, an artist and utter blackguard. Emilio caressed Julia and she, blinded by his ardor, consented to pose for him in the nude. Summoned to Rome to receive further honors, Romero returned home to find his wife had turned his home into a jazz-mad orgy, and as the noise reached a crescendo and Julia, drunkenly performed an indecorous dance. Romero exploded and drove his wife's guests from his home. Furiously, Julia ran off with the waiting Emilio, who, however, induced her to return for her jewels. The next morning Julia awoke to find Emilio had run off and her jewels were gone. Grotesquely she realized she had lost everything and returned to Romero. However, a moment after her arrival a huge parcel was delivered and as Romero unwrapped it, he stared speechlessly at the nude picture of his wife which the vengeful Arnaldo had bought from the fickle Emilio and sent anonymously to Romero. With suppressed excitement Romero slashed the canvas, and Julia madly ran to his desk and tore to pieces the music of an opera that represented months of intensive labor, the apotheosis of his art. Frightened by the terrible look of despair in Romero's face, Julia seized a gun to defend herself and as Romero tried to take it from her it exploded, killing her. Confused, bewildered, Romero fled and as the train carried him from the crime he could hear the wheels, the peasants, even the conductor sing his latest composition, the amazingly popular, "Goodbye Naples."

In Vienna, heavily disguised, all went well for a while until his money ran out and he dared not draw on his bank fund lest he be apprehended. At last, ironically, still wealthy, he was forced to pick up a position playing piano in an underworld cabaret. It was there that Arnaldo recognized him and following him home warned Romero it he dared return to work, he would be exposed as the murderer of his wife. In despair Romero accepted Arnaldo's alternative, to compose an opera which Arnaldo would claim to be his. Each day, under the influence of drugs Arnaldo supplied, Romero lost himself in composition and when at last the manuscript was completed, Romero bought a balcony seat and listened to the cries of, "Author! Author!" Then as Arnaldo bowed and scraped, Romero, unable to endure this longer, leaped up and with a cry of, "It's a lie!" leaped to the stage. Back broken, he produced the original manuscript, proof that the piece was his, and as the curtain lowered, Romero breathed his last, the cry of "Author!" still ringing in his ears.

MR. SAMARITAN

Maude & Grace Brickley Comedy File No. 10339

SEATED at his room in Mrs. Craig's boarding house Percival Archibald Jones reads the Boy Scout Manual and impulsively decides to follow the motto, "Do a Good Deed Daily." He descends to the kitchen and finding Mrs. Craig washing the breakfast dishes offers to dry them. Doubtfully she hands him a towel. As he proceeds jauntily he stumbles over the house cat, smashes his landlady's best dishes and as he starts to pick up the pieces, knocks the cake batter her lovely daughter Helen was stirring onto the bewildered cat. The cat emerges and Percival scrapes her onto a cake pan and starts to put her into the oven when Helen rescues the animal.

The dishes finished, Mrs. Craig asks Percival to model a gown while she pins the hem. Unwillingly he submits and with great difficulty masters the intricacies of the garment. Mrs. Craig pricks him repeatedly with her needle and while she answers the doorbell the wretched Percival squirms as the freckled grocer's boy and the burly ice man tease him. Mrs. Craig returns and helping him out of the dress, sends him with Helen for the groceries. It is raining and Percival holds the umbrella so that a steady stream of water flows down both their backs. As they cross the street Percival calls Helen's attention to the top of a nearby building and then catches her a moment before she stumbles into an open manhole. At the grocery store Percival leans on a barrel. The top caves in and he plunges head first into its contents—live crabs. He is rescued and scolded by the irate dealer and petted by Helen. Heavily laden with cumbersome bundles the Boy Scout buys ice cream cones for himself and the girl and manages to smear his hands, his face, suit and most of the bundles. Coyly he leaves Helen while he goes in to buy a birthday gift for her and emerges with a box of candy and also a union suit for himself. "Wrong number please," patiently asks Percival of the telephone operator and finally succeeds in calling and making a date with Helen. As he leaves the building he offers to assist an old lady down the steps, and tripping on his shoe lace plunges both awkwardly down. Half stunned the young gallant is revived by a resounding slap. While he waits for Helen he sees a large gentleman struggle with several unwieldly bundles and offers to help. He is curtly refused, but to the other's chagrin, seizes a bundle. Overladen as he is he stumbles into another shopper and all his bundles drop. The gentleman escapes and Percival stands in the center of a laughing group of bystanders while an amber stream flows from the large bundle.

Helen rescues him and they escape. As they enter the house he eagerly presents her with the gift. She opens—his underwear! The mistake is rectified and as he helps her off with her rubbers he wipes his muddy fingers on her underslip. Losing her temper, Helen gives him a piece of her mind and Percival returns to his room and after vainly trying to kick himself procures a revolver goes to a mirror, covers his eyes with his arms and fires pointblank at his reflection. A scream is heard and Helen rushes to the prostrate figure lying in the shattered glass. She pillows his head in her arms, he grins foolishly and puckers his lips, and Helen bends and kisses him.

THE FAST GAME

Florence M. Edwards Drama File No. 9447

WHEN Florence Montgomery's father was murdered by an unknown assassin while on a business trip in the kingdom of Marvania, life lost all its interest for his daughter. She was an only child, and her mother had died at her birth. Her father's death caused her to withdraw from all social activities, and despite frequent invitations from her cousin, Diana Winston, the most popular girl in Rockton, she refused them all, and led a very quiet existence.

One day, Florence, lunching at a little restaurant in a suburb of Rockton, saw her charming cousin seated at a nearby table with a very good-looking young man. Although she would have tried to conceal her presence from Diana, the sight of Diana's escort moved her to greet her cousin cordially, and she was introduced to Neal King, who seemed to be attracted by the modesty of Florence's quiet personality. Realizing that she had fallen in love with Neal, Florence found a new interest in life, especially since Neal returned her affection. For a short time the two were very happy, but the fascinating Diana, annoyed that so plain a person as Florence could gain the admiration of Neal, determined to make every effort to again win Neal's attention. Expert at using her great charm, Diana soon recaptured Neal's interest, for Florence, unaware of what was happening, made no attempt to hold Neal's love. Stunned by the confession from Neal that he no longer loved her, Florence cried out bitterly against life's injustice, for Diana already had her share of admirers, and Neal was only a pastime to her.

The loss of Neal, hardened Florence, and she resolved that if Diana could "play" a fast game, she could too. Naturally beautiful, she began to dress to her coloring, and watched Diana closely to discover the secret of her fascination for men. In a short while, Florence was so changed that even Diana was astonished. Florence drew the attention of many men to her, but never did she try to recapture Neal. A bitter rivalry sprang up between the cousins, and the arrival of a Marvanian count in Rockton, caused the two women to fight furiously for his affection. Flo, easily having the advantage over Diana, soon was escorted everywhere by the attractive foreigner. Incensed at her cousin's victory, Diana threw all caution to the winds, forgot Neal, who had been faithful to her, and made a silent decision to win the count at all costs. But she did not reckon on the depth of Flo's feeling for the count. She had become completely fascinated by Karl's charming manners, and forgetting discretion, threw herself at him with abandon. Karl, flattered by the attention of two such beautiful women, and more than a little amused by their strategies, played his game cautiously, now wooing Florence, now murmuring sweet promises into the lovely ears of Diana. Meanwhile Neal, who had been busily occupied with the opening of his new night club, slowly became aware of Diana's unfaithfulness. All too clearly he began to see that she did not really care for him, but was only anxious to take him away from another. His heart turned again toward his former sweetheart, but she too, was a different person from the sweet girl he had once loved. Seeing that Florence's infatuation for the mysterious foreigner about whom nobody seemed able to proffer information, was becoming serious, Neal, determined to help her, set sail for Marvania, in the hopes of discovering more about the count. Arriving in Marvania, he immediately went to the office of the chief magistrate, to learn whether Karl von Dieter really had a legitimate claim to a title. To his intense disappointment, he found the von Dieter title really belonged to the count, and that the latter was of a fine, old family, one of the first rulers of Marvania. Still suspecting the glib foreigner, Neal travelled through the small principality, questioning all who had dealings with the count. His efforts proving fruitless, Neal returned to Marvania's capital city, discouraged. Hoping to forget his gloom, he went to a popular restaurant, and there saw one of the country's most noted dancers, known by the name, "the Dieterling." Although it seemed an absurd idea, he somewhat felt that the dancer, whose name was so much like the count, was in some way connected with Karl. Cleverly winning her affection, and promising her ample recompense for any information she could give him, she finally uncovered the fact that she was really the Countess von Dieter, and that Karl, involved in a business deal with Mr. Montgomery had shot him, and then fled before he was apprehended. Guessing shrewdly that Frela von Dieter still loved the count, Neal told her of his love affairs in America, and the countess, burning with rage, promised to come to America with Neal, and reveal the fact that the count was married, to Diana and Florence.

Meanwhile, Florence completely won by the count, had begun to bore that worthy gentlemen, and deciding that he needed variety, he began to shower his attentions on Diana, who received them with delight, happy that she was at last, outplaying her hated rival. The count was Diana's constant companion, and ironically enough, their favorite rendezvous was Neal's popular night club.

At this crucial time, Neal returned from Europe with Frela, and planned to feature her at his club, knowing that the count would recognize his wife, and instantly try to leave town. On the night that the dancer, under the assumed name of Marcella Durk, was to appear, Count von Dieter, and Diana Winston, reserved a secluded table at the club. Florence, half-crazed by the loss of the count's love, and aware that she was soon to become a mother, planned to go to the club, and shoot the count. Unobserved by her lover and her rival, she slipped into the club, and took a nearby table that was hidden by a palm. But Neal, watching the whole affair from his private office that afforded him a full view of the club floor, saw Florence, rushed to her table, and begged her not to make a scene until Marcella Durk had danced. Reluctantly promising, Florence, with eyes fastened on the count, dimly heard the applause that greeted the entrance of the dancer. Neal, seeing the count turn pale when he recognized his wife, called Marcella to Florence's table at the end of the dance, and had her reveal to Flo that she was the countess. All her plans crumpling at this discovery Flo confessed her predicament to Neal. Forgiving her, he was about to take her in his arms, when his keen vision caught the count as he was about to try to escape from the night club, and the consequences which Karl knew would result from his wife's presence in Rockton. Signaling to the two body-guards who stood at the exit to the night club, Neal prevented the count's flight, and a few weeks later, when Karl had been sent back to Marvania to stand trial for the murder of Mr. Montgomery, Neal at last took Flo in his arms, and the two planned their future together.

DEMON OF THE SEA

Ruth E. Guy Drama File No. 10325

IN the stately home of Monsieur Dugat there is excitement for once again the master has picked up the morning edition to find his son's picture on the front page for another daring adventure in his plane. Sending for Ronald, Monsieur strides angrily up and down while the boy, in high spirits, musses up the hair of the dignified servant who summons him. A stormy scene follows and Monsieur, of a mind that Ronald is incaable of handling an inheritance with the requisite care, determines to cut him off when he returns to France. He sets sail and Ronald, philosophically dressed in formal clothes and takes his lovely fiancee, Doris to a New Year's dance at New York's most exclusive hotel. While the confetti showers about them, Ronald confides that his father is to cut him off. Doris loses step. "Cut you off," she echoes, and as he winces and asks, "Does it matter then, so much?" she returns his ring and disappears in the gay throng. The music blares. It is five minutes to twelve. Outside an extra is being hawked and the dancers pause uncertainly as they hear THREE LINERS DISAPPEAR IN MID OCEAN. The New Year arrives but the multitude is awed by the tragedy. Among those missing is Monsieur Dugat. Ronald's fortune is safe. People rush madly from theaters, hotels, night clubs to read of the tragedy.

Doris sets sail to meet a wealthy Count in London. New extras are announced. More liners are sunk without even a radioed plea for help. Ship after ship disappears and the entire world trembles. Ronald offers his private resources and his own aid to the baffled chief of the secret service and meets the chief's daughter, lovely Zelma Seaton. At Ronald's suggestion the United States submarines are called into service. Ronald goes along. The boats are ordered to remain below the surface. Suspense is keen. Will the sub-boats make it? A mighty cry goes up as a radioed message tells of the safe crossing. Why, Zelma asks, can subs cross in safety while ships fail? Her father replies that is the question that is troubling the world. The only clue is a weird red reflection, the periscope has caught. Zelma's father decides to sacrifice a large liner. It is rigged out completely only instead of passengers dummies are fastened to the decks and the ship is controlled by radio. A submarine is ordered to follow. Two hunder miles out there is a flash of light. The liner collapses and in less than a minute sinks. A mansion on a floating island is reported to be the source of the powerful ray. Submarines surround the place but when they clear the water the ray is turned on them and only one escapes. The situation is desperate. At length Ronald takes off alone across the ocean in a tiny camouflaged plane. While the madman peers into his glass reflecting the position of boats on the sea, Ronald with his silenced motors lands, slips up on the demon and fights desperately. Superhuman fingers clutch his throat but at length he hurls the creature in the sea and watches him sink as he had watched thousands of others. The light turned upon the island destroys itself, and Ronald wings back to the United States and to Zelma.

FLAMES OF HELL

Roy Luther Thayer Drama File No. 10389

WHILE on her way to a convent on the Hudson, Vivian North, young Confederate belle, stops off to see the West Point Sunset Parade with her father, a former Army graduate. She falls in love with Bolton Gale, a cadet, who subsequently attempts to elope with her, but is discovered and confined to the guardhouse while Vivian is obliged to return home to Cumberland in disgrace.

The Civil War breaks out and Gale, now a Captain in the Union Cavalry is sent to Cumberland. While riding through the village he comes upon a Lieutenant of Infantry, Miles Burton, former classmate of his, forcing his attentions upon a struggling Southern girl. Gale tears Burton away and they fight. Burton wounds Gale with his sword and leaves while Gale is taken into the house by the girl whom, to his amazement he recognizes as Vivian. The wound is a severe one, and when the detachment goes on Gale remains on to be nursed back to health. The only other occupant of the house is an old colored mammy, since Major North is fighting with Lee near Richmond and Vivian and Gale renew their old love. At length Gale is forced to return to his command but he promises to communicate with Vivian who tearfully gives him her own riding horse and wishes him Godspeed.

Eighteen months pass. Vivian's baby is born but she hears nothing from Gale. Cumberland is once again the scene of military activity and the inhabitants are burning their homes and stores and poisoning their wells in anticipation of its capture by the Union. All flee save Vivian, her baby and her old Slave Blossom. Lieutenant Burton and a detachment of soldiers ride in and amazed at sight of the beautiful girl, Burton again tries to embrace her. She holds him off and raucous laughter is heard as soldiers break in holding up some bottles of wine they have found in the cellar. To test it, Burton forces Vivian to drink and she toasts the South and Jeff Davis. When he demands that she give wine to her baby, Vivian tries to beg off, but under the watchful eyes gives the portion to her child. With a cry, all the soldiers drain their glasses and suddenly Burton notices the child is dying. Shouting, Burton draws his sword and descends on Vivian who mocks him. But just then the door opens and Captain Gale enters. Taking Vivian in his arms he silences her taunts, and tells her how he has tried in vain to communicate with her. While the soldiers rush out gasping for breath, Vivian points to the baby and falls, dying in the arms of Gale. As he holds her to him tenderly, kissing her forehead, he bends to her lips and drinks from one of the deadly glasses. Outside Major North and his reinforcements arrive and capture the poisoned detachment, but as he enters his house, the Major bares his head at sight of his daughter in the arms of her lover—dead.

MEN WITH MONEY

Hobert D. Cheatham Drama File No. 10227

IN love with Henry Brown, a soda clerk, Alice is advised by her father, Mr. Kin Herst, to marry someone who can offer her more in the way of worldly goods. She replies that Henry is a worthwhile boy, who spends his spare time in study, and accuses her father of placing too great a valuation on money, but he urges her to forget the boy, and devote her attention to Conrad Smith, a wealthy lawyer, who loves her. Believing that he is ruining Alice's future, Henry leaves town without seeing his sweetheart, writing her a note which explains his actions. The girl weeps bitterly, as she reads it. Mr. Smith is known to the underworld as Ned Kent, a gambler, and gang leader, assuming this double identity for business purposes. When Alice refuses to marry him, he determines to kidnap her father in order that he may be alone with the girl, and at the same time obtain ransom money. Explaining this plan to three members of his gang, he sends a false telephone message to Mr. Herst, and instructs them to seize him, as he walks to the home of a friend, in answer to the call. Binding and gagging him, the gangsters take Mr. Herst to a lodge in the Bear Mountains.

The next morning Henry Brown, who has secured a position with a construction company in a nearby city reads the account of the kidnapping and obtaining leave from his duties, goes to help Alice. Disguising himself in the white costume of a ghost, Henry steals into the camp of the gangsters, and, frightening their guard, sees Mr. Herst, but dares not enter, as he is unarmed. He picks up a note dropped by the guard which requests Alice to come to the camp, alone, the next night, bringing five thousand dollars in ransom money. Going at once to her home, and still wearing his disguise, as he fears that if the plans are revealed Mr. Herst may be found, Henry secretly leaves this note, but adds a post-script which advises her to bring a pistol. As he is leaving the Herst home, Henry encounters John, the negro chauffeur, who throws up his hands in terror, and runs frantically into the house, informing Alice that he has seen a ghost. She laughs reassuringly, and orders him to drive her to the camp in Bear Mountains the next evening, leaving word with her friends that they are to notify the sheriff if she does not return within three hours.

Arriving at the lonely camp, Alice is taken to a room, where she is left alone with a masked figure who takes her ransom money, and then removes his disguise, revealing himself to be Mr. Smith, alias Ned Kent. The girl struggles helplessly as he forces his attentions upon her, but at that moment Henry, in his white garb, breaks down the door, and sends Mr. Smith to the floor with a terrific blow. Police arrive as they are struggling, and arrest Ned and his gang. Mr. Herst is found in another room, bound but unharmed. When he is released he gladly gives his consent to Alice's marriage with Henry, and the young couple are presented with a reward of one thousand dollars for the capture of Kent and his gang.

THE CUCKOO CLOCK

Wilfred Lellmann Short Subject File No. 10368

IN his little Swiss home high in the Tyrolean Alps, Fritz Hallerthal sat at his work table carving, endless designs. For weeks now his four-year old son had tried to guess what the thousand minute wheels and cogs were for, but now as Fritz carefully fitted them together little Jan clapped his hands with glee for there, standing for all the world to see, was a wonderful clock. Gravely Fritz wound the mechanism and before Jan's very eyes a jaunty little cuckoo popped out to sound its shrill little call and then darted back again out of sight. Every hour as long as they lived, Fritz explained, the cuckoo would come out to see that all was well and pop in again. Buxom little Anna smiled happily at the absorption of her husband and son for while Fritz was working on the clock he forgot for a moment his resentment against the stupid game laws that forbade a man to hunt in his own beloved mountains. Anna trembled as she remembered how many times Fritz had put his knapsack on his back and set off to hunt in defiance of the game warden. Again and again she had begged him not to risk his life so, but each time the desire to bring down a fine buck had been too strong and off he had gone.

But now the clock was finished and Anna shuddered as she saw Fritz finger his gun reflectively. Then one day after his regular ceremony of winding the clock and kissing the saucer-eyed Jan, Fritz set off into the mountains. Anna shook violently as she heard a shot, but an instant later Fritz darted through the door, and when the game warden appeared, a now composed Fritz greeted him solemnly and plied him with wine while the stupid fellow rubbed his head and said he was sure a poacher had come this way. As the warden staggered down the path the hour struck and the cuckoo mocked. "Cuckoo, cuckoo." Roaring with delight, Fritz pulled Jan on his knee and told Anna how he had just barely managed to escape that time. Anna wept and once more Fritz promised he would not hunt again.

Daily Fritz went through his little ceremony before going about his business as a guide, but one day he omitted it. Sick with apprehension Anna went to the subterranean trapdoor and discovered Fritz had once again taken his knapsack and gun. Each hour she grew more frantic, and Jan restlessly asked question after question about the clock and where his father might be so late until, panic communicated to him, Jan wept himself to sleep on his mother's lap while Anna watched the road with burning eyes and each hour the cuckoo came out to call the passage of time.

Meanwhile Fritz left the house and, as a black cat crossed his path, laughed heedlessly. In the underbrush the hunter stalked his game patiently waiting until a rustle brought to his alert senses the awareness of a fine male deer. The moonlight shone on the poacher's gun. Exultantly Fritz fired and the proud buck leaped in the air and fell dead. But, "Halt!" the game warden shouted. "or I'll shoot!" Obeying instinct, Fritz fled. A shot rang out. Fatally wounded the hunter collected the last bit of strength in his body and as the clock struck nine, ten, eleven, Fritz staggered across the threshold and fell dying. Jan, awakening with a start, wailed, Anna screamed and threw herself across the body of her loved one, magnificent even in death, and the cuckoo, stopping forever at the stroke of eleven, stood staring at the woeful scene.

THE FALL OF ZEUS

Paul R. Snider Costume Drama File No. 10377

AT work upon the girdle she is going to wear in the great beauty contest, Hera as usual begins nagging her Olympian husband, Zeus. First she complains about the power Aphrodite and her son Eros are assuming and when Zeus assures her that she has nothing to fear from them, Hera adopts a conciliatory tone as she brings the conversation to the topic nearest her mind. Zeus is to be judge of the beauty contest, isn't he? Zeus frowns importantly. Well isn't she the most beautiful of the goddesses? For a moment Zeus steals a look at his mature and amply-proportioned spouse. Then he coughs judiciously. Of course, he adds, with his fingers carefully crossed, he thinks so, but a husband has no right to pick his wife when he is supposed to be acting as an impartial judge. Hera's burst of uxorious fury takes Zeus' breath away, but at last he comforts her by promising to resign his position in favor of Paris. Thus Hera will be assured of justice. Hera is not sure her husband means that as a compliment, but a glance at his face contorted in what he believes to be an expression of his confidence in her surpassing loveliness, reassures her.

The following morning Hera awakens her grumbling husband who feels entitled, as the Lord of Olympus and Earth, to more sleep, and when he admits that as yet he has done nothing about getting Paris for the contest, Hera dispatches him. Tired, overworked, Zeus begins stropping his razor but just as he is shaving under his chin, Hera yells in to hurry him, and Zeus swears mightily as he cuts himself. Ill-tempered he goes to Vulcan's garage and storms violently as his chariot wheel is repaired. Dashing to the festival, he searches anxiously for Paris, but as he sees Menelaus sitting in his box without his wife, Zeus remembers the gossip about Helen and Paris, and post haste repairs to the home of Menelaus. He winks ponderously as, by means of several transformations, he manages to slip in on the erring pair and finds them sitting blissfully together. Zeus' severity melts at sight of Helen's loveliness, and he remembers just in time he has appeared to them in the guise of Hermes. He induces Paris to obey, albeit reluctantly, the command of Zeus, but promises the loan of one of the King's own chariots to expedite the return of the young lover.

On the way back to Olympus, Zeus cannot get Helen's desirability out of his mind and he decides to step in himself in the guise of Paris and enjoy her beauty unhampered. With an excess of good feeling, he strides into Hera's room and kisses her resoundingly. A slap is his reward, and as Hera shouts she will tell her husband, Zeus remembers suddenly that he is not in his own guise and hastily transforms himself before her eyes, only to be received with crushing sarcasm. Hastily Zeus hurries her out to the arena and bows stiffly as the crowd cheers lustily. Excusing himself, Zeus assumes a boy's identity and creeps about, overhearing Paris bribed by Aphrodite who offers him the gift of the fairest woman in Greece if he, now the judge, selects her. Paris after dramatic hesitation chooses Aphrodite and while the crowd yells its approval, Hera is nasty in her accusations of collusion. In the ensuing riot, Zeus slips off as Paris carries off Helen.

Meanwhile, Eros confidentially informs Hera that Paris is eloping with Helen in one of Zeus' chariots, and Hera follows. Believing Hera has discovered him, Zeus sets Helen down and flees. Hera catches him and shakes him until, before her startled eyes Paris turns into an ahashed Zeus. At her stream of vituperation, a thunderous laughter arises from the Gods Eros has assembled to watch his little joke and henceforth Zeus and Hera are rulers in name only, while Aphrodite and Eros are the actual Lord of Olympus and Earth.

CIVIL MARRIAGE

Augusta E. Tuttle Drama File No. 10292

IN the excitement of packing to go to America, it had not occurred to Paul Sand that his daughter Lucie would so far defy his wishes as to have the legal notice of her marriage to Pierre Gervais posted. Now, learning that the civil marriage was to take place today, Paul rushed furiously to the City Hall and seeing Lucie and Pierre standing together, struck the boy a heavy blow on the head, explained to the crowd that the fellow had insulted his daughter, and rushed the protesting Lucie into a taxi. Hurrying his plans, Paul proceeded immediately with his wife and daughter to Havre and when Lucie insisted hysterically that she was married to Pierre, her father scoffed and demanded a marriage certificate for proof. All the way across the ocean Lucie was too ill to think and her mother dared not risk her husband's anger by openly sympathizing. At Ellis Island the Sands were met by Paul's friend Jean Silvestre who brought them to his home. Everything was strange to Lucie. The jabbering of an alien language, the caring for the Silvestre's twin infants and two older children while Mrs. Silvestre took her friends about. Then an excursion boat sank and among the numberless victims were Lucie's mother and father and Jean's wife. In her agony, utterly alone, Lucie brooded over Pierre Gervais. He had said if she left France he would follow. Had her father's blow killed him? Had he found another girl? Jean finding her dully weeping, put his arm about her shoulder and promised to take care of her. When matter-of-factly he explained his children needed someone to take care of them, Lucie haltingly told him of Pierre, but while her four step-children screamed lustily, Lucie Jean shrugged. This was America. In the hot flat, listened uncomplainingly to Jean's eternal comparisons with his former wife who could so well manage the squirming children that were Jean's pride and joy. And when her own baby was born, Lucie felt at last she would have someone of her own again to love, but in a few days the tiny wailing child gave up the struggle to stay alive, and Jean's silent look somewhat blamed the frail Lucie. How could Lucie know that all this while Pierre, having followed her to America was exhausting his resources in a futile search for her and was even now working at the pier, hopefully searching every face. But Fate is whimsical, and Jean decided, at last, to return to France. It was at the dock that Lucie stumbled against piled luggage and as a workman helped her to her feet they stared at each other. "Pierre!" "Lucie!" "Come Lucie," said Jean, and dully she hurried after her husband. Stunned Pierre watched her but, unable to go on, as the ship cleared the dock, Lucie leaped overboard. Pierre watching, saw Jean wring his hands, saw the bubbles, and dived in. Later, with a police officer and a priest standing by, Lucie explained between sobs she was married to Jean, but as Pierre protested she couldn't be, she was his wife, and produced evidence, the Priest interceded. To-morrow he said, Lucie and Pierre should be rightly married at the altar. Everything should be explained to Jean. Impulsively Lucie's hands grasped for Pierre's and the Priest's, and a great Peace flooded her soul.

FOLLOW MASTER

Hazel Stockwell Drama File No. 10445

IDLY Marion picked up the card in the street and as she turned it over her lips twisted ironically. It was a card of admission to a reception given in honor of the famous aviator who had just landed in New York. She remembered how she had come on to the city with the idea of standing metropolitan society on its ear. With the small inheritance from her aunt she had bought beautiful clothes, enough, she thought, to get her by until she was earning a large salary. As she toyed with her food in the dreary little restaurant, sitting at a table, "Reserved for ladies," she looked at the card again. Suddenly her chin shot up. She'd go.

Entering the brilliantly lighted ball room Marion blinked at the color and splendor. Suddenly a man bowed before her and Marion's head whirled as she danced in the arms of John Alderman, millionaire sportsman, whose picture she had seen in the newspaper only yesterday as he had been caught by ship's reporters, returning from a summer in Cannes where he had left his wife. A few moments later, a tall, smiling young man cut in on them and Jimmy Lane apologized for taking her from her partner, but assured her he had been wanting to know her ever since she entered. As they danced by a tall woman, Marion shivered slightly under the piercing eyes fixed on her. Jimmy frowned and danced Marion onto the terrace. As they sat Now, learning that the civil marriage was to take there talking a man tapped Jimmy on the shoulder, and he went inside, promising to return in a few moments. Suddenly a hand was clapped over Marion's mouth and she was carried off to a waiting car. In silence she was hurried through a dark alley, into a house and in a small dimly lighted room was told by a beady-eyed man that he had a job for her—to act as a come-on for John Alderman. Stoutly Marion refused and she was bound and carried into a far room. A moment later Marion heard steps and saw a tall figure in white drift toward her, accompanied by a sickly perfume that dulled her senses. Marion screamed as the figure bent toward her and a moment later Jimmy appeared, motioned the woman away, and pressed into Marion's hand a note which begged her to do as she was told and everything would come out all right.

The following evening dressed in a stunning costume supplied by her captors, Marion was "planted" in John Alderman's favorite restaurant, and as he came toward her smiling in recognition, she dined with him. Outside a man suddenly stepped between them and prodded Alderman, at the point of a gun into a taxi. Marion was about to call out when strong arms seized her and she felt herself drawn back by Jimmy. Proceeding after Alderman and his captors, Jimmy gave Marion a gun and told her to act as if she knew how to use it. In a small room the beady-eyed man was demanding that Alderman tell them where the famous family emeralds were kept. As the sportsman refused to talk, the man chuckled and prepared to torture the quaking millionaire. Jimmy and Marion broke in, covered the beady-eyed man and his confederate with guns, and untying Alderman, Marion telephoned the police. In an underground room Jimmy led the police to the Weasel, brains of the gang. As the white-robed woman came out, Marion felt that sickly perfume and recognized the Weasel as the tall, piercing eyed woman of the dance. Outside Jimmy hailed a cab, and slipping his arm about Marion he whispered, "How would you like to be Mrs. Jimmy Lane?"

THE CHARMED CIRCLE

Gladys Eiler Drama File No. 10435

WITH a little shrug, Barbara shows her husband, Lee Trent the letter informing her that since she has married a fortune hunter she has been cut off without a cent. To her surprise, however, Lee turns on her and bitterly tells her that he'd be a fool to stick with her now. Thoroughly disillusioned, Barbara proceeds with an action for divorce and when her decree is final she secures employment as a companion to Mrs. Anderson, a wealthy widow who is sailing for Cuba. There Barbara meets Roland Hartford, Mrs. Anderson's lawyer, who falls deeply in love with her and asks Barbara to marry him. However, the remembrance of her former unhappy marriage restrains Barbara fom accepting, and Roland is called back to the United States. During his absence, Mrs. Anderson shrewdly observes that Barbara is distrait without Roland and Barbara confesses that if Roland returns to ask her again, she will marry him. However, when, trembling with excitement, Barbara goes to the boat to meet Roland, she notices the possessive attitude of Eloise Barnes, a fellow traveler, who tells Roland she may have some business for him. Under the Cuban moon Roland takes Barbara in his arms again and as he tells her how much he has missed her, their lips meet and Barbara promises to marry him.

Soon after their marriage, however, while they are dining at a hotel, Eloise comes up and as Roland introduces Barbara as his wife, Barbara feels the other woman's eyes coldly appraising her. She shudders when Eloise takes one of Roland's cards and tells him she will soon have some business for him, but Roland smiles and tells her they need all the business they can get. Thereafter, Roland seems to spend most of his evenings in his office on business, and once when Barbara calls for him, determined to get him away from his work and see that he gets some rest, she finds Eloise smiling up at her from lowered eyes, and notices Roland's guilty expression. Dismayed, she returns home and as she is about to enter their apartment, so much more pretentious than they can afford, Barbara is seized from behind and hurried into a car. Hours later, cramped from the bonds, she learns that she is being held for ransom which her wealthy and adoring husband will be glad to pay. In vain does Barbara protest that her husband hasn't ten thousand dollars and bitterly she tells herself, infatuated as he is with the wealthy Barnes woman, wouldn't pay it if he did have.

Meanwhile Roland who has completed his legal work for Eloise Barnes, and has been pressing her to pay his fee only to be put off from day to day, arrives home penitently. To his consternation he discovers the note from Barbara's kidnappers and terrified by the threat that he will never see his wife again unless he pays the ten thousand, he returns to Eloise's house. Her arms steal around his neck, but putting her from him desperately he shows her the note and begs her to pay him for his work now. Coldly she laughs at him and tells him he'll get his fee—in time, but she sees no reason for rushing. As she comes closer suggestively, he dashes from her house, and at last borrows the money from Mrs. Anderson. Barbara is returned to him and the police catch her former husband who has engineered the scheme. "I didn't think you cared, Barbara sobs but Roland's arms tighten about her as he whispers, "I've been such a fool."

KINGDOM OF THE HEART

Maurine Powelson Drama File No. 10434

ANNETTE had been playing and singing one of her own little songs when Lawrence saw her for the first time and fell head over heels in love. In a few short weeks Annette and Lawrence knew they were meant for each other and proudly Lawrence brought his little bride home to his mother. Mrs. Burt looked at the child her son had married and her blue eyes shone hard as she made perfunctory motions of greeting. It was a great shock to her that her boy should choose a woman, somehow it had always seemed that no other woman could ever figure in Lawrence's life. And in the months that followed Mrs. Burt found a hundred petty faults with Annette. Her cooking, her marketing, the way she held little Robin, and in a cold voice that Annette was to remember again and again, Mrs. Burt confided to Annette, "Lawrence is so like his father, so fond of women." And these days when Robin was teething and his cries set Annette's nerves on edge, Annette would remember again and again her mother-in-law's words, "so fond of women" and wonder if after one of their little quarrels brought about by Mrs. Burt, Lawrence would compare her unfavorably with other women. Then Barry Given, who had loved and lost Annette to Lawrence, held her in his arms one night and as he tried to induce her to come away with him, he mentioned that she had a right to cheat as Lawrence was cheating. Although she had indignantly left Barry, his words haunted her and rather than let that fine love she had had for Lawrence tarnish and wear thin, she had gone away.

Her heart ached as the wheels ground out their song of defeat and as the train bore her to Hollywood, the pain of her body seemed to resolve itself into songs of defeat and lost love. It was in the movie studios that her songs found their place and Van Eller, famous director looked at the girl in amazement as she showed him the songs that his new picture needed. Eagerly he gave them to Daisy Day, niece of the Big Boss, who was to play the leading role in Van Eller's big picture. Annette winced as Daisy sang her songs as she would "Heigh Diddle Diddle" and taking them from the girl sang them herself. It was Daisy who broke the silence to marvel about Annette's rendition and Daisy together with Van Eller who induced the Big Boss to give the newcomer the role in the big special. So close was the drama to her own life, that Annette played the role in a white fire of emotion. When she finished the big scene she wept, and looking about saw the others were misty-eyed too. Then one day Van Eller drew her into his arms. Annette's heart ached for Daisy who loved Van Eller, and disengaging herself she told him of Robin and of Lawrence. Gently he released her, and that evening Daisy threw her arms about Annette and told her that Van Eller, whom she had always thought loved Annette, had just asked her to marry him. Mistily Annette smiled at Van Eller.

Then "The Wrong Way" played Lawrence's town, and in the darkened theater, Lawrence held Robin close while his wife sang "If only you will take me back." That night Barry explained his lie, told how he had tried anything to win Annette, and had lost.

Daisy and Van Eller were being married. Annette looked up and at sight of Lawrence and Robin standing shyly outside, she gave a little cry and a great movie star found herself gathered close to the heart of the man she loved.

THIS OUR LIFE

Mary Brafford Drama File No. 10352

LEFT with the support of his mother, Simmie Jones learns early in life the discipline of work. From dawn until long past dusk each day he works on his little farm without respite. Then, once, on a trip to town he stops at a party and his breath catches as he sees Ruth Clayton. With pounding heart he asks her to dance, and she amused at his rapt look consents. In a few weeks Simmie asks Ruth to marry him, and her eyes lower a bit as she gives herself to his kisses. For a while they are both happy in their little apartment and Simmie devotes himself to his work so that he can bring home little expressions of his love for his wife. But when Ruth learns that she is going to have a child she becomes sullen and short tempered. Simmie is gentle, feeling that she is frightened, but after the baby is born Ruth shows no signs of love for the child and one day Simmie returns from work to find his mother holding Sonny. "Where's Ruth?" he asks. Silently his mother turns over the note Ruth has left saying she is tired of giving her youth and beauty to a squalling brat and is suing for divorce so she can go back to her old life. Simmie tries to dissuade her but at the new look in Ruth's eyes he is frightened. When the divorce is final Simmie begins drinking, to forget. Then one night he is carried home, head cut by a beer bottle. Softly his mother tends him and as he realizes what a coward he has been, Simmie decides to live for his child and his mother. Then when he meets Nellie all the starved love in him comes to the surface and they are married. From the first Nellie gives large parties and every night runs off with friends. Even the coming of her two children Ray and Maxine fail to halt her activities, and Simmie rather than quarrel with her, says nothing. Then one night he arrives home to see smoke issuing from his house. With a cry he bursts in the locked door and drags the three children to safety. In the hospital ante room, Nellie, staggering a little from too much to drink, asks about the children but although Sonny and Maxine recover, little Ray dies. United by their grief, Simmie and Nellie cling to each other and for a while Nellie spends her time with her children and her husband. Then the old restlessness seizes her again and one night she disappears with Simmie's trusted foreman, taking little Maxine with her. Simmie is stricken. For months he searches for Maxine and then learns at last that she, her mother, and her mother's lover have been killed. Dully Simmie returns to his work. As he manages the machinery, the consciousness comes over him that life has beaten him, he has nothing left to live for. Suddenly his foot gets caught in the machinery and badly torn he is carried to the hospital. For a long while he does not care whether he lives or dies, but it is his little nurse who pleads with him to take hold of himself for the sake of his mother and his child. As he looks at the woman, the sun making a halo about her head, Simmie whispers, "I must live. It is true. For Sonny and mother. . . . " and as he reaches toward her hand, she smiles and her face is that of a madonna, a woman who knows what it is to suffer, and to love. . . . .

MAID IN THE HOUSE

Elsie Heinmiller Drama File No. 10149

THE newly-wedded Madisons arrive at the large farm on which they are to live and handsome John carries his wisp of a wife over the threshold in the time-honored manner of young romantics. Soon, realizing that his wife is finding the work too much of a strain, John urges her to get a maid, and she sends to town for one. When Rose arrives, Mrs. Madison looks at her critically, and finding her references are satisfactory agrees to hire her. But from the first moment Rose sees John Madison she becomes infatuated. As she pours the coffee at the dinner table she stares at him so fatuously that the coffee misses the cup entirely and after overflowing the saucer runs over the new tablecloth. Apologizing profusely, Rose clears up and thereafter, manages to impress her employer with the quality of her work. While Mrs. Madison goes to town to order some new dress lengths, Rose pretends to work so hard that John, coming in for lunch, is appalled to see her outstretched upon the floor, apparently ill from over work. Gently he lifts her up and carries her into her room, and Rose, little schemer that she is, puts her arms about his neck and clings to him until disturbed John hastily leaves her room. That night he tells Edna that they ought to get rid of Rose, but Edna dissolves in tears and weeps that John regrets his kindness and wants to deprive her of a maid. John tries to assure her that she can get any other girl she wants but unwilling to explain his reason, he at length drops the subject rather than cause an argument. The next time that Edna leaves the house, Rose, who has brought some whiskey, prepares a "spiked" glass of lemonade, and when John comes in, mopping his brow, she brings it to him. Surprised at her thoughtfulness, he accepts it and as he smacks his lips he exclaims it is the best lemonade he ever tasted. When he sniffs it, Rose playfully asks him what he expects to find in it, and laughing at his own suspicions, John downs glass after glass until when Edna comes home she find her handsome bridegroom in a stupor. Rose helps her get John to bed and plays upon her imagination by telling her that no woman can ever be happy with a drunkard. The unhappy bride weeps and when John wakes up with a splitting headache, she accuses him of so many things that in a temper he leaves the house. Rose again pretends sympathy and at last Edna agrees that she ought to go home to her mother to teach John a lesson. Meanwhile, when John returns contritely to beg Edna's pardon for losing his temper, Rose tells him a nagging wife is a terrible thing for any man, and that it's just as well that Edna is getting a divorce. Divorce has never occurred to John and he sinks heavily into a chair. However, Edna changes her mind, comes back to John and finds Rose hovering over him, kissing his head. In her fury she drives the girl from the house, and while Rose, dignity scattered trudges forlornly to the station, miles and miles away, John and Edna cling to each other and beg for forgiveness as they start life anew.

ONE WOMAN

Ramsey L. Reed Drama File No. 10280

PEOPLE have always told Marie she is too beautiful ever to have to work and when Ray Wilton holds her in his arms and tells her he can give her the pretty clothes and furs she should have, Marie marries him. When she returns to her family to show her diamond studded wedding ring, her parents try to hide their misgivings and question her about her husband's work. Only her brother Claude whom she has always adored, defends her, and cries out that anything is better than this hand to mouth existence. It is Claude who takes her back to her little apartment and admires the clothes Ray has bought for her. But when, that night, Marie is held tightly in her husband's arms, she asks him what business he is in. Ray covers her face with kisses and tells her not to worry about such matters. A few days later Ray comes home hurriedly to order Marie into his ear, and as he drives crazily to the outskirts of the town, frightened by his fierce expression she begs him to slow down, "And be caught by the cops?" he sneers, and cowering against the cushions of the car, Marie's heart sinks. The next few days are spent in hiding but at last Ray is caught and sentenced to prison for using the mails to defraud. He takes his term philosophically, but Marie, weeping as she tells him she is going to have a baby, promises to wait for him. Returning home she finds her parents heartbroken for her brother Claude has disappeared, leaving no clue.

At length Ray is freed, and promising to reform he takes Marie and the baby back. For a time they are forced to stint as Ray seeks employment, but at length, rebelling, he begs her to borrow money from her folks and when Marie refuses, loses his temper. Later, he returns and burying his face in her lap, begs her to forgive him, telling her how much he loves her. A few days later, however, he comes home excited about a racket he has developed, and when Marie refuses to help him, he sullenly excludes her from his consideration. When Marie sees him in animated conversation with a cheap looking woman, her last love for him dies, and she returns home to her people. She finds them agitated over a visit from a woman who claims she is Claude's wife, May. The woman had brought a year old baby which she claimed was Claude's and with a sob story and some faded snapshots, begged Marie's parents for money. They, bewildered, had given her a bill and asked her to give them time to think. Now she was begging them to give her money to hire a detective to find Claude. Marie, certain that this woman must know Claude if she produced pictures recently taken, sends her in search of the boy and they find him, starving and shamefaced, in the park. When they bring him home he tells them he has never been married, that he had fallen in with Ray's gang and had been ashamed to return home. When May returns, telling her sob story, she is confronted by Claude himself, and attempting to escape is arrested for blackmail. She is the same woman whom Marie has seen with her husband and the whole idea was Ray's. Ray begs Marie to forgive him and when she sues for divorce, he tries to kidnap the child given into Marie's custody. Claude, however, prevents him, beats him severely, and warns Ray that if he ever shows up again he'll be turned over to the police. It is on a trip abroad, to forget, that Marie misses Sonny, and finds him talking to a smiling man, Gordon Ross, and as Marie's eyes meet his, a new era begins.

SINNING HUSBANDS

Garabed Toumassian Melodrama File No. 10295

DESIRING a wife to give him sons, James a young barber of Aleppo, in the north-eastern part of Syria, journeys to his native home in Turkey, and weds Mary, a widow's daughter. The young couple return to Aleppo, and the early months of their marriage pass happily. James' business prospers, and his father, dying leaves him a small fortune, which enables him to buy a more luxurious home, and entertain lavishly. One of his friends, Joseph, has a beautiful young sister, Jane, whom James admires, but she is in love with John, a poor cutler. Aware of the advantage that a marriage between Jane and James would be to him, Joseph urges his friend to divorce his wife, but he replies that his Christian religion will not permit him to do this, and, angry because he cannot be free, James drinks heavily. Returning home in a drunken stupor, he often beats his devoted Mary, but she bears the punishment without complaint, praying that his love for her will return. One night he is unusually cruel, and she cannot restrain her cries, which attract the attention of a kindly neighbor woman, to whom she sobs out the story of her husband's brutality. The neighbor woman tells John, who sends Mary with Peter, his younger brother, to Anna, the wife of a winemaker. James and Joseph, in an intoxicated condition, come here to look for her, but Anna hides her under a basket of clothes. John then takes the young wife to Father Thomas, at the monastery, and he brings about a reconciliation between Mary and her husband. The two go to the cottage of his friends, Peter and Paul, for a vacation.

All is well for a few months, and Mary's happiness is complete when she tells her husband that she is to have a child, but he once more longs for Jane, and securing her brother's promise that he may have her if he can dispose of Mary, resolves to kill his wife. Inviting James to the house, he orders Mary to prepare a feast, and slips poison into her glass of wine. Soon she is seized with pain, but he quiets her, and tells her he has summoned a neighbor woman who will help her. She loses consciousness, and James and Joseph strangle her, but it is believed that the poor woman may have been killed but it cannot be definitely proved, as it is thought possible that she died of a fall, as there is a scar across her temple which might have been brought about by a fall, and her condition often caused her to faint. Charges against James and Joseph are dropped, as there is no definite proof of their guilt. Apparently overcome by grief, James attends the funeral of his wife, garbed in the apparel of deep mourning. A few days later, he prepares to wed Jane, despite her tearful protests that she loves John. Her lover attempts to take her away, but is captured and imprisoned for this plan, while executing it.

The wedding day approaches, and the unhappy Jane is dressed in white, and led before the altar for the ceremony, when a stranger stops the proceedings, and states that he sold James and Joseph poison just before Mary's death. An investigation is begun; her body is examined, and it is discovered the child she carried is black with poison. Joseph is sentenced to life imprisonment, James to exile, and John is released, and granted permission to make Jane his wife.

KILLER

Ethel Hallmark Drama File No. 10380

AT dinner in the home of Judge Drew, most prominent citizen of the sleepy little college town of Winslow, Jane, the petted daughter is receiving a lecture. Her brother, Tom, good-looking and ultra collegiate whistles at his father's urging Jane to think about her future more, and forget about Clancy Moran, who is just a penniless fortune hunter. Jane flies up in Clancy's defense, and when the Judge complacently suggests that anyone of Tom's friends, Horace, Paul, Jack or Edgar would be preferable to Clancy, Jane explodes, dismissing Horace as an overgrown baby, Paul as a self-conscious football star, Jack as one who knew only too well that he was most popular boy at the school, and Edgar, as an over-studious prig. Tom starts to protest, but Jane flies out of room, and her mother helplessly urges them to regain their tempers.

The following evening the ball the Judge is giving in honor of Jane's birthday is in full swing. As usual all Tom's friends are cutting in on Jane, but it is Clancy who swings her off the dance floor and into the garden. They are in close embrace when the Judge discovers them and sending the rebellious Jane inside, draws from Clancy an admission that although he loves Jane he is penniless. The Judge orders the boy from the grounds and tells him if he attempts to come back he will be run out of town. As Tom goes he sees a figure dart into the shrubbery, but preoccupied as he is, he goes on. That night a stealthy figure lets a rope ladder down from the roof of the Drew home, enters Tom's room, and swinging an axe crashes it into the sleeping boy's skull. Tom's unearthly scream brings his startled family to the scene and the murderer escapes with uncanny agility. The Chief examines the body, pronounces it murder, and explains that he can only establish a police net waiting for the murderer to return to the scene of his crime. Later, when Clancy tries to slip in to see Jane, he is caught and at the hysterical charge of the Judge is held as the murderer. Only the vigilance of the authorities save Clancy from lynching by the mob. The following night, however, while in prison another alarm is raised, police cars race out with sirens screaming, and Clancy learns that Paul, a classmate of Tom's has likewise been a victim of the axe murderer. Bitterly he asks the authorities if they believe that he committed that crime too, and when Clancy, in deep thought develops a theory, he induces the jailer to let him slip out that night and prove it, lest the whole town be wiped out by this murderer. Clancy proceeds to the home of Jack Smith, most popular boy at the college and states he believes he will be the next victim since the others have been the two most prominent boys at the college. Shuddering Jack agrees to Clancy's plan to let Clancy await the murderer, and Clancy paints a dummy head to resemble Jack. That night the murderer enters, buries his axe, and with a mad giggle prepares to leave. Clancy jumps for his throat, but the murderer slips out like an eel and escapes. On the roof he is cornered by the police but as he attempts to run down his ladder he falls and the body is identified as Edgar Mills, most studious boy of the class, who had gone mad with envy of the wealthier and handsomer boys and was killing them all. Clancy is freed and offered a position on the detective force, and the Judge, at first blustery, accepts Clancy in his son's place.

THE GLEANERS

Ermina Gerlough Drama File No. 10347

FROM the wreckage of the crashed plane a man groaned as he feebly shooed off a vulture. Despairingly his eyes searched the war torn field of grain and as he saw two small figures slowly move, a cry tore from his parched throat, then oblivion settled down over him. When at length he opened his eyes he saw two women one old and one incredibly young and lovely. The one called Gran explained it was a wounded soldier, and the younger reached for his pulse and asked, "How did you come to be here?" Irritably, Robert St. John snapped, "Don't you see the broken plane? Must you ask stupid questions now?" and the soft voice replied, "I'm sorry. I did not see. I am blind."

The grandmother hurried toward the hut they had claimed as their own and returned with some water and a blanket. Cynthia explained that her father had come to a physician's congress and when the war broke out he remained on the staff of one of the hospitals. Cynthia too had enlisted as a nurse. Then one day while her father was out, a bomb had wrecked the hospital. Cynthia had lost her sight and her grandmother, who had been visiting that day, had led her until they had come to this deserted hut and managed to exist by gleaning grain from the downtrodden field. Using the blanket as a stretcher, the women carried the groaning soldier to their hut and made him comfortable on the one cot. During the night Cynthia relieved Robert's burning forehead with her cool hand but the next morning at dawn she and her grandmother left to glean. Rain fell, and cold set in, but each day saw Robert's strength slowly return. It was one day when he was alone that Robert realized his bandages were part of Cynthia's skirt and realizing how she must be in need of outer garments he determined to leave and bring help for them.

Discouraged, Cynthia begged her grandmother to return home and as the old woman distinguished the tracks of a car they hurried back. But Robert was gone and Cynthia, falling down at the side of his bed wept bitterly. Two figures stood in the doorway—American soldiers come for Cynthia and her grandmother. Between them they led the weeping Cynthia to their car.

The war was over. A shipload of soldiers had arrived in Hoboken. To a fellow captain Robert St. Johns explained he was going to look up an old lady and her blind granddaughter. If they returned they must be in want. Proceeding to the address that Cynthia had given him, Robert realized the neighborhood was a magnificent one and when directed to Dr. Blair's mansion he stared perplexedly. "Sure," the gardner replied to Robert's questioning, "Dr Blair was overseas, and he has a daughter Cynthia, but she is not blind." It was late afternoon and Robert sat down puzzled to wait. Embarrassed, he watched the Blair car, driven by a uniformed chauffeur pull up. It was the old lady, now a white haired dowager, who recognized Robert and Cynthia incredulously ran toward him. After she has introduced him to her father she explained that a specialist had restored her sight. But now that Cynthia was rich, Robert turned to go and it was only when her soft arms held him and she pleaded that if he loved her he wouldn't let her money come between them, that Robert believed with her, that he could build planes, and make good, and his lips held hers.

THE OVERLAND TRAIL

Ann Delmac Western File No. 10343

WITH eyes turned toward the pioneer west, Mr. and Mrs. John Thorn and their six year old daughter Betty join a wagon train on the Overland Route. At Cheyenne they stop and Jim Day, notorious gambler, catching sight of Mrs. Thorn, decides he wants her. In his saloon he arranges a friendly game of cards but when Thorn declines the drinks he is offered, Jim arranges to have him shot as he is leaving. The wagon train moves on, too slim in numbers to revenge Thorn's murder, and Mrs. Thorn, ill from sorrow, is left behind with her daughter. Day pretends sympathy and when she is able to move about again, he offers her a position as entertainer in his saloon. In a short time Mrs. Thorn, desperately alone and friendless accepts the honeyed persuasions of Day and marries him. Time passes. Day's infatuation wears off and when he insists on tutoring Betty as an entertainer in his saloon, he beats his wife for objecting.

On a nearby ranch, a retired New Yorker Daniel Barr lives. He has sent for his son Danny, from an Eastern school to visit with him, but during a cattle raid, Daniel is killed and the child is met, instead by the sorrowing foreman Ben Lory. When they return to the ranch they hear shots and spurring rein find one of their cowhands wounded in the leg from trying to stop another rustlers party. Danny rides into town to get the sheriff but Adam Dunn is out trying to round up the rustlers. Danny see Betty sitting on the saloon porch and surprised, starts a conversation. Suddenly there is a shot and rushing upstairs they find Betty's mother has been killed. Danny tries to comfort Betty. Jim Day comes in to take charge and when he puts Sheriff Dunn on the case, and the sheriff can only report that he feels the rustlers and murders are from the same gang, Day removes him for incompetence and taking matters in his own hands appoints Bill Tate, one of his own men, in his place. Ben Lory sends Danny East again, and after a touching farewell with Betty, Danny goes. Having graduated he returns to find the rustlers still active, and Ben Lory at the end of his tether. As they proceed toward the ranch, they are held up and Danny notices a livid scar on the hand of the leader. Later, renewing his acquaintance with Betty, his breath catches as he sees how lovely she has grown and she tells him she is going to run away from Jim Day who is drunk most of the time, and only treats her with respect because she is such a drawing card for his saloon. She tells him that Tate is useless as a sheriff and lawlessness is more prevalent than ever. But with Danny back, she agrees to remain and help him if possible. Danny goes up to see the sheriff and is amazed to notice the livid scar on the sheriff's hand. Determined to prove his suspicions, he and Betty ride daily looking for clues, while their love grows.

Once, resting their horses near a ravine, they hear shooting. Danny investigates, recognizes grazing cattle as those from his ranch and creeps up to the shack. Quietly he opens the door and discovers that the wounded man lying on the floor is—Sheriff Tate. Gravely wounded, the sheriff weakly writes a confession telling he was Jim Day's right hand man. Jim had shot him for threatening, after Jim had refused to give him his full share of the last holdup, to expose the dancehall owner. Bill Tate had killed Betty's father and Danny's father, and Jim Day had killed her mother for wanting to send Betty away to school. Tate slumps over dead and Betty and Danny ride back to Cheyenne. Led by ex-sheriff Dunn, the townspepole round up Day's gang of rustlers, and hang them in the streets, and Betty and Danny return to the latter's ranch, married.

BEFORE THIS SHRINE

J. Marian Mohr Drama File No. 10429

ON her way home from Church with her parents, Vera Del Ora, beautiful Mexican senorita, sees a handsome but poorly dressed young man standing outside. As his eyes fall on the girl, radiant in a white mantilla, he sweeps his cap off his head in obeisance and Vera blushes. Her parents, seeing the by-play hurry her on through the streets and at home scold her for daring to forget her position so. A few days later, Vera is riding alone through the woods when her horse stumbles and throws her. As she cries out with the pain of her wrenched ankle, the handsome lad passes and offers assistance. He tells her he is Anguina Tula, a young adventurer and in the course of their conversation admits that he was just passing through the town when he saw her, but decided to remain on and find work. Anguina assists Vera to her home and though her parents express their gratitude to the young man, they are deeply vexed by the evidence that their daughter has fallen in love with a boy of humble parentage and no immediate prospects. Accordingly when at the fete that week, Villa De La Cosa, an older and wealthy mine and plantation owner pays marked attention to Vera, her parents beam and scowl reprovingly at their daughter when she reveals to the too ardent Villa that his company is not wanted. To the marked distress of the girl they cordially invite Villa, to call upon them and fixing his eyes upon Vera, Villa assures them he will not be long in taking advantage of their invitation. Vera, dismayed by her parents conduct, visits a gypsy fortune teller who is camping nearby and is advised to go and pray before the shrine of the Virgin, then to look in the little lake in the enclosure and she will see something to her interest. Vera does so. Meanwhile Villa has come to see her and is told that she has gone down towards the shrine. He follows, and Vera's parents, anticipating the union of their house with that of the well-favored La Cosas, chat happily. After some moments, however, they become anxious over Vera's failure to return and proceed after.

Meanwhile Vera completing her devotions, kneels and watches the lake. To her horror she sees La Cosa enter and not seeing her he makes a wry face and reviles the shrine. Vera flees, but La Cosa catches her in his arms and is forcing a kiss upon her when her parents enter and interfere. To the horror of the devout Del Oras. Villa curses them and when they find he is an unbeliever, order him to leave. Shaken by the encounter, they pause irresolutely but Vera sees that Anguina has entered the shrine, and unaware of the little drama because of an obscuring ridge of rocks, has knelt before the shrine that Villa has profaned, in devout prayer. Vera rushes over to him and kneels down at his side. Her parents look at each other, cross themselves, uttering a silent prayer, and walk away leaving them together.

HIS WIFE

Margaret B. Riley Drama File No. 10440

RETURNING home to his father's ranch from a rodeo held at the county fair, Daniel Raynor is introduced to Mary Selby, daughter of one of his mother's former school friends. It is Daniel who brings back to Mary's cheeks the roses that illness has laid waste and when he leaves for the city to pursue his mechanical interests he confides his ambitions to her alone. Two years pass and Daniel returns in response to his father's request that he manage the sale of the ranch. As he steps down from the train Daniel is astonished to see how lovely and tall Mary has grown and when, some weeks later the Raynors build a home in the city, Mary goes about with Daniel, helping to furnish it. As they go through the house, now complete, Daniel realizes that Mary is a part of it and gently he asks her if she will stay on—as his wife. Tears come to Mary's eyes, as she whispers humbly she never supposed he would ever return her love. And so they are married and the years go on. A child, Marie, is born to them and Mary and Daniel lavish all their affection upon her until suddenly, out of a clear sky, the child falls ill of pneumonia and in one day is taken from them. Their grief is unspeakable, but life goes on and Daniel, to assuage the pain in his heart throws himself with greater energy into his work and completes his first invention. It is a success and leaving his position he opens a one room factory at first, gradually expanding to a two story building with many employees. As his business grows he becomes more conscious of his educational deficiencies and determines to educate himself. He applies at a school and is introduced to Mrs. Anne Grayden who is to give him private lessons. Anne starts as she recognizes him as the man she had noted in passing on the street and had thought there was someone she would like to know, and as for Daniel, as he explains his needs to this poised, vital little woman, he feels something stirring within him. The necessary preliminaries arranged Daniel asks if he may drive Mrs. Grayden home and soon is persuading her to have dinner with him since his wife is visiting for the week. Over the dinner table, Daniel finds himself telling Anne who is divorced from her husband, his inner thoughts and when, suddenly he admits that he has fallen in love with her, she softly replies she has known she loved him since the first time he passed in the street. With their hours of study their love grows and Daniel says he will get a divorce so that they can be married. But Anne, knowing that Mary loves Daniel, refuses to take him away from his wife. It is Anne, always thoughtful, always understanding, who induces Daniel to give up one of their cherished meetings to take his wife out for their anniversary and as she restlessly goes alone to a movie, she passes Daniel and the gracious woman who is the wife of the man she loves. Mary senses the tension between Anne and her husband but cannot define it. Shortly after Anne learns she is to have a baby and again refusing Daniel's offer to marry her, she goes away alone. Unable to stand it longer, Daniel goes to her. Meanwhile, Mary long aware that Daniel no longer loves her, learns about Anne and her child, and realizing that this other woman has acted always to spare her, Mary quietly arranges to get a divorce. As she comes to say goodbye to Daniel she finds him sitting before the fire with Anne and their baby, and wishing them every happiness, she asks softly if she may not be godmother to their child.

THE HIGHER LOVE

Gladys Duthie Smith Drama File No. 10437

PROMISING his friend, Juan Pablo, who lies at the point of death, that he will care for little daughter, Isabella, Padre Pedro takes the sobbing child in his arms when the doctor signifies with a glance that her father has passed away. The two journey to Pedro's home, where his younger brother, Carlos Manuela, and his son, Juan, help the child to forget her grief. Isabella and Juan soon become fast friends, playing together under the huge trees bordering Pedro's home, and studying with the same tutor, as they grow older. Adoring the little girl, Juan protects her from all harm, and she regards him as a big brother, second only in her affections to Padre Pedro. As the two children are seated before Pedro, one evening, Isabella tells him that she wishes to marry Juan when she grows older, and her kindly foster father replies that he hopes this will come true, while Juan assures them both that there will never be another girl for him, as long as he lives. Padre Pedro is transferred to Cuba when Isabella is fifteen, and the two children sadly bid one another goodbye, promising to meet again as soon as their educations have been completed, and they are old enough to marry. In accordance with the wishes of her father, Isabella goes to Madrid the following year, to attend school. Juan sends her a photograph of himself, with a declaration of his love written on the back, which Isabella shows to her aunt, with whom she lives.

Juan becomes an engineer, and shortly before he plans to marry Isabella, he is sent to Cuba to direct the construction of a bridge. Jealous of this younger man, De Vasca, one of his employees who had hoped to be given charge of the construction, blows up the partially completed work, killing seventeen men; Juan's watch is found near the scene of the accident, and he is reported dead. Heartbroken, Isabella tells her aunt she wishes to enter a convent. A few days later, Ana, the maid, brings word that Padre Pedro has passed away. Isabella writes to Carlos Manuela, asking that he place a monument on the grave of her beloved foster father, then, overcome with grief, she collapses. Her life is despaired of, but at last she is again able to leave her bed. However, she does not know her own name, or remember anything of her former life. While in this trance-like state, the girl escapes from her aunt's home, and disappears. All efforts to trace her fail. Taking jewels which her father left her, Isabella goes to the Spanish Pyranees, and establishes a little church. Endowed with power to help the sick, people flock to her shrine from distant parts of the country, and scientists attempt to solve the mystery of her strange ability.

Severely injured, but not killed by the explosion, Juan is discovered in a ravine near the destroyed bridge a few days later ,and explains that he had given his watch to one of the workmen. As soon as he is able to leave the hospital, he searches for Isabella, but she has disappeared. In desperation, he tours Spain, and is told that perhaps the priestess of the Pyranees can help him find his sweetheart, by her occult powers. Following this suggestion, he enters her church. When she sees him, Isabella gives a cry of joy, and loses consciousness. Tenderly Juan restores her, and once more, she knows who she is. Wishing her joy, the people attend her wedding to Juan, believing a miracle has reunited them.

TOMORROW WE SING

Beverly Stewart Drama File No. 10430

INTERESTED primarily in material advantages, Mrs. Kane continually reprimands her husband, a minister in a little southern town, for his desire to serve his fellow citizens, rather than attempting to accumulate wealth. Influenced by her mother, their only child, Cecelia, grows up to scorn her father's idealism, and select her friends among the socially elite of the town. Mrs. Kane lives far beyond their income in order that Cecelia may belong to this strata of society, and is delighted when Will Ostrander, a banker who is several years older than the girl, asks her to become his wife. She is on the point of accepting when Allen Stuart, the junior member a law firm, also proposes to her. Swept away by her love for this attractive younger man, Cecelia ignores the fact that he is in moderate circumstances, and momentarily forgetting her mother's teachings, elopes with him. Mrs. Kane refuses to forgive her daughter, but the girl's father gives the young couple his blessing, although he feels that Cecelia has made an unwise choice, knowing her extravagant nature. The honeymoon is scarcely over when Cecelia begins to long for more pleasures than their limited budget permits, and one night tells Allen that she regrets her marriage, and wishes she was Will's wife. On Christmas Day Allen presents her with a fur coat and a roadster, as a surprise, telling her that he has purchased Liberty Bonds for her.

When she questions him on his ability to finance these purchases he merely tells her not to worry, and, merrily, they ride in the new car. A few days later police come to their home and arrest Allen; he confesses that he speculated and lost on the market with money which had been entrusted to him as guardian of an estate, feeling that he would lose Cecelia if he could not provide her with a few luxuries. The judge sentences him to two years in the penetentiary, and Cecelia, feeling her responsibility in the affair, sadly returns to her parents' home, where she cares for her mother who is ill. Later she secures a position in the stationery department of a store, and gradually resumes her former social connections and desire for wealth. At her mother's insistence, Cecelia begins proceedings for a divorce from Allen. While attending a party, Cecelia is introduced to Gordon Morrison, a doctor from Lexington, who is visiting in the town. She is instantly attracted to him, and when he tells her he is wealthy, and wishes to marry her, she consents. This is not possible as her divorce has not been completed, so Gordon persuades her to accompany him to Lexington, where they can later be married. Telling her parents that she is going to enter training as a nurse, and turning the money from her Liberty Bonds over to Gordon, she leaves with him. The next morning Cecelia finds that Gordon has disappeared, taking her money with him. Police advise her that she cannot arrest him, even if she finds him, as she gave the funds to him.

Cecelia secures work as a newspaper reporter, and while checking on the patients admitted to the hospitals, encounters Allen, who has been injured in an automobile accident, shortly after his release from prison. She sees him frequently, and calls at the home of his aunt Fannie, who cares for him during his convalescences, finally confessing her affair with Gordon, which Allen readily forgives, and joyfully promising to start a new life with her husband, forgetting their past sorrows.

CONVINCED

SINCE they were children together Robert had been fond of Dorothy and her brother James. However, lately James had fallen into bad company and despite all the efforts of his family had taken to drinking. Then one night he arrived home shouting that he had been converted to atheism. To the pious Wilsons the effect was startling and Mr. Wilson, worrying over his son's conduct, lost many crucial business deals. When it came time for the children to leave for college, the finances of the family were in a strained condition but rather than deprive them of any opportunities, the Wilsons stinted in everything for themselves. It was Dorothy who realized how much her parents were denying themselves and tremulously she informed them she was through with school. James, however, seemingly oblivious to sacrifices made for him went on, and Dorothy begged Robert to look after her brother at school.

At college, however, James sneered at Robert's theological studies and afire with his own ideas outfitted a chemical laboratory in which he intended to prove he could artificially create life. Mingling with a wild crowd, James sneered at Robert's conservatism and one night Robert heard him boisterously shout his ideas in the corridor. Realizing James would be expelled if he were caught, Robert dragged the intoxicated lad into his own room. James boasted wildly that to-morrow he would prove he could create a living plant in his laboratory. After all even God couldn't restore a dead man, and if he, James, could produce life out of nothing,—well there wasn't anything God could do, he couldn't. Vainly Robert tried to reason with the obsessed lad and the next morning when James swaggered off to his laboratory, Robert worriedly followed. "Look" shouted James, as Robert tried to stop him, and with wild eyes he set his chemicals boiling. Suddenly there was a terrific explosion. The doctor examined the two bodies and pronounced "A matter of hours." Writhing in agony, James drew his face up grotesquely and asked, "Where's . . your . . . God . . . now?" But Dorothy and her parents came and through interminable hours they watched over the two scarred boys. Days passed and weeks and out of the ruins, Robert was entirely well again and James recovered so that he would some day be able to walk without crutches.

As he sat at the window watching Robert and Dorothy walk in the garden together, arm in arm, he turned to his mother and Dad who had silently entered and put their hands on his shoulders, and patting their hands, he nodded toward Dorothy and Robert and exclaimed in a tremulous voice, "Thank God for all this."

That evening, Robert and Dorothy told the Wilsons of their love, and as they all sat around the dinner table, once more reflecting the prosperity that was becoming widespread throughout the country, James bowed his head and led them in their little prayer of thankfulness.

LOVE'S SPLENDOR

Henrietta Wise Downes Drama File No. 10359

EACH day returning to his stuffy room, Tao would take out the crude reproduction of the Saint's picture that hung in the Church back home, and leaning out on the fire escape would forget the squalling of the thousand infants oppressed by heat and city noises. Lost in thoughts of his 'Cesta who waited for him, he brooded over the slowness with which he accumulated the money that was to take him back to her eager young arms. At this rate, he thought bitterly, it would take years, many years. Then, while working with the street repair gang, Tao had looked up to see a vision of a girl waiting her chance to cross her horse from the riding school to the park across the way. Suddenly a motorcycle frightens the horse who rears. Tao jumps for the horse and is dragged many feet before he pulls it to a halt. The girl dismounts to thank him, but just then Tao sways and falls. She brings him in a taxi to a hospital and induces her millionaire father to have him taken care of. It is miraculous to Tao that his angel should interest herself in him but when he reverently shows her his Saint's picture and tells her of 'Cesta, she gives him money to return to Italy. With beating heart Tao embraces his 'Cesta and as she kisses him again and again she forgets all about Marco and his beautiful boat. Soon they are married. What is work now to Tao when at the end of the day he finds his own 'Cesta singing as she prepares his humble supper! And when 'Cesta's baby turns out to be a boy because the Blessed Mother has heeded 'Cesta's candles burned to her, their cup of happiness flows over.

Then one day Doris visits Italy with her mother and father and as she passes through the little village she remember's Tao's talk of the Saint's picture, and snuffing out her cigarette begs her parents to stay a moment while she sees it. But the heart dies within 'Cesta as she sees her Tao reverently help back to her shiny car the woman who has helped him come back to his 'Cesta, and misreading his grateful expression, she shrieks that she never wants to see him again and will not let him touch the bambino. Brokenly Tao waits for her fury to subside, but 'Cesta is irreconcilable and at last Tao, without knowing'Cesta is soon to have another baby, is forced to yield to her cries that he go away else she'll throw herself into the sea.

Months later a thin, sallow Tao appears at Doris' house and informs the shocked girl that her visit has been misunderstood and has broken up his home. Realizing that the strong Tao is slowly starving himself to death because of heartbreak, she induces her father to get work for him on a ship returning to Italy.

It lacks one day of Christmas. A thin tired man steps from a diligence and stops before an open door. Within a pale girl is listlessly stirring soup while the bambino sways precariously, holding onto a stool, and a small bundle on the bed frets incessantly. The girl turns. The spoon clatters to the floor. Flinging her arms about Tao's neck, 'Cesta babbles happily of everything that has happened, of the letter from the grand American lady explaining everything and of her gifts to the Church in gratitude to the village boy who has saved her life and was nearly killed by a woman. What, 'Cesta asks, does it all mean, what means that she hopes the light will shine into the soul of the woman to show her the splendor of her husband's love?

KINGDOM OF CHIVALRY

Gerhardt S. Hintz Historical Drama File No. 10361

THE CLAYTON mansion is ablaze with light, and sounds of music and laughter echo from its walls, for tonight the engagement of Beulah, the daughter of the house, to Gerald Kane, a young doctor, is being celebrated. The girl's friends ask her when she first promised to marry Gerald, with whom she has grown up, and she replies that she had chosen him for her knight when she was nine years old. They urge her to tell them the story behind this statement, and she accedes to their wishes. When she was a little girl, Beulah relates, her father often told her stories of the brave deeds of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. Curling herself in the canoe while it was fastened to the dock of the little lake on their estate, the child would spend long hours imagining herself a beautiful heroine, saved from peril by a brave and handsome knight, and, awakening from her reverie, regret how cowardly and dull the little boys she knew seemed by comparison with this glamorous figure of her mind. One lazy summer afternoon she fell asleep in the canoe, and dreamed that she was transported to a castle near King Arthur's, and in his day. Here dwelt Lady Emerelda Wellington, a widow, and her four sons. Since Lord Wellington had been slain in battle, his widow had daily grown weaker of an unknown malady, and could not take nourishment. She had a vision of an orchard, guarded by a knight who had been turned to stone by an evil spell cast by his enemies, and the fruit inside would restore her to health, she believed. Upon hearing this, Edward, her second son, at once began a search for the garden, but was thrown into a well by two thieves. John, the eldest, and Sigurd, the third son, aided by five knights of King Arthur, Lady Emerelda's friend, discovered their lost brother, but their quest for the magical orchard was still unfinished. Lucian, the youngest son, at last persuaded his mother, who was daily growing weaker, to let him go. After a long search, he found the orchard.

Underneath the statue of the knight was an inscription, stating that if this man's true name could be guessed, he would be restored to life. Armaunt Flint, the young squire who accompanied his master, and Lucian, tried vainly to guess the name, and became very impatient. An old man passed them, and advised them to be calm, as it would come to them. At last, Lucian pronounced the name "Emphis" and the knight came to life. Thanking his benefactor, he gave them the key to the garden, and warned him not to pay the ferryman, who would conduct him to the castle, until the end of the voyage. Following these instructions, Lucian and Armaunt crossed the river and found an old castle in which a beautiful young girl, Cynthia Alaric, was imprisoned. Taking ripe fruit from the trees, they started homeward with her. The ferryman struggled with them, but they overpowered him, and when they payed him at the end of the journey, he, too, thanked them profusely, for they had released him from a spell which forced him to row back and forth ceaselessly across the river. Restoring Cynthia to her father, a feudal lord, Lucian brought the enchanted fruit to his mother, and she was soon well again. Armaunt was dubbed a knight by King Arthur himself, and at the same time, Cynthia became the bride of Lucian, as both of them fell instantly in love with one another, and the consent of each family was joyfully given to this happy union. The wedding service was simple but colorful, attended by the Knights of the Round Table, neighboring feudal lords and ladies in armor and rich costumes, and their vassals and serfs. At the conclusion of the ceremony, a vested choir sang the hymns of old England, and the young couple retired to the moated castle which their families had given them, prepared to carry on the traditions of their class, with the aid of their faithful retainers. The wedding guests celebrated with a fox hunt, after their departure.

Awakening from this dream, the child Beulah found that the rope of her canoe had broken, and she was drifting down the stream. Little Gerald Kane heard her cries for help as he was passing by, and swam out to her. Bringing her to shore, the boy carried her to the house, and called a doctor, as her parents were not at home. Gratefully, Mr. and Mrs. Clayton told Gerald that he had saved their only child. When she was well again, Beulah told Gerald that he would always be her knight and she would be his lady, whom he someday might marry and carry away.

As Beulah concludes this story, her guests applaud, and Gerald comes to claim his fairy princess. Smiling at the happiness of this couple their friends agree that chivalry is not dead. Alone in the garden, Gerald takes Beulah in his arms, tenderly.

MOUNTAIN FEUD

C. G. Degman Drama File No. 10345

IN the early days of Kentucky history a feud had broken out between the Tolivers and the Brewers over the ownership of three wild hogs. Ben Brewer had put them in his pens, Jim Toliver had disputed his right and in the resultant gunfight both principals were killed and the relatives and friends of both families took up the battle for many years to come.

Many years later, Bud Toliver and Sue Brewer were to meet again after education, religion and financial development had checked the lawlessness of the region. Bud was taking a Normal Course and Sue a Nurse's Training Course at Berea College when they fell in love and decided to overcome their feud hatreds and get married when they graduated. In the gaiety of their romance, they ventured to a fortune teller and laughed merrily over the prognostication that Bud was to travel afar and Sue would find happiness when she saw a ship sail in the sun. On their last summer vacation each was cheered by the suspension of hostilities between the two factors and Bud came to the Brewers for a clandestine meeting with Sue. While leaving, he was seen by Sue's brother Tom who furiously drew a gun. Bud tried to stop him and in the scuffle Tom fell to the ground, shot through the head. In despair Bud escaped, borrowed money from his father and fled the vicinity. Proceeding to Cincinnati, St. Louis, Kansas City, he finally hired himself out as a teamster for a caravan bound for the gold fields of California. Impatient of delays while waiting for snows to melt, Bud and some of the other youths started prospecting and, untaught as they were, discovered the famous Comstock Lode and made their fortunes. Rich now at twenty-two, Bud dared not let his identity be known lest he be held for murder and while others rejoiced he brooded over Sue whom he wanted more than life.

Meanwhile back home Tom's body was found and Sue's skill as a nurse helped to save his life. Rising she denounced her relatives for their outworn feud and with a stirring speech awakened them to the needless waste of life. Securing a promise to meet the Brewers half way, Sue journeyed to Bud's people only to find that Bud had fled. Although she succeeded in establishing peace between the two clans, her heart ached for Bud and she followed him from city to city until in Kansas City she learned to her dismay that he had gone on to California. Resolving to continue her search she signed up with the Donnor party as a nurse. Soon however, the little caravan ran into Indian attacks, disasters in crossing rivers, storms, fevers and Sue worked valiantly. Forced to pitch camp near the Truckee River, they suffered want of food and soon they began to die off until only Sue and two men survived. At last, broken in spirit, they reached California and fell to their knees in gratitude. From camp to camp Sue traveled in search of Bud and as her medical training aided many, she became known as the Mountain Angel. An enterprising reporter wrote up her story and at last Bud recognized his Sue. When Sue's health became endangered by the dread Mountain fever she traveled to California. There, watching a gorgeous sunset, she saw a ship sailing into the sun and remembered the gypsy's prophecy. A footstep sounded behind her and turning, she cried out incredulously and with a little cry ran into the arms of Bud who had, at last, found her.

PETITE GAMINE

Douglas Beverly Drama File No. 10393

LIKE the crash of the irresistible cannon ball against the immovable post, Dick Barton met the artist Nita Page, of the Page millions, in old Vienna. Raven haired, magnificently proportioned. Nita had never crossed in her young life, but an improvident reporter had ideas against becoming the lap dog of an heiress and they quarreled. Dick tried to stay away until, finally yielding, he discovered that Nita was on her way Back Home. With the last of his capital, he flew to the dock and booked passage on the same boat, and as Nita raised startled eyes to his on the moon drenched decks, they hurled themselves into each others arms! For days they saw nothing but each other, then Nita fancied Dick was looking at a blonde. Shouting that he was fickle and heartless she avoided him, and in the ensuing weeks, after his letters were returned unopened, Dick tried to forget the terrible adventure.

It remained for gossip to reopen old wounds. Incredulously he heard that his cousin Steve, who bristled with money, had met and was now engaged to this same Nita Page. Never a psychologist and with his cousin's happiness of course foremost, Dick arrived to "warn" Steve against Nita. A terrific punch, the height of sheerest Artistry, robbed him of his senses, and he awakened to find Steve speeding in his mile-long roadster, trying to bring Dick to. Contritely Steve apologized for the blow and kidnapping, and despite Dick's gasp of dismay induced Dick to spend a weekend with himself, his fiancee, NITA! and Nita's friend, a beautiful redhead. Dick, rallying to his masculine defences, went merely to show Nita she meant nothing to him. But despite the amorous redhead, Dick squirmed at sight of the affianced pair, exchanging warm kisses; and remaining till groggy, staggered away from Steve's ravings.

Outside, the redhead squatted searching for four leaf clovers and cheerfully pulled him down beside her. It was this redhead histrionic genius, who informed Dick he'd "better be nice" to her because Nita had just invited him down to "fry him." And the redhead later stunned Nita and Steve by lying that Dick, (who began to enjoy the effect of the statement), had been boasting that he had given Nita the air!

Later, Steve showed off by riding one of the motorcycles that had started the Page fortune; and Dick, taunted, agreed to try. A barn stopped his career, violently, and Nita helped him limp to a sofa where he lay groaning. The redhead, Steve and finally Nita cheered him, successively.

But as Nita used her whole bag of tricks on him, Dick groaned more with the pain of what he was losing than his bodily aches. Nita sitting besides him, took "time out" from her bored seduction to knife him by reminding him he had never proposed, but when he attempted to remedy the lack, smirking she rebuked him sharply, and, unable to stand being played with so, Dick staggered off to the garden, only to jump in his track at sight of Steve ardently kissing the all-too willing redhead! Returning to the house, con amour, Dick almost stumbled over Nita, forlornly plumped down in the clover patch. The bad light, nita sniffed, had made her eyes red, but as Dick noticed that the pencil sketch she was completing wasn't for once, of Steve, (and, in fact, bore an unmistakable, if unflattering, likeness to himself.) he gathered his cousin's fiancee, sniffles and all, into his arms; and when Steve came out, with his arms around the redhead, Dick magnanimously agreed to take the shamelessly grinning Nita off the occupied hands of a relieved Cousin Steve.

THIS FAITH

N. J. McSweeney Drama File No. 10386

TORN with anxiety, Steven Farrel listens with a sinking heart as Dr. Grey, the city's most eminent surgeon, tells him that his wife, who has just undergone a major operation, has no chance for recovery. Placing his hand on Steven's shoulder, Dr. Grey requests that he face the issue bravely, hiding his despair from his wife, as she does not know the truth. Forcing himself to smile, Steven takes Marie Farrel's hand as he sits at her bedside and reassures her that she will soon be home again with him and their two children, Frank and Richard. As he looks down at the wedding ring on her thin, little hand he recalls the day when the lovely, dark-haired Marie became his bride, more beautiful than ever in her wedding gown. The first year of their life passed without a care, but after that his business failed and they were forced to move to a tiny apartment. Facing poverty bravely, Marie adjusted herself to circumstances without complaint, and helped her husband regain his position in the business world. When Frank was born, Marie's health began to fail, and after the birth of their second child, Richard, she sank rapidly. Hospital bills reduced their savings to nothing, but Dr. Grey gladly tried to save the brave young mother, without thought of immediate payment. A few days after the operation, Marie dies, still believing that her dreams of being again with those she loves will be realized. Believing there can be no God, Steven gives way to his tears when he is at home; Richard, although not understanding the situation fully, tries to comfort him.

Trying to convince the young husband that there is a plan in the universe, although we cannot understand it, Dr. Grey and his daughter, Lenore, urge Steven to find solace for his grief in religion, and in the care of his children. When Lenore agrees to look after them, Steven is happy, but wishing to escape from old memories, he gradually begins to drink, and sees little of his two boys. While he is seated alone in a cabaret, Mae, a professional entertainer, comes to his table and he orders a cocktail for her. After that, they see one another frequently, and forgetting the past momentarily in the attraction of this woman, so unlike his wife, Steven becomes infatuated, although realizing that her charms are only surface-deep. Eventually she becomes his mistress. Lenore attempts to interest Steven in his boys' futures, and he provides liberally for their education, but does not take a father's interest in them. When Richard becomes ill, Lenore finally goes to Mae's apartment where she finds Steven, and tells him he must come to his son. Frank, now eleven years old, follows Lenore, and sees her through the partially opened door, with her arms about his father's shoulder, while Mae is in the next room. Not understanding the situation, he becomes angry at Lenore, but still she will not defend herself as she does not wish to cast blame upon Steven. While Richard is convalescing, Steven stays at Dr. Grey's home, and falls in love with Lenore, finding in this splendid girl someone who can partially take the place of Marie. He asks her to marry him, and she consents.

Jealous and angry, Mae tells Steven that he cannot dismiss her so readily, and when he insists that they must not see each other again as he is going to marry Lenore, she goes to his fiancee's home and shoots her. Police take Mae into custody and Lenore is rushed to the hospital. For the first time since Marie's death, Steven prays, and finds peace. When Lenore at last recovers the two are married at her father's home. Years go by, and the boys, under the guidance of Steven and Lenore, become fine young men, Frank winning success as an interior decorator, while Richard is equally prominent as an architect. Through fulfilling his duty to his sons and trusting once more in God's wisdom, Steven has found a deep contentment, and he thanks Lenore for her faith in him, which brought about this redemption.

TROUBLE-MAKERS

Frank Hendricks Comedy File No. 10335

FATTY and Slim decide to visit their friend. George Wallace, who owns a farm a few miles away from their home in the little town of Barehill. After a long, dusty walk, they come to the old rail fence that surrounds Wallace's cabin; Slim's long legs take him easily over the top, but Fatty struggles to crawl under it, as his friend looks on, laughing. Following this short cut, the boys come to a creek, bridged by a rough plank. Jumping up and down as he crosses it, Slim quickly reaches the other side, but Fatty slips, and falls into the shallow water. Farmer Wallace hears his calls for help, and brings his mule, Mode. Placing the singletrec on its traces, and fastening one end of the rope to it, throwing the other end to Fat, Wallace harnesses his mule, and gives him a slap. Just as the animal has almost drawn Fat out of the water, he backs up, and again Fat finds himself in the center of the creek. Wallace directs Slim to lead the mule on with an ear of corn, and at last his friend is rescued, dripping wet. Instructing Fatty to take off his wet clothing, Wallace brings him a bright, red blanket, and leaves the boys, while Slim spreads Fatty's spacious trousers on the bushes. Playfully, Fatty pretends to be John Doe, a bullfighter, until a real bull sees his brilliant costume and chases him. Reproving him for this foolishness, Wallace gives him a blue blanket, in exchange.

When his clothing dries shapelessly, Fatty helps Wallace to pick peaches, and Slim prepares to take his horse to the blacksmith, but his boast that he can ride anything proves untrue, as the animal crashes into Fatty's ladder, sending him to the ground, and throws Slim. Fatty hurls an over-ripe peach at his pal, and the two soon empty the basket, as they laughingly throw the fruit at each other. Chiding them for this wastefullness, Wallace asks them to help catch a rooster; Fatty falls in a tub of dirty water, in this pursuit, but Slim leaves him there until he corners the bird. Wallace sends the boys after two pails of water and a jug of cider; they sample the latter, and pouring some of it in a smaller bottle, leave the jug. A mountain sheep bucks Fatty, causing him to spill the pails of water. He takes a drink of cider, squirting it over his pal when a garter snake frightens him.

Gloria Ways, a pretty neighbor girl, asks for help with loading the hay, and Wallace, with a sigh of relief, sends the boys. Slim's long legs become tangled, as he ascends the ladder to the loft, and he falls, gleefully, Fatty calls him a giraffe, and goes ahead of him, his friend pulling at his baggy trousers as he climbs. The boys load the hay enthusiastically, spraying it over Gloria, as she stacks it. Slim is unable to lift the last fork-load, and discovers that Fatty is sitting on it. This task completed, the two see Mr. Wallace leaving for the blacksmith shop, and decide this is their chance to ride in an old carriage, which he values highly, and never uses, preserving it as an antique. They hitch Mode to it and climb it, Slim's long legs dangling over the edge. As they reach the duckpond, Mode stops, and the wheel comes off; Slim jumps away, but Fatty is thrown in the water, with the carriage. They pull it out, and lead Mode back to town, Slim upholding the broken front axle. Wallace sees them, and sends the trouble-makers flying, with shots from his gun.

THE UNEXPECTED

W. L. Gonterman Comedy File No. 10376

FOR years it was the habit of Sol Fuqua to sit in the station depot, chewing his tobacco at leisure while he discoursed to anyone who would listen what he'd do if he had money. He'd travel to the big city, Sol would say and his eyes would become dreamy, and there he would live—but live! At this point his listener would either wink prodigiously or encourage Sol to expound further upon his adventures. One day as he was thus engaged, leaning against the baggage truck, the busy station agent rushed up, grabbed the truck and precipitated Sol headlong upon the gravel and stone. Considerably bruised, Sol was carried home and when the doctor advised him to remain in bed a few days, it occurred to Sol he had a nice case against the railroad. With an exaggerated hobble, Sol betook himself to a shrewd attorney and presented the facts. After some deliberation, the lawyer slapped Sol violently upon the back and told him he could collect five thousand dollars easily. Sol coughed. Five thousand! Enthusiastically he entered into the facts of the case and with the aid of careful leading questions built up a corking testimony. As the day of the trial approached, however, Sol began to grow a little scared. He was having bad dreams. It wasn't worth it. What if they discovered that he wasn't really so badly hurt! But his counsellor reassured him and one fine day Sol hobbled into court and flinchingly testified that he had received many permanent injuries and partial paralysis of his right hand. "Just a moment, Mr. Fuqua," said the Judge. "I forgot to swear you. Raise your right hand." But before Sol could comply his attorney thundered that Sol was unable to lift his hand and with an apologetic air, Sol glanced at the Judge. As Sol continued his story, nicely prompted by his attorney, the Judge looked less and less pleased and turning to the now quaking Sol reminded him that in the event it was proved he was extracting money on false pretenses he would be imprisoned. Only his lawyer's warning glance saved Sol from a complete breakdown and the jury filed out. Shivering Sol begged his lawyer to drop the case, but after a sharp reprimand he slumped back in his chair to wait. The room was hot and sleepy. . . . .

The jury came back awarding the plaintiff the full sum. With a cry, Sol accepted the money and sportily dressed in new checked clothes left for the city with a wave to envious friends. Entering one of the most exclusive night clubs, Sol beamed happily as the torch singer fiddled with his sparse hairs and smoothed his cheek. Importantly Sol stole into her room and with a little cry she turned. "You!" she cried and melted into his arms. Sol remembered his arm was supposed to be paralysed but ther was no policemen about and he staggered under the weight of the swooning beauty. Suddenly there was a rapping at the door. Frantically, Sol faced a burly policeman who shouted, "My wife!" Sol shook and as the policeman clutched his shoulders, Sol yelled "No! No!" Suddenly he heard his lawyer say as he shook his shoulders, "Wake up, wake up. The jury has just reported they didn't give you a dollar. Shall I ask for a new trial?" "New trial," shouted Sol, "Good grief no. Thank goodness I'm saved," and before the astonished court performed a handspring.

PRIDE

Modesto Fernandez Seijo Drama File No. 10365

PRETTY, young, little Lupita rebels against her life of poverty and when Manolo, holding her close, tells her he loves her, she disengages herself from his embrace and tells him fiercely she will never marry a poor man and spend a lifetime in drudgery. In company with her friend Maria, she goes to a dancehall and when Maria smiles at one Ramon, he comes over to her. Lupita begins to get frightened and is about to leave when Maria and Ramon come back and introduce Lupita to Ramon's friend Lio, a wealthy young man who is in search of thrills. With Lio's strong arms about her and his eyes burning into hers, Lupita begins to become more reckless and it is many hours before he drives her up to her door in his expensive car. Her grandmother is beside herself with anxiety and when she sees the car her worst fears are realized. Lupita scoffs at her fears but as her grandmother tells her that surely this rich young man means her no good and that she will lose Manolo by such conduct, Lupita retires to her room promising not to keep her appointment with Lio. However, in her own room, Lupita looks about the bare little walls, the depleted wardrobe, and when the horn of Lio's car sounds outside she can stand it no longer and she runs to him. Manolo, summoned by Lupita's grandmother, arrives, and sees the girl he loves speeding down the road, hair tossed by the wind. That night, in his scheme to carry her off her feet, Lio takes Lupita to the most exclusive night clubs in town and presents her with an exquisite necklace. Paling, she refuses the gift, but Lio kisses her fingertips and assures her he bought it for her and it will be perfectly all right for her to accept it. That night when Lupita arrives home, she hums songs from the show and her feet dance on air, but her grandmother looks at her sorrowfully and when Manolo comes over and tells her magnanimously he doesn't care what she is, he loves her and is ready to take her back, Lupita flings his hands from her shoulders and screams that they are all so willing to believe the worst of her that she'll show them. When Lio comes for her, Lupita tosses her head and prepares to go off with him. Manolo tries to restrain her and receives a stiff uppercut which leaves him outstretched on the floor. For a moment Lupita bends beside him, then runs off with Lio. He takes her to a sumptuous hotel and she is overcome by the splendor. Slowly his lips crush down on hers.

The next morning Lio learns that unless he returns home immediately and drops this cheap affair he will be disinherited and with a last glance at Lupita's lovely face, he leaves her. Lupita is beside herself when she realizes she has been deserted. She dares not return home but her search for work is unavailing and she cannot stoop to making money in the ways suggested to her. Brokenly she returns home to find her grandmother ill from worry, and as remorsefully she nurses her back to health, Manolo comes back, and seeing Lupita, lovely in her new humility, he softly draws her into the shelter of his arms.

FIRST LOVE

Modesto Fernandez Seijo Drama File No. 10329

HAVING achieved a phenomenal success as the editor of a progressive newspaper, Don Alberto attracts the attention of Rosita an adventuress. Alberto, in love with his wife Juliet, and adoring his young son, Chico remains oblivious to the subtle advances of Rosita and to insure the success of her schemes, Rosita induces her lover, Manuel to compromise Juliet. When Rosita leads Don Alberto to the garden and he sees with his own eyes evidence of the unfaithfulness of the woman he has loved and trusted whole heartedly, Don Alberto loses his head entirely for a moment. Juliet struggles free of Manuel's embraces, but when she tries to explain she sees the look of unbelief in her husband's eyes, and before the whole gathering at the dinner table, Don Alberto makes veiled allusions to the infidelity of women. When they return home, Juliet tries again to explain but Don Alberto tells her he is getting a divorce, and at the trial, the judge awards the child to his father. Brokenly Juliet refuses the money Alberto places in the bank for her, and goes out to look for a job. Forced to accept menial labor, Juliet's cup of bitterness runs over when she reads of the marriage of her former husband to the very beautiful Rosita.

Meanwhile Rosita and Manuel rejoice over the success of their schemes, and rebelling against Alberto's expectation that she will love his son as he does, Rosita urges Manuel to be more discreet lest they be suspected and Manuel urges her to get rid of her husband so they can get hold of his money. For a long time Rosita hesitates against murder but when Alberto warns her for being too extravagant she conspires with Manuel to put him out of the way.

Meanwhile Juilet aching for sight of her child, gets a position in the home of which she was formerly mistress in order to be near Chico. Instead of proceeding straight home, one night, Alberto fancies that he has caught sight of Juliet in his garden and wonderingly investigates. Meanwhile, Manuel is lying in ambush for Alberto and as the minutes pass, long after Alberto's regular return home, Manuel gets cramped. Rosita whispers she wants a cigarette, and as he bends forward to give her one, the gun explodes and Rosita falls back dead. Terrified, Manuel escapes, and Alberto, returning, is held for the murder of his wife. His quarrel with his wife over her extravagances, his suspicious that she had a lover, and his footsteps in the garden, allegedly made when he escaped the scene of his crime, serve the prosecuting attorney to build up a strong case against Alberto. The attorney for the defense, unable to produce a good alibi, makes his plea against capitol punishment and the jury believes the defendant is guilty. However, it is Juliet who comes to the stand, admits that Alberto's story was true, he did see her in the garden, but she escaped lest he fire her and separate her from her child. It is Juliet who urges that Manuel, a regular visitor to Rosita, be found and taken by surprise, Manuel confesses and is sentenced in place of Don Alberto, now free. Juliet leaves the court room, but Don Alberto catches up with her and softly says, "You worked in your own house to be near your child" She nods wordlessly, "Juliet," he whispers, "will you come back again, and forgive me," And as she lifts her lips for his kiss, he realizes how much she means to him.

HI-JACKERS

Peter J. Manos Drama File No. 10369

HI-JACKER extraordinary, Joe Stilletti managed to elude all police attempts to capture him. Then one day when his men had hi-jacked a beer truck and in their garage repainted and changed the license plates on it, a jovial policeman, John Sarne saw them. But from the window of his apartment across the street, Joe saw the copper move down the street and detailed his henchman Kid Bumper to follow. At a police box, John stopped to turn in his report. "Hi buddy," someone said, and as he turned a stream of bullets plowed through his body.

Meanwhile Joe continued his activities. Stores that refused to sell his beer were blown up. Tony Masser, another beer baron fought furiously for the territory, but Joe hi-jacked his trucks until Tony called up Joe and arranged a meeting. Joe set Room 13 in the Hotel Bassen and at the appointed time Tony and three henchmen appeared. Genially Joe served liquor but when Tony made his terms, to pay Joe a certain sum of money to get out of town, Joe excused himself and went into the back room. There was a thunder of shots and when the manager and police broke in Room 13, four dead bodies lay upon the floor. No one had registered for the room and no clues had been left. For a while Joe enjoyed undisputed possession of the vicinity then Augie Stintz arrived in town with his mob. Soon Joe was calling on a customer to ask what the idea was of selling Augie's beer instead of his. The customer replied that every day a barrel of Augie's beer is delivered to him whether or not he orders it. Joe refused to believe the story and shot down the bartender. Joe was now up to his neck with beer that wasn't selling. Then as he walked down the street a limousine pulled up, a fellow shouted, "Remember the four men you shot in the Hotel Bassen, now I'm going to get you." Joe whirled but the next moment a dark fellow shot at the car, which pulled off hurriedly. The dark fellow stepped forward and as Joe questioned him, he explained he was Mike Mayhew, who was in the beer business until the police forced him out. Joe took Mike into his gang and a few nights later invited him out in celebration of his engagement to Margie Kolan, blonde stunner. Mike managed to invite Margie to his place sometime for dinner, and the following day, Margie came. After a few high balls and kisses, Mike asked questions. When he found out that the murder of Tony's men and the policeman John Sarne were the work of Joe and Kid Bumper, Mike excused himself for a moment while he went out for more ginger ale. A few minutes later he returned, and turning on the radio, took Margie in his arms and began dancing. Suddenly Joe appeared, and refusing to believe Margie's story that she had been followed by a policeman and had ducked into Mike's apartment, whipped out his gun. Mike hurled himself on Joe and the two rolled desperately on the floor. Meanwhile the radio broadcasted the police alarms that Stilletti's men had been captured, Kid Bumper had confessed, and the police were searching for Joe. Margie stared in horror as Joe's knife buried itself in Mike's shoulder, then picked up Joe's gun and shot him. A moment later the police broke in. Mike, staggering to his feet looked about for Margie and caught her just as she was about to leap from a window. Gathering her in his arms, he explained that he was John Sarne's brother and had sworn to get Joe, and the police lieutenant, entering, winked and left the two young people alone.

Paul G. Beckwith Drama File No. 10367

IN a white settlement in British Guiana, an English woman sings for native and white patrons of a cafe in order to keep herself and her little blonde baby from starving. According to the medicine man's interpretation of the sun god's will, a child with yellow hair is to be the saviour of the natives, aiding them in driving back the whites. One night the natives descend upon the settlement and after a long search find the baby Paul and his mother in a room above the cafe. Killing the woman, they seize the child and loud is the celebration that night for now they have a deliverer.

Twenty years later the country is under military rule. Paul grows up as a native, taught to hate the white man upon whose plantations he and the other natives work. No one suspects that this bronzed tall lad is white but when one day, on one of his frequent marauding expeditions, Paul finds a book, he stares at it solemnly for minutes, unable to understand what it is. The temper of the natives is rebellious and Governor Winston, a hard and merciless man arrives with his daughter, Lucille. His severity incites the natives and in the depths of the forest they hold a tribal ceremony in preparation for an attack. Paul pleads with them that force will be useless against the whites who outnumber them ten to one. The Chief's son, Unger, jealous of Paul, tries to make his people lose faith in him for cautioning them. However, they remember the promise of the Sun God. Whereupon, bent on revenge, Unger overtakes Paul and attacking him, leaves him for dead. Lucille, riding on horse back finds the body and carries the boy to her friend, Staunton, a plantation master, who cares for him. As he recovers Lucille comes each day to teach him to read and write, and to show him, as it proves necessary, that it is wrong to steal. Staunton suspects that Paul is not a native but Paul can offer no information about himself save that he has always been among the blacks, one of them. Filled with longing for Lucille whom he worships as a goddess, Paul decides to return to his own people but upon his arrival finds them armed for rebellion and realizes that if he attempts to reason with them now he will be killed. However, when he sees the blacks attacking the whites, Paul, torn between two loyalties, finds love the greater call and comes forward to protect Lucille and Staunton. Lucille, misunderstanding his advances, is frightened and shoots, wounding him slightly, but he makes her understand at last that he has come to aid her and together they bend to staunch the wounds of Staunton. Lucille's father refuses to yield to the natives and is killed. But soon reinforcements arrive and the natives are routed. The Chief's son tries to kidnap Lucille, but in single combat with the wounded Paul is killed. Paul persuades the whites to compromise with the slave-driven negroes, and while searching the archives of the Governor's records, Paul finds records to prove that he was the child the natives carried off. Staunton embraces him and tells him that Paul's mother was a noblewoman, disinherited by her family upon the birth of her child. She had come here and Staunton, her brother, had come to find her to tell her she had at last been forgiven. At Staunton's urging, Lucille and Paul are married and return to England and happiness.

UNTO OTHERS

Morris Platt Drama File No. 10350

SON of immigrants who need the few dollars a week David can make selling newspapers, David finds no opportunity to pursue his studies of medicine. Evenings he manages to get away to school, tired as he is, and at last he decides to take up the study of pharmacy which is allied to the practice of medicine. Upon graduation he opens a small drug store with his accumulated earnings and so begins a long struggle. Ambitious, eager, David soon becomes known in the neighborhood for reliable service and he takes in a clerk while he handles the prescriptions. However, with the coming hard times, David finds more and more of his customers are unable to pay him for drugs, and rather than press them in time of stress, he allows their accounts to drag. Soon his expenses overbalance his earnings and he is forced to release his clerk. Twenty-four hours a day he is expected to be on his job and when accidents occur it is to him rather than the fee-demanding doctors that victims come. A cheery "thank you" is all he gets for his services and his landlord begins to hound him for rent. Then one day it is snowing fiercely without and as David wearily checks up his accounts he sees a girl slip on the ice outside. In a moment he is at her side, and finding her unable to walk, picks her up, carries her into the store and revives her. Janet looks up at him gratefully, but her face flushes as she explains that she hasn't the money to pay him. David gives a short laugh. Pay him! Nobody does that. Then repentant for his bitterness, he asks if he may take her home. Hesitatingly she explains she has no home and as David looks at her perplexed, he offers stammeringly to share his apartment with her. Showing her his small quarters, he gives her a key to the bedroom and after giving her some hot food leaves her. In the days that follow Janet's heart goes out to him as she sees him hour after hour selling cut rate cosmetics which do not give him any profit, painstakingly putting up prescriptions while he is so tired that his hands shake, and always, withal, being friendly to exacting customers. Resolutely she insists on selling for him, but soon the good women of the town whose accounts are many, many dollars delinquent begin to sniff at the thought that their druggist is living with a woman, and with one accord they take their business elsewhere. Now David finds his store practically deserted and even his few paying customers are discouraged by the gossiping others who feel it their moral duty to boycott his store. Janet, realizing she is responsible is heart broken and having nowhere else to go, determines to end her life. But David administers an antidote and his anxious look fades only when she smiles feebly at him. Holding her hand tightly he realizes now how much she has grown to mean to him and he asks her to marry him. She looks at him incredulously, but as she realizes he means it, she raises herself and with ringing voice proclaims that as his wife her first duty is to see that nobody imposes on him any more. It is Janet who persuades him to install a soda fountain, a circulating library and other money-makers, and as people slowly trickle back to the "moderne" pharmacy, David happily begins the study of medicine while Janet looks on fondly.

MEDICINE MAN

Ernest Haviland Hobbs Drama File No. 10358

PARCHED, the Steve Lawrence family rejoice as they come to a pool in the Tule Desert in Arizona. As they are about to drink, Jo Bitterroot, an Indian, dashes up crying, "Death water" and saves them from drinking the arsenic water. He leads them to good water, doctors Mrs. Lawrence who has fallen sick, and makes friends with the two little boys and their collie. But it is sixteen year old Claire Lawrence whom his eyes follow tenderly. He calls her "Golden Wood Lily." Leading them safely to the Hayes ranch, their destination, he leaves them. Old Mr. Hayes surmises that Jo is an Oklahoma Indian, possibly a half breed, a good doctor, and fighter, who had, single handed, captured a bandit.

Later, Claire's little brother falls into a well and Jo rescues him, then presents Claire with a pony he has caught and tamed for her. At a ranch festival, Monte Porad, partly Mexican, is fascinated by Claire and is rejected by her. Enraged, Monte kidnaps her, but "Indian Jo" trails them, fights Monte, and takes "Golden Wood Lily" to his cave in a cliff. Moved by his kindess, she lifts her lips to him, but after a long glance, he leaves her and silently keeps guard outside through the night. Next day, as they are returning, a shot rings out. Jo falls, and Monte recaptures Claire. When she tries to escape, he seizes her brutally, but Jo rushes up. Monte draws his revolver, but Jo, with Claire's little .32, beats him to it and kills Monte. Jo is exonerated, but realizing that Claire is in love with him, he becomes sad, tells her his "enemies try kill or prison;" and goes away, telling her if he lives he will return to her. Claire weeps a little over the exquisitely wrought diamond ring he leaves with her.

Months later, a handsome, well dressed, metropolitan young man rides up, dismounts, runs to Claire and takes her in his arms. Struggling and indignant, she glimpses the scar on his forehead, from the Monte Porad encounter, and he asks, "Golden Wood Lily not know Jo?" Incredulously she returns his kisses and he picks her up in his arms.

When they can talk again, he explains that many years ago he lost his parents, originally New England people, a sister who looked like Claire and two little brothers, in the Johnstown Flood. A wealthy aunt adopted and educated him as a doctor, leaving him her fortune. For several years he had practiced medicine successfully, then a patient had mysteriously died and an autopsy revealed poison. A note from the patient's wife addressed to him had served the prosecuting attorney as a motive for murder. However, before the case came to trial, he had escaped, disguised himself as an Indian, and come to live in Arizona. When he had fallen in love with Claire, he dared not ask her to marry him because of the murder charge, but had returned to face trial. However, the patient's wife, dying, had confessed she was the murderer and Jo had been freed. Jo had conquered the bandit and Monte Porad with a quick-shot hypodermic syringe he had invented.

A great happiness fills Claire as she consents to become the wife of the independently wealthy and adoring Joseph Bittern Root, M. D.

A WOMAN ALONE

Red Martin Drama File No. 10379

JEALOUSY seethed in little Slay as his eyes followed Joan and Wally walking home from school together arm in arm. As they reached a sheltered spot Wally put down Joan's books and taking her in his arms kissed her tenderly. Unable to stand it longer, Slay seized a rock and hurled it. A moment later, aghast he bent over the pain-wracked form of Wally while Joan wept convulsively. Gravely the doctor pronounced that Wally might never walk again and his old defiance gone, Slay was marched off to a reform school.

Years passed. Wally was still bed-ridden and as Joan tended him gently, he begged her to go out with other people, telling her she was throwing away her life on a wreck of a man. But Joan picked up the newspaper and to put an end to Wally's talk started reading aloud. Suddenly she started. Among the notables arriving was a young surgeon from abroad who specialized in spine cases. Perhaps, Joan murmured, perhaps. A few days later she was admitted to the apartment of the eminent surgeon and as his eyes measured her appraisingly, she pleaded with him to take Wally's case. "Your husband?" Dr Frederick asked. Joan flushed. "No, not yet." For a long moment the doctor looked at her. "How much would you give for his recovery?" The girl's eyes burned. "Anything," she cried then dropped her eyes before the surgon's lifted eyebrow. But in the end Dr. Frederick took the case and where so many others had failed, he succeeded. Joan wept as she thanked him, and as she asked what his fee was, he answered steadily, "You." Aghast she drew back, but making no movement toward her he repeated, "That is my fee. I shall make no attempt to force you." All that night Joan struggled with herself. Honor demanded. . . . then she wept, honor!

When Dr. Frederick came for her she was ready. She got a pretty capable little nurse, Susan for Wally, and with Dr. Frederick left on the boat sailing for the continent. He had the Captain perform the ceremony, and dully Joan went through with her part of the bargain. Meanwhile Wally suffered a relapse, and Susan to save him, pretended that she was Joan, still waiting, still faithful. And when Slay, released at last from the reform school, came to take revenge upon Wally, it was Susan who stopped him and telling him Joan had gone off with another man, persuaded Slay to remain and help the boy he had once injured.

Joan's baby was born and Frederick proved always adoring, tender, untiring in his efforts to make her forget Wally. Once one of Frederick's friends induced him to come to a night club but Frederick broke away to return to Joan. The next morning, leaving the house, he turned to wave to his son at the window when a car struck him down and killed him before Joan's horror-stricken eyes. When the estate was settled, Joan returned to the United States. It was at the dock that she turned in amazement at sight of a bronzed young man, and with a cry of, "Wally," was seized in his arms. Wally had come to see off the honeymooners Susan and Slay, and had found again, his Joan.

SUCKER GAME

Lillian R. Webster Drama File No. 10341

A FEELING of well being had quickened John Gilmour's pulse until the butler handed him a letter. Reading it, the color drained from his face and with slow steps he proceeded to the breakfast room and tried to respond to the gaiety of his daughter Laura. Later, alone in his office, he reread the letter telling him that the boy, Ralph Metcalfe, having found out where his mother lived, had run away from the private school. The letter further asked whether Mr. Gilmour should like the police called in to find the boy. With shaking fingers John dialed the home and requested that the case be dropped and under no circumstances should force be used to find and bring Ralph back. There was no work for John that morning as his mind fled back over the years when he had thought he was madly in love with the flashing eyed Thalia Metcalfe. For months he had rushed her, even begged her to marry him, until he had met Patricia Warne, a girl from his own set, and realized that Thalia had just been an infatuation. It was Patricia he had married but on his wedding day a letter had come from Thalia telling him she had given birth to a son. With fear in his heart he had gone to the hospital but Thalia had promised that as long as he paid for the boy's board, she would not bother him. In the ensuing years John had sent a check regularly and his happiness with Patricia had been unmarred until shortly after the birth of their child, Laura, Patricia had died. From then on John had given every thought to Laura. Now with the reminder that Thalia's son was at large, John's only consolation was that the boy did not know who had been supporting him all these years.

Three years passed. Fondly John watched Laura grow up and realized soon somebody would be taking her from him. Then one night she climbed on his knee and as she told him of Ralph Hardman, son of a garage owner, John knew it had come. But when he met the fine looking blonde boy, he knew that Laura had chosen wisely. A whirlwind courtship followed. Then one night Ralph explained he was not really the son of Hardman. He had been brought up in a home and had been supported by the father who had never recognized him. Aghast John learned that Ralph had run away, back to his mother Thalia Metcalfe, when he learned she was desperately ill, and then had remained after her death, with Thalia's husband, Hardman. Trembling John explained to the astounded boy that he was his father, and Ralph could not marry Laura, his own half-sister. It was only at the end of a painful scene that Ralph suddenly realized that both John and his mother were dark, whereas he was fair. In that lay hope. John had no real proof that Ralph was his son, if they could only prove otherwise! Together they rushed to Hardman, who looked at John dully and as he repeated the name Gilmour drew forth an envelope. In it was Thalia's explanation that she had been married to Hardman when she met John that she was so desperately in want that she had played him for what she could get and when her baby was born, she had chosen the only way to hold him for support. Her husband had always been an unwilling party to the fraud. Silence for a moment, then the realization that Ralph was free to marry Laura. It was after dinner that the two older men walked out into the garden together, and Ralph drew Laura into the circle of his strong young arms.

MURDER ON THE SEINE

Henry Spenle Drama File No. 10362

AT sight of a man driving a dagger into her mother's heart little Lucie started to scream only to lose her voice from shock. The murderer darted down the steps through the garden, and seeing the maid and butler following frantically, drew from his pocket a key with which he locked the garden gate. Minutes later, the pursuing pair reached the street and as they called wildly for the gendarmes, George Gautier came up the street. The servants exchanged glances. Their employer was dressed exactly as the murderer and built the same way. Inside Mrs. Gautier was dying. Her voice was gone. Hastily the prefect gave her a pencil and paper to write the name of her murderer but she wrote G-E- and death stopped her hand. The little girl could not speak but as her father approached she shrank back. George was held for his wife's murder but through the testimony of the Baroness de Villier that he was with her a few moments before the murder and could not have returned on time, George was freed by the dubious police. Knowing the Baroness had lied about the time, George tried to communicate with her but she had fled with her young son leaving a message that she lied only to save herself from being involved in the murder case. The woman he loved, his own child, everyone believed George guilty.

Meanwhile, the real murderer Gerard Balle, lover of the murdered woman, who had purposely dressed similarly to her husband for protection, was ironically defeated in his desire for a big contract by George Gautier. Whereupon he determined to kidnap Lucie from the sanitarium where she was being cared for. As he walked down the street an apache tried to kill him, and instead of turning the fellow and his hag of a mother over to the police, Gerard paid them to kidnap Lucie. The child's eyes started as she saw driving the car that was kidnapping her, the man who had killed her mother. Years passed. Lucie grew up with the apache Lorando, his mother, and his brother Guiseppe who loved the dumb girl and protected her from harm. One day, while selling flowers, Lucie, now known as Florencia, was seen by Pierre de Villier, son of the Baroness who had meanwhile returned to George. Pierre, an artist, determined to have Florencia as a model and with the promise of money, won the consent of her keepers. However, when Lorando discovered Pierre was teaching Florencia sign language, fearing she would give them away, he determined to kill Pierre. Florencia, seeing Lorando creep up behind Pierre screamed and saved Pierre at the same time she regained her voice. Lorando fled, meanwhile beginning a blackmail of Gerard. Pierre, realizing from Florencia (Lucie's) story who she was, brought her to her father, but Lucie recoiled until George pleaded with her to remember that she had not seen the murderer's face and it might conceivably have been someone else. Meanwhile Guiseppe found out from his mother his brother was blackmailing Gerard, and arrived just as Gerard pulled a gun on Lorando. Lorando wrestled for the gun, shot the banker, and when his brother saw his white staring face, stabbed Guiseppe and fled. Before dying, Guiseppe confessed all, freeing George of the last vestiges of suspicion. Lorando was caught with his mother, and Lucie found happiness with her Pierre.

A MOTHER ERRS

Mary E. Buckley Drama File No. 10332

QUIET, unassuming, Alicia Joyce, young heiress overtaxes her strength in social work and on the advice of her physician she and her indulgent aunt Mrs. Wilson, once one of the most outstanding social leaders in London society, take a cottage together on the outskirts of the vast Andrews estate. Enjoying their idyllic existence out of the social whirl, Alicia mischievously defies the "No Trespassing" sign on the Andrews' estate and goes swimming in the stream. For several moments she is unware of the smiling attention of Jack Andrews, but as she realizes she is observed she hastily scrambles to the bank and dresses behind some bushes. Amused Jack asks if may escort her back, but she shakes her head and hurries off. Some days later, she again ventures to the stream, and dismayed sees a barking puppy make off with her dress. As she follows, she slips and turns her ankle and Jack coming up, apologizes for his dog's conduct and picking her up in his arms carries her to her house. Mrs. Wilson, at first concerned over her niece, invites Jack to stay for tea and the friendship between the young pair grows.

Meanwhile, however, the Andrews are in a desperate financial condition and Mrs. Andrews is depending upon her hitherto wild and reckless son to marry one of the wealthy young debutantes and rebuild the Andrew's fortune. Noticing the change in her son lately, Mrs. Andrews follows Jack to the home of Alicia and as she sees the two young people embrace tenderly, despair fills her heart. Returning home she broods about her son's mesalliance with a poor girl, and the next day pays a call on Alicia. Haughtily she observes that her son has shown excellent taste as usual, and as Alicia graciously receives the mother of the boy she loves, Mrs. Andrews explains she has come to warn her not to take Jack too seriously. She feels, she says with pretended difficulty, it is her duty to warn Alicia that her son's engagement to a girl of his own set is to be announced in a day or two and she docsn't think it fair of her boy to mislead Alicia. At first incredulous, Alicia at length believes and she assures Mrs. Andrews that she can take care of herself. Accordingly when Jack comes again, Alicia pretends that it has all been a game with her and that she is returning to London. Believing that all Jack's protestations are part of his skilled technique, she sends him away and with her aunt leaves the house. Jack leaves home and a few weeks later the Andrews are forced to sell their estate at auction. With the proceeds the Andrews re-enter London society and one day Mrs. Andrews is astonished at seeing Alicia and her grandmother at an exclusive function. In her first moment of astonishment Mrs. Andrews demands to know where her son is, and as Alicia, who has vainly tried to forget Jack, replies that she doesn't know, Mrs. Andrews breaks down. To the startled girl she confesses that Jack has disappeared, and that her story of another woman was a lie.

But it remains for Alicia, during one of her charity visits to a hospital, to recognize among the survivors of a mill explosion, her Jack and despite his unwillingness to be recognized, she makes him see the light again. They are married at last and as they return to what was once the Andrews' estate, Alicia presents her mother-in-law with the deed which she, through an agent, has bought at the auction. And now all is happiness.

PLEASURE WOMAN

D. Kumar Drama File No. 10256

ON a visit to India, Richard Brown, young American physician learns that the daughter Maharaja, the flower-like Princess Kunti is gravely ill and that the leading physicians of the country have tried in vain to aid her. When he offers his services, he is admitted to the sick room and under his skillful treatment Kunti soon recovers. Each day in the garden, the young American comes to watch the progress of his patient and her lovely eyes follow him adoringly. At length the Maharaja offers Richard great wealth for his aid, but touched by the beautiful young girl, Richard refuses, and when the father offers him anything he wishes as a reward, on impulse, Richard asks for the hand of Kunti in marriage. The populace learning of the King's consent to his daughter's marriage to a non-believer rise in rebellion and the military commander urges the King to protect the palace with cannon. The King refuses to permit armed force, but, alone, gives way to despair. Richard, however, steps out on the balcony, within full sight of the rebellious subjects and through an impassioned speech wins their support. The marriage is performed and Richard is appointed State Medical Adviser.

At the British Legation ball, Richard meets an English woman, Rosa, who, becoming infatuated with the handsome young physician, pretends illness so that she may call him to her. In the exotic boudoir, so different from his humble little wife's Richard soon responds to Rosa's murmurs of love, but will not transgress against his marriage vows. Kunti realizes that her hushand is struggling against some powerful emotion, and when he returns trembling from a professional call, Kunti realizes that there is another woman. At home she tries to solace him, but as he puts her gently from him she broods and at length sends word to her husband that she wants to see him at eight when the moon is just rising. At the appointed hour she comes to her husband's room and performs a worship of parting, calling upon the moon and the pole star to witness. Richard is touched by her conduct and tries to lift her to her feet, but she sends him to the other woman, and slips from the room.

For a long time Richard hesitates between his fondness for his little wife and his desire for the other woman and at length, unable to stand it, rushes from the house. However, at Rosa's home he finds her entertaining another lover and in disgust returns home. For hours he remains on the balcony allowing cool breezes to sweep his fevered face, and at length enters his wife's room. To his astonishment he finds her sitting cross legged on the floor, eyes closed in meditation. Silently he waits for her to finish and as she raises her eyes, he kneels before her humbly. Softly she tells him it was not his fault, but her weakness in not being able to keep his love and as he lifts her tenderly in his arms, they renew their pledge of love—this time for all eternity.

THE BELLS

Nina Delpas Drama File No. 10316

WEDDING BELLS are ringing. Laughing gaily, Edith Avery runs down the Church steps holding fast to the arm of her handsome bridegroom. As the newlyweds ride away, the bells chime slowly. Years pass. Now the wedding bells have given way to the dinner bells cheerfully rung by the colored maid, but Edith stands looking out the window wondering why Francis isn't home yet. The children protest they are hungry and she tells them to eat without her. While they chatter gaily about staying up to hear the New Years Eve bells at midnight, Edith remains worriedly watching the road. The hours lengthen. Minutes before midnight the children have dropped off to sleep.

In another part of the city, Francis Avery restlessly paces a small furnished room. As the New Years bells ring out, he seizes a pen and paper and writes a note to Edith telling her he can't go on living. His bank has discovered the money he has been taking regularly, and the police are after him. He ends with love to Edith and the kiddies and wishes that she may yet find a man to make her happy. As he looks out of the window he sees among the gay people in the streets, a policeman making his way to the house. The doorbell rings. A heavy step sounds up the stairs. Francis lifts his revolver and blows his brains out. An ambulance shrieks up the street. Back home Edith tucks the sleeping children in. Suddenly the telephone rings. She runs to it, and slowly hangs up as a voice tells her her husband committed suicide. The days that follow are heavy. Francis has left nothing behind. She sells her home, her clothes, everything to meet her husband's obligations and moving to a poorer section of the city, begins working to support the two little ones. Each night the five o'clock whistle sees her mechanically closing her desk and returning home to cook supper for the children. It hurts her to see how shabby their clothes are, but she has an indomitable courage and slowly slowly she works her way up in her firm to the position of secretary to the president, Carl Major, a wealthy but hard working business man. She reminds him of his board meetings, buys his ties for him, and reserves pullman seats when he travels. Gradually she becomes so indispensable that when she is forced to remain away for a week while she nurses little Reggie through pneumonia, Carl is frantic without her. On her return he greets enthusiastically and as they are alone in his office, he turns to her and tells her he doesn't know what he'd do without her. She smiles at this, but he goes on to ask her to marry him, telling her he'll give her children a home, and send them to fine schools, and give her those things which she has been deprived of. Having grown fonder of him than he suspects, Edith accepts and once again wedding bells ring out. Carl is much older than Edith and the children look up to him as a kind if frequently absent minded pater. As Carl's wife, Edith finds she is expected to preside at his board, give parties that make the hospitality of the Majors famous, and receive expensive gifts of jewelry, but her husband, beyond telling her what a splendid wife she is, is far too busy with his affairs to have time for love. Then comes the crash of the stock market. All day and most of the night Carl is at his office trying to save his stocks, but when Edith tries to help, he irritably tells her he has no time for her now. The bottom falls out of the stock market. Carl's fortune is wiped out. Dazedly he returns home—a failure at fifty. But Edith still has some jewelry left, and she can still work, and it is her courage that give Carl faith in his ability to start over and with Edith, mount to the top again. Now it is Christmas. The bells are ringing again. Carl and Edith sit together fondly watching the joy of the youngsters over their gifts. "Peace on Earth," the bells are chiming, "Good Will to Men."

THE HOMECOMING

Jean Wentworth Drama File No. 10313

BEAUTIFUL, spoiled by her banker father, Vivian Strong comes to the bank to make a large withdrawal, and her eyes are held for an instant by the sardonic gaze of John Armstrong, cashier. Thereafter, every time she comes to the bank, John manages to be at her service and soon they become friendly. When her parents send her to a fashionable finishing school, Vivian rebels against the rigid rules and the matron, annoyed by her infringement of the rules about not going out with men on weekdays, drops her from the school. Mr. Strong is furious but when he attempts to discipline her, she jeers at him until he admits his helplessness. Meanwhile Vivian continues to see John and to slip in at dawn, drunk and disheveled. Then one night Vivian tells John she is in trouble and they slip away and are married. The following day a shortage is discovered in the bank accounts, and Willis Bradley, who has loved Vivian and has bitterly resented the change in her since she has gone out with John, is held for the theft of forty thousand dollars. Willis pleads innocence, but his arrest is ordered. Whereupon John walks into Mr. Strong's office and tells him to release Willis Bradley. Strong is amazed at the insolence of his employee, but John returns the banker's look, and admits that he stole the money. Strong gasps and as he is about to call the police, John stops him and with superb impudence advises him not to inform the police since it will reflect poorly upon the reputation of the Strongs. The banker shouts, "What do you mean?" and John coolly replies that he is Vivian's husband. Strong sputters and fumes and John admits that he married Vivian so that he could get hold of money he needed badly. It is only with a great effort that the banker can resist choking the handsome fellow, but at last he thunders that if John goes away and never shows his face in town again, he will annul the marriage and drop charges. Willis is freed, but Vivian becomes hysterical when she learns her father has sent John away and despite all the proof of John's unworthiness, sobs that she loves him and would forgive him everything if he returned. Her baby is born and for her child's sake, Vivian lives, hoping vainly that John may return to her. Willis tries to induce her to forget but at length, realizing that she loves no other man save John, he marries another woman who has loved him.

Vivian's child Jack, grows up into a fine, strong lad, who is sent by his adoring mother to West Point. With the outbreak of war, however, the boy goes overseas to the grief of his mother. At home, Vivian, now gray haired and still lovely, anxiously waits for reports from the front. John, an officer, is wounded on the battlefield. Near him a soldier is suffering terribly. John limps to him and gives him the drop of water left in his canteen and slowly drags the soldier to the hospital base. They occupy adjacent beds and during the weeks of convalescence, Jack talks ceaselessly of his mother while the other fellow bitterly asserts he has known no happiness all these years, having thrown aside his one chance. But at last Jack learns that John Blaine is his own father and triumphantly the boy brings home to the mother who has never ceased loving, his father, repentant now and hungry for sight of the woman whose love he did not fully realize until he felt he had lost her. And Jack discreetly turns while his parents hold each other close.

THE DECEIVING FLESH

Mahadeo Marajh Drama File No. 10217

DESTROYING the peace of the beautiful island of Maracas, Jerry Augustus Brown, an outlaw, plunders the homes of the wealthy inhabitants, and defies police. A civic meeting is held in an effort to discover a means of trapping him, and a handsome stranger arises, addressing the group eloquently, urging them to protect their rights. Not until he is leaving does anyone recognize him as Jerry Brown; police are summoned, but he escapes, throwing two of them over a precipice during the chase. Touring the world in disguise, Jerry finally buys a home in California with the remainder of his booty, and marries Molly Pantin whom he met during his voyages at sea. One child, Diana Mary Brown, is born to them; as she grows older Jerry tells his daughter that she has inherited much of his love of adventure and luxury, and warns her that no real happiness comes from disregarding the rights of others and placing too great a valuation on money. He is walking in the forest when a thunder storm arises, and a bolt of lightning strikes and kills him. Molly marries Henry Blakes, who spends her money lavishly; Mary is sent away to school at Port of Spain.

Ben Jones, a student at the school Mary attends, becomes her closest friend, and the two are nicknamed "Jack and Jill" by their class-mates, as they are together constantly. When his father dies, Ben is forced to leave school, and on their last afternoon together, Mary and Ben promise one another that they will someday become man and wife, pledging their troth on a small Bible, which Ben's mother has given him. After her graduation, Mary discovers that Henry Blakes has exhausted her mother's fortune, and deserted her. The girl secures a position as secretary to Lincoln Palmer, attorney-general for the Standard Oilfield Company. Ben's mother dies and he buys a little farm, which Mary visits, promising that she will soon come there to stay, as his wife.

The long hours of hard work and the life of poverty which she now faces are new to Mary, and she oftens longs for the luxuries she once enjoyed. Her employer is called out of town, and leaves the office in charge of his son, Bob. During their daily contacts at work, Bob comes to love Mary, and asks her to become his wife, painting a vivid picture of the wealth and social prestige she may enjoy in that position. She replies that she loves someone else, but finally yields to his persuasion, her father's blood asserting itself. Ben receives a note from Mary, disclosing her plans, and sadly reflects upon the deceitfulness of woman. Oil is discovered on Ben's property, and he wins a sweepstakes lottery, but his new wealth brings him no happiness without Mary. As she leaves the church after the wedding ceremony with Bob, the girl begs his forgiveness, telling her husband that she has made a mistake and in fairness to both of them, must have this marriage annulled and go to Ben. Granting her permission to do this, Bob bids her farewell, and she takes the train for Ben's farm. He receives her with bitterness, and cannot believe that she has not returned only because she has heard of his good fortune. Her happiness destroyed, Mary leaves, and attempts to drown herself, but is rescued by an officer. Bob and Ben are both summoned to the emergency hospital, and Ben is told that Mary had no knowledge of his wealth. When she recovers, Ben asks her pardon, and they plan to share the future together, thanking Bob for his kindness.

THE ADORABLE IMP

Dorothy Franklin Drama File No. 10300

ACCEPTING the invitation of Mrs. Millicent Freeman, her father's devoted friend, Natalie prepares to spend the summer at her plantation in Kentucky, and secures permission to bring Elaine, her chum, with her. Mrs. Freeman is much more pleased with the stately beauty of the blond Natalie than with Elaine's gay, gypsy charm, but she greets both girls cordially, and presents her grandson, Donald, home from his duties as an engineer, for the summer. A few days later she confides to Donald that while Natalie represents the highest type of southern womanhood, Elaine, to her mind, is "an imp of Satan." He protests that she cannot be as bad as all that, but his grandmother replies that the servants have found her drinking and smoking; apparently there is no end to her disgraceful conduct. Walking in the garden with Natalie, Donald sees a man escaping through the bushes, apparently in great distress. Natalie tells him this is Wayne Rylie, a neighbor of Elaine's, who loves the girl devotedly, and has come here to try to win her, but Elaine is ambitious to marry Johnny, a wealthy and worthless acquaintance of Donald's, for purely mercenary reasons. Protesting with her against this cruel treatment of Wayne, Elaine rudely advises Natalie and Donald to leave her alone, and even retorts discourteously to Mrs. Freeman. Donald asks Natalie to become his wife, although confessing that he loves Elaine, unworthy as she is. Natalie consents, saying that his love is all she asks.

The next morning Natalie discovers Wayne has committed suicide with carbon monoxide gas from the car in the Freeman garage, leaving a note which states that he cannot go on living when the girl whom he believed loved him has proven false. Elaine takes the news with apparent unconcern, but Natalie weeps. As he sees her lovely face swollen with tears at the funeral, Donald feels that she is more than ever his ideal of womanhood, and is contemptuous when Elaine appears, dressed in Chinese red, and apparently nonchalant. Donald and the two girls follow the hearse to the boy's home, in the Kentucky mountains, and he tells the distracted parents that their son died accidentally. While the young man is buried in his native hills, a chinaman, working with an engineering company, approaches Donald. He recognizes him as Gee Wing, a laborer who had once been in his employ, and become angered at a remark he made against his god, Buddha. Saying that he hopes all is forgiven, Donald holds out his hand, and Gee Wing motions for him to follow him. Leading him to a cave, Gee Wing and two other Chinese, bind him.

Natalie returns home, but Elaine remains to help search for him, and over hearing Sing Lee, another laborer, discuss a kidnapping at the cave, hastens there. Ignoring the snakes in her pathway, the girl bravely continues her search in the dark passage, and at last discovers Donald, weak with hunger, bound. Going to him, she attempts to release him, but Gee Wing comes upon them, and announces that he is going to torture and kill her lover. Donald tells Elaine that he wishes her to know, first, that he loves her, and always has. The girl prevails upon his captors to stay the execution until Donald is stronger, and that night, the two of them escape in a plane belonging to the construction company. They make a forced landing, during a storm, and are picked up by a searching party, and taken back to the Freeman estate to recover. Mrs. Freeman shows Donald a letter from Natalie when he is able to sit up in bed; it states that Elaine played the role of "imp" in order that Natalie might marry Donald, as Natalie had onced prevented her brother from recklessly killing someone when he was intoxicated, and Wayne loved her, not Elaine. Forgiving Donald and Mrs. Freeman for their injustice to her, Elaine admits she cannot even smoke, and hopes to fulfill their ideal of a modern southern woman.

BITTER HARVEST

Laura E. Brown Drama File No. 10290

ALTHOUGH a member of the most socially prominent family in the little southern town of Corning, Jack Franklin chooses Helen Spencer, a girl in very moderate circumstances, as his wife. Her beauty and sweetness bring him great happiness, and all goes well until Jack's father dies, leaving him a large inheritance. Becoming restless, Jack tells Helen that he wishes to move to Sodom, a nearby city. She replies that she is afraid they will not be happy away from the little town where they have always lived, and that he will be ashamed of her lack of sophistication, but he reassures her, and prevails on her to accompany him. A group of unscrupulous politicians persuade Jack to run on their ticket for mayor. Helen advises him against this, as he does not know them, but he ignores her warning, and hires a secretary, Stella Gray. His political friends give a party to which Jack brings his wife, and Stella is escorted by his campaign manager, Bob Eavans. As Helen does not dance, Jack leaves her in the company of Bob, at Stella's suggestion. They go into the garden; Jack, attracted by Stella's sophistication, kisses her. She persuades him to leave his wife at home after this, since she does not fit into the group. In the days that follow, Jack and Helen grow constantly farther apart, as he spends most of his leisure time in Stella's company. At last, he asks his wife for a divorce, and when she refuses, strikes her.

Returning home to apologize, he finds Bob Eavans at the house, and leaves again, angrily, refusing to believe he had only come to make a friendly call. Jack discovers Stella in a cafe with a man whom she introduces as Mr. Nott; she refuses to accompany Jack, and he goes to a hotel. Police trace and arrest Jack the next morning, charging him with embezzling campaign funds, and he discovers that his political friends have merely used him as a tool to secure money from voters, which they have used for their own purposes, leaving the city so that he will be held responsible for their crime. Jack is released on bond, and at once hires detectives to search for Helen. He becomes ill, and is taken to the hospital, but at last his wife is discovered, living with her mother in New York, and brought to him. Jack sees that she is to become a mother, and begs her forgiveness as he takes her hand. With tears in her eyes, she readily grants it, and promises that she will be waiting for him, with his child. A few days later Jack is taken to prison, to serve a five-year term. Helen and her mother return to their little home in Corning, but she writes to her husband frequently. Jack reads in the paper that Stella has married Mr. Nott.

Police arrest Jack's political associates, who confesses that he is innocent, and the governor pardons him. After a few days' delay, he hastens to Corning, but his happiness dies as he sees a funeral at Helen's home, and is told that she lost her life in giving birth to his son. Believing that he had gone to Stella, since he had been delayed in coming, she asked him to leave that woman, and care for their child, as she died. Repentant, Jack vows to do his best for the little son that she has left to him.

SAFE HARBOR

Margaret Cagnola Drama File No. 10307

WHILE purchasing decorations for the party to be given to the Allens, friends of his father who are coming to visit them in Hawaii, Bob Graves is attracted to a lovely girl in Hawaiian dress who is singing in back of the store. The Hawaiian proprietor, Mr. Moreno, explains that Lulu is his daughter, and when Bob asks if she will come and sing for their guests tonight, Lulu excitedly begs her father to let her go. However, that night, Grace Allen, who has always loved Bob, notices his absorption in the pretty singer, and in a loud voice exclaims that she thinks race lines should be observed more strictly. Lulu weeps as cold eyes are turned toward her and Bob hastily comes forward and turning his back upon his people for their rudeness offers to take Lulu home. At home Mr. Moreno discovers Lulu's unhappiness and when Mr. Graves comes over explains that Lulu is really a white girl, left with them by her mother who had run away from her lawyer husband. Graves scoffs and urges Lulu to stay away from his son. Indignant, Mr. Moreno asks the unhappy girl if she would like to go to New York to study, and Lulu, feeling that she is making Bob unhappy goes. However, when Bob learns that Lulu has gone he apathetically begins drinking and nothing his father or Grace can do, helps. Only when Lulu returns, radiant in smart clothes, does Bob snap out of it and on Lulu's promise to marry him, he is rehabilitated. Relieved at seeing his son shaven for the first time in months, Graves Senior learns that his son is getting married and has returned to the United States with Lulu.

Grace, indignant at Bob for choosing what she calls a native girl instead of her, returns to New York determined to win him away from his bride. The telephone rings at odd hours, and Grace throws her lover out of her apartment when he tells her she is making a fool of herself. Once when Grace calls, Lulu pleads with her to leave them alone, and at last decides to go to Grace and explain that she is going to have a child. As she rings the bell, however, a shot rings out and bewildered, Lulu is held for the murder of Grace Allen.

At the trial Attorney Green mocks her as she pitifully tells her story but when in the course of the testimony she explains that she is really a white girl, and tells about her mother, Green questions her closely and tells the astounded court that he is certain now Lulu is his daughter. The Judge raps for order and reminds the court this is a murder trial and the fact that Lulu is Green's daughter has nothing to do with it. The jury files out and the Judge gravely reads the jury's finding that the prisoner is guilty. Suddenly a man's voice rings out. Taking the stand he explains that he thought Lulu would be released, but he cannot send her to the chair. He was Grace's lover and her murderer. She had sworn to break up Bob's home and when he had begged her to give up the idea, pleading his love, Grace had ordered him out at the point of a gun and he had killed her, in the subsequent struggle. Lulu, freed, walks out of court between her husband and her now found father who promises to make up to her all the years he was unaware of her existence and at last Lulu finds happiness.

ILLUSION

Jack Busho Drama File No. 10299

HIRED hand on a small farm, Jack longs to pursue his interest in chemistry, and at last strikes off for the big city. For three hours he walks along a dusty road and at last is given a hitch by a friendly couple. As he leans back in the car, dreaming of the days when he shall have realized his ambitions, a luxurious car passes the one he is riding. Jack gasps as he sees behind the liveried chauffeur, the most beautiful girl he has ever seen. As he stares, she turns slightly and smiles and thereafter her face becomes a symbol to him of all he wants.

In the city he is confused by the crowds and as he is shown room after room by sharp faced hoarding house ladies, he turns away, unable to adjust himself to narrow stuffy cubbyholes after the cool expanses of the country. In one house, however, he pauses in amazement before the picture of the girl in the car, and although the room is smaller than the others, he takes it to be near the girl of his illusions. From the kindly old couple who give him board, Jack learns that the girl is their daughter, Sally, who had left home and come to New York. They followed her but had been unable to find her. Jack's heart aches for them and he determines to find Sally as much for them as for himself. Evenings he takes a course in chemistry at Columbia University and fixes up a basement laboratory. His co-workers at the rubber factory urge him to come with them to dancehalls and theaters, but Jack pursues his night studies instead. Then one night he cries out as he realizes that his experiment to make rubber out of weeds is a success. Carefully he demonstrates his process to the stockholders of the company and he becomes an over-night sensation. His picture appears on the front pages of newspapers, his company exploits the new process, and Jack is feted widely. Now women bid for his favor. At dinner parties he is lionized and scandal blows its hot breath along his path when one night at a fashionable hotel a woman makes an obvious bid for his attention and the following morning is found dead—shot by her jealous gangster lover. As the infinite possibilities of the new product are realized, and Jack's further experimentation proves that his work was not a chance but one carefully backed by knowledge and genius, he becomes the most talked of figure in the day's news.

It is at a testimonial dinner given in his honor, that he tires of the idolatry with which he is received and wanders out on the terrace. As his eyes become accustomed to the darkness, he makes out a huddled figure against the rail. Far below the lights of the city twinkle. The girl suddenly climbs over the terrace edge. With a quick movement, Jack pulls her back and he gasps as he looks into the pale face of the girl of his illusions. Gently lowering her onto a bench, he sits beside her and waits for her paroxysm of weeping to stop. Sobbing she tells him that her lover is discarding her and she can't face poverty, and it is Jack who rebuilds her interest in life by convincing her of his adoration through the years, and by bringing her back to her parents who in their great joy at seeing her again, don't care what she has been. And as the months pass, and Jack forms the habit of dropping in at Sally's house for quiet evenings away from grasping fair weather friends, a new and all-enveloping love comes into being between Jack and the new Sally.

THE PRETENDERS

Clarence Koons Drama File No. 10322

TIM noticed the girl opposite him holding her curls as the wind blew them, and getting up he shut the train window. She smiled gratefully. They had been riding for hours now from the west. She was Blanche Fait, coming alone to New York. He was Tim Brent, bound for the metropolis too. While the train chugged across the continent they confided their ambitions to each other and before they separated in the station, they planned to meet and report to each other how they were getting on. At their first meeting, each tried to pretend that he was getting alone fine, but both of them had tasted fully of the loneliness of the big town and suddenly they were in each other's arms and when Tim asked Blanche to marry him, they wept a little as they made plans. Tim was to buy a truck of his own with his money and the money Blanche could add, and they were married and moved into a tiny apartment. In a little while Tim was doing business. Not much, but enough so he could bring a big steak home to celebrate once in a while. Then Tim was warned he'd have to pay "protection money." "What for?" he answered. "I'm all right." The next day three tires blew out. Discouraged he had them fixed. Again he found them slashed and cut. Blanche's baby was coming and Tim was desperate. When the gang approached him again, he pleaded he didn't have a cent. The boss looked at him narrowly and told him how he could make money. So Tim began transporting liquor in his truck. Now he was making money enough to move Blanche and the baby to a bigger apartment. He was a big shot. What's more the boss' dame, Sondra, slid up to him and told him he could go far. Tim became inflated with a sense of his own unportance and when Blanche pleaded with him to give up this sort of thing and go back to honest living, he told her furiously to mind her own business, and to make up for his harshness showered clothes upon her, clothes that Blanche hated to wear because they were bought with tainted money. Many nights Tim stayed away, held by Sondra's kisses. One day he was sitting in her apartment, when the boss, supposed to be out of town, walked in. He drew a gun. Tim's fist slapped it out of his hands. With a snarl the boss struck Sondra down. Resentfully, Tim flew at him and they fought, breaking furniture and smashing windows. At last Tim knocked the Boss down. With a cry Sondra ran to him, and warned Tim to clear out of town, the Boss would get him.

It was a broken Tim who returned home and begged Blanche to go away with the baby. Noticing his torn clothes and battered face, she ran to him and begged him to confide in her. Without sparing himself, Tim told of the Boss who was coming to avenge himself. But Blanche would not go, and when the Boss came, it was she who ran forward and received the bullet intended for Tim. Sobbing, Tim picked up his wife and when the doctor warned him that Blanche would get T. B. unless she were removed to a drier climate, Tim left everything behind and bought a Western ranch. Here with Blanche and the baby he found, at last, happiness.

GIRLS TOGETHER

Mary H. Burris Drama File No. 10260

FORCED to leave school at the age of eleven in order to help support her invalid mother, Marianne becomes a maid at the Hallet Hotel, in the little southern town where she has always lived. The girl spends many weary hours cleaning, making the beds, and carrying wood and buckets of coal to the kitchen stove. After her mother dies she makes her home in a small room in the attic of the hotel. Mrs. Hallet is not unkind to the girl, but Fannie, her daughter, who helps her with the housework, is just Marianne's age, refuses to be seen with her, and avoids her when the two attend the same Sunday school. In order to tease Fannie Marianne wears an old pair of slippers and bustle belonging to Mrs. Hallet, and follows her to church in this attire. When she sits down, the bustle throws her clothes over her head. Blushing scarlet, the girl hastily leaves the church, amid the suppressed laughter of the congregation, and receives a spanking from Mrs. Hallet when her guilt is discovered. As she is chopping kindling, Marianne's axe slips, cutting her toe. Mrs. Hallet sends for Dr. Roberts, a young physician who lives at the hotel, but when the girl sees him, and recognizes him as one of the people who laughed at her in church, she runs away. The doctor follows her until she agilely climbs a huge oak tree, stepping onto its branches from the second story window. Then he gives up the chase, and sends the girl a box of salve the next day.

Mrs. Hallet gives a picnic in honor of Fannie's sixteenth birthday, to which Marianne is not invited. Rebelliously, the girl dresses up in discarded clothing and attends anyway, dancing with Dr. Roberts in front of the astonished Fannie. Admiring her spirit and beauty, he tries to help Marianne with her studies, and gives her little presents of perfume, dainty handkerchiefs, and other trifles, dear to the heart of every girl. When he asks her to marry him, the girl's happiness is complete, but the same afternoon, Mrs. Hallet tells her that Fannie is in love with the doctor, and would make him a much more suitable wife than she, as her education is slight, but his infatuation for Marianne is blinding him from everyone else. Believing that she may prove harmful to his career, Marianne tells him she is in love with George Traylor, a garage mechanic, and kisses him in the presence of Dr. Roberts. Deeply hurt, he turns away from her, his faith in women shattered by her behaviour, and tells Marianne that she apparently only tolerated him for what he could give her.

Driving Mrs. Hallet's car home from the market where she has purchased supplies for the week, Marianne sees Fannie with a group of girls, swimming in the lake. As she passes them, Fannie calls for help, and Marianne goes to her rescue. In saving her, the girl strikes her head against a rock, and is badly injured; Fannie sends for Dr. Roberts. Deliriously, the girl calls for him, and says she will never love anyone else. When Marianne regains consciousness, Mrs. Hallet admits her attempt to persuade the girl to give up her lover, and the two are again united. In gratitude, Mrs. Hallet sends Marianne away to school with Fannie, and the two become close friends. Meeting accidently on the street, years later, when Marianne is Dr. Roberts wife, and Fannie is married to a merchant, the two laugh together over the incidents of their girlhood.

CAST THY BREAD

Mrs. W. E. Sloan Drama File No. 10308

WORKING together for their mutual good, Mr. and Mrs. Blossom and their five children are rewarded with material success and the close, spiritual bonds of the old fashioned family. The boys. Frank, Marvin and Andrew help their father after school hours in his department store, and the two girls, Frances and Margie, aid their mother in the management of their home. As the children grow older, the family is able to purchase a beautiful home in the country, surrounded by a profusion of flowers, with apple trees, bearing snowy, white blossoms in the orchard; from this, the neighobrs affectionately term the happy group "the Apple Blossom Family." When they return from church on Sunday, they often dine under these trees, thanking God for the peace and security of their home. The eldest girl, Frances, marries James Monroe and goes to California to make her home; here her two children are born. As the boys are preparing to enter college, depression sweeps the country, and Mr. Blossom's business suffers, but his wife reminds him that if they trust in God, as they always have, everything will be well. Anxious to help, Frank and Marvin persuade their parents to let them go to California, and purchasing an old Ford, set out across the country. Mrs. Blossom bravely smiles as she bids them farewell, and confides to her friend, Mrs. DePree, that she knows all will be well with her boys. They secure a position with an oil company, and invest their savings in its stock.

Frances wires that her baby is ill, whereupon Mr. and Mrs. Blossom, Andrew and Margie drive to her home. As they pass the hills of California, Mrs. Blossom observes how like they are to the immortal place where Christ talked to his disciples. Selecting a modest cottage in Anaheim, mother and daughter take care of Mr. Blossom, who has contracted influenza with never a word of regret for their former luxury and ease. Margie secures a position with Mr. Trask, a lawyer. Attracted by her fresh, young beauty, he makes love to the girl, her innocence and purity bringing out his finer qualities. Trask asks her to become his wife, saying that he knows he does not deserve her, but can never love anyone else, but she replies that she will not think of marriage while her family is in difficulty. Andrew secures work with the oil company, and all three boys buy a major share of its stock, in a new well, jointly. Desperately in need of money, they decide to sell the stock to Lee Holt, a promoter. Margie mentions this to Mr. Trask, who tells her she must stop them, as Holt is unscrupulous, and would not buy it unless it had real value. She telephones this news to her mother, who at once takes the car, and drives to the oil field, but on the way, a bridge, weakened by a recent flood, gives way, and her roadster slides into a ravine. Miraculously she is unhurt; Holt, on his way to sign the papers, is stopped by the bridge, and before he can reach the boys, their mother has notified them. As Mr. Trask prophesied, the property brings wealth to the family, and when Mr. Blossom and Frances' baby Shortly after this, the boys are married to three are restored to health, Conrad weds Margie. lovely girls whom they meet through the church. Thus "the Apple Blossom Family" is united and augmented, through faith in God and each other.

STRENGTH OF WOMEN

James R. Newland Drama File No. 10392

IN the library of the Manor House, Sir Arthur Berkley sat reading, his two sons Richard and Frank near him. Suddenly Aunt Audrey, Sir Arthur's sister came in storming that the gardner had injured his arm and would be unable to drive her into town. With a little sigh Richard offered to drive his aunt and as they neared the gate, Richard whistled with surprise at sight of Sally, the daughter of the gardner, who had just returned from college. Later, home again, he managed to find Sally and exclaiming over how lovely she had grown since their childhood days when they had played together, he invited her to come riding with him. In the days that followed Richard found himself falling in love with the girl, and despite the grumblings of his aristocratic and stern aunt and the anticipated difficulties with his father, Richard confessed his love for Sally. Frightened she urged him not to spoil their friendship and pointed out that she could never fit into his family, but young love recognizes no difficulties. On a weekend visit with his brother in New York, Richard bought a beautifully mounted engagement ring for Sally, and on the urging of Frank, agreed to see the hit show in town that night. A little surprised at his brother's easy familiarity with the theater, Richard accepted the invitation to come back stage and was introduced to Pat Carrothers, the star, in her dressing room. Realizing that Frank knew Pat well Richard made an excuse to go out. Meanwhile Maurice, the theater manager entered, and resenting Frank's presence ordered him out. Pat picked up a gun and ordered the men to stop quarreling and in the ensuing struggle, Frank fell shot through the heart. Richard, hearing the shot rushed back and seeing his brother's body, picked up the gun incredulously. A second later the police broke in and as Pat continued to stare accusingly at Richard, the boy was held for his brother's murder. At the trial Pat testified that she had retired to the back of the room leaving the two brothers speaking and that no one else could have entered without her knowledge.

Meanwhile Sally distraitly continued to believe in the innocence of Richard and on a visit with Sir Arthur told him stoutly she would expose the real murderer. Accordingly, certain that Pat had not told the whole story she staged a faint outside the stage entrance and was carried in the car of Madam Reinhart, once a famous star, to her home. Learning that the girl was stage ambitious, Madam Reinhart decided to take on Sally as a protegee, and enjoyed the jealousy of Pat, whom she disliked, when Sally made an instant impression on Maurice Thornton. Through Maurice Sally was given an opportunity as Pat's understudy, and when Pat, in a fury over Maurice's recent indifference to her, slapped her maid, Norah pushed the insolent star so violently that Pat broke two ribs in falling against a shelf. Sally was given her opportunity and to the delight of her well wishers scored an over-night sensation. In her jealousy Pat's references to the murder of Frank Berkley led to the arrest of herself and Maurice, through Sally's action, and on Maurice's narrative of the actual events, Pat was incarcerated and Richard freed. And to the happiness of Sally and Richard was added that of Madam Reinhart and Sir Arthur who, discovering each other again, picked up their romance where it had been shattered many years ago.

SIN DAUGHTER

Maude Morrill Melodrama File No. 10397

AVOIDED by her classmates at school because she is shy and sensitive, Mirth Hennessey wistfully watches them at their games. Brought up by her Aunt Belle, who overemphasizes the child's delicate health, she is unhappy until, after her aunt becomes a widow, they make their home with Uncle Fred in the country. Laughingly ignoring Belle's apprehensions, her cousin, Robert, takes Mirth coasting; under the influence of his gay disposition she soon becomes a normal, healthy child. Robert often plays the piano for her amusement. She is sad when this understanding friend goes away to college and she is sent to a private school, where she becomes acquainted with Richard and Barbara, children of David Dare, her uncle's close friend and later boards at their home. Richard, previously indifferent to girls, takes her to many parties and she soon makes several friends, but Barbara, finding her too serious, slights her. Mr. Dare invites the Hennessey family to his home for Christmas dinner, and she again sees Robert, back for the holidays, but the old understanding has somehow been broken between them. Robert studies music in an Eastern conservatory, and Mirth one day wins success as an authoress. Aunt Belle receives a letter from Mirth's mother, whom she believed dead, asking that her daughter comes to her, and she prevails upon the girl to go. Mirth makes the trip with the Dare family, who are spending their vacation in the same town.

The young writer soon discovers that her mother's purpose in sending for her is to marry her to Carl Ferguson, a wealthy lawyer, many years her senior. Unhappy in the empty life she is forced to lead, the girl feels that Mrs. Grey, a servant, and her daughter, Marie are her only true friends in the house. Carl Ferguson admires the clever authoress, but when Mirth tells her mother she will never marry him the older woman becomes angry, and finally tells Mirth that she is not her daughter but a fondling whom her friend, Kate Downey, adopted for her in order that she might deceive her husband, who always longed for a child. Advising Carl of this fact when he proposes, Mirth is told that she must be his own daughter, as he placed his baby in a foundling home when her mother died, wishing to conceal his marriage, and was later told that Kate had adopted her. Overhearing this conversation Mrs. Grey confesses that she was formerly nurse for the Dare baby, whose mother died at birth, and that when the infant was only a few days old, Kate called at the home, pretending to be an old friend, and switched the Dare baby for one she had in her arms, when left alone for a moment in the nursery. Mr. Dare, who had been away when the child was born, believed this baby to be his own and she did not dare to tell him the truth. Kate admits the charges, saying the Dare baby resembled Mirth's foster mother more closely than the one she had taken from the home, and Mr. Dare confirms the fact further when he discovers a family birthmark on Mirth's shoulder. He welcomes her to his home, while Barbara goes to Carl Ferguson, her wealthy father.

Robert, now a successful composer, tells Mirth he knows now he has always loved her, and going to his arms, the girl promises to marry him, while both the Dares and the Hennesseys approve.

HIRING a motor boat for the day, Pete and Mary decide to celebrate the seventh anniversary of their wedding with an outing on the calm water of Lake Wyannetta. Wishing to share their pleasure, Mary calls their friends, Pat, Lorraine, Betty, Gilbert, the Benson twins, Paula and Pauline, Rose and Mabel, two school teachers, and Grace Allen; delighted at the prospect of escape from the hot city with its wearing routine of duties, they start out at six-thirty. Five year old Jim, Mary's son, proudly helps his mother and father carry the picnic delicacies to the car; soon the party assembles at the lake, and, boarding the boat, start away. Grace settles her substantial two hundred pounds in the center as a ballast. All the women cast admiring glances at Pat, but he centers most of his attention on the Benson twins. After a delightful ride, Pete and Pat dock the boat and help the women ashore; soon the group gathers around the picnic spread, in a secluded spot in the woods. Mischievously, Pat steals Grace's olive, and soon has everyone in the party joining this game. When Pauline collects the greatest number of olives, Pat jokingly rewards her with a light kiss; everyone laughs but Paula who turns away. When she goes for water at a nearby stream, Pat tells her he loves her, and meant nothing when he kissed her sister, but she replies that he is too carefree and irresponsible for her. Returning to the boat, the party sing "Red Wing," and other popular melodies, as they speed homeward.

Pat tells them an old Indian legend of the lake. Valleda, a redskin maiden, was driven to its shores by white men who attacked her, and drowned herself to escape. Her lover, Brave-In-The-Woods, pronounced a curse on the lake, beating its smooth surface into a white froth, and followed the girl to her grave. Their bodies were never recovered, but from that day forth, the lake had taken its toll of at least one while person every summer. Hardly is the story ended when a strong wind plays across the still waters, ruffling their calm. Soon the little boat tosses from side to side, white foam spraying across its decks. Pat takes command, advising everyone to remain calm, and with the help of Pete and Grace, who retains her position in the center of the boat, begins bailing out the water. He turns to comfort little Jim, held close in Mary's arm, assuring him this is just part of the picnic. Pauline becomes hysterical; firmly taking her by the shoulders, Pat gives her a little shake and orders her to help with the bailing. The boat lurches violently to one side, and Paula is thrown into the rough water. Without a moment's hesitation, Pat jumps in after her. After a severe struggle with the waves, he reaches the girl, and brings her ashore. As she is regaining consciousness, Paula murmurs: "Pat, I love you." When the boat drifts toward the cliff near their port the sea is calm and the good spirits of the party restored. Pauline thanks Pat with an embrace when he tells her he only wished to restore her self control during the storm; she hopes that he will become her brother-in-law, she adds.

The next day when Pat calls at the Benson home and asks Paula to become his wife the girl replies that she knows she has misjudged him in the past, and will gladly marry him. When their engagement is announced, Grace jokingly asks him how he will be able to distinguish between the two girls, but everyone rejoices in this happy union.

RANCH ROMANCE

John Gordon Western File No. 10349

LEONARD BROWN is greeted at the door of the AB4 Ranch by Jessie Green, the seventeen year old daughter of the house. When he asks her if he can find employment here, she calls her father, whispering to him to give the young man something to do, if he can. Mr. Green hires him, instructing him that his first duty will be to mend fences which have been torn in some mysterious way, and through which twenty six of his choicest cattle have escaped. Under the instruction of Jack Frost, another cowboy, he set to work, and soon has the gaps securely filled. He notices a piece of green and black striped flannel caught on a nail near a torn place on the fence. Removing it, he puts it in his pocket. Leonard's next duty is to assist Jack in branding the cattle, and as he stamps the AB4 mark on the animals, he becomes very familiar with it. Seeing him expertly rope a steer while he is riding, Jessie asks him to teach her the trick, and he is amazed at the skill she soon attains, after a few lessons. Leonard and Jessie ride together over the flat plains of Texas. When her horse becomes frightened by the sound of blasting in the distance and runs away, Leonard follows. After a swift and dangerous chase he catches up with her steed, and lifts the girl dexterously from it. As they both dismount and rest, she suddenly kisses him, in gratitude. Leonard tells her that he loves her and wishes to marry her, but she replies that she is engaged to someone else and he must forget about this kiss.

Entering the living room, Leonard sees Jessie talking to a young man whom she introduces as Jim Clarke, and notices that the shirt he is wearing is of the same material as the piece of goods he found by the fence. Leonard notices a patch, of corresponding size, missing from the elbow; Jim follows his glance, and flushing angrily, bids goodbye to Jessie and leaves the room. When they are alone, Leonard tells the girl that Jim may be the cattle rustler her father is searching for; she replies at once that he is her fiancee. Insisting that he be questioned, Leonard is angrily dismissed by the girl, who tells him she should have remembered that he was nothing but a cowboy, and could not be expected to act like a gentleman. Going to her father, Leonard again confides his suspicions; Mr. Green assures him that he must be mistaken, but adds that he wishes him to go on a scouting expedition for the lost cattle, accompanied by Jack. The two young men set out together but after riding all day long find no trace of the missing animals. They decide to pitch camp for the night when, in the distance, they see a stray steer, and, capturing it, discover it is one of their own as they recognize the brand. They tie it to a tree, and hide behind bushes. After night falls three men ride up and prepare to take the beast away when Jack flashes a light upon them, and Leonard holds them with his pistol, he recognizes one of them as Jim Clarke. Restraining Jack from his desire to lynch the men, Leonard turns them over to the sheriff. They confess their theft, and admit that the cattle are hidden a few miles away from their ranch. Mr. Green's lost property is restored to him, and Clarke and his accomplices sentenced to twenty years in the penetentiary.

Gratefully, Mr. Green rewards Jack by making him his assistant, while Leonard is given the position of foreman, and presented with a cash award by the state for his bravery in capturing these outlaws. Jessie apologizes for misjudging him, but Leonard tells her, with mock seriousness, that she can only atone by becoming his wife. With the complete approval of Mr. Green, the two are married.

THE MIRROR OF LOVE

Knarf Snamooc Melodrama File No. 10383

RESIDENTS of the little village of Loneoake welcome William and Lou Van Dassel, a young German couple who have purchased a farm in the community, in true pioneer spirit, toasting them, and offering help and neighborly advice. Cold and reserved, William refuses their kindly offers, even though sorely in need of assistance with his planting and reaping. When a little daughter, Dorothy, is born to them, they are scarcely able to obtain the necessities of life, despairing, William drinks heavily. A young woman comes to their farmhouse one night, beautifully dressed, and carrying a tiny baby in her arms. She tells them that she ran away from her wealthy home in order to become an opera singer, but abandoned her career to become the wife of an engineer, who was recently killed, leaving her with their child to care for. Her parents have expressed their willingness to take her back into their home if she will give up her baby, who has been blind from birth. Selecting the Van Dassels because she, too, is of German descent, the girl pleads with them to care for the child, offering to pay fifty dollars a month for this service. William agrees, and leaving the baby, whose name is Harold Henscom, the mother sadly turns away. As Dorothy and Harold grow up together, the girl makes it her special mission to guide the blind boy on his way to school and play. Neglected by the other children because she is unattractive, Dot is appreciated for her beauty of character by Harold, who loves her more than anyone in the world. The two are so constantly together that they are called the Siamese Twins.

Harold's own mother secretly visits the farm, and finding the two alone, gives them money for new clothing. She notices a small mouth organ which her boy is playing, as Dot accompanies him in a rich melodious voice. Taking Harold to the county fair, Dot spends all the money on a new suit for him; this infuriates her parents, both of whom have become degenerates, and they order the boy out of the house, advising him that he is not their son. Before Dot can follow, he is gone; finding his cap in the river she concludes that he has thrown himself into it, and been swept to the falls. In reality, the boy makes his way to the city, and eventually falls exhausted at the door of a kindly widow woman, Mrs. Naffets. Giving him the name of her dead son, Dick, she adopts the boy, and finds work for him with her friend Sam, a cobbler. The boy's gift for playing the mouth organ attracts trade and many voluntary contributions; he is soon able to help his foster mother. Three bleak years pass uneventfully for Dot when a fire burns down her home and kills both parents. The girl is hideously scarred, and goes to the falls to take her own life, but is prevented from doing so by her pastor; he tells Dot that Harold may be alive, needing her. Dot begins a search for him, and at last finds her old comrade playing his mouth organ; she joins in the song. Recognizing her voice, he joyfully takes her home. When Dot removes her veil, Mrs. Naffets sees her disfigurement, but approves of her marriage to Harold, realizing he will never know.

A Physician becomes interested in the boy, and performs an operation which restores his sight. Unwilling to disillusion him, Dot leaves before he can see her, but returns later, concealing her identity and becomes Mrs. Naffets servant in order that she may be near her love, who is now a doctor. Recognizing his mother in a passing car, Dot feigns injuries as she throws herself in front of it, in order that Mrs. Henscom will take her to Harold. The girl's innocent deception is discovered but not before Mrs. Henscom has noticed Harold's mouth organ on his desk, and through this at last learned that he is the boy for whom she has searched since she attained prominence as a singer. Dot again runs away, and is prevented a second time from suicide at the falls when Harold saves her. He and his mother take her to the hospital, and before she fully regains consciousness, engage a plastic surgeon to remove her scar. She emerges from the operation a beautiful young woman, able to take her place beside her husband at last. His happiness is completed when both mothers become fast friends.

DANCING STARS

AWAKENING Elnora, his lovely wife, with a kiss, Everett Beverly urges her to call the children so that they may all go downstairs and "see what Santa Claus has brought." Upon entering the nursery Mr. and Mrs. Beverly discover that their two little sons, Jean and John, have been eagerly waiting their visit, and after exchanging Christmas greetings with their parents, they hasten to the huge tree in the parlor and gleefully open their gifts. Everett presents his wife with a ring. After a delicious breakfast prepared by Diane, the colored maid, Mr. and Mrs. Beverly attend church, leaving the boys with their presents. As they walk through the streets of London, listening to the Christmas carols of Old England played by the church chimes, both confess that they love one another even more than the day they married, and silently thank God for their happiness. In the afternoon their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Eames and their little daughter, Joan, are their guests at dinner. Leaving the three children in the care of Diane, the two couples spend an evening of dancing at the Venetian Cafe. In the years that follow, the Beverly boys attend school at Oxford; Jean is popular among his fellow students but acquires habits of drinking and gambling. John, although quiet and studious, is equally liked and attains a splendid scholastic standing. In order to save his mother from worry he pays many of Jean's gambling debts, and helps him with his studies. Both boys fall in love with Peggy Crawford, the daughter of a prominent London lawyer, whom they meet at a social gathering.

Joan Eames, now a beautiful brunette, disobeys her parents and becomes a dancer, soon winning for the Christmas holidays, Jean sees her performing in a cabaret and is instantly fascinated. prominence. When the Beverly boys come home Despite his mother's protests, he renews his acquaintance with the girl, defending her against all criticism. In an effort to bring his brother home with him, John goes to the cabaret where Joan is dancing; recognizing him, she goes to his table and carelessly throws her arm around her playmate of former years, to the amusement of the crowd. Peggy, seated at another table with friends, witnesses this, and knowing Joan's reputation as a woman of affairs, is deeply hurt. Following her to her dressing room, John urges Joan not to trifle with his brother's affections as it is only bringing unhappiness to his mother, but the girl replies that she sincerely loves Jean, and cannot give him up. Shortly after this, Jean attends a yacht party aboard the York, to which Joan and her former admirer, Jack Horn, have also been invited. During the course of the evening the guests drink heavily, and Jack makes an insulting remark at Joan. She strikes him, and he pushes her aside, accidentally throwing her against a weak spot in the railing which gives way. As she falls into the sea, Jean at once dives to her rescue, but both are drowned. Several hours later their bodies are recovered and their families notified.

Receiving a telegram which tells of the tragic death of Jean, his father goes to the morgue to make certain it is true before telling Elnora. After viewing his son's body, he drives sadly home, but a truck crashes into his car, sending it through a plate glass window and killing him. Overcome with grief, Mrs. Beverly and John go away for a rest, at the order of Dr. Cowley, the family physician. Newspapers print excerpts of Joan's diary, proving her love for Jean, and his for her. Despite the scandal, mother and son are gratified to know that his feeling was sincere. Peggy writes John a note of sympathy, telling him that she has always loved him, but thought he cared for Joan, and she consents to become his wife. Bravely, Mrs. Beverly tells the young couple they must all think of the future, not the past, and find again the happiness that had been so cruelly shattered.

THE MILLS GRIND FINE

Susan Elam Melodrama File No. 10338

WHEN he opposes the marriage of his father, Sir Charles Gordon, to Clara Coulson, governess to his little sister, Alice, Clarence is ordered out of his home, and sadly, the young man takes his leave of his father and sister, both of whom he loves. Clara becomes the second Lady Gordon, but little Alice dies, longing for her brother, and Sir Charles regrets deeply his quarrel with his adored son, who tried only to protect him fom marrying a woman he considered unworthy to take his mother's place, but he cannot trace him. A daughter, Fannie, is born to Clara and Sir Gordon. One cold wintry evening when Sir Charles lies ill in his bedroom, a young woman with a little boy of four is admitted to see Lady Gordon, and states that she is the wife of Clarence, and the child, his son. Lady Gordon asks her to spend the night at the pavillion, promising that she may see Sir Charles the next morning, but that night, struggles with her, and takes away her marriage certificate and other proofs of her story. These she drops in the snow, and they are picked up by Elsie, her maid. Sir Charles is found murdered, and the woman and child are accused, but before the trial takes place, both disappear.

Sir Phillip Sydney orders his country estate, Lenwood Court, to be renovated in preparation for a party which he plans to give, honoring the twentieth birthday of his adopted niece, Evelyn, whose father was a poor pastor, and whose mother gave her to him, when she lay dying, shortly after her husband was killed in an acoident. A young artist who has been adopted by Lord Howard, Sir Phillip's friend, comes to retouch the paintings, and introduces himself to Evelyn as Edward Lawrence, when he encounters her in the hall. The two become friends, and he falls in love with the charming young heiress, but does not tell her of his adoration, as he realizes the difference in their stations. Lady Arnold and her son Henry are guests at the party; Henry proposes to Evelyn, but her maid, Mary tells her that he betrayed her years ago with a mock marriage, as she lies dying. Gratefully, the girl thanks her for this knowledge, and longs for the love of an honorable man, whether poor or wealthy.

Clarence Gordon is rescued by the crew of an East Indian merchant vessel from an island where he had been washed ashore after a shipwreck, eighteen years before, and goes to England. He calls at his father's estate shortly after Sir Phillip, Evelyn, Lord Howard and Edward have arrived for a short visit, at the invitation of Lady Gordon and Fannie. Establishing his claim as the rightful heir, he tells his stepmother that Tim McCarthy, the gardner, related last night as he lay dying that she had hired him to imprison his wife and kill his little boy, stealing them from the jail so that they could not testify at the trial of his father's murder. At last confessing that this is true, Lady Gordon sends for Clarence's wife, who is confined in a sanitarium, suffering from temporary insanity caused by the loss of her son. Her reason is fully restored when she sees her husband. Lord Howard states that Tim McCarthy brought a child to him years ago, who is his adopted son, Edward, and a birthmark proves that he is the child of Clarence and Edith. Relating how his own wife and baby left him when they were told by a "friend" that he had betrayed them, Lord Howard discovers that Edith is his own daughter, when Lady Gordon signs a confession to that effect, also stating that she was the murderer of Sir Charles, fearing his son would appear and claim his estate. The unhappy woman kills herself with the knife that stabbed her husband, and Fannie, in hysteria, breaks a blood vessel and dies. Now in a position her hand, and in their joy, his father, Lord Howard to ask Evelyn to become his wife, Edward wins and Sir Phillip find happiness.

RESPECTABILITY

Priscilla McCabe Drama File No. 10373

SINCE childhood, Peter and Marguerite had been constant companions, attending the same country school and exploring the wooded trail surrounding their neighboring cabins in the northern part of Canada. It was he who taught the girl to swim and fish, and she tramped beside him when he helped his father with the trapping. Almost every evening Peter would come to the cabin where Marguerite lived with her aunt, helping them with their household duties, as one of the family. But when the girl was seventeen, this simple relationship changed; Peter asked her to become his wife, and she accepted. Advising their friends of this, the two planned to be married in the little village church in the spring. James and Emmet, two cousins, both the sons of Holland-Dutch farmers, upon hearing of the wealth that was being obtained from the lumber trade resolved to abandon the hard life of tilling the soil, and seek their fortunes in Canada. They settled in a cabin near Marguerite's home. Stopping the girl as she walked through the woods, James introduced himself; at first, she drew back, unaccustomed to this unconventional behavior, but disarmed by his handsome appearance and suave, charming manner, she returned his smile, and told him her name, later granting him permission to call. A few days following this, she was presented to Emmet, and, with Peter, attended a picnic given by the two cousins.

Encountering the girl alone in the woods, James took her in his arms, and pouring forth his love, begged her to become his wife. Swept away by this torrent of passion, so different from the quiet devotion of Peter, she believed herself to care for him, and returned his caresses, promising to break her engagement. Unable to resist his appeal, the girl remained with him all night, and, confessing this to Peter the following morning, asked him to release her from her promise. Assuring her that he did not censure her, Peter urged his fiancee not to marry James as he believed him treacherous and unworthy, but she replied that nothing mattered but her love for him. Returning to his cabin, James told Emmet of the previous evening, whereupon his cousin informed him that he, too, loved Marguerite and meant to see that he left her alone. As they rowed down the river for supplies at the village, the cousins quarrelled hotly; seizing an oar, James struck Emmet over the head and killed him. Weighting the body down with a steel trap, James hastily threw his cousin into the water, and escaped through the woods to a distant part of the country.

Dragging the river in search of the two men, police discovered the body of Emmet, and in the trial that followed, questioned Marguerite, forcing her to admit her relationship to James. Peter loyally stood by his sweetheart, assuring her that he understood and forgave, and repeating that he would always wish to marry her. Weeping, the girl told him that she now knew she had always loved him, and was only momentarily infatuated with James, but she did not feel that she had the right to become his wife. After months of searching, police at last captured James and brought him to trial; he was sentenced to be hanged. Following the execution, James' parents begged the authorities to send his body to their home for burial, but they could not comply. Led by Peter, a group of their friends cut down the body from the gallows, and bore it across the frozen St. Lawrence River in a swift sledge, to the United States. Here it was interred near a school house, but later sent to the parents, who placed it in a cemetery near their home. After their death, friends flattened the head-stone so that it could not be found by curiosity seekers. Marguerite yielded to Peter's pleas to become his wife, and in her devotion to him the girl atoned for the past, finding solace in his honest love.

THE DANCER

Elise Lathrop Drama File No. 10331

SLIPPING away from her governess, little Marie Pavlovna, the Princess Karsavina, sails toy boats on the pond in the garden of her father's estate with Olga, a peasant child, and one day goes with her to the cottage of her maternal grandmother, Katia, who greets her with sardonic courtesy. Later, Katia bitterly tells Olga that Marie is her cousin, as she was once loved by the dashing Prince Feodor and bore him a daughter, Olga's mother. Although providing liberally for his sweetheart and natural child, Feodor married a woman of his own rank, and her son was the late father of Princess Marie. Olga grows into a vivid, radiant girl, with a talent for dancing; a stranger notices her grace and sends her to the Imperial Ballet School at Moscow. After the establishment of the Soviet government, the girl decides to pay a visit to Katia, whom she has not seen since childhood, but finds her grandmother dead. A Soviet mob sets fire to the Karsavina estate and Marie's invalid mother dies of the shock, but with Olga's help, the princess escapes, disguised as an elderly peasant woman. As they are leaving the burning palace, Olga commands the timid girl to take the family jewels from the safe, and hiding them in her garments, leads the princess through the woods; silently she follows her cousin.

Both girls eventually reach America, due to Olga's efforts, and here she secures a short contract to dance on the stage of a motion picture house. For publicity purposes, Olga bills herself as Princess Karsavina, and claims to be Marie when Jack Newland, a young reporter, interviews her for his paper, The Morning Searchlight. Enthusiastically, Jack takes his friend, Dr. Frank Williamson to see the dancer, and later Frank goes to another theatre when he sees the princess billed, but discovers a less capable, though charming girl, taking her part. Advising Jack of this fact, he and his friend question the manager, Eisenberg, and are told that Levin, agent for the princess, assured him she would be a sensation, while her actual performance proved to be very poor. After questioning both men, they discover that the dancer they saw was not the true princess, and that she has disappeared. At last gaining admission to her tiny apartment, they are greeted by an elderly woman. When Jack asks her who appeared on the stage of the Alameda theatre, she faints, and in reviving her they discover that she is wearing a wig and heavy make-up; when this is partially removed she is revealed as the dancer they had last seen. Frank realizes that his patient is on the point of starvation, and prescribes food before she tells them that the dancer they seek is her cousin, who disappeared. Desperately in need of money, she attempted to fill her engagement at the Alameda. At her request, Frank sells a diamond for her, but when he returns with the money, Marie is gone.

A few days later Olga returns and tells Jack that she accepted a dinner engagement with a stranger who came to her dressing room, introducing himself as Baron Lorski. Driving her to a lonely house, he disclosed himself as a representative of the Soviet government, and demanded that she give him the Karsavina jewels. When she stated that they were all sold, he replied that he had noticed the ring as she danced, but she replied that it was paste. Although finally proven not to be the princess, the girl was held, until a servant helped her escape. Through her descriptions, the false Baron and his accomplices are captured, but the jewels are missing. Two years later, Frank accidentally meets Marie; she discloses that she took her jewels and went to Hollywood, where her godparents were engaged in motion picture work, as she believed Olga had deserted her. The princess gives up her budding career to become Frank's wife, and, knowing now that Olga is her friend, helps her to secure a film contract. Jack is engaged as her press agent, and soon becomes her husband as well.

WINGS OF WIND

Edith V. Bitner Historical Drama File No. 10336

ADOPTED by Indians who slay her parents, a beautiful white child is welcomed to the Shawnee tribe, and given the name Poco-Huntas, "tomboy," because of her ability in performing acrobatics, similar to the skill of chief Powhatan's daughter. When she is five years old, a group of men belonging to the religious sect familiarly known as shakers visit the tribe, to learn whether or not they are friendly to them. While they confer with Lal-lui-tsee-ka, the prophet, and Te-kum-tha, the chief, aided by George Bluejacket, an interpretor, the golden haired child darts forward in their midst, and the chief admits that she was kidnapped when his tribe plundered a wagon train. At last he yields to their demands to take the child back to the shaker settlement at Union Village and here the Eldress appoints her a medium for visits of the Holy Wisdom, believing her agility indicates spiritual insight. Little Poco-huntas is told the history of the order to which she now belongs; the Eldress relates that Jane and James Wardleigh first separated them from the Quaker church, because of the shaking and other physical manifestations they practiced, while worshipping God. Toward the middle of the eighteenth century Ann Lee, a cook, had visions in which she was told that she was Christ, appearing this time in the form of a woman to prove the duality of his sex. She further united the shakers, whose real title became the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing and established colonies at Watervliet and New Lebanon. Among the first converts was Anna Middleton, a slave. The Reverend Richard McNemar became a leader at the Union Village settlement.

Steeped in the traditions of these kindly people, Poco-huntas grows up to accept their customs of platonic relationship between men and women, equal sharing of all property, with no individual ownership, and physical demonstration during worship. She wears her hair drawn tightly back, concealed by a bonnet as do all shaker women, while the men cut theirs squarely in front, observes the rule of silence during mealtime, with prayer before and after, and accepts the fact that men and women do not sit side by side, at any time. At services held in the meeting house, she questions and counsels the members, who kneel before her, acting as a medium for the Holy Wisdom. Colonel James Smith charges these peaceful people with misconduct, brutality to children, particularly in the case of Poco-Huntas, and states that their Elder, David Darrow, hoards their property for his personal use, exerting the same absolute power over his subjects as a pope. Since the Great Revival in Kentucky in 1801, opposition to the shakers had grown, and a mob of five hundred men in military attire appear at Union Village, following Colonel Smith's false charges, but they are dispelled by peaceful arbitration. Darrow orders a curse on Lebanon, from whence the mob came, and a blessing on Dayton, at the meeting in Jehovah's Square; Francis Bedle and the Reverend McNemar are sent to ride through these towns, and pronounce the edicts. As a result, Dayton suddenly flourishes.

James Cameron, young editor of the Western Star at Lebanon, visits the shaker settlement following this, and falls in love with Poco-Huntas, now a young woman. She is forbidden to see him, but they often meet clandestinely, and become secretly engaged. While exploring the newly discovered Mound City of Ohio, Cameron finds among the ruins a box containing a few pieces of gold, and a letter from Poco-Huntas' mother, stating that Indians are about to attack, and she has hidden her daughter, Rose Ellen from them, praying for God's mercy to her. As this chest is found near the spot where the child was taken, it proves her identity, and, not belonging to the shakers, the girl renounces their religion to become Cameron's bride, grateful for their kindness to her.

PARDONED

William Jackmuff Comedy Drama File No. 10446

AS the pretty little waitress flipped his dinner down before him, George Ruby looked up from Detective Story Magazine, and ran a grimy finger under the "REWARDS OFFERED FOR DANGEROUS CRIMINALS" page. Sarcastically Dolly advised him to stick to his garage mechanic business and forget about detective stuff, and deeply offended, George finished his dinner and walked out.

Back at the garage he slipped another glance at the Detective Magazine and as a car pulled up and two men ordered him to "fill her up," George's eyes popped at sight of the bulging gun holsters. Pointing his stream of gasoline at the two men, George called loudly for "Help" and "Police" and as the owner came running out and explained to the open-mouthed George that the pair were the best detectives on the force, Smith and Jones, George in his amazement turned the gasoline on his boss. With a splutter of rage, the boss fired George. For hours George walked about, lost without his job. A hundred times he passed the filling station, and at last, seeing an expensive looking car, he got the urge to tinker with it. As he seated himself at the wheel, he decided to ride it around the block, but a cop, on the lookout for automobile thieves and acquainted with the owner of the car, blew his whistle and gave chase. A police car followed, and George, frightened began speeding through traffic, each motorcycle cop along the way joining the entourage. Up one way streets and past red lights George whizzed, in and out, until he lost the whole flock, but in his enthusiasm he came up behind one of the police cars and as he determined to pass the car, fell right into the clutches of the law and was sentenced by a stern faced judge to five years in prison as a car thief. In the prison work shop George managed to upset everything and that night retired to his cell with the other prisoners. At eleven o'clock inspection. the guard's flash found the bed empty and after a hasty search the alarm rang and the city was scoured for the missing prisoner. Next morning when the other prisoners were herded in the shop, George woke up, came out from under the bed where he had been sleeping all along, and finding his cell open walked out. On the way he found a guard's uniform with sun glasses in the pocket, donned it, opened the gate, and walked out of the prison, unchallenged. In town he sold his "watchman's" uniform to a pawnbroker in exchange for a green and yellow checked suit, and boarded a freight from which he jumped when the train passed his home town. Hearing two men talk about Slade, notorious gangster who was reputed to be in town and discovering the speakers were the detectives Jones and Smith, George started running again and with his last quarter bought a detective magazine. Opening to the Criminals wanted section, he looked up the picture of Slade, and started as he recognized the face as a fat man who had brushed by him, knocking him over. Remembering having seen the fellow enter a house, George followed with loud-beating heart and overhearing Slade and some other men talking, slipped down the creaking stairs and into the street. Rushing up to Jones and Smith, George urged them to go after Slade but they recognized him as the escaped convict and took the precaution of locking him up first. When they rounded up Slade and others of the most notorious gangsters in the country, Jones and Smith were promoted and together managed to get a pardon from the Governor. On the train going home George bought an apple and a magazine and asked the baffled train boy for change of an eight thousand dollar check, his reward for the capture of the criminals. With the money George bought the restaurant in which Dolly worked and offered half interest to her—as his wife.

OUR BILL

Mrs. J. V. Branch Comedy Drama File No. 10388

PROMISING to bring him up as his own son, Mr. Mason takes care of six year old Bill Smith when his father lies at the point of death in the county hospital. Making room for the boy in his tiny cottage, the old bachelor soon finds his chief pleasure in life is this adopted son, and proudly relates all the triumphs of little Bill. Most of his meager salary is spent on clothing and toys for the boy; he gives up his Saturday night poker game in order that he may gratify the youngster's wish for a toy violin, and teaches him to play it. Brother Smart, Mason's closest friend, tires of hearing continually of the exploits of the child, and often says that he imagines he is not as exceptional as Mason believes him to be, whereupon a quarrel invariably follows, and, sooner or later, a reconciliation. Emily, Smart's little girl and the pride and joy of his life becomes Bill's playmate and the two are usually to be found together, Mason remarks that perhaps they will marry when they grow up, but Smart replies that they won't if he can help it, and Mason retorts that, on second thought, he would not want his son to marry into such a family. Wishing to justify his foster father's pride in him, Bill studies hard at school and spends many hours on his music lessons. When he is sixteen, he is invited to play his violen at the morning service in the church. Delighted over this recognition of his boy's talent, Mason forcibly leads Smart to the church, the first time either of them have entered its doors in many years.

Loudly proclaiming that such music should not be allowed in a church, Smart provokes Mason to another quarrel, and the latter states that he supposes the only kneeling he has ever done has been over a crap game. Then he asks him what became of the five dollars he won last night. Mattie, Smart's wife, overhears this, and demands that her husband turn this money over to her, but he has only two dollars and a half left. Going to his friend's home, he tries to make amends for the quarrel, and the two pitch horse shoes, with an additional fifty cent piece which Smart had hidden in another pocket as stakes. Emily and Bill attend parties and picnics together during their high-school days, and it is no surprise to their friends when they announce their engagement at the senior dance, but the girl's father objects seriously to this. Emily is heart-broken and Bill crushed when Brother Smart objects to their early marriage, but their plans are made and their promise given, and sure that such love as this will always find a way, Mason has little trouble persuading Bill to go to New York to finished his study of music.

Influenced by her father, Emily begins to doubt Bill's love. The following year Smart loses his life savings in investments, and is forced to mortgage his home. To save him, Emily finally consents to marry George Stevens, a banker. Bill wins success with his music, and offered a radio contract. Hearing of Smart's difficulties, he advances him money, through Mason, and Emily sure of his love when he dedicates a composition to her, again plans to become his wife. Smart now proudly refers to the boy as "our Bill," to the annoyance of Mason, who refutes this much delayed claim.

THE GIRL FROM CAROLINA

Lloyd H. Martin Drama File No. 10399

WITH a whanging on ukeleles and mandolins, Fred and Charles ride up in their Model T Ford and leap gallantly up the steps of the little Carolina home to call for Myrtle and Irma. As they ride up the road their rich young voices harmonizes old Southern tunes and at last they arrive at the country club. Outside in the moonlight Fred kisses Myrtle and asks her to marry him, but freeing herself gently from his arms she tells him that since her father lost his position at the bank and is so despondent she dares not leave him now alone. Perhaps in a few months things will pick up for him. Inside again they dance with the others but Fred is disheartened. Meanwhile in another corner of the room, Charles watches Larry Fait, a newcomer to town, drink from a flask, and Larry turning offers Charlie a swig. Clapping his new friend on the back, Charles readily agrees to introduce Larry to Myrtle and Larry asks for the next dance. Glumly Fred watches Larry bend intimately toward the girl he loves, and when Charles apologizes for having brought the fellow over, Fred assures him it was all right. From then on every time Fred calls Myrtle she has made a previous date with Larry and at her home, Larry becomes very friendly with her father. When he learns Mr. Benson used to work in the bank but was laid off during the depression, he gives Mr. Benson the address of a friend of his in the next town who may be able to give him some kind of work. Eagerly the old man dresses in his best clothes and knocks at the hotel room. Steve Foley asks him innumerable questions and the old man, happy to be able to show how much he knows about the bank accounts of the leading citizens, chatters guilelessly about all the money he handled for the head of the general store, the rich widow, and the wealthy spinster. Steve tells him to come back on Monday and begin working.

Sunday morning an envelope is delivered to Mr. Benson and to his astonishment one thousand dollars in bills drops out and the single word "Thanks." Certain that it is a mistake, he proceeds on to Church only to find the whole town buzzing with the reports of the three gigantic extortion plots that had been practiced on the head of the general store, the rich widow, and the wealthy spinster. Dully Mr. Benson enters the Church. As the splendid voices of the choir ring out in spirituals and the sermon is about Sin, the old man's head drops on his breast.

Meanwhile, despite Fred's warning, Myrtle goes out with Larry, and as she asks him to turn the car back, he steps on the gas and putting his arm around her says, "We're not going back, baby." Looking at his face she realizes for the first time how she has been misled and she struggles with him, until the car swerves sharply into a tree. After what seems like hours Fred comes up. and binding the unconscious Larry, he dumps him into the back seat, and motioning to Myrtle to get in beside him he returns to town. Myrtle tries to speak, but Fred doesn't answer. In town he is acclaimed as he turns over Larry and the money he extorted to the police. Larry's pal Steve Foley is caught leaving the hotel and Myrtle returns home. Gently they break to her the news that her father has died of heart failure in the Church but nobody suspects his connection with the plot except Fred. As she stands alone in her darkened house, Myrtle hears a step and Fred entering, gathers her softly to him.

THE CHANT OF THE JUNGLE

M. Wilkens Melodrama File No. 10087

DECIDING to make another of his famous pictures of animal life, Johnson selects Jo-Jo, a native who had served during his last expedition, as head boy and gun bearer, and soon assembles his crew. Travelling as lightly as possible, he starts off for the heart of Africa with Arnold French. his camera man and the latter's young bride, Dorothy, as his only white companions. The early days of the expedition pass successfully; they obtain many excellent shots of birds and animals little known in other regions. Johnson tells Dorothy and Arnold that the first rule of an explorer must be never to strike a native, or, if that could not be followed, to use a whip, and providing there was none at hand, to strike with the fist in the pit of the stomach—but better never to strike at all. Attracted by his friend's lovely wife the explorer watches her with keen interest, realizing how empty his life has been of human ties, and envying French. Fearing that he is falling in love with Dorothy, Johnson sternly tries to forget her, and drinks heavily; in amazement, Jo-Jo watches his master, who has always enforced strict rules of temperance, and makes away with his whiskey bottle, consuming its contents. Johnson's main object is to photograph a herd of lions, and he is unwilling to turn back until this end is accomplished. After forty days of hard travelling the native show signs of exhaustion and restlessness, but Johnson decides to pitch camp on the veldt and await results. Jo-Jo again steals into Johnson's tent, and drinks.

Taunting his master with a drunken leer, Jo-Jo warns him: "to stay-to die." Controlling his temper, Johnson merely smiles, but when one of the the natives show signs of exhaustion and restlessness, he deals the head boy a glancing blow on the chin, sending him to the ground, unconscious, and breaking his own wrist. The natives fuse into mass, watching him, and giving the effect of a many headed monster. With an effort, Johnson commands one of the boys to bind his broken wrist, setting his teeth when he awkwardly draws the bandage too tight, and accepting his malicious apology: "Pardon, Lord," in silence. Quickly he orders the natives to go about their tasks, which they perform stupidly, accomplishing nothing. The next morning Jo-Jo absents himself, as usual, on a scouting expedition, and returns at night, again intoxicated. He persuades the natives that they must break camp, and regarding him as a hero since he dares oppose the white leader, they disappear into the forest, deaf to Johnson's pleas and threats. As the three white people attempt in vain to sleep, their only protection a camp fire, they hear the sinister beat of tom-toms in the distance. Toward dawn, the tom-toms cease and the natives stealthily creep on the three, carrying them in their sleeping bags to a village a few miles distant. Dorothy and French are imprisoned in a hut, while Johnson is thrown into a pot of boiling water and surrounded by shrieking savages as he meets his death. Stabbing their guard with a hunting knife, Arnold escapes with his bride before they share the same fate, the penalty for breaking the explorer's code.

WORLDS APART

Mrs. Fred Moreland Drama File No. 10447

AT the country club Willie's eyes had followed the lovely Ruby Gray. "Who is she?" he asked, and as they told him she was an English girl visiting Inez Shelton, Willie bit his lip. A moment later Inez saw him and ran to him. "Dance?" she asked laughing up at him, but as they moved across the floor Inez's eyes darkened as she saw Willie looking after the graceful pirouetting figure of her cousin, Ruby.

The following day Willie saw Inez and her cousin ride by on horseback, and as, impulsively he started to follow Inez cut Ruby's horse with her quirt. The animal crazed with pain, leaped forward, throwing Ruby violently to the train tracks. Instantly Willie flung himself to the ground, snatched up the unconscious girl a moment before the train rumbled by. "Let's get her to the hospital immediately," Willie urged, "she's hurt." "No," Inez broke in, "to my house." In the car Ruby opened pain-filled eyes and smiled up at Willie then her lids dropped heavily. The doctor looked grave and a nurse was procured. Willie left, stopping at the florist to send some flowers. It was strange that he knew, although he had never spoken to her, that he loved Ruby. For several days Willie called but Ruby was too ill to be seen, then one day he was admitted to her room, and as he looked down at the white face, she thanked him for saving her life. As the nurse indicated time was up, Willie went, promising to return next day. Inez watched him go with rage in her heart. For years she had been in love with Willie and now she had lost him to her cousin. The next day she met Willie at the door and explained that Ruby was worse and could see no one. To her mother who had never denied her anything in all her spoiled young life, Inez poured out her hatred of Ruby and shouted that the girl would have to leave. But the next day when Willie came the nurse admitted him and as he held Ruby's hand and learned that she had been better yesterday, his feelings broke through and he told her he loved her. It was madness, Ruby protested, they didn't know each other, but in the end she admitted that it was a madness she felt too, and with a kiss, Willie left. That night Inez came to see the sick girl for the first time, explaining sweetly that she had been so busy arranging for her wedding with Willie, that she had had no time to come before. Ruby remained staring at the ceiling and when the nurse came in, she cried out at the girl's high fever. Ruby moaned that she wanted to go home, and Inez facilitated her departure. Again and again Willie was turned away from the house by the always present Inez, but it was Lucille, maid in the Shelton household. who, unable to stand the deception longer, at the peril of her position, informed Willie that Ruby had been removed after Inez had lied about her forthcoming marriage to Willie. Aghast, Willie took passage on the next boat to London, determined to find the English girl, and explain. After two days a storm broke out and the ship, striking a submerged rock, sank. Adrift in a life boat, Willie was picked up and for ten days was delirious from exposure. But weak as he was he began his long search for Ruby and at last, in a park, found her. Together they returned to Willie's mother, and Inez, married to a widower, wrote asking for the forgiveness which, in their happiness, they willingly granted.

THE ANGEL OF THE SAGE BRUSH

Anonymous Drama File No. 10442

BUMPING wildly along the road, the covered wagon lost a wheel and crashed violently. Pity crept into the nurse's face as she bent over the bandaged figure of the pioneer woman, softly going out of the hospital room, she reassured

Gus Heller that his wife would soon be well and able to go on again. In the weeks that followed the childless Hellers marveled at the paticnce of the little nurse and when at last they continued their journey in the mended wagon, they promised to write to Betty and tell her how they were getting along in the great west. Months of arduous nursing followed for Betty and at last her health broke. The doctor advised her to go west, but Betty continued working until at last the Hellers' letter arrived and Betty reading of their loneliness and how much they wanted to see her, decided to take her doctor's advice.

At the desolate western village, Betty saw the Hellers waiting for her in their dilapidated car and as they gathered her close, Betty felt once again the warmth of having a mother and father of her own. From the first Betty helped with the work and the Hellers adored her. When it came time for her to depart, half-jokingly Gus asked why she didn't stake her claim to the adjoining strip of land—and Betty did. Joe Blakely, stalwart young westerner whose homestead was four miles to the north came to warn her this was no place for a woman, but remained to help her put up her fence and stake her claim, grumbling all the while that it wasn't safe for a woman alone. The Hellers, knowing that Joe and Betty were falling in love although neither realized it, smiled.

Then through a terrific storm, Joe plodded bringing Betty a dog for a Christmas present, and although she scolded him for having come out in such weather, her eyes were misty. A few days later, puzzled over Joe's failure to pay his regular visit, Betty went after him found him burning with fever. Heedless of appearances, she moved into his shack and day and night nursed him through a severe case of pneumonia. Thereafter Betty was kept busy administering to the Homesteaders. No distance was too far for her, no task too arduous and the grateful Homesteaders dubbed her the Angel of the Sage Brush.

The allotted three years having passed, Betty's claim was now hers without dispute, and hungry for sight of the East, she left. Touched by the elaborate farewell to their Angel, Betty soon began to long for the Sage Brush again, and when Joe wrote that Oil Prospectors were snooping about, Betty rushed back. Only she and Joe held out against the offers of the promoters and when an oil gusher was discovered on Betty's property, Betty thanked the wisdom of Joe who had again and again restrained her from accepting what seemed to her a fine price. Everyone came to congratulate the now wealthy Betty except Joe, and puzzled by his seeming indifference, she swallowed her pride and went to him. Only when she saw him sitting forlornly, and realized it was her fortune that was keeping him from her, Betty rushed into his arms. The Hellers rejoiced with the others for the Angel of the Sage Brush was home to stay.

MOTHER KNEW BEST

Rosa Makovec Drama File No. 10441

THE only child of wealthy, foreign born parents, pretty Ilse Steinau feels that her mother is selfish and old-fashioned when she discourages her from going to night clubs and gay parties. One morning while playing tennis, Ilse meets Dorothy Leyden, a vivacious dark-eyed girl who plays a swift and spectacular game. As they rest after the set, Ilse's eyes admiringly follow the other girl as she lights a cigarette and runs long fingers through her wavy hair. They become fast friends and from Dorothy Ilse learns all about the gaieties of the city. Ilse brings Dorothy home to dine with her, but from the first there is an antagonism between Mrs. Steinau and Dorothy who carelessly calls Ilse's mother old-fashioned when she notices her disapproval of smoking. After Dorothy has gone. Mrs. Steinau expresses her distrust of the girl but Ilse stoutly defends her new friend and continues to play tennis with her daily. On the courts Ilse introduces Dorothy to Max Fry, her fiance, but Dorothy's flip comments later make her feel for the first time that despite Max' consideration and tenderness, he is, after all, dull. On their way home Ilse admires an expensive dress, and stopping off at her father's office, she squeezes him with a bear hug and when resignedly he asks what she wants this time, she wheedles money for the dress, and wears it that night at a dance. She is an instant sensation and as men crowd about her, Ilse feels she has too long been deprived of the exciting things of life. Somewhat to her surprise Max arrives and Ilse knows that her mother has sent him to look after her. She tells him she doesn't need protection and just then Lloyd Weldon, one of Dorothy's friends cuts in. When Max starts to explain that Ilse is his fiancee, Lloyd laughs at him and they dance away leaving him standing in the center of the floor. That night the crowd goes to a night club, and Ilse dances every dance. It is six in the morning before she gets home and as she slips into her room she sees her mother, eyes red with weeping, look at her sorrowfully and retire without a word. Ilse sleeps through until three in the afternoon and the next evening her father brings friends home to supper and the inevitable discussion is postponed. The telephone rings and Ilse gaily promises to go with the crowd again. Her mother interferes, but Ilse weeps and convinces her father that Max has exaggerated because she refused to dance with him, and Ilse goes out with the crowd again. Ilse has a marvelous time going to theater and to the night club afterwards, but although she sees Lloyd frequently and becomes infatuated with him, she somehow cannot bring him home, knowing instinctively her parents will disapprove of him. With a hurt face, Max comes to remind her they were to be married in a few months but if she insists he will release her. Ilse thanks him sarcastically and Max goes, his goodbye almost inarticulate.

For weeks Ilse continues to meet Lloyd. Then one night they all have hot drinks, and Ilse gets so drowsy she falls asleep on the lounge. When she awakens she finds herself in a strange bedroom, the door locked. Panic-stricken she cries out and a key is turned in the door. An elderly woman enters and with hands on her hips explains that it is a shame for a nice girl like Ilse to have come in drunk with Lloyd Weldon. She wasn't going to have goings-on like that in her house and she sent Lloyd away. She is about to turn Ilse over to the police when the girl's tears win the landlady and Ilse calls a taxi and brokenly returns home in broad daylight. With trembling legs she makes her way unnoticed to her room, realizing sickeningly that her drink had been drugged. She falls asleep only to awaken with a scream that brings her mother running. The next few days Mrs. Steinau worries constantly about Ilse who, however, goes about with assumed bravado, and wheedling another dress from her indulgent father, Ilse determines to go back to the night club and confront Lloyd. However, when he sees her, he and Dorothy leave and one of the other men tells her to be careful of Lloyd, he'll drop her the moment he is through with her, as he has done innumerable young girls before her. Dully Ilse mingles among the dancers and that night she dances wildly, abandonly then wanders out to the terrace to let the cold air hit her fevered cheeks. At last she faints and the frightened management sends for her parents. The doctor diagnoses pneumonia and tells her grief stricken parents she is soon to have a baby. For weeks a day and night nurse as well as her parents are in constant attendance. Lloyd disappears. At last, wanly Ilse pulls through and Max, who has refused to come despite her calls, arrives at last when she begs to see him, and holding her hand tells her softly that he still loves her, and wants to marry her. Nobody suspects the child is not Max', and in the devotion of his wife, Max finds happiness.

HERITAGE

Cecelia Eggen Drama File No. 10423

JOINING the crew of a boat bound for the Jamestown Colony, young John Marshall bids farewell to his parents in England, and promises his sweetheart, Millicent Eames, that he will send for her as soon as he can. A severe storm rocks the little craft as it bravely crosses the sea, but at last it safely reaches the shores of the New World, in the spring of 1768. Hearing of the land claims the government is giving to settlers, James takes over several acres in the heart of the forest, and begins homesteading. With the slender savings which he has sewn in his clothing for safekeeping during the journey he buys a few cattle, and clears a pasture for them. The young man builds a log cabin near a stream on his property, and sends pressed flowers from the front yard to Millicent. The following year he earns enough through the sale of his cattle to send for her, and the two are married. In spite of the hardships of their rugged existence, they are happy as they work together. For safekeeping, John hides their money and valuable possessions in an iron chest beneath an oak tree which shelters their home. In the second year of their marriage a baby, David, is born. When the Revolutionary War is declared, John is called to arms, and one day a messenger tells Millicent that he is dead. The shock proves too much for her weak heart, and she, too, collapses and dies. Little David tries in vain to waken his mother, and when he cannot, wanders into the woods in search of help, clutching a picture of her and his father to his breast.

He becomes lost in the woods, and is picked up by a hunter who carries him home on horseback, many miles away. The hunter and his wife, when they cannot discover who the child's parents are, adopt him. More than half a century rolls by, and David's grandson, his education completed, has become an assistant to Burke Dennis, the eminent historian. While accompany him on an expedition through colonial territory, David is presented to Dolores Remington, a lovely New England girl, whose ancestry dates back to the first governor of the colony. He falls in love with her, and one day cannot resist telling her this; when she replies that she cares for him, as well, he relates the story of his grandfather's adoption, saying that he has no more idea of who his people are than an orphan. Dolores replies that she is interested in him, not remote ancestors, hut he further states that he has very little money, and cannot, in fairness to her, ask her to leave her luxurious home, much as he longs to marry her. The Dennis expedition takes David to territory where John once built his home. They discover a series of peculiar Indian graves, and begin excavations in hopes of finding further clues of this tribe, whose burial customs indicate a new source of study in America's background. While digging, they discover the iron chest buried years ago by John, and David sees a carefully framed photograph in this vault, identical with the one his grandfather has had since childhood. Showing this to David, senior, he is told that these must be his ancestors, and a trip to England confirms this fact, as his appearance is very like his relatives. whom he traces through names in the chest.

David wins an excellent position as a historian, and marries Dolores, but before he can tell his grandfather of his ancestors, the old man tells friends he is going to claim his glorious heritage in Heaven, and leaves them.

WHEN WOMEN PAY

Tillie Dowling Drama File No. 10334

WHEN Anna's mother leaves her father, saying that she can no longer put up with his unfaithfulness, the responsibility of looking after the family falls upon her shoulders, as she is the eldest girl. She cooks and manages the household, looking after her four younger sisters, and trying to keep peace between her hot-tempered father and five brothers. As the family grows older, they separate; Anna's father persuades her and her sister, Mildred to accompany him to New York, leaving Blanche, the baby of the family, with Pauline, and the boys on neighboring farms. Starting out in an old car, with very little money, they make the long, tiring trip, spending the night in empty school houses and barns, as they cannot afford to pay for lodging. When they arrive at the metropolis Anna's father looks up Mrs. Kate Kozlik, a widow, with whom he has carried on a correspondence since a chance meeting years ago, and takes the girls to her apartment. She secures employment for them in the cigar factory where she works, but tells their father that she does not wish them to remain in her home, and is critical in her attitude toward them. Anna informs her father that she and her sister will not allow this woman to take their mother's place, and that if he marries her they will leave him, but he will not give her up. The girls find their own apartment.

As she is leaving a motion picture house, alone, Anna slips, twisting her knee. Harry, an usher at the theatre, helps her home, and asks permission to call. The lonely girl welcomes the friendship of this attractive young man, and they are together every evening, following this. Anna learns that she is to become a mother, and tells Harry, who marries her secretly, and sends her to her sister, Albina, in a neighboring city. When their little son, Ronald, is born, Harry comes to her. The baby lives only a few months, but the following year their second child, a daughter, is born to Harry and Anna. Harry persuades Anna to remain with her sister, sending her money and visiting her frequently, although still working in New York. Officers arrest Harry one afternoon, as he is playing with his daughter, charging him with bigamy. He confesses that he has a wife and two children in New York but felt that he should marry Anna in order that people would believe she had the protection of his name, when the baby, Ronald, was expected. Tearfully bidding him farewell at the prison, Anna admits that she will always love Harry, but can never trust him again.

Taking her little girl with her, Anna goes to the home of her sister, Pauline, in the country, leaving word that Albina must never tell Harry what has become of her. She helps Pauline manage her poultry ranch, and they become very successful. A truck, passing the ranch, strikes Anna's little girl as she is returning from school and seriously injures her. As she lies, delirious, in the emergency hospital, the little girl calls for her father, and Anna wires to Albina to send for him, if she knows where to find him. When Harry comes, he tells Anna that his wife has secured a divorce and married another man. For months, he has searched for Anna and now asks her to take him back again, to which she agrees, and as soon as their child recovers they are reunited.

FRONT LINE

Ernest Mazzolini Drama File No. 10293

LEFT an orphan when he is little more than a baby, Luciano yearns for the love of a mother and father, which he has never known. He is adopted by his grandfather and grandmother, who are fond of him, but his Uncle Alphonso, who also lives with them, mistreats the boy, often beating him, and his Uncle Roland and Aunt Blanche took property belonging to his mother away from her, adding to her sorrows after the death of his father. In the tender affection of his grandmother, and the kindness of his Aunt Mary, the boy finds a solace for his unhappiness. He is sent to Holland to work, while he attends school; his employer drinks heavily, and mistreats the boy when he is under the influence of liquor. Luciano finds another place, and is happily situated until the war breaks out, and Austria, his native country, enters. Examinations are held for soldiers and workers in the cause; because of his youth, Luciano and his friends fall in the latter class. In the hopes that he will be declared unfit, the boy drinks wine in which tobacco has been soaked, and becomes desperately ill, but after a second examination he is declared "able," and sent with a group of others, all under eighteen, to the Barracks of Tonale. The boys face the fire of distant machine guns as they climb the mountains, and the even more treacherous dangers of melting snow, as they make their perilous ascent. Pete, Neno and Mario, are assigned to the same tent with Luciano, and the four become friends. When Neno is too weak to carry a heavy knapsaek, he is whipped, and suspended by his arms from a pole.

Unable to grasp a rope while ascending the peaks, because of illness, Luciano is brutally struck by his corporal. As he can no longer stand this inhuman treatment, he runs away, and is almost drowned while crossing a river, but at last reaches his grandmother and Aunt Mary, who had been notified by the War Department that he was dead. In a few days, he leaves them, saying that he is returning to the Alps, although he secretly resolves never to do this. He finds his friend, Pete, working on a farm, and through him secures employment. The manager discovers he is not strong enough to work in the fields and allows him to care for the Baron's horses. Anna, a lovely young peasant girl is kind to him, and they find, together, the bliss of first love. Before many weeks have passed, they plan to marry.

Their dreams are shattered when another examination is held, and Luciano is declared able to be a soldier. Those who are declared fit celebrate riotously, but Luciano knows how soon their cheers will die, when they face the reality of war. As he passes again through his village, Aunt Mary tells him that his grandmother, whom he loved more than anyone in the world, is dead. He is arrested and imprisoned for his desertion at Tonale, but later freed of the charge, as he was not a soldier at the time. Luciano undergoes strict training and discipline at the military camp at Linz The colonel who presided at his trial gives him twenty four days' leave; after stopping to see his Aunt Mary, he hastens to Anna, at Miran. To celebrate the birth of a son to the Empress, all leaves are doubled; Luciano returns to his village to have his papers signed, taking Anna. She is affectionately greeted by Aunt Mary, and Luciano is invited to bring her to Uncle Roland's home, but refuses, since his uncle had made no attempt to see him previously. In repentance, Uncle Roland ealls on him, and receives his forgiveness. Luciano and Anna return to Miran, their happiness clouded by thoughts of pending separation. As she sadly bids her lover farewell, Anna gives him a little silver ease, containing pictures of Christ and the Virgin.

Packed like animals in their box car, the soldiers at last reach the front, and the terrors of bombardment. The Italian troops attack, and Luciano, to save himself, kills one with his bayonet. The dead man falls over him, protecting him from a similar fate. He finds himself the only living person in the shell hole, and when he rejoins his regiment, discovers that only two hundred of the original eight hundred have survived, among them his school friend, Ernest. The storm troops join their battalion, but Luciano, who has received a wound in the thigh during the attack, is taken to the Red Cross Hospital near Miran. Anna and her mother come to visit him, until the major who inspects the hospital, rudely orders them away, and transfers Luciano to another village, but his sweetheart makes the long journey and visits him there. Gendenni, a patient in the next bed, shows Luciano how to snap the thermometer to apparently send his fever up, but eventually he is declared strong enough to again risk his life at the front, and sent back to his regiment. Rations are inadequate, and the soldiers face the terrors of war, half starved.

During one of the last battles of the war, Luciano falls, and dies in Ernest's arms from a shrapnel splinter in the temple, commending Anna to his care. When peace is declared a few days later, Ernest carries the tragic message to the girl, and asks her to become his wife. She refuses, as she can never love anyone but Luciano, and enters a convent, to hide her grief behind the sanctuary of its walls.

GYPSY FIRES

Francene Cole Drama File No. 10355

WISTFULLY watching the carefree bands of gypsies as they pass through her native town in Hungary, little Lavon Perry wishes that she might wear their gay costumes and join the happy life of these nomadic people whom she is descended from. When her mother is killed the little girl goes to America, to make her home with Mrs. Banky, an aunt. Arriving at the little Indiana town where she is to live, the child soon discovers that Mrs. Banky has taken her only through a sense of duty. Her days are filled with hard work and frequent punishments for slight mistakes. Billy, her cousin, is also unfriendly to her, but her aunt's husband kindly soothes the girl, and the two of them often steal a few moments together in the parlor, where Mr. Banky plays his violin, accompanied by Lavon on the piano. He tells the child she has musical talent which she should cultivate, but her aunt suggests that she find work in a factory as soon as possible. Billy develops whooping cough, and the task of nursing him falls to Lavon. Dr. Thomas Lord, the family physician, admires her skill in caring for Billy, and becomes attracted to Lavon, soon wishing to marry her. Although he is many years her senior, her aunt insists upon this union, and at sixteen, she becomes his wife. Little more than a child, she is unaccustomed to the gay, social life her husband leads, and feels ill at ease among his friends. When her baby dies shortly after birth, Lavon's health fails, and she is sent to a sanitarium in Denver, at the order of her physician, Dr. Mayers.

Left to himself, Dr. Lord soon seeks the company of other women, and neglects to write to his young wife. She slowly regains her health, and passes the time while convalescing in studying the violin. Naturally gifted, she delights the other patients with her music. After she is released from the hospital the girl is unwilling to return to her husband, and, with the money she has saved from household expenses, goes to a hotel in the country. A gypsy band camps across the road, and again, Lavon's old longings to join them posses her. When she tells them that she, too, is partially gypsy, and demonstrates her ability to play the violin, they welcome her to their number. As she travels over the country with them her delightful music and dark beauty attract many tourists to their fortune telling booths. Lavon persuades the gypsy girls to organize a band, which wins instant success. In the course of their wanderings they go to Lavon's home in Indiana, and she sees Dr. Lord on the street, but he does not recognize his frail wife in the radiant young woman who passes him. With a pang, Lavon knows she still loves her husband and always will. That night he comes to the fortune teller's tent; she whispers to the palmist to tell him of the wife he neglected, and her devotion to him, in spite of everything. Don, a young gypsy, makes love to Lavon, but she tells him she cares for someone else.

When Dr. Lord is told that his wife still cares he exclaims that he would give anything in the world to find her, as he, too, loves her. Lavon, who has been hiding behind the curtains, steps forward at this, and he takes his wife tenderly in his arms.

HIGHWAY MURDER

Marcus Clarke Drama File No. 10333

ARRESTED as he is driving to work, John Clarkson is charged with the murder of Jack Pierson, a gambler, whose body was found the night before in Lover's Lane, a notorious meeting place at the outskirts of town. He states that he was driving toward town after dinner when he stopped his car to take a young woman whom he knew with him, as she was waiting for the suburban train. When she told him that she was in a hurry, he turned the car through the short cut of Lover's Lane, but the engine stopped at that moment; in getting out to adjust the distributor with a pair of pliers, he saw a girl whom he recognized as Zella Martin, a dancer, dart swiftly across the road. Saying that this is all he knows of the case, and refusing to name the woman who accompanied him, John is warned that the case will go against him, as it is a recognized fact that he and Jack were rivals for the affections of Zella, and his gun and a handkerchief with his initials on its border were found beside the murdered man. Believing that his reelection depends upon his convicting John of this charge, District Attorney Adams tells his friends he will spare no efforts toward that end. Gail Winslow visits John, and begs him to allow her to confess that she was the woman in the car, but he refuses, reminding her that as they were once sweethearts, and her husband, the Honorable George Lyman Winslow, believed her to be at her sister's home, such a statement would be grossly misunderstood.

Securing the services of her lawyer, Gladstone Haywood, the most able attorney in the state, Gail confesses the truth to him, and is again counseled to remain silent, as the divorce that he is securing for her cannot be obtained if this evidence is revealed. At the trial, the coroner states that the two bullets found in the body of Jack Pierson corresponded in caliber to those missing from John's gun, which was found beside the murdered man. When John is cross examined by Adams he admits that for several months Zella was his mistress, and that he frequently quarreled with Jack, whom he met in a gambling hall, over the girl. Discovering that she was giving her attentions secretly both to Jack and his campanion, Duke Farson, John states that he resolved never to see her again, and to give up this mode of living, dvoting his time once more to his business, and seeking to regain his former place in the community as a respected citizen, advising Zella of this fact. Confirming his statements, John's mother and friends relate that for several months he had not seen Jack or Zella, but evidence is too strong against him, as he still refuses to name the woman in the case.

Following Zella to her home, Gail appeals to her, confessing her love for John, and begging the dancer to help her, but she is refused. Duke Farson, entering Zella's room in an intoxicated state, throws the girl to the floor, and tells her he is through with her. The next morning in court the infuriated Zella testifies that she stole John's gun from the shop of her brother-in-law, Jim Clements, where it was being repaired, and gave it, and one of his handkerchiefs to Duke, who murdered Jack with it. This evidence frees John, who hastens to Gail, obtaining her promise to marry him.

BROKEN VOWS

Elizabeth O'Connell Drama File No. 10432

DESPITE the misgivings of her family and of Walter Saunders who has always loved her, Betty Howard decides to get a position in town so that she can help her war-wounded father support his youngsters. A few weeks later she meets John Carew, a handsome older man and after the briefest of courtships, John asks Betty to marry him. Trembling with excitement, she brings him home to meet her family, but although her father is cordial and friendly, when Betty asks him what he thinks of John, her father takes her hand and tells her gently that she is too young to know whether she truly loves this man. Betty remembering John's urgent pleading that they be married immediately bites her lip, but when her father suggests that she wait one year—until she is nineteen, Betty promises. John sullenly goes back to his own town, claiming she couldn't really love him or she wouldn't want to wait, but a few days later Betty's father is killed and the little family grief-stricken, sell their house. John returns and induces Betty to marry him immediately. When Walter comes after arranging all her affairs for her, Betty tells him she is going to be married and seeing the dismay in the brown eyes that have always followed her adoringly, Betty turns to her packing.

It is a wistful and lovely bride, remembering all too vividly her broken promises to her father, who accompanies John to his home. Soon she is to discover that John is a hard drinker and that in his intoxicated moments he is capable of many cruelties. For several days Betty withholds her knowledge that she is to have a child because John has not come home sober, then one night she decides to tell him. That evening John comes home without the dreaded inflamed eyes and stumbling legs, and just as Betty begins to tell him he interrupts to ask her if she would mind if he adopted a baby. For the first time Betty realizes why her neighbors have gossipped every time she has gone by, and retiring to her own room she gives way to a paroxysm of weeping. Shortly afterwards Stella Andrews leaves town, the night after Betty has caught the girl in her husband's arms. The women in town speculate about who the father of Stella's child is, but locked within her heart Betty guards her knowledge. For the sake of her unborn child, Betty remains on with John and long before her two other children are grown, Betty's love for her husband is entirely extinguished.

Then one day in town she meets Walter again. Eagerly he seizes her hands and tells her she has grown lovelier than ever in her maturity. Walter has never married—his love for Betty being ever a part of him, and now, realizing that she is not happy with John, he tells her that if she ever wants him he will be waiting. She clasps his hand in understanding, and they part.

During one of John's binges, he strikes Betty and she falls up heavily against a shelf. Wincing with pain she says nothing for several weeks until the doctor urges an immediate operation. Coming wanly out of the ether, Betty sees the worried faces of her husband and the two younger children and as John whispers hoarsely, "Don't tell her," Betty's fears are aroused. At length she learns that John's neglect of the plowing machine has resulted in the death of Ray, their first born. Betty is unconsolable and when Anna gets married and Leslie leaves for school, Betty listens palely to the half-drunken mumbling of Stella Andrews who has come to plead that Betty release "her man." That night Betty begins action for divorce against John and as she leaves town, Walter comes to the station, and looking deeply into her eyes, tells her that he will still be waiting, when she comes back. . . .

LAUREL TO THE VICTOR

Cecelia Paccione Drama File No. 10424

RACING up the walk, Gordon Allen flourishes the ticket he has for his mother to attend his graduation ceremonies. Surprised at her failure to reply to his call with her customary cheery smile, Gordon runs through the house looking in every room, panic creeping into his voice. Aghast he sees a heap on the bedroom floor and sees the still figure of his mother outstreched. The boy rushes blindly through the streets, drags the doctor to his home, and as the medical man raises grave eyes and pronounces, "Sorry son. Heart attack," Gordon gives way to a paroxysm of grief. The honors he is accorded at the commencement exercises are empty, and selling his home, he reads of opportunities in Florida and embarks immediately upon a boat making a coastwise trip.

Aboard the boat his attention is caught by a beautiful girl who is traveling with a man and an older woman. Once she notices his intent look, and drops her eyes embarrassed. Then a sudden squall breaks out and Gordon, rounding the deck, hears a cry and sees the girl swept overboard. While the man with her stands paralysed, shouting to stop the boat, Gordon flings himself overboard and rescues the girl. Willing hands pull the drenched pair aboard, and assured the girl is all right, Gordon retires to his cabin. At dinner that night, the boy Gordon has noticed with her, comes over and extending his hand says he is Leslie Brooks and wants to thank Gordon for saving his sister's life. Gordon visibly brightens and his heart leaps to his throat when Leslie introduces him to Ruth and his mother. The remainder of the trip Gordon and Ruth are together constantly and when they dock they plan to see more of each other. Gordon takes rooms and finds a position. He is dressing to call upon Ruth when he hears a faint cry for help, followed by a shot. Rushing across the hall he sees a man lying wounded on the floor a gun beside him. A moment later the police break in and when Gordon explains that he came in answer to the shot, they look at him with obvious suspicion and arrest him. The wounded man tells that he was held up by three masked men, shot when he attempted an outcry and the men ran off. He guesses this one was left. Gordon repeats his protestations of innocence.

Meanwhile Ruth, dismayed by the arrest of Gordon, is disconsolate. Her brother shrugs and says that's what happens when you trust strangers, but Ruth flares up and refuses to believe Gordon is guilty. Leslie, decides his sister needs cheering and induces her to come out with him. At the night club, however, she cannot stand the music, and retires to the rest room. As she is coming out, she overhears three men discussing their plan to hold up someone and get the other hundred dollars they need, the other holdup having netted them three hundred and forty seven dollars. With a start Ruth realizes that is the sum purported to have been stolen by Gordon's supposed confederates. Hastily she sends for the police and three plain clothesmen foil the new holdup, search the men and find the billfold taken from the wounded man. Gordon is released and finding Ruth waiting for him he takes her in his arms and asks an important question.

HAPPY DAYS

Valerie Protsky Short Subject File No. 10363

FATHER TIME decides to hold court in his palace in the clouds. The Sun, represented by a tall, golden-haired girl, kneels before him first, and stating that she is the life of all beings, takes her place at his side. She is followed by her brunette sister, the Moon, who announces that she is the foe of darkness and guards all lovers. Another lovely blonde girl, representing the Stars, states that she is the hope of the world and the fate of everybody, as she completes the semi-circle around Father Time's throne. Raising his scythe, Time summons the days of the week, who dance before him gracefully. Then, in turn, each appears before his throne. Monday tells him that she is blue because she follows Sunday, and can't get down to work. She then presents Monday night, who is sad, because, although she is as old as the world, no one has given her a name. Tuesday, smiling more brightly than Monday, introduces Tuesday night, another nameless girl. Wednesday, in a state of expectancy, is followed by her night, and Thursday, stating that the worst of the week is past, presents Thursday night. Friday, dressed in a golden gown, announces that she represents material wealth, for she is payday. Friday night, who follows her, laments the fact that she, too, has not been given a name. Saturday smiles gaily as she steps forward, and Saturday night, in spite of her merriment, requests a title. Sunday and Sunday night are the happiest of the group, but Sunday night, in the midst of her joy, regrets her namelessness.

Decreeing that the nights have earned a right to their own names, Father Time commands the Sun, Moon and Stars to christen them. Monday night is called Valenight, Tuesday, Loodnight, Wednesday, Kysnight, Thursday, Feebsnight, Friday, Hannight, Saturday, Dramnight and Sunday, Liesnight, as each kneels in turn before Time's handmaidens. Time then decides to change the divisions between night and day, using six o'clock as the dividing line in place of noon and midnight. Parting the clouds, Time and his court watch the effect of this change upon earth-dwellers. A mother puts her little boy to sleep at four o'clock, in spite of his protests, as she tells him that it will be midnight in two hours. Office workers go to luncheon at six in place of noon, and theatres open at two, until the time division is understood. Soon, however, people adjust to the programme, and each expresses satisfaction that morning begins shortly after sunrise in place of in the dark, and night logically starts when the sun goes down. Confusion changes to agreement that Father Time has made a wise decision, and even clocks on steeples extend their hands in congratulation.

Each day of the week and corresponding night demonstrates the effectiveness of the new schedule by showing Father Time in his crystal ball how the people she watches over are benefitted at work and play by this change. Following these pantomimes, each girl sings a brief song and dances in tribute to Time's judgment. The Sun, Moon, and Stars sing "Happy Days," a song rejoicing, and the rest of the court joins in the chorus, dancing as they sing, while Father Time smiles and nods wisely. The song is taken up by earth dwellers, as they pursue their various occupations.

KIMBERLY

Frank Purdes Drama File No. 10439

COMMISSIONED to investigate diamond smuggling at the Kimberly mines, Captain Bailey Rholford of Scotland Yard boards a steamer for Cape Town, Africa. On board, he renews his acquaintance with Elizabeth and John Marlin, whom he met at a dance in London, shortly before his company was sent to the front. She tells him that she is going to marry Herbert Delmont, the owner of a rubber plantation near Cape Town. The three separate when they leave the ship, expressing the wish that they will soon meet again; John and Elizabeth hire native guides to take them to Herbert's plantation, while Bailey reports to headquarters. The guides lead the two into their own village where they are taken prisoners, but Bailey, on an expedition through the forest, finds Elizabeth's scarf, and traces her to the village, forcing the natives to release the girl and her brother as they are being taken to the center of the habitation, to be put to death. Thanking their benefactor, the two continue on their way. Elizabeth is horrified to find Herbert under the influence of liquor and living with a native woman. Finding he no longer cares for her, she breaks her engagement, but as a native uprising takes place, it is impossible for the Marlins to leave immediately. Bailey comes to call on his friends, and notices an uncut diamond with a curious cross mark on its surface, lying on the table. He examines it, but says nothing.

With the aid of native spies, Bailey traces losses at the mines to agents of Herbert. Natives, apparently selling vegetables to the mine workers, bribe them to smuggle the diamonds to them, concealing them in their hair, Bailey is told, but he cannot establish conclusive evidence. As the standard of the diamond market is dropping steadily, he feels he has not a moment to lose, and, remembering the diamond he saw at Herbert's plantation, realizes that its cross mark had been placed there at his instigation, as all diamonds officially released had this mark polished off, so that they could be distinguished from the contraband gems. Ordering a complete inspection of boxes of crude rubber sent out from Herbert's plantation, and in opening two boxes marked with black strips for purposes of indentification, he discovers a small steel tube in each, cleverly concealed in the wood. Opening the tubes, Bailey finds each filled with uncut diamonds, none of which have been officially released. Before he can arrest Herbert, one of the men in the smuggler's employ rushes to him, and tells him that Bailey will soon expose his crime. Desperately, Herbert plans to kidnap the Scotland Yard man; at his command Bailey is seized by a group of natives as he is on his way to headquarters, and taken to the jungle where preparations are made to burn him at the stake. He threatens the natives with punishment from his government if they carry out their plans, and one of them decides to report this to Herbert. Elizabeth overhears this conversation, and, relating it to John, hurries with him to police headquarters. The two of them lead police agents to the spot where Bailey is bound, and rescue him just as flames curl up about him. Charged with smuggling diamonds and attempting to murder Bailey, Herbert is taken into custody, and subsequently given a life sentence at the penitentiary.

When Bailey regains consciousness after his rescue, Elizabeth tells him that she loves him, and he replies that he has wished to marry her since the first day he saw her, in London, years ago. As the two lovers and John sail back to England, they plan an early wedding.

FROM ALL HAPPINESS

Rebecca Churtz Drama File No. 10372

SUNDAY is the happiest day of the week for Charles Bolton; after teaching his Bible Class at the Methodist Church he listens to Mary his wife, as she sings in the choir, and they walk home together through the streets of their little Ohio town, as contented as the day they were married over sixteen years ago. Their fifteen year old son, Drinkle, overtakes them, and the three spend a quiet afternoon in their comfortable home, enjoying visits from their many old friends, and concluding the peaceful day with songs, as they gather around Mary at the piano. Drawn closely together by their devotion to one another, they feel that nothing can dispel their happiness. Earle Gray, a lawyer, and his wife, Christine become acquainted with the Boltan's through their three young sons who attend school with Drinkle. The Gray's home life is as peaceful and happy as that of the Bolton's; husband and wife are apparently mutually in love, and both vitally interested in the welfare of their children. Having much in common, the two families become fast friends, playing bridge, picnicking and dancing together, until one day Earle, finding Mary alone in the garden, makes love to her. Although she fights against it, Mary finds herself drawn to this brilliant lawyer, whose sophistication and suavity are the antithesis of her husband's frank, rugged qualities. At last she admits that she loves him, and reveals this fact to Charles, asking him to grant her a divorce.

Desiring his wife's happiness above all else, Charles grants her this request, but Christine bitterly contests Earle's suit for divorce. Determined to have his freedom, he hires a man to break into his home and then bribes the servants to testify that she has been carrying on a clandestine affair with this stranger. Eventually, he wins his point, but as there is some doubt created in the minds of the jurors, Christine is given partial custody of the boys and awarded sufficient alimony to care for them and herself. The huge Gregory home is retained by Earle; Christine takes the boys to a cottage in another part of the town. Earle tells Mary that he must attend to some business in Cleveland before they can be married. While he is away, he is injured in an automobile accident and taken to the hospital. Here he becomes attracted to his pretty nurse and, upon recovering, marries her, returning with his bride to his former home. When she sees how cruelly she has been deceived, Mary informs Earle that she will sue for breach of promise, as she is desperately in need of funds, and will not take money from Charles. Earle sends her a check which she accepts; shortly after this he is killed in a second accident.

His mind temporarily upset by the loss of his wife, Charles becomes desperately ill. Mary longs to see him, but feels that she cannot face him, after the unhappiness she has caused her husband. Searching desperately for weeks, she at last finds work as a seamstress in a designer's shop, and she goes home at night to her lonely room, gazes wistfully at the pictures of her son and husband, dreaming of the days when they were together, their lives untouched by scandal and grief. In repentance, she thinks of Christine and her sons, wondering how so much sorrow could come to both families, and severely censuring herself. The doctor despairs of saving Charles' life, and Drinkle, going to his mother, begs her to come. She hastens with the boy to Charles' bedside, and begs him to forgive her; he replies that there is nothing to forgive between them, but that his happiness will be restored if she will return to him. Mary assures him that there is nothing she wishes more than this, but soon after these words, her husband dies, holding her hand. Taking her son in her arms, Mary resolves that his life, at least, shall be protected from further unhappiness.

HEAR DEM DARKIES

Wylmah Downing Comedy Drama File No. 10395

WATCHING the sun cast its final rays over the Mississippi Valley as they sit on the porch of their little shack, Old Jerry and his wife, Dehlia wait for Black Annie, the youngest of their nineteen children to come home for supper. Slowly the handsome darkie girl crosses the cotton field where she has been working, dragging "One Eyed Aggie," as she calls her hoe, after her, singing a mournful melody as she goes. After supper she joins the neighbors as they sing the ballads of the old south and dance together in a plantation cabin. Annie's sparkling brown eyes tantalize many of the young swains, and she gaily flirts with all of them, at last going home to sleep on her corn shuck mattress in her bare little room. The next day the girl is again crossing the cotton field at noon, fanning herself with her old felt hat and singing "That Sweet Watermillion," homeward bound. As she passes the graveyard, bravely ignoring superstition, she hears the melodious notes of a guitar, and, in terror, looks to see who is there. When she discovers a young negro seated by a tombstone her confidence returns, and rolling her eyes proficiently, she asks him who he is. "I'se the Gitar King," he modestly replies, and tells her that he came from New Orleans on a banana boat.

From that moment on, Annie loses her heart to him. Taking him with her to dances, on fishing trips, and to revival meetings at the little rustic church, she spends every moment when she is not at work, and many minutes when she should be in the cotton field, in his company. He is nicknamed "Big Six" and becomes a favorite in the town because of his prowess at drinking other darkies under the table, and playing more melodiously than any of the local musicians. Fearing she is losing him to Sally, an attractive competitor, Annie becomes desperate. Deciding that if she had more attractive clothes she could win his love, she goes to town and picks out a gay pink dress with much ribbon and lace trimming, but she lacks two dollars of the price, four ninety-eight. Annie goes to Tom, an unprepossessing neighbor with one front tooth missing, and the father of six children. Innocently rolling her eyes and smiling at him, she cajoles him into granting her request, but Big Six sees her on the porch of Sam's home, flirting with him, and does not meet her at their usual place by the willow tree. Heartbroken, the girl looks for him, and, sobbing bitterly, tells her father that the man she loves is gone. Fetching Tom with him, Jerry goes to the waterfront, and the two stop Big Six as he is boarding a boat for New Orleans. When they explain Annie's purpose in going to Tom, Big Six tells Jerry he loves his girl, and they return to the cottage.

Jerry and Dehlia sell their heifer yearling, giving the fifteen dollars to their child for a wedding present. She wears the pink dress, a gift from Tom, when she is married, spending her money on accessories. After a gay wedding celebration, the young couple go down south, with Annie's present as a means, and her parents return to their cottage, hoping Annie will find the same joys that they have known, together.

ABDUCTION

Maude D. Belote Melodrama File No. 10482

WHEN Alice Myers reads that her childhood sweetheart, William Lane, has married Doris Lee she angrily throws the newspaper to the floor, and in a jealous rage, swears that she will have revenge for this; her brother reminds her that before Lane became a successful engineer she was not particularly anxious to marry him, but she ignores this truth. Two children, Bob and Joyce, are born to the Lanes. Behaving in the traditional manner of the woman scorned, Alice has the little girl kidnapped; the country is combed for a trace of Joyce but she cannot be found. Overcome with grief, Doris dies, and the little girl's disappearance remains a mystery, as no one suspects Alice. When the furor has died down, Alice places the child in an orphanage, giving her the name of Jean Lynn. Another foundling, Joy, who closely resembles Joyce in appearance, becomes her closest friend. As she is dying, Alice confesses her sin, and William sends for his daughter, now seventeen, to come to him at once. Unwilling to leave her dearest friend, Joyce persuades Joy to run away with her, saying that she may be able to persuade her father to welcome them both into his home. Their train is wrecked, and Joyce is killed, but Joy escapes injury. Greeting her at the station, Lane and his son conclude that Joy is Bob's sister, since she resmebles baby pictures of Joyce, and the girl cannot bear to destroy their great happiness at this reunion, by telling them the truth.

Ralph and Ray, college friends of Bob, come to visit him; Ralph falls in love with Joy or Joyce, as she is now called, and urges to marry him saying that he believes Ray will become Bob's wife after his sister finds a home of her own, but she refuses him, secretly loving the young man who believes he is her brother, and feeling that he, too cares for her. William Lane dies suddenly of heart failure, leaving a large portion of his estate to Joy, as he thinks she is his daughter. Realizing that her innocent deception has gone too far Joy leaves a note explaining everything to Bob, and stating that she will never see him again. Knowing now that he loves his "sister," Bob tries vainly to find Joy. Alone in New York, Joy becomes acquainted with May Davis, who lives in an adjoining apartment, and introducing herself as Jane Gray, asks May how she can find a position. Confiding that her husband deserted her, and she is soon to become a mother, May arranges for Joy to take her place as a mannequin, and the two girls share the same apartment; a few months later, May's baby is born. Joy's employer forces his attentions on the girl until she is forced to leave her position, and becomes a cabaret singer in a night club. Returning home late, she finds her former employer attempting to take May in his arms, and when May shoots him, Joy insists on taking the blame for the baby's sake. Tom Stone, a young attorney, defends Joy and as her employer recovers, the girl is fully acquitted. Becoming interested in her, Tom secures a loan through a friend of his, and advances it to Joy, so that she may study music.

A few years later, Joy becomes a successful concert singer. Accompanying his friend, Tom, Bob Lane hears the girl who, through Tom's plans, has been his protege, as he loaned the money for her training. Bob is enchanted with her voice and appearance, and goes back stage to greet her. When she turns to thank her benefactor, recognition is mutual, and Bob is not long in persuading Joy to give up her career and become his wife, when she finds he cares as much as she for him.

NUGGET

Spencer E. Lloyd Western File No. 10337

TAKEN to the Explorer's Club by his friend, Walter Beech, when he visits New York, after selling cattle at Chicago, George Farley is introduced to Jeff Carne, another old Westerner, and the two exchange stories of the early days. George asks his friend why he carries a small gold nugget with him at all times, and his friend takes him back thirty years, in memory, as he relates the tale behind the good luck piece. He had just been appointed to the Indian agency at Fort Wingate, in the spring of 1903. Eager to know someone of his nationality, he makes friends with Chris Severt, who holds a similar position at the neighboring Shiprock Agency. While the two are riding together they come upon an old man, shabbily dressed, with flowing white beard, lying upon the ground, the victim of an arrow shot. Hastily taking him home, they remove the arrow, which has a peculiar rounded point, and try to dress the wound, but it is so large that they cannot staunch the flow of blood, and the stranger dies before morning. In going through the old man's clothing, in hopes of identifying him, they discover only a few pieces of gold flecked quartz. George has these assayed, and finds they are valued at forty thousand dollars a ton. They search for a mine close to where the man was found, but discovering a blood-soaked saddle, concludes that he may have been shot many miles away. During the following winter Indians begin to pay their bills at both agencies with gold nuggets, and again Chris sets out to the find the mine, and never returns.

Dick Mason, an adventurous youngster, is sent to take his place at the agency; at the same time George's sister Elva, comes to the Fort to visit her brother. Winning the title of "Hell on Wheels" because of his boldness in dealing with the Indians, Dick is respected for his fairness in dealing with them. He openly accuses one of them of selling liquor to his younger brother, but none of the Navajos harm him, and when one of them is caught in a terrific blizzard, and rescued by Dick, his gratitude is expressed by little services he performs around the agency store. Elva, who prepares hot soup for the partially frozen old man, also wins his loyalty. Motioning him to follow, he takes Dick to a spot near the headwaters of the Rio Puerco and Rio Salado Rivers, and here he finds the skeleton of Chris Severt, lying by a cliff that is yellow with gold dust, underneath a ledge of quartz. The Indian guides him home by a circuitous route, taking four days for the trip, so that he loses the trail. Confiding these happenings to George, the two young men set out secretly to find the mine, going north, then west into Arizona, thence east again into New Mexico. They awake one morning to find an arrow drawn in the sand, with two nuggets at its head, and a knife at the base of the shaft, but Dick accepts the challenge by placing two silver dollars at the head, and six bullets in the place of the knife. Both young men pocket a nugget, and continue. Just before they reach the supposed location of the cliff, Indians spring up from the rocks, and surround their camp fire, but at that moment, Elva, who has been searching for them with their Navajo friend and a detachment of cavalry from Fort Wingate, appears, and conducts them back to safety, and shortly after is present at the wedding of Elva and Dick.

In concluding his story, George adds that he has always carried nuggets as a reminder to stay in his own territory, and Walter nods in agreement at this wisdom.

THE HAND OF FATE

Mary Helen Livingstone Drama File No. 10421

MOUNTING her favorite horse, Silver, Ruth Cummings rides swiftly through the mountain trails surrounding her home. When a spotted faun crosses the trail, Silver is frightened and dashes recklessly toward a rocky ridge, in spite of Ruth's efforts to check him. The girl loses consciousness as he approaches the edge of the cliff, but Mike Livingstone, a recent settler in the community, dashes to her rescue on his horse Midnight, and takes her in his arms when she falls to the ground, checking Silver's reckless plunge with a restraining hand. Ruth discovers that her arm is broken and she has received a cut on the temple; these injuries are treated at the home of Mike's parents, who are immediately won by the girl's charming manner. The next day Mike takes Ruth to her home, while the disgraced Silver follows behind, forgiven by his mistress, and the young man becomes a frequent caller. When Mike asks Ruth to marry him, and she accepts, both families are delighted. Confessing to his fiancee that his one vice in the past has been gambling, Mike promises to renounce this vicious habit, and Ruth readily forgives him, but warns him that he must keep his word in this respect. Ed Downing, a neighbor who has loved Ruth for years, advises Mike that he can win a large stake if he will come to the Burning Bell, the town gambling hall, with him in the evening. Unable to resist the temptation, Mike finally agrees.

The young man takes his place at the table besides Ed and Bat Eye, his accomplice, who has won this title because of blindness in his closed right eye, brought on during a battle over cards. Soon realizing that Ed and Bat Eye are cheating, Mike accuses them, but Ed draws a gun, and, laughing scornfully, tells him that everyone at the table has been hired to help win all of his savings in order that Ruth may realize that her fiancee is unable to keep his bargain. Mike wrenches the gun away from Ed, but he draws a knife, and the two struggle. One of Ed's accomplices turns out the lights, and the entire group join in the fight. Whispering to him, someone warns Mike that the sheriff is approaching, and he must leave; as he follows this advice, he sees that Ed and Bat Eye are lying on the floor, mortally wounded. Hastily mounting Midnight, Mike escapes through the darkness. In the days that follows, he becomes a fugitive disguising his features behind a beard, and remaining only a few days in each town, continually watchful and haunted, yet not daring to return to his home as he knows the disgrace his arrest would bring to his parents and Ruth. As he sadly watches the setting sun, Mike wishes that he, too, might sink to oblivion, and at last resolves to give himself to authorities, hoping that they will believe in his innocence. Overcome by the shock of her son's disappearance, Mike's mother lies at the point of death, tenderly cared for by Ruth, but when she sees her boy again she smiles happily, before closing her eyes forever.

Bat Eye confesses that he stabbed Ed, whom he had hated since he lost his savings at a card game in which Ed cheated him, years ago. Immediately after signing this confession, he dies, and Ed, realizing that he cannot live much longer, tells Ruth that he persuaded Mike to break his promises by assuring him that he could win money which he needed in order to marry her. When Mike presents himself to the sheriff, these confessions bring about his release, and the forgiveness of his fiancee. Ruth and Mike are married; a few years later twins are born to them. The little daughter is named Polly, in memory of Mike's mother, and thankful that the hand of fate has once more been kind to him, Mike never again gambles with his happiness.

MURDERS AT LARGE

Billie Buckel Melodrama File No. 10375

POLICE, discovering the bodies of six young girls who attended Belfery High Boarding School, are unable to find clues which will account for the murderer or his motives. One of the students informs them that the girls slipped away, against the rules of the exclusive school, to go riding, and were not seen again. They were found, in a badly mutilated condition, on the grounds of a mansion, formerly owned by an English Lord, situated just across the Canadian border. In searching the mansion, a letter signed by Timothy Osbourn, a once famous surgeon who left the country years ago, is found. Nan Peters, a young reporter and a graduate of the school, tells her friend, Bob Manning, an aviator, that she means to solve the mystery. When he laughs at this, and teases her, she becomes angry, and quarrels with him. That evening she promises to marry Tom Herrington, a medical student, and a quiet and industrious boy, but later writes him a note, breaking the engagement, as she loves Bob. Nan and Bob attend dinner at Belfery Hall that evening, but she is very cool to him, determined that he must take her work seriously. Conversation centers on the murder in spite of all efforts not to talk about it continuously, and Nan states that Dr. Osbourn was a friend of her father, whom he trusted completely. Bob offends her again when he discovers that Nan is carrying an automatic pistol, and cannot restrain his laughter. At the conclusion of the dinner, Tom calls at the Hall and requests Nan to go for a short ride with him, as he wishes to discuss something of importance with her. Wishing to apologize for breaking her engagement, Nan gladly complies.

Later, Bob searches for Nan in the garden, hoping to end their quarrel, and persuade her from continuing in her detective work, as he believes it to be too dangerous. He finds a slip a paper bearing the names of the six murdered students, and Nan's, written at the end of the list. Hastily jumping in his car, he speeds toward the mansion, and finds Nan, wounded, in the garden. She tells him that she will be all right, but he must pursue Tom, who is in the house. After placing his sweetheart in the car, Bob breaks into the mansion and hunts for Tom, at last finding him in the cellar, where he has constructed a laboratory. Fiendishly, his eyes glazing, Tom, seizes him, and attempts to stab him with a huge knife. Nan recovers sufficiently to drive to the next residence and summon the police, who reach the mansion as Tom and Bob are struggling, and arrest the former, while Nan and Bob are rushed to the hospital, and treated for their injuries. At the trial, it is revealed that Tom is a nephew of Dr. Osbourn. When his famous uncle died in England the boy determined to surpass his reputation, and studied his medical books assiduously. He became obsessed with the idea of transferring a human heart, while still in action, into the body of someone who had just died, thus reviving them, and when he was sent to Canada as a student, resolved to attempt this mad scheme. Inviting the six girls at the boarding school for a ride, he made them the victims of this plan, but as it failed, selected Nan. As he attempted to force her into the mansion she shot at him, and he ran away. His confession ended, the young man pleads insanity, but before the trial is concluded, breaks away from the guards and leaps from his cell window to death. Agreeing with Bob that she no longer wishes to be a detective, Nan promises to take over the position of becoming his wife.

OUR BACHELOR BROTHER

Sadie De Groot Drama File No. 10354

TEASINGLY referred to as their bachelor brother by the two older Crane boys, Jack, the youngest member of the family, replies that he will never marry until he finds a woman who can equal his mother. When he discovers that his father has drawn two hundred dollars out of the bank without mentioning it to Mrs. Crane, and that he is receiving bills from the jeweler at his office, Jack becomes suspicious, and, opening one of them, discovers that Mr. Crane has purchased an expensive bracelet. Julia Lane, an attractive young woman who lives next door, calls frequently to see Jack's mother, but the boy observes that her visits are very brief when his father is not at home, and is not surprised when he finds her seated upon his lap one day. Observing that the girl is wearing a new bracelet, he draws his father aside and frankly questions him, confessing that he has opened his mail while alone in the real estate office. Although ashamed, Mr. Crane tells his son that he feels there is no harm in a little innocent pleasure with Julia; Jack warns him that she is unscrupulous and begs him to consider Mrs. Crane, but he will not listen to the boy. Mary, Julia's younger sister, encounters Jack alone in the back yard of his home and, telling him that she knows what is troubling him, offers to help in any way she can to separate Julia and his father, but he does not know whether or not he can fully trust the girl. Later, Mr. Crane employs her as a secretary in his office. The doctor orders Jack's frail little mother to take a rest at a resort in the mountains, and the boy persuades his father to send him with her.

Mary writes daily to Jack, telling him that much as she regrets carrying tales she feels that he should know that his father is giving a succession of parties at his home during their absence and is constantly in the company of Julia. Jack wires that he and his mother will return to their home Sunday evening, and going to Mr. Crane, Mary tries vainly to persuade him to send away guests he has invited for a riotous house party. As she is pleading with him, his wife and son enter, and seeing her in the midst of this group of people, Jack's suspicions are again aroused, and he is in doubt as to the truth of her explanation. Cynical because of his father's conduct and Julia's treachery, Jack decides to remain a bachelor. Heartbroken, Mrs. Crane's health fails rapidly; her husband begs to be allowed to see her, and at first Jack refuses, but touched by the sincere grief in the older man's eyes, and believing his promise that he will not see Julia again, as it will bring his wife unhappiness, the boy relents. As the two stand by Mrs. Crane's bedside, she asks her husband to be good to her boy, and passes away. Several months later, still infatuated with Julia and wishing to forget the past, Mr. Crane marries her. She soon exhausts his savings in a series of parties and reckless spending, and threatens to leave him.

Advising Jack that Mary tried valiantly to warn him against her sister, Mr. Crane tells his son that the younger girl has been his loyal friend. His doubts cast aside, Jack asks her to marry him, and his entire family is surprised when he ends his bachelor days. Ashamed of her past indiscretions, Julia tells Mr. Crane that she will help him to regain his former position, guided by the example of her sister's life.

STOCK MARKET

John Budris Drama File No. 10474

JIM NORTON eagerly leaves his position at the factory when his friend, Roger Harrison, secures a place for him with the Clayton and Company Brokerage Office, one of the largest of its kind in New York. The young man's first duties are to mark up the lightning quick changes of the stock quotations on a huge blackboard, as they appear on the ticker tape. Excitedly, he tells Ruth Carrol, his friend, who is employed as a hat check girl at the Club Mirador, that his career has just begun, someday he will hold an important position in the firm. She warns him to win his success by honest labor rather than speculation, but in spite of himself, Jim feels the urge to try his hand at the market. He makes a number of small investments of five and ten shares, familiarly termed "cats and dogs," with another house. Roger points out an attractive young woman seated at the exchange, and tells him she is Helen Vinson, of their most capable customers. He adds that she made fifteen thousand dollars the previous week, and has a bank balance of eighty thousand; presumably someone who knows the market from the inside advises her. When Helen turns her ankle one afternoon, Jim assists her to her home, and the two exchange greetings every day, following this incident. Helen plainly shows that she is interested in Jim, inviting him to parties at her home occasionally. He picks up an envelope which she drops, and finally opening it, reads an unsigned statement, advising her to purchase shares in Watson Electric.

Following this advice himself, Jim purchases two hundred shares, presumably at 75, but when he finds it has sold at 74 afterwards fears that he will be sent to the penetentiary if the stock continues to drop. At first it goes down to 73, but then, as it is operated by a pool, soars to 95, and Jim finds that he has made four thousand dollars in one afternoon. His elation decreases when he is summarily dismissed from his position, but he decides hereafter to devote himself to the market. Jim's success in the next few years is phenomenal; he forgets Ruth in the new life that his sudden wealth brings to him, and even when the market crashes in 1929, Jim still retains a bank balance of five thousand dollars, while hundreds of other speculators lose everything. With this, he purchases shares in Central Copper, and when his brokers inform him that more margin is needed, he desperately tries to find additional capital. At last, he recalls Helen, and finding that she is in Atlantic City, arranges to meet her. She agrees to lend him fifteen thousand dollars, as he requests, if he will marry her, as she must have a husband before she is twenty-five years of age in order to gain her inheritance of one hundred thousand dollars, left by an eccentric uncle. As it is essential for him to have this money in order not to lose everything, he signs a contract which she hands him, without reading it, and goes through with the ceremony. Jim discovers to his horror that his wife is apparently addicted to drugs, among her other dissipations, and is utterly faithless to him. Seeking consolation, he goes to the Club Mirador, and finds himself in Ruth's room the next morning. She explains that as he was too much under the influence of liquor to be responsible she brought him here. Jim tells Ruth he has always loved her, and pours out his troubles to the sympathetic girl, who confesses that she cares for him, and gives him all her savings of four thousand dollars, which he invests in Winthrop Steel, at last clearing eighteen thousand. Jim repays Helen's loan, but she refuses to divorce him, saying that the paper he signed agrees that he will never start proceedings against her, and, in a jealous rage, she shoots him. When Jim regains consciousness at the hospital, Ruth tells him that his wife died of heart failure, brought on by her overwrought emotions. Gladly, Ruth promises to nurse him back to health, and both agree there shall be no more stock market in their future together.

RECORD FLIGHT

Harold E. Hicks Drama File No. 10165

ENTRUSTED by his father, a skipper with the captaincy of the small sailing vessel, "The Polar Bear," Will Holden incurs the envy of his older brother Tom who leads the crew to mutiny and abandons Will on a small boat. Will is rescued but when Tom, the only survivor of "The Polar Bear," which had subsequently struck an ice float and sunk, returns he tells a false story of the incident, and Will, realizing that his father and everybody else holds him accountable for the disaster flees to America where he marries and has a son, Bill, in whom the spirit of adventure throbs.

Years later, Tom, smarting under the sting of remorse, under the name of Billings makes a fortune and ever fleeing to escape his own conscience lands in Hawaii, where he becomes friendly with Lord Grayson, an English aristocrat, his daughter Betty, and the Baron Ashbury, Betty's unwilling fiance. To Hawaii too, comes his nephew, Bill in army service. When the controls of the plane in which the Graysons, Tom and the Baron have gone up for a look at the active volcano Mt. Waikishi become fouled, Bill climbs out on the wings and saves the plane although he is himself swept off to fall unconscious on the edge of the crater. Tom pales as he discovers the brave young mechanic is his brother's son, but he determines to keep the secret of his identity the while he helps the boy. Bill is honored for his courage and falls in love with Betty who returns his affection, but when Bill appeals to Grayson for his daughter's hand, the British Lord assures the boy that he cannot give his daughter to a mere "nobody." Soon after the Graysons return to England and the Baron renews his efforts to hasten the marriage.

Disconsolate, Bill buries himself in work upon a plane operating on a rocket principle and Tom offers to finance his operations. Bill continues to work finally completing his model. When Betty excitedly waves before her father's aristocratic nose the news that a young American, Bill Holden is to attempt an around the world flight in a single day, the Baron, feeling that he has lost Betty, determines to have her at any cost and kidnaps her. However, Betty escapes from the Baronial castle with the aid of a rebellious servant of the Baron's while Bill sensationally encircles the globe and Nations go wild. Bill is feted in every country as he proceeds home, but in England he stops to ask again for Betty's hand, and the abashed Grayson, props knocked out from under by the betrayal of the trusted Baron, admits ruefully that Bill is hardly a "nobody" any more. Congratulations pour in from everywhere as the daring young flyer marries the pretty Betty in St. James' cathedral, but as Bill warmly pumps the hand of the recently arrived Tom Billings whom he thanks for making his flight possible, Tom confesses that he is Bill's uncle and explains the circumstances of the disgrace of Bill's father long ago. The bride and groom and the repentant Tom returns to the little town where Will is rejoicing over his son's success and as Tom begs for forgiveness his brother magnanimously extends a friendly hand.

THE CONVERT

Bertha M. Roy Drama File No. 10448

THE time is several years before the first flapper is to bob her hair. The place is a Church where Robert and Eleanor are vowing to love, honor, and obey. Before a hushed throng, Eleanor raises sweet lips for her bridegroom's reverent kiss.

Time passes. Before a cozy fireplace in the little home they have bought, Robert smokes his pipe while Eleanor, head resting against his shoulder reads aloud the age old tales of Persian poetry. She lifts her eyes to his and his arm tightens about her shoulder. So it should always be, Robert whispers. Then the first wave of the woman's movement sweeps the country. To Eleanor whose days are a marking of time until Robert's return from business each night, the suffrage agitation offers a new absorbing interest. Always enthusiastic about anything she does, Eleanor throws herself heart and soul into the cause and Robert at first indulgent grows successively uneasy and finally resentful. Returned from a discouraging day at the office, Robert finds Eleanor no longer waiting. New friendships claim her. A maid does the housework and Eleanor is forever entertaining raucous voiced suffragettes. Even as he enters his house he hears the blatant voice of Helene Blodson laugh loudly as she tells Eleanor Robert Streeter is just an old-fashioned husband and as the woman file by him, Robert enters the disordered room and seating himself heavily, asks how Eleanor can enjoy the company of such women. At that they quarrel and telling him he can find his supper in the icebox, Eleanor goes out. For hours Robert sits before the fire, his newspaper unnoticed on his knee. The next morning at breakfast, Eleanor remains hidden behind her paper, pride stopping either from confessing how badly he feels. Robert storms out, and all that morning he is unable to do any work as the suffragettes gather in the streets below, ready for their demonstration. Then Robert's stenographer tells him she is leaving, going to get married, and at the unexpected advice of her employer to steer clear of suffrage, the girl raises her brow. The arduous work of hiring and breaking in another girl begins, and as flirtatious applicants file into his office, Robert turns in disgust. At last he hires a spectacled, prim looking woman, and sinks heavily back in his chair. The street noises rise to a crescendo. Slamming down his papers, Robert tells his stenographer she can take the afternoon off, he is closing for the day. He goes down into the street and winces as he hears the ribald remarks of the street loafers who have come to have a good time at the expense of the suffrage workers. One fellow catcalls. Someone starts a fight. The street teems with flying fists. Women scream. Robert turns, realizing suddenly that Eleanor may be in that crowd. Suddenly he hears a cry. Turning he finds Helene Blodson struggling with a ruffian who thinks the emancipated woman is any man's woman. One uppercut and the fellow lies stretched on the ground. As Robert and the shivering Helene come into the house, Eleanor puts her arm about Helene's shoulders and crimsons as she learns of the brawl. At last Helene goes. For a moment there is a strained silence. Robert lights his pipe, and sitting beside him Eleanor reads aloud from their book of poetry. Robert's arm tightens about her shoulder. The fire grows brighter.

PRISON BARS

J. Burnett Drama File No. 10426

ON a tour of inspection of her father's stables, Nancy watches Jimmy, son of one of her father's friends, brush the coat of Fifty Million, her father's entry in to-morrow's derby. Smiling at him she says it is absurd for a man of his social standing to act as jockey, but Jimmy assures her he loves horses and wants to ride Fifty Million to victory. Nancy raises her eyes to his when a step is heard behind them and John Smith, one of the brothers Smith, famous racing enthusiasts, remarks cuttingly that a jockey should keep in his place. Angrily Nancy reminds John that Jimmy is as well born as he is, and she returns to the house. That night her father is giving his well-publicised pre-derby ball and Nancy is dancing with Jimmy who has dropped in for one dance, since he must retire early to keep training. Suddenly John cuts in on them, and Jimmy bids Nancy goodnight and retires.

Meanwhile, John's brother William has lost a large sum of money gambling and unless he can raise five thousand dollars immediately his life has been threatened. In vain he has appealed to his brother who is about to place that sum on Fifty Million, and now he has followed him to the Raymond dance to plead for the money. Looking about the ballroom he sees Clara, who loves his brother, sitting alone and approaching he asks if she knows where John is. Furiously she replies that he is making a fool of himself over that Raymond girl and William goes out to try to find John. After the others have gone, he finds John wandering toward the stables to be sure that Fifty Million warrants his five thousand bet. William approaches, in evening clothes and gloved, and pleads for the money lest he be murdered. John harshly refuses and goaded to fury by his brother's heartlessness, William seizes one of Jimmy's knives from the wall and drives it through his brother's heart. Stunned he realizes he has killed him and returns to their rooms. As he enters agitatedly, he sees Clara pacing up and down waiting for John to tell him he has to marry her.

The following day the Derby is run and Jimmy rides Fifty Million to victory. Just as he is approaching the smiling Nancy, a police officer intervenes and handcuffing him arrests him for the murder of John Smith. In vain Jimmy protests his innocence. Only his finger prints appear on the knife since William wore gloves and his quarrel with John is widely known. Nancy tries hysterically to secure Jimmy's release, knowing now she loves him.

With the money William pays off his debts and prepares to leave town, overcome by remorse. But Clara wild-eyed enters the room and screams she knows he killed John, she saw him return to their room. William tries to choke her into silence, but Clara's screams bring the police and William is arrested. His guilt is proved and Jimmy is released to find Nancy waiting for him.

GAME'S END

Claude A. Greene Drama File No. 10353

ENTERING Harvard University two years after his brother, Eddie Snell quickly wins prominence that the quiet, studious John has never attained. The younger boy is given an important place on the football team, and becomes a member of a leading fraternity, to which his brother had always aspired. Eddie's gay disposition and boyish charm make him a favorite with everyone, but John conquers his natural jealousy and rejoices in the boy's triumphs until Helen Dane, the girl he has loved since his first day at Harvard, seems to prefer Eddie to himself. Unhappily, he confides this situation to Helen's younger sister, Mary, she laughingly reassures him that there is no truth in his belief, but counsels him to stop his brother from carrying off all the honors. In despair, he goes alone to a speakeasy and here meets Joe Virri, a gangster; after John has become intoxicated he agrees to Virri's suggestion that he bring Eddie here before the football game with State University, on which Virri has bet heavily, so that he may prevent him from playing and lessen Harvard's chances for victory. The next morning, John is horrified to think he has entered into such a conspiracy, and confesses his disloyalty to Eddie. The boys' parents and their brother, Bobby, come up to see the game. As Mr. Snell is a detective of note, John relates his conversation of the night before to his father, and he brings about Virri's arrest and imprisonment on various petty charges.

Escaping from jail shortly before Thanksgiving a year later, Virri determines to seek revenge for the hard life he has endured these past months. Reading in the paper that Mr. and Mrs. Snell and Bobby are again visiting their sons, he waits until they attend a dance at the University and, bribing the maid at their apartment, kidnaps Bobby. The distracted parents, discovering their loss, immediately inform the police, but no trace of Virri can be found. Although overcome with grief at this tragedy, Eddie feels that he must play in the Thanksgiving game, as the league championship will belong to Harvard if he wins. Amid cheers of the crowd, the boy brings victory to his team when he scores two touchdowns at the close of the game, but later cannot keep from breaking down when he is alone with Mary. Tenderly, she tries to console him. A few days later Mr. Snell receives a note from Virri, offering to return his son if he will pay a ransom of twenty thousand dollars, sending the money by a messenger to a lonely shack in the mountains. John and Eddie persuade him to let them go to this appointed place.

At the designated hour, the boys, wearing masks, John advances with the money while Eddie, who is hiding in the bushes, springs on Virri, and after a fierce struggle, binds him. Discovering Bobby in the shack, they return to the city, where Virri is arrested. Overcome with anxiety when she learns their mission, Helen almost faints with relief when she sees John is safe, and confesses her love for him, while Eddie and Mary announce that they have been secretly engaged for months. All rivalry ended, a double wedding is planned for the following spring.

VS. THE PEOPLE

Leonard Wyatt Drama File No. 10160

APPOINTED technical adviser at the Wilson Woolen Mills, Rolland Brainstorm boards the train for his new position in the city of Rockland, eager to begin his work. At the suggestion of one of his colleagues, he finds board and lodging at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Gumshoe Hawk, who introduces him to their daughter, Fedora. Taking a street car, he calls on Mr. Heart, his employer, who tells him that he expects absolute loyalty from his workers, and that no scandal must touch their private lives. He replies that he will gladly comply with these requests, although thinking them a little unfriendly. Mr. Hawks is a superintendent at the mill, as he tells Rolland, but when the young man explains methods by which he hopes to cut down the cost of production and lighten the working hours, he finds his landlord much opposed to any changes in the system. Puzzled, Rolland starts to his room, but finds Fedora standing in the hall, and as she says she wishes to talk to him, he invites her into his room. The girl tells him that all the men at the mill will resent any reforms he may try to instigate, as it might result in their losing their positions, and adds that the plant has always been run along the tyrannical methods of a sweatshop.

Mildred Allan, a young college teacher who boards at the Hawks' home, encourages Rolland in his plans for bettering conditions, and applauds his courage; he also makes friends with Charles Bangor, a fellow-worker. One day he overhears Fedora discussing with her parents his desirability as a husband, and hears her say that she is in love with him. He decides to select another boarding house, as he has never been more than friendly with the girl, but that night her father attempts to stab him, and sets fire to his room, believing that he has seduced Fedora. When Mildred hears the news she asks Rolland not to see her again, but Charles Bangor says that the whole affair was pre-arranged so that his friend would be asked to leave. In spite of this, Rolland continues his work at the mill, writing a series of articles which expose the unfair and absolete labor conditions, and suggests remedies. Fedora and her parents drop charges against him, as they have no evidence, but he moves into Bangor's boarding house.

Depressed because of his alienation from Mildred, Rolland joins Bangor and two other boarders, Hoot McFarlane and Lee Trotwald, in a party. After several drinks, they visit a house in the red-light district, but Rolland refuses to stay, and returns to the boarding house. Next morning they are accused of stealing whiskey from the landlord, and overhearing a conversation between him and Trotwald, realizes that it is another attempt to discredit Rolland, and this time he is discharged. However, his work wins him a research scholarship with a leading university, at twice his present salary. Calling to console him, Mildred is told the good news, and promises to go with him to his new post.

THE SIN MARRIAGE

Iva Marks Drama File No. 10464

COLLAPSING in the arms of her Aunt Maria when she receives a telegram which states that her lover, Roney, has been killed at the front, Helen sobs out her confession. Shortly before Roney departed for his training camp she yielded to his embraces, planning to marry him as soon as he obtained a leave of absence, but three weeks later he was sent suddenly to France, before the event could take place, and now the unfortunate Helen finds that she is to become a mother. Aunt Maria relates this to Helen's father, a prominent architect, and he replies that he blames himself, since he had never taught his motherless girl the value of self control and consideration, showering every luxury and advantage upon her. Determined to protect her name, Helen's father asks Jack, a young man in his employ, to marry the girl, promising to reward him for this service, and his consent is readily obtained. With a heavy heart, Helen allows her aunt to help her arrange the train of her satin wedding dress, and kneels before the altar, while her friends smile in approval at her marriage with this attractive young man. Sadly, she reflects that she, who might have had the choice of the most socially eligible young men in town, is now grateful to be accepted by one who is almost a stranger to her. Following the ceremony, the young couple leave for their strange honeymoon, which is to be spent in a cabin in the Rocky Mountains. As they board the train, Helen's father gives Jack an envelope, requesting him not to open it until they have reached their destination.

Jack is consideration itself to the young bride, never intruding on her privacy, and listening sympathetically when she tells him of her love for Roney. They walk through the woods together, gathering flowers, and picnicking on the steep slopes of the beautiful country. Occasionally Jack returns to the city to complete certain pieces of work, leaving Helen in the housekeeper's care. One night, as Helen is very tired, he carries her to her bedroom upstairs, and suddenly crushes her to him, telling her that he has loved her distantly for years, following her career through the society pages of the daily paper, and embracing this chance to help her because it was the fulfillment of his dreams. Startled at first, Helen then returns his embrace, replying that she, too, has learned to care for him, with a deep and abiding love very different from her passionate infatuation for Roney, but felt that he would never truly respect her. Happily Jack reassures her, the next morning he is called away on business. In searching through his bureau for a receipted bill which she needs, Helen discovers an envelope from her father's office, containing a check for ten thousand dollars, and a brief note of thanks. When Jack returns that night, she accuses him of professing his love only that he may receive favors from her father; deeply wounded, he makes no reply.

A terrific storm arises and Helen becomes ill. At the risk of his life, Jack walks three miles in search of a doctor, fighting his way through the swollen streams of water and falling trees, but when he returns with the physician, the housekeeper tells him that Helen's baby is dead. Jack is in constant attendance while Helen lies critically ill, and her father, summoned by the doctor, tells the girl that her husband loves her devotedly, and had refused from the first to cash his check. Happily, Jack forgives his young wife, and when he wins a prize, she goes with him to another city, to begin again.

CAT'S MEOW!

Amelia C. Hampton Comedy File No. 10100

ALL through supper Henry sat meekly while Hannah complained about not having a thing to wear, and harassed by accumulated bills he opened his mouth weakly when she extended her legs and showed him the new pair of shoes she had gotten, the only thing new she'd have to wear to Church Easter Sunday. At last they went to bed and for hours Henry crawled between his covers trying to fall asleep and forget his worries. At last, just as he was sinking into a blissful oblivion a prolonged meow assailed his ears. With a grunt he turned over, trying to get back to sleep. Meow. Meow. He could stand it no longer. Eyes blurred, he picked up a shoe and hurled it. For a moment there was silence. Then a wail sounded from the other bed. "Henry, you threw my new shoe at the cat!" Henry stared at her blankly and as Hannah gave way to sobs, he muttered thickly, "I'll get it for you." It was several moments before Hannah realized that Henry had gone out in his pyjamas and bare feet. "Henry!" she called, but the front door slammed, and while she stood at the window wringing her hands, Henry scouted around unsuccessfully for the missing shoe. Hannah was just falling off to sleep when she heard Henry shouting from downstairs. Sticking her pigtailed head out of the window, she saw Henry frantically gesturing from below that he couldn't find her shoe in the snow and he had locked himself out. "O-o-o-oh!" moaned Hannah running aimlessly about the room. "I'll be right down. Don't go away." Outside Henry was sneezing and Hannah pattered about the bedroom as she sought her slippers and bathrobe. "O-o-o-oh," she cried again, as she discovered that in her excitement she had put on Henry's robe, and while he banged at the door, she hastily changed and got her hands all caught in the lining. With the bathrobe twisted about her face, she started for the stairs only to trip and roll down with a crash. At length, she stumbled to the door and as the lock stuck, she yanked violently. It was several minutes before the door jerked open under her trembling hands. "Henry!" she cried, but he was numb with cold. Putting her arms under his for support, she dragged him into a chair and as his sneezes shattered the stillness of the night, she ran about collecting aspirin, mustard plasters and even castor oil which she forced down the poor fellow's unwilling throat. Between sneezes, Henry groaned that he couldn't find the shoe, but Hannah was too concerned about his cold to worry about that. At last she helped him into bed, mustard plasters stuck all over his chest. All the blankets she could find were heaped on her shivering husband and as she said, "There, now get some sleep," Henry moaned.

It was when Hannah was getting into bed herself that she kicked her new shoes, and with a cry of joy she called out, "It wasn't my new shoe after all, Henry. Don't worry about that old shoe you threw out. I don't need it anyhow." "Ka-choo," was Henry's answer, "Ka-choo." And as he began to fall asleep at last, from the back fence sounded an ominous and nasty, "Me-ow-ow!"

THE FREIGHTER'S DREAD

Richard G. Williams Drama File No. 10449

RECEIVING an appointment as minister at Rock Lake, Richard Kenyon advises his wife that they must plan to go immediately, if she is willing, and Marion prepares for the journey, although her parents and sister, Julia, protest. Taking their two children, Buddy and Sue, they board the train, and are met at the station by a member of their parish who drives them in his carriage to their new home. Richard remarks that the geography of the country is unique, as Rock Lake is situated behind a practically continuous chain of rising peaks, and is told that one of the six points of his ministerial service lies beyond this range, and can only be reached by passing over the highest peak in the wall. Inspecting this pass later, he discovers that its grade is dangerously narrow and winding, forming sharp angles over a deep abyss. Their closest neighbor is Frank Hunter, a ranch owner, and his young son, Tod, who is studying for the ministry, and visiting his father during a short vacation. They help the new minister in every way they can, aiding him as he repairs the roof of his house, and offering to lend their horse and buggy to him when he makes his monthly calls. Julia Kenyon comes to Rock Lake to visit her sister, and Tod soons spends much of his time in her company. When he asks her to marry him as soon as his education is completed she replies that, although she loves him, the life of a minister's wife is too dull for her.

Richard talks over the advisability of taking his wife with him on the perilous trip over the highest peak in the chain with Julia, who urges him not to leave them behind, and when he finds that the Hunters will be away he is glad that Marion is eager to accompany him. Borrowing Frank's horses at his insistence, Richard allows them to rest for four days, feeding them well, so that their strength will be intact for the journey. When he starts out with Marion, Julia, and the two children, Richard finds the animals full of spirit. They dash gayly along in spite of his efforts to restrain them, but the summit is reached safely, although Marion is bady frightened. Suddenly the team leaps forward, and the occupants of the carriage are thrown two hundred feet below, their fall broken by a tree, thus saving them from being hurled into a roaring stream at the base of the incline. When they regain consciousness they see that Buddy is not with them, and his horrified young mother discovers him perilously clinging to a jagged rock, extending directly over the stream. As Richard's leg is broken and the women are trembling with terror, there is no one to save the boy, but Marion's screams of terror attract the attention of the Hunters, who are returning from a visit with relatives on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. Tod at once climbs after the child, almost losing his life as he slips on the wall of barren rock, but at last reaching the little fellow, and carry him to safety. Frank, with the help of farmers who are passing, brings the rest of the family to his carriage, and they return home.

Informing Tod that she is now convinced a minister's wife may have her share of excitement, after all, Julia promises to wed the young hero, and the ceremony takes place in Richard's church.

THE BRAVE REQUEST

Louis M. Cardoza Drama File No. 10170

WHEN Dave Webb asks Mr. King for permission to marry his daughter, Doris, he is told that it will be granted on one condition only—that he give up his ambition to become an aviator. Dave explains that he wishes to continue his training until he receives a pilot's license, which he only wishes to use as a hobby, but Mr. King replies that he will never allow Doris to become the wife of a man who takes such chances with his life, and unless he promises never to go up again, he must not see his daughter after this. For her sake, Dave renounces his ambition, and goes to work as a cashier in Mr. King's bank, making plans to marry Doris within a few weeks. Returning home one evening, Dave finds his mother in tears, and is told by his father that their securities have failed, and unless he can raise five thousand dollars by the end of the week he will be unable to meet the mortgage on their home, and Dave's sister, Alice, will be forced to come home from school. Mr. King refuses to lend them money. Reading in the newspaper that an amateur aviation race is to be held in Chicago, Dave tells Doris that he must complete his course and enter it, as this is the only way that he can help his father. She pleads with him not to do it, as it will be dangerous for him to compete when he has had no experience, and tells him her father will not consent to their marriage if he breaks his promise, but he replies that he must enter.

Just before the races begin, Dave receives a wire, stating that his mother is critically ill, and he must come at once, but he tells George, his friend at aviation school who has also entered the meet, that he cannot leave, as his family will need money more than ever now. His hand trembles as he starts the plane, but he forces himself to go on, and, although he almost crashes into another plane at the close of the race, he come in first, and is awarded the winner's purse of seven thousand dollars. Hastening home, Dave arrives a few minutes after his mother dies. His father's business, and their home, is saved, but over-come with grief, the boy collapses. His unhappiness is increased when the next day he receives a note from Doris expressing her sympathy, but stating that her father has refused to allow her to see him, and as she is all he has in the world, she feels she must obey. Dave invests the money that remains as his award in the race in an aviation company, after he has helped his father, and, losing his position in the bank, becomes an air-mail pilot.

One evening several months later, twelve-year-old Diana King, Doris' younger sister, does not return home from school, and the child's father receives a telephone message from Mr. Hogan, a farmer living on the outskirts of the city, who says that he saw a child answering her description being driven past his farm in a car with two men. Police begin a thorough search in the hills surrounding the Hogan home, but after a week, no trace of Diana is found. Covering the district in his plane, Dave looks for the girl without telling Mr. King, and sees three figures hidden in a crevice in the hills. He sends word to the police by radio, and makes a parachute jump to the spot. Although his arm is broken in landing among the rocks, he holds the two men until officers arrive, and they are arrested. Diana is restored to her family, and police tell Dave that he has captured two notorious kidnappers, John and Everett Hansen. Mr. King thanks the boy heartily, and withdraws his objections to his marriage with Doris, telling him he may continue as an aviator, if he wishes, but Dave answers that his stock in the company has increased, and he plans to become a director, before Doris is to be his wife.

OUT OF EDEN

Jean Valois Drama File No. 10340

LONELY and poverty-stricken on her little Oklahoma farm, Miriam Shannon Parnelle is deeply agitated when Kenneth Adams, an admirer of thirty years ago when she lived on her parent's beautiful estate in Louisville, calls unexpectedly. She receives him bitterly, advising him that he is the cause of her present low estate, since he betrayed her youthful love, and she was forced to marry her father's groom, in order that the child she was expecting might have a name. Deeply wounded, her father had disinherited her, giving her only this barren farm, where she and her husband had lived together in poverty until his recent death, sending her daughter away when she was still a child. In atonement, Kenneth offers to assist Miriam in recovering her former status, but she refuses, although a little of her old affection for this man, who loved her when she was a southern belle, returns. After he leaves, she regrets her decision, and resolves to better her condition. Oil is discovered on the farm, and as she is now a wealthy woman, Miriam assiduously takes treatments to improve her appearance and health. Once more tastefully dressed, much of her former beauty returns, and Henry DeVere, a wealthy traveller whom she meets during a sea voyage, falls in love with this woman, although she is ten years his senior, and urges her to marry him. However, as he has formed a previous alliance with a young girl, Miriam refuses him, and he marries his former sweetheart.

The renunciation is a severe shock to Miriam, and Kenneth hears that she has died, following an operation in New York. Soon afterwards a young woman who introduces herself as Miriam Parnelle, daughter of his old sweetheart calls on him at Louisville, and impressed by her astounding resemblance to her mother, he feels for her the love he once had for Miriam, but does not reveal that he is her father, as Miriam has forbidden this. At a costume party reminiscent of the gay nineties, Kenneth suddenly knows that this woman is Miriam herself, and she confesses that he has discovered the truth, as the daughter died in infancy, and she has taken rejuvenation treatments, and is now living at the old home, willed to her by her parents, who died recently. Bob Mallot, a young attorney, falls in love with her, and refuses to allow her to disclose her secret. Although infatuated with him, she refuses his proposal, but accompanies him to Miami, where they meet Kenneth, while attending a yacht party. A hurricane arises, and as the ship goes down, Miriam sees Bob swept into the sea; she and Kenneth are rescued together, but she believes Bob dead, although he is, in reality picked up by a slow freighter without wireless. Grief and anxiety destroy Miriam's restored beauty, and she goes to Vienna, with Kenneth's help, where she can again be rejuvenated. When she returns six months later she finds Bob married to Dolly Porter; he wishes to annul the marriage, but Miriam opposes this. Henri DeVere, whose wife is now dead, comes to Louisville to attend the Derby, and renews his romance with Miriam. She confesses that she, too, loves him as deeply as ever and makes a sporting proposition with Bob that if her horse wins in the Derby he must renounce all claims to her affections, and not reveal their brief affair to Henri. If he loses, she will become Bob's wife, following the annulment of his present marriage. Dolly's father and Bob's mother come to Louisville to attend the races, and Kenneth surprises everyone by announcing his engagement to the elder Mrs. Mallot. Miriam's horse slips and falls, just before crossing the tape, and Bob claims his rights, but Dolly's father reveals that his daughter is expecting a child, and must not be deserted. Henri, liking this younger man, and not wishing to take an unfair advantage of him, says nothing, but even when Miriam discloses the secret of her age to him, Bob still wishes to marry her, and she feels that she will find as his wife an enduring love such as Henri could not give her. When Dolly confesses that a former fiance, and not Bob, is the father of her child, Miriam prepares to keep her bargain, but Dolly's mother and Kenneth prevail upon Bob not to desert his present wife, and at last he promises he will protect her. DeVere claims Miriam as his own, and these two who have known much of the world's sorrow find happiness together.

WHAT NEXT?

Marion Mayer Drama File No. 10483

AS she is dusting the furniture in their tiny apartment, Catherine calls to her grandmother, who is lying, ill, in the bedroom, and receiving no answer, hastens to her. With a cry of horror, she realizes that this kindly woman who has cared for her since babyhood, is dead. For the next few months, the child is taken care of by her Aunt Margaret and Aunt Emma, but is made to feel very unwelcome in either home, receiving no kindness but an unusually large share of duties. Telling her that she is taking her to a party, Aunt Emma conducts Catherine to an institution where families who are not able to provide for their children may place them, taking them back into their homes as soon as possible. Bravely holding back her tears, Catherine follows the matron of this girls' club to the dormitory. Although she soon makes friends with the other girls, there is little time for play in the strict routine of work they must follow after school hours, and Catherine wistfully yearns for a home, making the best of the situation, however, as is her usual manner. A fire damages the club, and Catherine, almost completely concealed by blankets as she sleeps, is the last to be taken from the burning building. While repairs are being made, Mrs. Smith, a wealthy patroness of the club, takes the girl to her home, and here she is seen by Grace Meyer, a teacher and social worker, who adopts the child. For the first time since her grandmother's death, Catherine feels that she is loved and wanted.

Grace Meyer takes Catherine to the Grand Canyon during summer vacation, and the next year, sends her to a camp, where she enjoys wholesome sports with girls her own age. Furnishing the upstairs rooms of a huge garage on her sister's estate, Grace makes a real home for the lonely orphan, taking an interest in her studies and pastime, and fulfilling one of her dearest wishes by giving a party in her honor. Perceiving that she has talent, Grace arranges for her foster daughter to study the violin and take dancing lessons. Catherine's new found happiness is shattered when illness forces Grace to give up her position, and put herself in the hands of her physician; in order to cut down expenses, it becomes necessary for the girl to return to the club, although she is allowed to spend every week-end with Grace. Ashamed to let her classmates know where she lives, Catherine stops every night at the home of a friend, so that they will not follow her. Roy, one of the students, invites her to the theatre, and she accepts only on week-ends, when he can take her to Grace's home. The two become fast friends, but Catherine feels that if she reveals the truth of her family life to him, he may lose interest. Applying herself diligently to her school work, Catherine wins a high record, although much of the time she would like to spend in studying must be given to other things. She secures a position caring for a child in order to meet expenses. Catherine is elected vice president of her class, and upon graduation, enters business school, while Roy goes way to dental college, visiting her at her Aunt Geraldine's camp in summer.

When her beloved friend, Grace dies, Catherine, now a secretary in an insurance office, takes a room with Mrs. Porter, a widow, who has one daughter, Betty. Becoming jealous of Catherine, and admiring Roy, who visits her at Christmas time, Betty destroys his letters to Catherine, and she believes that he no longer cares. Later, after Catherine helps nurse her through an illness, Betty confesses this. The following spring, Roy and Catherine are married; at last she knows the joy of a home of her own.

FREE LOVE

Kaye Roberts Drama File No. 10356

FROM the window of his apartment across the hall handsome Bill Cook sees Lou Pelton step out of a stunning limousine, and as she waves goodbye to a well dressed middle aged man, Bill lets the curtain drop. A few minutes later Lou is in his arms and as he kisses her fiercely, he asks where she picked up the millionaire. Lou shrugs as she assures him it doesn't matter she could never think of another man save Bill, but he looks beyond her, and as he leans back against the divan and toys with her arm he tells her that she really ought to use her beauty to better advantage. For a moment Lou is shocked as she realizes what Bill is saying but as his fingers caress her slowly, he tells her that Brooks Schuyler has money, wants her, and if she went to him, she could still see Bill anyway. Bitterly Lou goes to her own room and turns the key in the lock. But at the store when Brooks waits for her to take her to dinner, she is struck by his kindliness and consideration and when, without touching her he offers her a penthouse and tells her he loves her, she accepts.

Some weeks later she meets Bill again, and as he looks at her fine clothes and diamonds, he smiles crookedly. Lou wants to hate him, but Bill still has the old power over her and when he pleads with her to come to his apartment to see his pictures, just for old time sake, she reluctantly goes. Once in his arms, however, she forgets everything else Some time later she discovers she is going to have a child. When she tells Bill, he turns her down and tells her to stick Brooks Schuyler, not him. In that moment all her love for Bill dies and when Brooks comes to her that night he asks gently what the trouble is and asks her to marry him. Weeping a little, she tells him he is the finest man she has ever met. However, she is struck by a car, her baby is born dead, and Brooks takes care of her tenderly. When she recovers he repeats his offer of marriage, and she consents.

Then one afternoon Bill comes pleading for money, telling her gangsters are after him. Although Lou is sickened at sight of him, when she realizes how desperate he is, she gives him some money and tells him she never wants to see him again. A few days later Bill comes again, but this time Lou repulses him. Angered, Bill threatens to spoil her happiness with Brooks by revealing that she had lived with him. Lou tells him to get out, but Bill repeats that if she doesn't have the money when he comes tonight, he will reveal everything. Crushed, Lou scarcely hears the ringing of the telephone bell and when she picks it up she hears her husband telling her he is coming home earlier than usual to take her to a show to-night.

Desperate, she writes a note to Brooks confessing all, and decides to commit suicide. But outside she hears a shot and running to the door she sees Bill fall to the ground, shot by gangsters in a curtained limousine. The gangsters are caught and reveal that Bill double crossed them, and Brooks, to whom Bill had told the whole story dashes in, anxiously fearing the crowd outside portended some harm to Lou. Taking her in his arms, he refuses to listen to her confession, saying, "I know," and Lou for the first time whispers, "I love you."

SATURDAY NIGHT

Dewey Gutchess Drama File No. 10466

BOTH employes on the farm of Mr. Preston Bell, young Jerry Winters and Joe Grass, a taciturn, middle-aged Pole, become acquainted as they work in the fields together. Jerry generously helps Joe when he encounters difficulty, often completing his planting and furrowing if the day's work proves too difficult for the older man. As they eat their lunch together, Jerry frequently supplies Joe with tobacco, and listens attentively while his co-worker tells him of his wife and three small children at home. In turn, Jerry confides that he is in love with Dorothy, a young woman who lives on a neighboring farm. On Saturday night, the two men go to town together to celebrate, as is the local custom. The next day Jerry is walking in the fields with Dorothy when he encounters Joe, and introduces him to the girl. Later, Dorothy tells Jerry that Joe called at her house, inviting her to go riding with him, but she refused, knowing that he was a married man, and advising him that she did not wish him to come again. When Jerry asks Dorothy to marry him, she promises that if he will save enough money to make a first payment on a little cottage before the first of the year, she will gladly consent, but feels that he must first learn to take responsibilities seriously. He promises to do her bidding. Joe sneers, but makes no response when Jerry tells him this news, as they are working in the fields.

Saying that one of his children is ill and needs special medical attention, Joe succeeds in borrowing all the money Jerry has diligently saved at Dorothy's request. Soon after this, Jerry sees Joe driving a car, and upon asking him how he can afford this, is told that it was purchased with the borrowed money, as the story of the sick child was merely a ruse to disqualify Joe in Dorothy's eyes. Angrily, Jerry demands that he repay the money, but Joe informs him that he is in love with Dorothy, and does not intend for her to marry. Realizing the true calibre of this man, Jerry explains the entire situation to Mr. Bell, who agrees to subtract the money from Joe's wages, as he knows Jerry is absolutely truthful. This procedure angers Joe, but he knows that he cannot combat it, as Jerry could have him arrested or dismissed from Mr. Bell's farm, if he chose. Finding Jerry alone on the following Saturday night, Joe, who has become intoxicated, makes an insulting remark about Dorothy. At once, Jerry orders him to apologize, and when he refuses, the two men struggle violently. At last, Jerry throws the older man to the ground, then lifts him to his feet, and tells him to leave before police take him into custody. Still eager for revenge, Joe takes Jerry's bill fold from his pocket when he is not looking, and, leaving it near Mr. Bell's barn, sets fire to the structure. Seeing the flames as he returns home, Jerry summons the fire department, and helps them save the barn, but suspicion is attached to him when the bill fold is discovered, and Joe testifies that Jerry had been drinking and threatened to set fire to the place the previous evening. Mr. Bell states then that he was a witness to the entire proceedings, but remained silent in order that Joe might fully convict himself. The judge sentences Joe, and Jerry is awarded with the cottage Dorothy desires, as an expression of Mr. Bell's appreciation.

The next Saturday night is the most gala event in Jerry's life, for Dorothy becomes his bride. Following the wedding, a dance is held in the barn, and after much celebrating, Jerry proudly carries his bride across the door-step of their cottage.

THEY ALSO LEARN

Hazel E. Davis Drama File No. 10475

ANXIOUS to keep her youngest daughter, Goldie, a child as long as possible, Mrs. Carver does not allow her to attend many social events, and evades her questions and pleas for more liberty. Eager for life, the sixteen year old girl rebels at this strict regime, and when James Harmon, a travelling salesman, introduces himself to her as she is enjoying a soda at the corner drug store, Goldie finally agrees to slip away from her home and meet him in the evening. Telling her mother that she wishes to retire at an early hour, Goldie goes to her room, then climbs out of the window and keeps her forbidden rendezvous. Flattered by the compliments this flashy stranger besieges her with, the girl contrives to see him often, riding with him in the country, and at last yielding to the excitement of his embraces. Sobbing, she tells Harmon that she has been very wicked, and must not see him again, but she is afraid to confess her sin to her mother, much as she longs to tell her of the whole affair. Shortly after this, Harmon leaves town. The following year, Mrs. Carver is more lenient with her daughter, allowing her to attend many of the school functions, but Goldie finds the boys uninteresting in comparison with the impetuous Harmon and longs to see him again until a friend tells her casually that he is a married man. Attending the senior dance with her brother, Goldie is "tagged" by John Gregory, president of the class, and as soon as they smile into each other's eyes, the two fall mutually in love.

John is Goldie's class mate; the two study their lessons and spend many delightful leisure hours together, and when John asks the girl to become his wife, she replies that she wishes to do so with all her heart, but first must confess her past to him. Silencing her with a kiss, John tells her that she has nothing to tell him. Their engagement is kept a secret until John completes his education at medical college, while Goldie takes up commercial studies in order to help him. Then, following his chosen career as a country doctor, the young man claims Goldie as his bride. The early months of their marriage are unclouded with misunderstanding, and, completely happy for the first time in her life, Goldie forgets the mistakes of the past. As she is shopping she encounters a stranger, who invites her to accompany him to dinner. Indignantly, the young wife turns to face him when she recognizes with horror that he is James Harmon. All the attraction she once felt for him turns to revulsion as she compares his coarse, sensuous features with the fine manliness of her husband, but he warns her that unless she will see him he will expose her past life to her husband. Fearing to lose John, she yields, and whenever Harmon comes to the town, is forced to spend a certain amount of time in his company, deceiving her husband. At last the day of reckoning comes, and John accuses her of being with another man. Goldie pours out the whole story, assuring him that her relations with Harmon are now innocent, and tells him he must not leave her now, as she is expecting a child, but he refuses to believe the baby is his, and at last the young wife returns to her parents, where her little son is born.

Three years later, John decides to sell their home, and, needing Goldie's signature, goes to her. He finds the baby alone with the nurse, and when the child, who strongly resembles him, tells him that his mother prays every night for Daddy to come, he forgives Goldie. All three return to their old home, happy once more.

TRAIL'S END

Mae C. Smith Western File No. 10463

RACING over the expansive grounds of his father's ranch, King Keene attempts to reach the corral before his childhood sweetheart, Rose James, can score a victory for her pony, while his parents look on with approval at these two wholesome and radiant young people. However, Dandy Sykes, foreman of "Dad" Keene's ranch, remarks to one of his cowboys that King's parents have shielded him too much from the seamy side of life, and a few unpleasant experiences would save the boy from future unhappiness. When Dad and Mother Keene visit Mr. Keene's brother in Texas, Dandy takes the boy to a saloon, where he orders his first drink of whiskey, and afterwards goes to an upstairs room with one of the professional entertainers of the establishment. Returning from his trip, Dad and King are walking through the main street of the little town when a devotee of the saloon informs Mr. Keene of his son's recent visit to the place, and as his incredulous father questions him, King admits the truth of this statement. Infuriated, he strikes his son, sending him to the ground, and orders him to leave the ranch. Rose, riding through town, witnesses this, and tells King that she will accompany him wherever he goes. Still beside himself with rage, Dad orders Dandy to leave, at the point of a gun, and fires, wounding him slightly, when the kindly foreman tries to reason with him. His anger passed, Dad sobs out his unhappiness that evening to Mother Keene, but their trusted forman and their only child are gone.

Rose and King are married by the padre at an old Spanish mission at the next town, when she steadfastly refuses to leave. They decide to travel to San Antonio in search of employment. Buying a few provisions and a small tent, they camp along the way. King constructs a net from his shirt, but the fish they caught are stolen by a bear; however, the operation is repeated, and the two sit down to a delicious breakfast, light-hearted in spite of their sorrows, because they are together. Crossing a ford, King is thrown from his horse, but under Rose's tender ministrations, recovers. A mountain lion in on the verge of attacking Rose when King kills the animal with his revolver, and at another time saves his wife from a coiled rattle snake with the same trusty weapon. As they approach San Antonio, King and Rose see two robbers holding up a stage coach, and each lassoing one, hold them until the sheriff arrives; he informs them that they have captured the Black Phantom and the Curly Wolf, but forgets to give them the reward they have earned, and desperately need, for this achievement; years later it is mailed to them. The storekeeper at San Antonio advises them that there is to be a dance that night which they attend, and King is obliged to fight an intruder who forces his attentions on Rose; later, this man has him arrested for robbery, but King proves his innocence, and the man himself is discovered to be the criminal. Rose and King win prizes for their expert horsemanship at the San Antonio rodeo, and are invited to join a travelling troup of cowboys who perform in various cities. After a few years, they accumulate enough money to purchase The Texas Star Ranch, and it is here that their three children are born.

King receives a letter from Dandy, who has been given his former position again, urging him to come home, but he stubbornly refuses, until his father makes the same request over the radio. When he hastens home, the now successful rancher and his family is joyfully welcomed and all is forgiven.

THE SONG WRITER

Louise Darby Drama File No. 10396

JEAN THURLOW refuses to marry Tommy Bryant, informing him that she wishes to make a name for herself in the world, and confiding to her aunt that since the recent death of her father has left her without funds, Tommy's mother has not regarded her with favor as a prospective daughter-in-law. Friends and relatives are surprised when the girl turns down her aunt's invitation to share her home in Beltsville, and much to that good woman's horror, determines to seek her fortune in New York. Arriving in the glamorous city, Jean is greeted by her former school chum, Virginia, now a rising young reporter, and conducted to the apartment which she shares with Patricia Dutton, a commercial artist. Aside, Virginia warns Pat to avoid shocking the naive Jean with a too-hasty initiation into the sophistication of city life. Vance Traymore, a song writer, drops into the apartment, and is presented to the attractive newcomer. With amused satisfaction he watches Jean as she expertly prepares their evening meal, and invites the girls to attend a party in his studio that evening; Pat leaves with Van, deciding to dine with him. Thrilled with her first taste of "night life," the impressionable Jean is delighted when Van's friends, who are, for the most part, theatrical people, present an impromptu entertainment, and, after a little urging she shyly contributes her part by singing a composition of Van's. The group are charmed with the fresh beauty and melodious voice of this child of the country whom Van christens "the Infant," and she, in turn, is amazed at the merit of his composition, but, bitterly, he tells her that his ability to compose deserted him, with his lost ideals.

Encouraged by her belief in him, Van works diligently on the score of a new composition, "Melody," following suggestions which the girl offers; meanwhile, she submits her own musical compositions to a publisher, who promises to give them careful consideration. Virginia, who despises the fascinating Van, warns Jean that he is not the sort of man with whom she should associate, and adds, with implied meaning that he belongs to Pat, but as Jean does not understand, she ignores this bit of advice. Finding them together constantly, Pat goes to Van's apartment, and frankly asks him not to trifle with Jean's affections, reminding him that he has caused unhappiness before, but he retorts that he would gladly have married Pat years ago, had she not refused. Following that, his inspiration had seemed to take wings, and he had turned to the doubtful stimulus of excessive drinking, as Pat, who had so often cared for him, knew only too well. Jean had helped him to recapture his old enthusiasm, and he wished to marry her. Realizing her defeat, Pat helps him when he returns, intoxicated, late that evening, and agrees to drop her claims if he will cease drinking; with admiration for Pat, he agrees to this sporting proposition, and when "Melody" is rejected, philosophically prepares to rewrite it. Tommy comes to the city, seeking Jean, but as she has just been granted a radio contract, secured through her talent and Virginia's influence, she again refuses his proposal, and returns to his home sadly.

Discovering that she is to become a mother, Pat goes to Virginia's aunt, in the suburbs of the city, and when she loses her baby and almost dies, Vance, recently refused by Jean, hurries to her, at last realizing that he loves her. Shortly after this, they are married. Virginia wins promotion, and becomes the bride of her editor. Although successful, Jean's life is somewhat empty, but when she dedicates a song to Tommy, he hastens to her, and she knows that she loves him above all else.

JUDGED

Alex Berg Historical Drama File No. 10468

IN the public square of Augsburg, Germany, in 1530, a fanatical monk urges death to all followers of Luther. Challenging the right of a Christian to advocate bloodshed, the Elector of Saxon advises his daughter, Catherine, that he has faith in his friend, the Kaiser, to see that the Lutherans are justly dealt with, and the Margrave of Brandenburg shares his hope, but the Landgrave, turning to them, states that he fears they will never gain their ends by peaceful means. While they are debating this question, one of their followers unceremoniously seizese the friar by his neck, and throws him from the platform, amid his cries of heresy. During a Turkish invasion the kingdom was divided and it was the Elector's vote and loyal support which gave the Kaiser his position, in return, he granted the Diet at Augsburg, to hear the plea of the followers of Dr. Luther to publicly worship in accordance with his revelationary and stirring doctrine. The little village is electrified with suspense when a messenger announces that the Kaiser is approaching, and the citizens wager between themselves whether he will remember his debt of gratitude and favor the Lutherans, or deny them, motivated by fear of Papal displeasure. The Elector hastens to greet his sovereign, who receives him cordially and grants him the honor of allowing him to ride beside him into the village. During the ceremony of welcome, Robert, a young cousin of the Kaiser, is presented to Catherine, and smiles with favor on her beauty; she, in turn, is attracted to him, and they converse.

The Papal ambassador approaches the altar for the benediction, and all kneel but the Lutherans, who, removing their hats, stand with respectful reverence. Angrily, the Kaiser looks at this defiance, and dismisses the Lutheran princes with a haughty bow, when they salute him. Later, the Duke of Bavaria informs the Elector that the Kaiser wishes all Lutherans to assemble before him that evening, and warns them not to incur his displeasure again. The Landgrave, despite the Elector's protests, makes preparations for war. As they walk through the village streets together, Robert attempts to persuade Catherine to renounce her dangerous faith, but she steadfastly refuses. Assembled in the great hall the Elector calmly challenges the Kaiser's right to prescribe the manner in which God shall be worshipped, saying that He alone is authorized to decide such matters. Controlling his anger, the Kaiser informs the Lutherans that if they are present at the Corpus Christi procession he will forgive and honor them, otherwise, they shall be imprisoned, and the Elector's land shall become the property of the Duke of Saxon. In a quiet voice, the Elector refuses; the Kaiser then states that the Lutheran preachers must refrain from lecturing during the Diet, but perceiving that this is again a trap which will prevent their cause being heard, they refuse. The Margrave kneels before the Kaiser, saying he may sever his head, but he cannot make him become disloyal to his cause. The assembly waits breathlessly until the Kaiser at lasts grants the Lutherans a hearing on the twentieth of June, 1530.

At the opening of this hearing, the Elector insists upon having the matter read in German, rather than Latin, and although the matter of the Turkish uprising is considered first, the Elector forces him to allow the reading, over riding his various ruses. Expertly shaped by the studious Melanchton. and read by Dr. Beyer, the Lutherans win their first victory when Professor Ingolstadt approves the confession. Robert, stirred by their bravery, joins the Lutherans and wins Catherine's love.

OUR DESTINY

Ethyl H. Sehorn Drama File No. 10476

WHEN her husband sells the farm, their last possession, to travel west, even while she watches him tie up the money in miserable little tobacco sacks and store it away, Gale Cummings submits without protest. She endures the heat, the wind, the storms and the "hoss swappin'" as they drag along the plains, but when little Gloria becomes ill from the long wagon trip and Alf persists, despite the doctor's warning, in going on to California, Gale balks. Alf, stubborn and undeterred, gives her twenty dollars and leaves her stranded with their two little daughters. Gale manages an existence by sewing all day and half the night. Finally she knows it cannot go on. She tries to have Gloria adopted, but in the end leaves the children with two friendly families and lays her tired head down for the last time.

At eighteen, Gloria meets the wealthy Mr. Lowden, who thoroughly approves of the spirited girl and decides she is the choice as wife for his dour, disagreeable son. He manages to get the youngsters married, and Gloria, trembling on the brink of a new life, discovers her bridegroom is an ill-tempered, jealous sot. Only when Hal Lowden threatens their baby, Jack, does Gloria slip out with their child. She isolates herself on a distant ranch, but after some months her baby is kidnapped by a woman who has gained Gloria's confidence. Crazed with anxiety, she at last manages to recover Jack, after proving the whole scheme was a malicious gesture on the part of Hal. Again she flees, to be cook at a mine. However, her security is endangered by the amorous attention of a huge Finn, Frykland, who is jealous of the mine superintendent. One night he batters down her door. She defends herself with a small stool, and assuring herself he is not dead, she pushes on.

Gloria's sister, Jean, now a wealthy widow, meets Gloria again and gives her money to open up a beauty salon in California. One day a fat patron screams as a careless operator burns her, and the woman turns out to be Mrs. Frykland, the Finn's wife. Gloria is defended by Rockwell Lane, a lawyer, who falls in love with his client, but despite his able defense, the Fryklands set Gloria back considerably. Meanwhile her son Jack grows up and causes his mother hours of anguish by taking up aviation. Frykland, bombastic about his triumph over the woman who repulsed him, runs into Lowdan and commenting on the similarity of name describes Gloria and her son who is an aviation enthusiast to his mother's distress. Whereupon Hal writes to his son and invites him to come back to him, posing as the injured husband, and adding the inducement that he will start Jack in aviation. Jack believing the sincerity of his father's offer, decided to go, and, when Rockwell assures Gloria that she is being unreasonable in interfering with her son's ambition, Gloria, nerves over-wrought, turns on him and they quarrel. Rockwell continues his friendship with Jean, and Gloria reaches the nadir of hope. Then Alf Cummings, who had frittered his life away, appeals to his daughters. The wealthy Jean, remembering Alf's desertion of them many years before, sends him twenty dollars and washed her hands of him, but Gloria goes to his aid.

However, Jack soon learns that it was not affection for him that inspired his father's friendly overtures, but spite for his mother, and inheriting a small fortune from his grandfather Lowden, Jack returns to his mother and aviation and it is Jack who brings together in the autumn of their lives, Gloria and the kindly Rockwell Lane.

STORY OF MARIE SAGARDE

Jonas Roos & Mary Roos Haas Drama File No. 10513

AS her foster father Jean plows his field, an Arcadian song on his lips, lovely Marie Sagarde stops him, and winding her white little arms about his neck begs him to tell her who she is. Jean grows grave as he realizes this child is rapidly maturing into womanhood and his great frame shakes as he tells her of her father, a gallant soldier of Napoleon who had fallen in love with the radiant Eloise Bethaucourt. With the Empress Josephine assisting him in his suit, Eugene won the fair Eloise as his secret bride, but when at last he asked her father for his blessing, the impoverished Royalist Bethaucourt had drawn himself up to his full stature, and shouting at this "commoner" who had dared aspire to his daughter, had driven Eugene out. Sent by his Emperor on a command, Eugene had returned to find that Bethaucourt had fled taking his wife and daughter with him, and months later a note from Eloise was smuggled to the grief-stricken soldier telling him their child Marie had been left with sisters in a Montreal hospital. Gaining permission from his Emperor, Eugene had hastened to Montreal and holding his beloved infant close, had traversed the whole of the Arcadian country in a vain search for his bride. At last Eugene had entrusted his babe to the care of Jean and his good wife, and had returned, unhappily, to France.

Confident that some day she will see again her beautiful mother and splendid father, Marie continues her carefree life. Everyone adores her and when one day she finds a fever-stricken Opelousas Indian Chief Onato, she nurses the old man back to health. Everyone marvels as the fierce warrior allows the slip of a girl to tend him and from Onato Marie learns the language of the birds and the creatures of the forest. Onato tells her of his hatred of the white man who had wiped out his whole glorious tribe, and to Marie Onato confides how he had taken revenge upon a boatful of people lost in midstream. Only one beautiful girl had Onato saved because she was insane and the Great Spirit had forbidden his braves to harm those "possessed." When Marie learns that this poor white woman still lives, she begs the Chief to take her there. Tenderly Marie speaks to the woman, still beautiful, but although she obeys Marie's every gesture, the woman can understand no word of what Marie says. However, when Onato proudly shows a richly wrought chest that he has saved with the woman, Marie is appalled to learn that this is Eloise Bethaucourt, her own mother. With a great cry, the girl leads her mother to Jean and his wife who care for her as they would another child.

Then Napoleon is defeated and Eugene who has remained true to his Emperor to the bitter end, returns to Opelousas in search of his daughter. With him he brings Lieutenant Andre Sasaigne, son of his deceased best friend. Jean stares aghast at the returning soldier, then on a sudden impulse urges Eugene to don the full regalia of the soldier of Napoleon. As Eugene appears in the clearing, he looks past Marie to Eloise and as a cry tears from his throat, she rushes to him and flinging herself into his aching arms, regains her sanity Onato disappears into the depths of the forest and Marie whose heart has been proof against all the courtship of the gallants of Opelousas, finds her happiness with the dashing young Andre Sasaigne.

LAID OFF—the cry of the Depression! In a few short months Samuel Nelson had changed from a salaried respected business man to a hollow-eyed wreck, drinking to forget the hungry eyes of his children and his wife. Despair mounted. In a crescendo of utter hopelessness Samuel ended his life, leaving Virginia to struggle along for a short while and then to follow, broken by the uneven battle. Wide-eyed the youngsters heard the relief committee discuss what was to become of them, then, small hands clasped, they ran away. In the depths of a railroad box car they met Charcoal, little runaway negro lad, who shared with them his stolen food and taught them the best ways of eluding the police. It was Charcoal who stole a suit of boy's clothes for Emma and for weeks the two white children and the little black crossed the country together riding the rails, and stealing provender. Then at last they were caught by a watchful train agent. As the huge railroad man shook Emma Charcoal's fist shot up, and the youngsters hailed before a judge were separated. Charcoal was sent back South to his family and the two little Nelsons were committed to the bleak walls of an orphanage. Months of utter loneliness followed and then Emma was seen by Ralph Vincent, famous impressario and given her opportunity to have her splendid voice cultivated abroad, while the alert spirited Charley was adopted by the millionaire Fairfields and educated along legal lines. Graduated, Charley found his along legal lines. Graduated, Charley found his career already created for him as a Corporation Counsel, the poor and oppressed, found the snobbishness of his adopted parents holding him down inexorably.

Years passed. Emma returned to New York for her first concert and was welcomed by Ralph Vincent who stared transfixed at the vibrant young beauty of his protegee. Embarrassed by the girl's warm embrace and expressions of gratitude. Ralph held her off and assured her his reward would come when her voice was heard in the great Metropolitan Opera House. In the days that followed Emma trained constantly for her first concert, and Ralph was always near with suggestions and encouragement. Charley coming to visit his sister found in Ralph a staunch friend and the one man who could sympathize with his restlessness. To Charley this business of matching wits against the acquisitive brains of large Corporations was a bootless pursuit, and Ralph, whose life was now wrapped up in the development of Emma's career, alone understood. Then came the day of Emma's debut. Alone on the great stage the young girl stood and as her voice swelled with rapture a hushed silence fell over the audience. Then a burst of tumultuous applause. In her dressing room, Emma received the congratulations of friends who assured her she would be signed up for the Metropolitan. Only Ralph remained in the background, glowing with pride. But when at last Charley came it was to report he had not heard the concert. Puzzled Emma questioned him and learned that Charcoal was being held in the South on the grave charge of having raped a white girl. Charley had reached an open break with the Fairfields who warned if he insisted on defending the negro they would disown him. Suddenly Emma rose and to the consternation of her admirers, the rising young star pledged herself to the support of the negro lad. While Charley and Emma aroused public opinion in sympathy for Charcoal the papers hinted at dark scandal in the life of the rising young concert star. The case excited national interest. Charley won an acquittal for Charcoal but for Emma the Metropolitan contract never arrived. Only Ralph came, Ralph who understood all. And in his love Emma found happiness.

THE SAGE BRUSH TRAIL

Albert Gaines Western File No. 10118

IT is noon when Tim McGill dismounts outside the Ace High Saloon and strides up to the bar. Jim Dalton, notorious outlaw, blanches and whips his hand to his gun, but Tim beats him to the draw, shoots the gun out of his hand and warns him to be on guard if he's contemplating any of his old tricks. Back in his hideaway, Jim Dalton gives his men orders for the stage coach hold-up while Tim is learning at the bar that his old friend Jack Harris is being driven to the wall by cattle rustlers too powerful to be caught. Tim flips a coin to the counter and strides out. As he is riding through the hills he sees four men hold up the stage coach and with deadly accuracy he picks off the one who has taken the satchel. The bandit drops from his saddle while the others flee. Tim seizes the bag of money from the disabled outlaw and brings it safely back to town.

At the ranch of his friend Jack Harris, Tim is given a warm greeting when he says he is coming to work as a ranch hand, but it is with a look of amazement that Tim again greets Margaret, Jack's daughter, whom he has last seen as a child. As he enters his quarters, he looks back after the lovely girl and trips over a red haired figure sprawled over a cot. Mumbling, the cowboy delivers an uppercut which sends Tim staggering backwards. Tim is about to retaliate when he cries, "Red!" and Red Barger swears roundly and gleefully as he pumps the hand of his pal. Outside Red admires Silver and tells Tim he is on time to enter the wagon race soon to be held in town.

While warming Silver up in the hills, Tim hears a girl cry out and at sight of Margaret struggling in the arms of a man, Tim tears into the fellow. Only after the man has jumped on his horse while Tim has gone to the support of the dazed Margaret, does Tim recognize his old enemy Jim Dalton and his jaw tightens. As he escorts Margaret back safely she admires Silver and he tells her she is to feel free to ride him any time.

Once on a return from a cattle sale, Tim discovers both Margaret and Silver are gone. But when Silver comes back alone, whinneying, Tim senses trouble and hurriedly sends Red to round up every fighting man in the vicinity. They all meet at a fork in the trail and Tim lets Silver guide them to the Dalton hideout. Shooting begins in earnest and Tim leaps through a window to rescue Margaret who is fighting off Jim Dalton. With a muttered curse for his Nemesis, Jim escapes leaving the rest of his gang to be captured.

The day of the wagon race, however, Jim is at hand to loosen the wheels of Tim's wagon and only Tim's remarkable strength and Silver's valiant effort saves them from disaster and, to the amazement of the crowd Tim rides the disabled wagon to victory. At the bar Jim is waiting with drawn gun. Tim enters. When the smoke of battle clears only Tim walks away. Outside the crowd is cheering and as Tim accepts the race prize he draws into his arms the lovely Margaret and asks her an important question.

NAVY MEN

Walter S. Poe Comedy Drama File No. 10305

WHERE you saw Jack Blane you were sure to see Bob Hall. Sailors both, stationed on the same ship, Jack was noisy and aggressive and always seemed to be getting into a scrap. But give him time to whistle his four note call, and Bob would come flying to his aid, fists flying, and in a few minutes, arm in arm, and caps pushed back on their heads, Jack and Bob would triumphantly leave the fray while their victims were left strewn about.

Nothing could break up their friendship until the advent of Betty. And for a while even Betty treated them both with equal friendliness. Ashore the three were always together until Jack began to recognize unmistakably that he rated second in her affections. Bob, blissfully unaware of Jack's brooding would come home dreamy-eyed to rave about how marvelous Betty was and what a great sport she was. Then one day when they got into a fight over which side of the bunk Betty's picture belonged on, Jack strode over to his pal and told him once and for all they ought to have it out. Jack knew, he said that Betty loved him. To prove it he'd ask her tonight to marry him. Bob scoffed at Betty's acceptance of the ring Jack twirled and said Betty would be wearing after this evening, but Jack swaggered out. Disappointed at seeing only Jack, Betty asked for Bob. Jack scratched his head as if he found it hard to tell the truth about his own pal, but finally he explained that Bob was tired of being true to one woman. He claimed they were all alike and had taken out a girl he picked up. Betty broke down but Jack comforted her in a brotherly fashion and suggested that she show Bob she didn't care. In fact, Jack continued, he'd even help her in a scheme. Accordingly he induced her to wear his engagement ring and took her to a show. All the way through the performance Betty was miserable, but Jack was so sympathetic and the following night when she saw Bob, who had gotten drunk to forget that Betty had chosen Jack, she decided to show him. Jack strutted more than ever and Bob avoided him, spending his time drinking pint after pint of gin. However, Shorty, who was Bob's assistant, happened to be sitting next to Betty and Jack one night when Jack fed Betty's resentment by telling her lies about Bob, and when, that night, Bob came home staggering drunk, he decided to interfere. Calling on Betty he pleaded with her to make Bob stop drinking. Betty asked why she should after what Bob said about her. "Did you hear him?" asked Shorty and admitting she had gotten it from Jack, Betty began at length to believe Shorty's earnest pleas. Together they began a search of all the night spots of the city until they came to one where Bob, hilariously drunk, was flailing his arms about and threatening anyone to come up and fight him. With great difficulty they managed to get Bob to Betty's house and put him to bed. Next morning realizing where he was, Bob started to leave, but Betty came in and persuaded him she loved him. When Bob learned Jack's part of the business, he dashed out of the house. Minutes later he returned with a black eye and a minister. Only after they were to see Jack's shiner, and deciding he had spent married did Bob explain briefly that Betty ought enough time talking, he bent expertly to Betty's lips.

The lady phones the police and among the curious throng comes Don Carlos who explains to the police that Violet had doubtlessly mistaken this room for his where he had left some jewels for her. Violet is freed and accepts Don Carlos' invitation to walk in the park. There she admits to him that she dares not leave with him, fearing the Wolf who would kill them both. Don Carlos assures her, however, that she has a right to happiness and in sensuous words describes the glamorous and beautiful island of Porto last Violet promises to sail with him and they Rico and his father's vast sugar plantation. At take passage on the S. S. the Tropical. When the Wolf discovers that Violet has betrayed him he and his gang board an English ship and at the point of guns force the Captain to sail. The radio operator, however, wires the Tropical which in turn sends for help from the Air Police Force, six heavily armed planes. The Wolf opens fire and is answered by a volley from the Tropical. The Air Squadron arrives and the gangsters at last surrender. The wedding of Violet and Don Carlos is celebrated on the high seas and the young pair find peace and happiness in Porto Rico.

THE GLORY OF YESTERDAY

Oscar Mendez Drama File No. 10563

IN a German City beer and patriotic speeches flow freely as a great statue is unveiled in honor of Vincent Von Gordon, an obscure scientist who, loving his Fatherland, devoted his last experiments to the devising of a lethal gas deadly enough to protect his country in case of war. The only two of the great crowd who do not share the general enthusiasm are the widow and son of the inventor, who foresee that the gas will be a curse on mankind bringing havoc and destruction in its wake. When the government awards them a pension and a Munition Corporation gives them a large sum of money, Earl decides to invest the money to redress the evil he thinks his father has done, and induces his mother to accompany him to the United States where he can work upon a counter-formula.

War breaks out in Europe and soon Von Gordon's invention begins to serve its diabolic purpose. The United States enters the war and while the drums of embittered countries are beating funeral marches, in a small, dingy laboratory in New York City, the Von Gordons are spending their last penny for the benefit of mankind. Nights Earl works at his chemicals while his mother aids much the same way that she aided her late husband in the early days. Meanwhile Madeline Frane has fallen in love with Earl, and troubled by his constantly harassed expression, she begs him to tell her what it is he is working on. At home her father, a war official, speaks constantly of the undermining influence of German spies, and when, one night, Madeline determines to take Earl away from his night work and see that he gets some recreation, she finds him at work upon his gas. Despite her love for him, out of a sense of patriotism she delivers Earl to the police as a German sympathizer who is planning to destroy the United States with his deadly gas. The Von Gordons' story that they are devising a counter gas to end war and avoid more wholesale murder is ridiculed. And when through the espionage system the Germans discover that the son of Von Gordon, the Patriot, has betrayed them to the enemy, they send through the same system information discrediting Earl's story and denying that Vincent ever had a son.

Madeline, however, is now convinced that Earl's story is true and pleads with her father to intercede for her lover. Earl pleads for a chance to prove his invention is what he says it is and is given financial aid to carry on. With Earl's formula the deadly effects of the Von Gordon lethal gas are soon combatted, and the war is soon ended.

Earl receives his reward for his service and he and Madeline are married. With his mother and his bride, Earl comes to Germany and assuming imaginary names, the three go on a charitable tour aiding war orphans, establishing a Peace Temple, and building up the stricken country. Visiting his home town, Earl finds that the statue of his father has been demolished and a shrine of peace erected nearby. From the town gossips, Earl learns further that all praise is being given to a son of the city who has been called a traitor during the war and now is hailed as a benefactor to mankind, a humanist whose name is Earl Von Gordon. Without revealing that he is Earl Von Gordon, Earl, takes his wife and mother aboard a yacht for a much earned rest. Somewhere in the South Seas they procure an old newspaper and read that the world, grown weary of peace, has, hit by depression, turned to war to give work to idle hands. In his imagination Earl sees the people of his city turning their backs to the peace shrine, and seizing guns. A bombshell destroys the temple and a new statue is erected to a grinning War God. And as the yacht sails on through serene waters, Earl dreams of a new generation in which the warrior would lose his glamor and the glory of the day fall on the shoulders of human benefactors.

THE SCARLET CRESCENT

Charles Sheppard Drama File No. 10205

SADDENED because he has no son, and telling his wife, Sarah, that his life as a merchant is dull and futile, Kurd Osman Pasha leaves his luxurious home in Mersin, Turkey, and sets forth for Adana. At the outskirts of the city of Uan he sees a young girl selling pottery and carved cigarette holders, and persuades her to accompany him to a cafe. She tells him that she is Maria Alaska, the daughter of a Turkish banker who was robbed and murdered, and she is forced to make her own way in the world. Osman persuades her to live with him as his wife, providing her with beautiful clothing. Making friends in the city, Osman opens a bank and prepares to settle down, but when he kills the murderers of Maria's father in vengeance, he burns his own bank, first removing all the jewels and money, and leaves the city in order to escape arrest. Finding refuge at an Armenian farm near Harpoot, he seeks lodging at the home of Christians. Osman is attracted to the landlord's daughter, Rose, and wishes to marry her, but the girl's parents refuse, as he is a Kurd. In a rage, he kills them, and takes Rose. Osman becomes an outlaw, plundering the stores and banks of Turkey, later going to Arabia. One day he sets forth again, leaving a watch and pistol with Rose, instructing her to give it to their son, if the child she is expecting is a boy.

A few months later the baby is born, and is, indeed, a son, whom Rose names Alec. When he goes to school the child it at first ostracized by his Turkish classmates, because his mother is a Christian and his father a Kurd, but the Armenians welcome him. As he reaches young manhood, a band of Kurds invade his city, killing Armenians. Alec decides to avenge his friends, and kills several Kurds by hurling milk cans filled with gun powder at them. Taking the pistol and watch of his father, he sets forth for the camp of the Kurd leader. Assuming the name of a young man whose mother informed him had been invited to join the Kurd forces, and wearing a scarlet crescent, he gains admission. A young man named Sarkas befriends him, and conducts him to the camp of their leader. Forcing all those present to climb into sacks, which he ties, making them helpless to act, he is about to assassinate the leader when the man recognizes his gun, and informs the boy that he is Kurd Osman Pasha, his father. Relenting, the boy and Osman turn homeward to find Rose. On the way they find a French girl, Pauline, lying in a caravan, a victim of sleeping sickness, beside her father, who has been killed by the bite of a poisonous snake. They take her with them, reviving her. The next day soldiers surround their camp, and Osman is killed. Pauline severely wounded in the battle which follows.

Taking the girl in his arms, Alec pours out his love, and places his ring upon her finger, saying that he wishes to marry her, but she dies in his embrace, begging him not to become an outlaw, as his father was, and he promises to heed her words. Bidding a sad farewell to his father and sweetheart, Alec turns homeward.

THE LOVE WALTZ

Lucy Holloway Drama File No. 10536

AS they scrub the floors of the orphanage, the four pinched faced little girls beg Sue to dance for them and their eyes glow as her lithe young body pirouettes gracefully in the drab room. Suddenly a stern voice interrupts and the frightened children chime, "Good morning, Mrs. Crosley." Sharply the head matron takes away the privilege of their play hour as punishment for idling and as the youngsters huddle together later, Sue is sent for. In Mrs. Crosley's office she is informed that Mr. Carton has kindly offered to give Sue a home. Sue's eyes meet the cold grey ones of her "benefactor" and a shudder passes through her body. Before she goes Mrs. Leaner, the only matron who shows any affection for the youngsters, confides to Sue that she has looked up her record but all that she can find is that

Sue was left by a woman who gave her name as Mrs. Judy Jones.

At the Carton farm Sue winces as she feels the lecring eyes of Carton upon her wherever she goes, and when Ellis, one of the farm hands whose intelligent face is strangely contrasted with the other eight members of the household, helps Sue with the dishes, Pearl Carton, spoiled daughter of Sid, takes an immediate hatred of the "orphan brat," and her scheme to accuse Sue of stealing her money is frustrated by Ellis. Then one day, left alone at home, Sue looks up into the grinning face of Sid Carton and as his strong arms seize her she cries out. Instantly Ellis appears and the two men struggle. Suddenly Sid is knocked backwards, his head striking a table. For a moment he lies moaning, then is still. Frightened Sue stares then she and Ellis flee. For days they run through the orchards and forests and at last take shelter at a farm house. In Denver they halt and trembling buy a paper. They see headlines, "Police search for pair who attempted to murder Sid Carton" and a little prayer of thanksgiving goes up that at least they did not kill him. Knowing that if they attempt to get married they will be caught, they decide to separate and meet clandestinely. Ellis takes a position as a hotel cook, and Sue, despite Ellis' warnings, secures work as a night club entertainer. She winces at the open-mouthed stares of coarse men, at the glaring lights and rough language but conceals all that from Ellis lest he worry about her. Among her many admirers is one Langley who waits for her the first night and insists on driving her home. Somewhat to her surprise he does not attempt to molest her and the next night repeats the performance. However, one Red Morrison, who supplies the club with booze, takes a fancy to Sue and by a ruse Sue escapes him. The next night he grows abusive and she slaps him. Langley calls for her as usual but Sue is through. That night Ellis exultantly shows her a newspaper without any reference to the Carter case and tells her as long as they have ceased to be news they can be married. At the City Hall, however, just as they are about to start, police come and arrest Sue for the murder of Red Morrison. However, when things look blackest, Langley shows up to provide an alibi for Sue and prove that the owner of the night club killed Red, hoping Sue would be held. Langley reveals he is a detective employed by Sue's mother to find her. After all these years Sue's mother had been reconciled to the reformed gambler who had deserted her, and Sue finds at one time a mother, a father, and a husband in the person of Ellis.

SURRENDER

A. E. King Drama File No. 10428

A BITTER rivalry exists between two sparkers (wireless telegraphists) in the Royal Navy and just before the boat docks, Albert Edward Jones and Manfred Wicks clash. The fight is stopped by the arrival of a superior officer, and the men go back to their places. Ashore on leave, Jones takes a bus ride and notices the dismay of a pretty girl Mary Scott as she discovers she has left her purse at home. The cockney conductor exclaims angrily that he is not going to be taken in again and as he is about to put the girl off, Jones pays her fare and induces her to borrow money for the purchases she intended making in town. When she learns he is a sparker she in forms him that her father is a retired sparker himself, and when Jones escorts her home, Mary's father shows him his wireless set which he is unable to fix. After hours of tinkering with the set, Jones gets it to go and wins the admiration of Mr. Scott. Mary smiles at their friendship and later as she and Jones take a stroll together she tells him she is coxswain of a local girl's boat crew which, in a weeks time is racing another local club. If they win this event they will create a record for the most successive wins. Jones, who has rowed for his team at school learns that Mary's crew is traveling down to Greys a few days before the race to put in a bit of stiff training and Jones, without informing Mary, travels dawn to Greys and watching the crew performs gives them some pointers. It is his training that causes Mary's crew to win by a length and a half and Mary jumping out of the boat happily embraces Jones. They are observed by Wicks who has come down with his brother. Wicks frowns and his brother asks if he knows the fellow with the pretty Mary Scott.

Meanwhile Jones confesses his love to Mary but they decide to hold their marriage up until his boat returns from a long trip. Promising to write regularly, Mary waves to Jones as the boat pulls out and absently greets William Wicks who has come down to the dock to see his brother off. Aboard the ship, there is much complaint about petty robbery, and a captain's messenger, Peter, who has always looked up to Jones as his particular hero is held. Jones pats his head and assures the badly frightened lad that he believes in his innocence and when, a few days later he catches Wicks stealing, he exposes him and Peter is freed. Wicks nurses his grudge against Jones and writes a letter to his brother with the result that William, strengthening his friendship with Mary on the basis of their common interest in H. M. S. The Falcon, soon reports that Jones had been severely punished for stealing, according to his brother's letters. Mary at first refuses to believe the story, but so convincingly does Wicks report the action taken, that when Mary finds from her father that that is exactly the procedure when a man is discovered to be a thief, she does not answer any of Jones letters and his own are returned to him unopened. However, when the ship docks, Mary overhears the Wicks discussing their scheme, and running to Jones, Mary begs for forgiveness and gives him a ten shilling note. "What's that for?" Jones asks. "Remember our first meeting?" and as they both smile, he takes her into his arms.

CORAL CAVES

Florence R. Bacon Short Subject File No. 10420

ENCHANTED by the charm of Lurline, a mermaid, the Merland King resolves to woo his beautiful subject, and make her his queen. At his command, his loyal henchman comb the ocean for its richest pearls and sunken treasures; selecting the choicest jewels, he presents them to the winsome mermaid so that she will border her gauze-like, green robe with them. More beautiful than ever in this rich robe, Lurline completely captivates the heart of the monarch, and he pleads with her to share his throne, to which the capricious maiden agrees. The King decrees a day of celebration, and while his subjects sing and pledge his health, he gives Lurline a pair of wings, silvery in their sheen, as a betrothal present. Teasingly, she asks her lord what she shall do with these, as he fastens the wings to her shoulders, and, playfully, he replies: "Fly from me, sweet." No sooner are these words spoken than Lurline, with a flutter of the wings, soars into the air, far above his head. In a fury of rage, the Merland King lashes the sea and beats the waves, until even skeletons of seamen who had long ago been called to Davy Jones' locker rock in their watery graves. The celebration ended, the merrymakers' rejoicing changes to a wail of lament, while the Merland King calls out in his rage, but the heartless Lurline only laughs, a note of mockery in her merry tinkle, as she flies out of sight. She soars through the air, happy in her now freedom, until she spies a ship's high mast, where a sailor stands, singing a ballad of the sea.

Astonished, the sailor questions where she is going, and, settling at his side, she replies; "No farther away," as she takes off her silvery wings, and throws them into the ocean; then she plucks the gems from her rich robe, and fashions them into a chain, which she winds about the neck of her new found love. In the first port where the good ship anchors, the sailor sells his chain of gems, and purchases a mighty new vessel, and, with Lurline, sails across distant seas. At length, a terrific storm overtakes them, and the beams of the strong ship are severely shaken. As the mighty waves crush the walls of the vessel, the crew is sent to a watery grave, but Lurline clasps her love to her, and guides him through the tempest to a coral cave, where she bids him hide, while she sees if the Merland King is approaching, as she fears. While he thinks of his lovely sea sweetheart, a group of mermaids and men surround him, shouting, and bear him to the Merland King, who terrifies him with his anger. Sick with fear, the sailor betrays his love, saying that he will restore the maiden who fled from his court, if the king will signal the next vessel that passes, and safely have his envoys conduct him there. This is done, and as the sailor departs, the king and his court hasten to the coral cave. When Lurline discovers her lover's treachery she wrathfully declares vengeance on all men on land or sea, the king has a magic girdle of tiny, silvery bells welded about the waist of the mermaid, so that their sweet, uneasy tinkle will warn all men never to venture near. Blindfolded, with a grim merman on either side, the maiden is conducted over many waters, following a tangled and tortuous route, till she is left, at last, at an isolated prison, beneath a lake. Alone, she wanders in her watery world, sometimes singing in tune with the sad, strange bells, the weird music terrifying all who hear the banished mermaid.

GIRL OF THE HILLS

Mrs. T. M. Cahill Drama File No. 9582

EVEN as a little boy, Randall Wallingford, of the Virginia Wallingfords, played in the shadow of a mighty river a few miles from his home, and built miniature bridges and dams, repeatedly telling his fond mother that he wanted to be an engineer. In his 'teens, he still came to the same secluded nook, to dream of his half-formed plans for the future. Startled one day, as he rode toward the spot, by the sound of wild hoof beats, he saw a huge bay galloping across the fields, a frightened golden-haired little girl astride it. Succeeding in stopping the horse, he learned that the rider was Cynthia Sanderson, the oldest daughter of a hill family, living near the river's edge, and farming the lands around it. Young as they were, the boy and girl felt a strange attraction for each other, although they were both aware of their difference in social position.

Four years passed, before the two met again, but Randy never forgot the smiling eyes and lovely hair of Cynthia Sanderson. During those years, Randy finished his engineering course at college, and as his mother had hoped, found pleasure in a deep friendship with Sylvia Carrollton, the only daughter of the Wallingford's nearest neighbor, Edmund Carrollton. Since childhood, the two parents had planned for the marriage of their children, and seeing that Randy seemed to care for Sylvia, Carrollton promised his daughter a generous wedding dowry. Randy, anxious to start on his career, secured an engineering post with the state, which was interested in projecting improvements in the hill country.

Meanwhile, Cynthia, against the wishes of her parents who were kindly folks, but poorly educated, completed her schooling in town, and began teaching, her four little brothers and sisters among her students. She too remembered her childhood cavalier, but whenever she looked toward the stately mansion in the valley below her home, she knew how hopeless her dreams were.

When Sylvia left to study in England, although nothing definite had been said, Randy felt bound to Sylvia, and determining to be a success, planned to harness the power of the broad river that flowed over the Sanderson land, and enthusiastically told Mr. Carrollton of his plan. Accidently meeting Cynthia again, where he had first seen her, Randy was again drawn to her, and revealed to her, in strictest confidence his attempt to win the state's approval of his project. With the return of Sylvia, who had changed in some indefinable way, Cynthia felt that Randy had merely been playing with her affections, and refused to see him any longer. Arriving home from school one afternoon, she was surprised to find Mr. Carrollton, negociating with her father for the purchase of the Sanderson land. Realizing that this would spoil Randy's plan, since the state would have to pay Mr. Carrollton a considerable sum for the property, Cynthia, at first was glad to have an opportunity to hurt the man whom she believed had lied to her. But aware of the meanness of her thought, she detained Mr. Carrollton, meanwhile sending her young brother to summon Randy. Seeing him rushing down the road, she slipped out and hurriedly explained the situation. Randy, confronting Carrollton with his betrayal of his confidence, wrung from Carrollton the confession that he had lost his fortune, and took this way of making money so as to give his daughter the dowry promised her. Sylvia, who had come to fetch her father, heard his last words, and blurted out that the man she really loved was Nigel Carter, an Englishman, but had given him up because she felt she was obligated to Randy. With a glad cry, Randy went towards Cynthia, his joyful expression revealing all his love for her. And a month later, as Sylvia and Nigel were married in London, Randall Wallingford and his wife, Cynthia, stood proudly with Mrs. Wallingford and watched the governor of the state break the ground for the power house that was Randall's greatest dream.

THE POOR RICH

Agnes Andreasin Drama File No. 10471

AS they are seated at the dinner table, Mrs. Steven Storm persuades her husband that it would be advisable for them to purchase a home where their only child, Girlie, might have a spacious yard in which to play. Agreeing with her, Steven and his wife select a mansion on Riverside drive, deciding to enjoy a little of the small fortune recently willed to them by Steven's parents. Soon they move from their city apartment to this new establishment, high on a hillside, and Mrs. Storm telephones an employment agency, asking them to send applicants for the positions of governess and chauffeur, while she engages a butler recommended by a friend. That afternoon, an attractive and well educated young girl applies, and is employed as a governess for Girlie, although she has no references, as she has recently graduated from an eastern school, and sought this, her first position, as the family fortunes have recently collapsed; she gives her name as Miss Jerry Fabian. Wilbur Gordon, a personable young man, until recently employed as an air pilot, is engaged as chauffeur. He soon becomes a devoted admirer of the governess, and Girlie is delighted with both of them. Reading in the daily paper of the success of his former war time buddy, Steve, Max Greensberg, a racketeer, familiarly known as the Beer Baron, resolves to share his good fortune. When Jerry is taking her young ward for a trip to the toy store, Max drives up to them in a high-powered car, strikes the governess with a blackjack, and seizes the child, telling her that he is taking her to see another display of dolls.

Hysterical when she regains consciousness, Jerry at first is unable to relate what has happened, and, later, when the incident comes back to her, cannot recall the license number of the car in which the child was kidnapped. Charging her with purposely withholding the truth, police suspect Jerry of being an accomplice, but Wilbur assures her that he has complete faith in her. Max drives the startled Girlie to his headquarters in chinatown, where he leaves her in the care of Charley Faust, a hunchback; he soon makes the little girl feel at home, telling her stories and quieting her fears. Reading in the Herald Tribune that the child's anxious parents are willing to do anything in their power to regain their daughter, Max writes an anonymous note, advising Kenneth Storm, Steven's brother, and his wife, Trina, to bring forty thousand dollars in ransom money to the aquarium at the Battery, and present it to a man who will touch them, as he passes. Unable to raise this amount immediately, they give one thousand dollars to the stranger; Steven Storm, watching the procedure from a corner of the building, recognizes Greenberg, but before he can reach him, he is gone. When Max neglects Girlie, leaving an inadequate supply of food and blankets for the child, Charlie's kind heart is touched, and concealing the little girl in a huge coal bucket, he carries her to a truck, and drives to the home of his grandmother, on the East side of the city. Telling his grandmother that he rescued Girlie from a drunken father who was beating her, Charlie urges her to care for the child and keep her away from public view, which she gladly agrees to do.

As she is mechanically dressing, the numbers of the license plate on Max's car suddenly come to Jerry's mind, and she seems to see them in the mirror. At once, she informs the police and Wilbur that the number they seek is 608. Wilbur recalls that he saw a man changing a plate by that number in a public garage recently, and, remembering that the plate he drove away with was numbered 71981, he reports this, and police, by this clue, arrest Max. He confesses to the kidnapping, but cannot produce the child, until Charlie makes known his part of the venture. Max is sentenced to the penetentiary, while Charlie is liberally rewarded by Girlie's happy parents, and Wilbur, receiving a position as pilot again, takes Jerry into his arms, as she consents to become his wife.

MARRIAGE LICENSE

Nahan Pfaff Drama File No. 10499

AT college on a scholarship, Paula Payson is beside herself with joy when she learns that she has been selected as premiere danseuse in the big Revue, playing opposite the wealthy and popular football hero, Richard Lansdowne Arrick, III. Nor does Richard object to playing love scenes with the radiant Paula, as his adoring younger brother Bob observes. The rehearsals proceed miraculously without a hitch and the excited manager goes frantic worrying that something will happen, but the opening night the performance is greeted with a hushed silence for a moment, followed by thunderous applause. In the wings, Richard kisses the starry-eyed Paula and whispers that he loves her, while Richard's father congratulates him gaily and says, watching those love scenes he felt young again. Richard begs off going to dinner with his family, but his father winks as he suggests that he come and bring the young lady. The haughty Mrs. Arrick strains herself being cordial to her son's guest, but that night she shows her disapproval as she questions Richard closely about the girl and sees how enthusiastic he is over a "nobody."

The play goes on tour and the romance of Dick and Paula progresses. On their return, Dick persuades his mother to invite Paula up for dinner and that night he asks her to marry him. Although it all seems like a dream to her, Paula gently explains that it was her father's dearest wish that she should make a name for herself as a dancer, and that she has already signed a contract to study with a famous professor. Richard is dismayed but his mother having seen the two together, after supper comes in to Paula and with great dignity informs her she is not to fall in love with Richard who is expected to graduate from college and carry on his father's business. Tears smart Paula's eyes as she is about to inform Mrs. Arrick that her son has already expressed his desire to be married, but she keeps her counsel. That night Mrs. Arrick further induces Richard to leave the small middlewestern college and attend an Eastern University, and, hating to thing of college without Paula, Richard at length agrees. Triumphantly Mrs. Arrick informs her husband that Richard has acceded to her wish that he go East, since she is herself an Easterner and the bone of contention between the Arricks had always been whether or not Richard would attend his father's Alma Mater or go East where his mother had acquired her snobbishness. For the two weeks before Paula is to leave for her dance studies, Richard and she are together constantly, with Bob fondly envious of his brother's happiness. Then work starts in earnest for Paula and spurred on by the hopes of her teacher Paula practices until she is exhausted while Richard dashes out to see her whenever possible. Then Richard enters the big Eastern college and soon the boy from the middlewest is creating a sensation on the football field, while Paula, appearing at a concert is given her great opportunity to go to Paris. Before she leaves she accepts the invitation of friends of Richard's family to come up to the college for the weekend, and her last night there, after they have regretfully kissed each other goodbye, Richard, unable to stand the thought of parting, makes his way back to Paula's room. The next day she sails, and Richard presses an envelope into her hand.

At first sensational as a dancer, Paula finds herself tiring easily and at length discovers she is going to have a child. Eagerly she follows reports of the big game, the last Richard is to play, and stares trembling at the newspaper that reports Richard has been seriously injured. Bob telegrams are encouraging until one reports that Meningitis set in and Richard died suddenly. It is in Vienna that Mrs. Arrick accidently meets Paula incognito in the hospital and superciliously regards Paula's baby, who, at the corner of his eye has his father's birthmark. But it is Bob who embraces Paula as with dignity she shows Mrs. Arrick the "letter of introduction" Richard had given her—their marriage license.

DANCE HALL GIRL

Mary E. Mack Drama File No. 10502

TURNED down at all the employment agencies, Joan sways dizzily and is assisted by a red haired girl who, learning that she is desperately in need of work—any kind of work—gets Joan a position with her as a taxi dancer. Joan is seen by Harrington Lee, a white haired handsome blueblood, who is sufficiently impressed with her to offer her a position as companion to his mother, an exacting dowager. Meanwhile Joan's mother, Betty, becomes more seriously ill and when the doctor gravely asserts that only a long vacation can help her, Joan seriously considers the proposal of Harrington Lee although she has since fallen in love with Jack Daly, penniless protegee of Harrington Lee, who has known Jack's father. At the same time Nell who has always wanted to find a wealthy protector falls in love with the hardworking Frank Somers and finds all her theories going up in smoke.

Harrington's mother dies but not before she has confessed that she had broken up the one love of her son's life by having his marriage annulled through lies. In her last moments Mrs. Lee makes the comforting Joan promise that she will not rest until she has found the girl and her baby and made up to her for all the suffering. Betty rapidly recovers under proper care but the big dramatic moment comes when Harrington Lee, having driven Joan to meet her mother, cries out, "Betty!" and discovers that Joan's mother is the girl whom he had married and been separated from by his mother. As the daughter of the millionaire Harrington Lee, Joan is free to marry Jack Daly but Nell, feeling she no longer belongs, disappears and Joan is disconsolate as all efforts to trace her fail. However, just as she is beginning to doubt the sincerity of Harrington, he locates Nell through the ruse of inserting an ad for a girl with dance hall experience and Nell, answering it, is induced to come back to them. Nell marries her Frank after the colorful ceremony reuniting Harrington and Betty, and Jack goes to work in one of Harrington's plants. However, his rapid advance, deserved though it is, is resented by Joe Mann, and the enmity is the one thorn in the happiness of the enegaged pair.

Nell returns from the combination honeymoon and business trip to find that her friends have outfitted a cottage for her as a wedding gift. The first night back she and Frank are sitting alone before their hearth when the bell rings violently and a white faced Joan bursts in to tell them that Jack is being held on a murder charge. When Nell learns that the murdered man, Joe Mann was having a fight with Pete Harris when Jack, summoned to stop them, was alleged to have shot at Joe and killed him, she looks thoughtful and starts as she receives a description of Pete. Calming the hysterical Joan, Nell visits Pete and recognizes him as the brother of one of the dance hall girls whom Joe had ruined. Although Pete denies that it was he who killed Joe and shifted the evidence, when Nell promises him all the Harrington Lee influence to lighten his sentence, he admits the story and is, after a dramatic trial, given a minimum sentence. Jack, freed, finds a trembling Joan waiting for him, and as he gathers her in his arms, Harrington and Betty, and Nell and Frank softly withdraw.

NEW DAY

Clifford Norman Bourne Drama File No. 10500

AT the regular weekly luncheon of the Business Association a discussion is in progress as to the cause of the recent cigar maker's strike. Robert Keene, a real estate and investment broker, John Lane, president of the Citizen's Bank and Eddie Farrel, a visitor in the Florida city each advance their theories, but only Sam Biglow, leader in the factory district, has a true insight of the facts. Smiling expansively, he tolerantly explains that two of the wives of the factory workers indulged in a fantastic bleaching treatment for their hair, and, discouraged by the expense this entailed, their husbands refused to continue working, the other employees following suit. Lane's hands clench angrily at this patronizing and absurd statement by this man who is corrupting labor conditions in the city where he has worked so diligently for civic betterment, but the banker says nothing.

Following the luncheon, Robert returns to his office, where he reads a letter from an old college friend, now a Senator in Washington, advising him to become a detective and writer, as he had once planned, as the need for men of high calibre in this work is paramount today. In amusement, Robert compares a photograph of himself, decorated with sideburns, and taken during university days, with his present trim appearance. Falling asleep, he dreams of circles, gathering to listen to his words, and the whole world seems composed of round objects. He is awakened when Elsie Lawson, a young girl whom he loves, calls.

Elsie is appointed to drive home the winner of a car, raffled off at the county Fair. Eddie Farrel purchases twelve tickets, but Robert, buying only two, is the lucky man, and as they ride through the park, he tells Elsie of his love, and although she returns it, she replies that her mother, a widow, wishes her to marry Farrel, and they must wait. Eddie purchases a dry goods store willed to Elsie and her mother by Tom Lawson, for $25,000. Determined to make a little change in himself, so that he may win Elsie, Robert disguises himself in sideburns, and calls at the home of his friend, the Senator, in Washington, D. C., where he is cordially received, and presented to the Senator's daughter, Julia. At the Senator's instigation, he writes an open letter to bank presidents, including John Lane, offering to help them trace persons responsible for starting panics. Lane offers $1000. reward, in the event he gives information leading to the conviction of such a person, at any time, as he fears a panic is approaching, and, assuming the name of "Mr. Circle," Robert returns to Florida, disguised beyond recognition. When the bank refuses Eddie a business loan of $5000. he borrows it from Mrs. Lawson, Elsie's mother, in spite of the protests of Elsie and John Lane. Angered by Lane's conversation, which he overhears, Eddie cashes this check, and withdraws an additional sum equal to it which he had on account, sewing these bills in his vest. He then advises Biglow, who calls at his Dry Goods Store to open a charge account, that the bank is insolvent, and the cigar factory workers withdraw their savings, causing a panic.

Robert discovers the truth of the matter through Biglow's wife, who inadvertently contradicts her husband's story of the beauty treatment. In the presence of the Lawsons, Lane, the Senator and Julia, Eddie is arrested, but Julia, who knew him before his venture in Florida, persuades them to drop charges, after Eddie influences the factory men to return their deposits, and the telephone girls, overhearing the conversation, follow suit. A special Act of Congress appoints Robert as conservator to carry on this work, and, removing his disguise, he claimes Elsie at last, while Julia and Eddie embrace.

IS THIS JUSTICE?

Blanche Gephart Spedding Drama File No. 10507

TWIN sons of a wealthy Montana rancher, Jerry and Terry, young handsome, and popular, led campus activities at an Eastern University. Jerry, the steadier of the two, watched with amusement his brother's peccadilloes, and restrained his mirth as Terry proclaimed that each girl was after a fraternity dance, however, Terry seemed the only one in the world for him. One night more than usually moved, and when Jerry put his tongue to his cheek, Terry leaned forward and insisted with great seriousness that this time he really was in love. Moreover, one glance at the quiet Helen told Jerry that whether or not his twin was serious, this girl was in love with Terry. For a few days the affair ran its course and at last Jerry took his brother aside and informed him it wasn't fair to Helen. At first resentful of Jerry's implications, Terry finally acknowledged that he intended marrying Helen after graduation, and had the grace to blush before Jerry's fixed look. The night before the fraternity stag, Helen called up and Jerry heard his brother assure the girl he'd meet her to-morrow at City Hall and she had nothing to worry about. All that night Jerry worried at the amount of liquor Terry was consuming, but the other boys had as much and there was no stopping Terry. At last six of them piled into Terry's car and as they speeded through the night the car crashed. The first to awaken to consciousness, Jerry realized in one blinding flash that if Terry were held for this, it would ruin Helen's life as well as his, and dragging himself to the wheel he took his brother's place. When one of the victims died in the hospital, Society demanded payment, and Jerry heard the Judge condemn him as a drunken, reckless fool, a menace to others, a murderer sentenced to prison for a term from five to twenty years.

The years passed slowly. At the age of twenty-three Jerry was freed only to find that his father had disinherited him. Before he could recover from the shock of his father's denunciation the door slammed to. With only the money left him by his maternal grandmother, Jerry left town and riding on to Texas purchased the B Bar B ranch. Prison and injustice had made of Jerry a hermit and now he went into town only when he needed supplies. After months of veritable isolation, Jerry stopped in at Ma Blair's the best eating house in town, only to find a pretty waitress struggling with a ruffian. One blow sent the fellow out, and Jerry learned that Nancy was a niece of Ma Blair, recently arrived on the stage coach. Although he fought shy of women, there was something appealing about Nancy and learning that she dared not go riding alone, Jerry offered his services as escort. Even when Jerry told of his prison term, Nancy continued to look at him adoringly and at last in the front parlor of Ma Blair's they were married.

Then one day came Jerry's father. Years had lined his face and as Jerry invited him in to meet his wife, Dan Masters grasped his son's hand and told how Terry had, after years of philandering, been killed by his neglected wife, Helen, and had, before dying, confessed that it was he and not Jerry who had driven the death car. Brokenly Dan asked his son to come back and take his rightful place, but Jerry, arm about Nancy's slim shoulders, shook his head and said his place was here, where he had at last, found happiness.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE MIGHTY

N. Philip Watterson Drama File No. 10450

IN celebration of his twelfth birthday, George Randall is taken by his Uncle Ned to see Bob Fitzsimmons, touring the country in vaudeville. Afterwards, the youngster follows, breathless with excitement, when his uncle goes to the dressing room of the former champion, and introduces George to him. Eyes shining with hero worship, George can scarcely believe he is not dreaming when Fitzsimmons warmly shakes his hand, and presents the boy with an autographed picture of himself in fighting apparel. All the way home on the train, George relives this glorious moment, and announces to his uncle that he, too, will someday be a great fighter, while Ned Randall nods in understanding at the enthusiasm of this boy whom he has cared for since the death of George's parents. At home on the farm, Emily, Ned's own little girl, is shown the treasured 'pitcher," and told of the career her cousin has decided upon, but the dainty and fastidious child is less enthusiastic than George. At sixteen, George still retains his ambition, and purchases a book of instructions on the technique of boxing for a dollar. With the willing but inexperienced help of his uncle, he soon masters these elementary lessons, and appointing Ned both as trainer and manager, prepares for his first bout with Lefty McPherson, at the Empire Opera House, converted into an arena. Overcome with excitement, Uncle Ned, wearing a large-brimmed straw hat and a spotted tie, shouts out suggestions to his nephew in the ring, more emphatic than technical. Furious because the crowd is laughing at the elderly farmer-manager, George determines to show them, and sends his opponent down for the count with a straight left to the jaw.

George, always goaded on by the crowd's uproarious reception of Ned's suggestions, and inspired by Fitzsimmon's picture, which he talks to before each battle, wins a series of victories. At the suggestion of the promoter who signs him, and upon Ned's insistence, George engages the professional services of Terry Madden as his trainer, and is finally in line for a battle with K. O. Baldwin of New York; if he is victorious he will be entitled to challenge the heavyweight champion, Kid Phillips. He asks Emily if she will become his wife, but the girl replies that although she loves him, she does not wish to marry a prize-fighter, and will consent only if he will renounce the ring. George tells her that if he wins the championship, he will be content, and with this money they can provide for Uncle Ned in his old age, and purchase a farm for themselves, adjoining his. She consents to this plan, but warns him that if he does not renounce the ring, regardless of whether or not he succeeds, she will break the engagement. Just before his fight with Baldwin, George receives a telegram, and against his manager's wishes opens it, but when it merely states that the cows were so hard to get into the barn that Ned missed his train, all is well, and with a final glance at Fitzsimmon's picture, George enters the ring. Baldwin drives Randall to the ropes, and hammers him unmercifully, but later, as he is sparring, Baldwin taunts his opponent about Ned. In a flash, the slighter man straightens up, and laughing scornfully, sends his opponent to the floor with a straight to the jaw, catching him in an unguarded moment, and winning the fight, amid wild cheers from the crowd.

When Ned reads in the paper that Phillips the champion is said to be something like Fitzsimmons, George refers him to Webster's definition of "something," and Emily knows the fight is his. After he is acclaimed champion, the wedding takes place.

THE RECKLESS SEX

Paul M. Weitzel Drama File No. 10484

AS the afternoon whistle blows at the Simmons Dress Factory, Dora Hurtz, nineteen, and Mary, her sister, two years younger, join the throng of workers on their way homeward, and walk to the little frame house across the railroad tracks where they live with their parents. Strict and old fashioned, Mr. Hurtz does not encourage the girls to make their home a social center, and as they see their mother, worn with toil and having little to brighten the dull routine of her life, they agree that they long for more excitement themselves, and are determined to win it. In an adventurous spirit, they stop one evening at the close of the day, when two young men, seated in a Ford roadster, say hello, and, noticing their attractive, boyish appearance, return the greeting. Introducing themselves as John Meyers and Henry Smith, the boys soon persuade the two sisters to go for a short ride, and drive to a beer garden at the edge of town. While the four are gaily sipping the foamy liquid, John places a nickel in a slot, and dances with Mary, to the tune of the player piano, while Harry and Dora follow suit. Returning home, the girls invite them into the parlor, and they listen to the radio. After agreeing to meet the following evening, they leave; driving home, John remarks that he knew they were nice girls at a glance, and Henry agrees. It is not long before the two sisters confess that they are both in love, while the boys come to a similar conclusion. Dora says that she does not wish to marry and settle down, as she feels Harry is too serious for her.

Both girls annoy their respective sweethearts in their insatiable desire for dancing, beer gardens and excitement, and these things are all new to them. John proposes to Mary one evening, and she accepts, but he adds that he will want a quieter life when they are married, and the girl assures him that she is not, at heart, "wild," although she likes a little innocent pleasure. The four again are seated at a beer garden when the two men propose that they go home; Mary is willing, but Dora objects violently, and, asking Mary to follow, goes to the ladies' room. Slipping out a side door, Dora recklessly re-enters the garden, and goes to a table where two young men of flashy appearance are seated. Unwilling to leave her, Mary accompanies her sister, and when, at Dora's suggestion, the men ask them to dance, she reluctantly consents, in order that she may watch the older, and more reckless, girl. Tired of waiting, John and Henry begin a search for the sisters, and seeing them as they dance, leave in indignation. While driving home, they agree that girls never know what they want, and these two, for all their apparent innocence, are rather wild, and would never have made satisfactory wives.

Later, Mary calls John on the telephone, but when he recognizes her voice, he hangs up the receiver. Desperately, she calls Harry, and tells him that Dora drove away with the two strangers, slipping from the crowd, before she could stop her. Henry drives into the country with Mary, and they pick up the thoroughly chastened Dora, walking homeward, all desire for adventure gone, as she goes to Henry's arms, repentant. When John hears the story, he again urges Mary to become his wife, and a double wedding is planned for the following spring.

THE VISION OF GLORY

Elsie Cobb Drama File No. 10490

RUTH FRANKLIN, daughter of a minister, persuades her father to allow her to become a laboratory assistant to Dr. Steven Krask, a prominent biologist, although he hopes that his only child will marry Tommy Peters, a young doctor. When Ruth returns home full of enthusiasm over Steven's experiments in attempting to alter forms of animal life, the Reverend Franklin is disturbed, as these ideas are too revolutionary and contrary to his beliefs for him to accept, but he trusts that the old fashioned religious training he has given his daughter will stand by her, and loving Ruth more than anything in the world, is delighted to see her happiness in this new career. Absorbed in her work, Ruth has little time for Tommy, and quarrels with him when he is unsympathetic over Steven's ideas. Dr. Krask calls at Ruth's home, and discusses his beliefs with her father; although they are diametrically opposed to the minister's faith, the Reverend Franklin cannot help liking Steven, and understands the great influence this brilliant man exerts over Ruth. He is not surprised when Steven calls him, a few months later that he and Ruth wish to marry, but feels that, since their background is so fundamentally different, such a union would be ill advised. When Ruth tells him that she will never love anyone but Steven, he reluctantly consents, and performs the ceremony himself.

Ruth divides her time between the management of her home and assisting her husband in his work. Eagerly, he tells her that he has a plan by which he believes he can create life. Horrified by his fanatical enthusiasm, and believing some of his plans are cold-blooded and contrary to all religious beliefs, Ruth tries to dissuade him from this, unsuccessfully. Obsessed with the plan, he devotes all his time to his work, neglecting the young wife completely. At last, ill with worry, Ruth confesses her unhappiness to her father, and tells him that she wishes she had married Tommy, whose simple faith, and wholesome outlook is so like her own. Going to Steven, the Reverend Franklin reveals this conversation, and, feeling that Ruth no longer loves him, the scientist agrees to drop out of her life. He tells his father-in-law that he will leave her in the morning.

As she is sleeping, Ruth seems to be standing on a high plateau, conscious of a great expanse of azure sky; suddenly a crowd of people appear, and seem to be watching a woman, leading a queer animal, resembling a hartebeest, which carries a strange sort of a pig in a pouch on either side. Forcing the animal to a platform with difficulty, the woman turns it over to a man who is conducting a fair; as he lifts the baby pigs from their pouches, he demonstrates their unusual strength. Suddenly looking from the platform to the sky, she notices a small red ball of fire, whirling about, and calls her husband's attention to this, saying it resembles candy boiling over; it forms a continent, then disappears. As she feels a strange, whirling sensation, Ruth remarks it is the end of the world, and clinging to Steven, pleads: "Can't we stay together?" as they whirl through space. Ruth awakens at that moment, and finds herself in Steven's arms. Assuring him of her love, the young wife pours out her sorrows. Tenderly, he comforts her, and promises never again to neglect or worry her, as she means more than anything else to him.

TOO MUCH LOVE

Mae B. Kremer Drama File No. 10443

ANNOYED because she must abruptly terminate her vacation to attend the wedding of her sister, Rita, to John Walton, Alta Phillips bids her friend, Marlene Cromwell, goodbye, and packs her bags. While thus engaged, she remarks that her timid, sweet sister, with her feminine charm, seems to be more successful in winning the man of her choice than she, herself, for all that she is the more beautiful and dashing of the two. Maurce, Alta's brother, drives her to their home from the station, and she is soon presented to John, whom she considers not handsome, but attractive and arresting. As they greet one another, both find their interest keenly awakened, and when Alta appears in her bridesmaid's gown of white lace, with matching Quaker bonnet, John cannot take his eyes away from her, fascinated with her flaming beauty which is the antithesis of Rita's pink and gold daintiness. After the ceremony is performed by the Reverend Williams at the little Quaker chapel nestled in the hills of Bethel community, the young couple leave for John's charming colonial home in the country. Before it becomes necessary for Alta to return to high school, she and Maurce visit Rita, and as John kisses his sister-in-law, she feels her cheeks flame. During their stay a terrific storm comes up one night, and, terrified, Alta impulsively rushes to John's room, and for a moment, takes refuge in his arms.

John's Christmas present to Alta is a small diamond ring, set with pearls, and at graduation time, he and Rita fulfill her wish by giving the girl a squirrel coat. The following summer, Alta keeps house for Rita who is expecting a child, carefully maintaining an impersonal attitude toward John. Shortly after she enters college, Alta receives word that Rita's baby daughter lived but a short time, and Rita is in a very delicate physical condition. The Phillips family, including Alta, spend Christmas Day with her, and Alta remains the rest of the week. At Rita's suggestion, John drives her to the Quaker church, whose services she has never missed while at home, and, on the way there, takes her in his arms, pouring out his love. She confesses that she too, cares for him, and feels they should frankly tell Rita and ask her to agree to a divorce, but knowing what a shock this would be to her in her present condition, John refuses. Alta tries to put him out of her heart, but when he asks her to leave college and spend a forbidden day in his company, as he passes through the town on business, she cannot resist, and surrenders to his love. The following summer finds Alta again at her sister's home, and although she tries to avoid John, the urge is too strong. At last she tells him she is to have a child, and while he is comforting her, Rita encounters them. When her anger has died down, she offers to adopt the expected baby. The next day a gun that John is carrying accidentally discharges and kills Rita. A short time later, John and Alta are married by the Justice of the Peace, and when her family and the little Quaker community hear of this, they turn against her, censuring her the more when her little son is born. While supervising a shipmnt of hogs, John is thrown from his wagon and killed.

Alta and Junior go to New York, where she is beginning to win prominence as a singer. Ted Shrewsbury, scion of a wealthy family, falls in love with her, but tiring of this life, she visits her brother, recuperating from lung trouble in New Mexico. Sabina, his sweetheart, stabs Maurce when she sees him with Alta, not realizing she is his sister, but Dr. Bruce Mendenhall saves the young man, and Sabina is forgiven. Ted follows Alta, but she knows now that loves the fine, young doctor, and when he asks her to marry him, is on the point of confessing, but he tells her he knows all, as he is the Reverend William's nephew. Joyfully, she and her son, whom Bruce adopts, look forward to happiness.

THE SHERIFF OF RAINBOW VALLEY

Berniece Daum Western File No. 10487

RECENTLY elected sheriff of Rainbow Valley, Buck Martin pledges himself to round up the cattle thieves who have been making raids on the nearby ranchers. As he is scouting on the plains he sees three men branding cattle and as he approaches they all draw their guns. Amiably but with a dangerous glint in his eyes, he demands their business, and when they order him to move on if he wants to keep his health, Buck snaps out, "Drop those guns." For answer a shot rings out. He ducks but hearing a sharp outcry, he fires at the retreating figure of the rustlers, then turns to the recumbent figure which has received the bullet intended for him. As he turns the body over, he gasps as he realizes that the person shot is a girl, and an attractive one at that. Examining her, he finds that the bullet has lodged in her arm, and as she raises brimming eyes, she apologizes faintly for crying. Buck digs the bullet out, and admiringly he compliments Sally for her courage in not crying out as any one else would have done. She thanks him and gets up but sways dizzily from the shock, and Buck offers to take her home. With infinite care he steadies her on his horse and rides her home where her father Jim Baldwin thanks the the sheriff tremulously for saving his daughter from a bad infection. Buck advises that Sally get plenty of rest and he looks grave as Baldwin tells him that he too has been bothered by the rustlers. Buck rides into town, unable to get Sally's lovely face out of his mind.

Meanwhile at the ranch, Sally and her father are preparing to retire when Sally cries out sharply, "What's that?" and her father goes out to investigate. Sally waits for a while then worried by her father's failure to return goes outside and calls frantically, "Dad. Dad!" Panic-stricken, she mounts her horse and gallops into town, arousing the sheriff and explaining what happened. As she finishes, she plunges into Buck's arms in a faint, and Buck turns her over to his landlady, and saddling his own horse rides post haste toward Happy Ranch. Investigating he finds Baldwin outstreched behind the corral. As Buck bandages his head, Baldwin explains he heard a noise and was about to investigate when a blow on his head knocked him out. Investigation proves that most of Baldwin's cattle are gone and Buck swears he will get the rustlers if it is the last thing he does.

A few days later, however, while Sally is resting at home, a knock sounds at the door and as she opens it a burly fellow forces his way in and orders Sally to accompany him at the point of a gun. Frightened, Sally submits and as they reach the plains Sally's heart jumps as she sees a party of cowboys from town go by. She is about to plead for help when the gun, dug in her ribs, silences her and the party passes. However, in town the cowboys start kidding Buck because they saw his girl riding with another fellow, and with a start Buck remembers the note Baldwin had found warning him to mind his own business. Spurring rein, Buck follows and as he draws up Sally's abduotor fires using Sally as a shield. However, Buck shoots the gun out of his hand, and the two roll in hand to hand battle. The other fellow reaches his gun by stealth, but Sally kicks it out of his way, and Buck holds him down until he gasps the whole truth—gives away the hiding place of the rustlers and admits he was capturing Sally to hold her for ransom. Buck cleans up the gang, and happily embraces Sally who promises to be his bride.

SOULS IN TORMENT

Morris D. Bernstein Drama File No. 10538

YOUNG Patrick Dannie, scion of a wealthy family and distinguished as an aviator, glances with bored tolerance at the guests his father has gathered for a dinner dance in his son's honor; secretly he knows that the purpose of this assemblage of the socially elite is that he may select a wife from their midst. Slipping away as soon as he can, Patrick hurries to the modest, country home of Hannah Fay, a young girl whom he met at the Los Angeles airport, through Fordham Dean, a pilot with whom he served during the war. Taking the vivid, dark-eyed girl in his arms, he tells her of his love, and they plan to be married, but when he broaches this subject at the breakfast table the next morning, his father replies that if he does not give up this girl, whose social background is vastly inferior to his own, he will be disinherited. In an outburst of anger, Patrick informs his father that he cares nothing for his inheritance in comparison with his love, and leaves. When he reaches Los Angeles, he seeks Fordham Dean, who shows him a letter, given to him by Hannah; it states that Dannie has been killed in an airplane crash, and encloses a newspaper clipping which substantiates this fact. Patrick recalls lending his leather jacket to an aviator who was killed, and concludes that his father sent the letter and clipping to Hannah, although knowing them to be false. Adding that Hannah had quarreled with her father over Dannie, Fordham states that he fears she will not return to her home.

In searching for Hannah, Dannie goes to the Montor Carlos cafe, owned by Charlie Yen; this fact is reported to the young man's father by Jones Carr, his agent. In order to gain his confidence, Dannie purchases an interest in Charlie's gambling enterprises, as he has received an anonymous note stating that Yen has information concerning Hannah, although the Oriental denies it. Fordham deceives his friend when he discovers Hannah in a private room at the Montor Carlos; attracted to her intensely, he takes her in his arms, and she does not resist, as all her interest in life died with the tragic news of Dannie. Allene Gilbert, a former sweetheart of Fordham, upon seeing him with Hannah, extinguishes the light, and attempts to shoot him; he is only slightly wounded, and the girl sobs hysterically, receiving his forgiveness. A group of men, at the instigation of Patrick's father, send Hannah a message, stating that her father has been injured in an accident at sea; at once, she boards a motor boat, and hurries to him, but, not finding him at the appointed place, discovers the trap, and eludes her pursuers, finally returning to the cafe. Meanwhile, Patrick, told of this by Allene, has gone in search of her in his plane, and crashed to the ground, but is not seriously injured. He traces the kidnappers, and hears them discussing their plans which miscarried; several slanderous remarks are passed on the character of Hannah, but this only makes Patrick more eager to find her. When he returns to the cafe, he discovers the girl seated at a table, but she refuses to marry him, and disappears the next day.

Patrick, a brilliant student at college, secures employment as a reporter, and learns through Jenny, a society girl, that Hannah has been seen with Hyler Grove, who has been hired to take her attentions away from Patrick. Encountering them together, Patrick reveals this, and, not trusting anyone, Hannah shoots him. As he lies, wounded, she goes to him, sobbing that she has always loved him, but thought herself unworthy. Together, they face the future.

DESERT ROSE

Antonio Rocchetti Drama File No. 10462

RECEIVING word from headquarters at Massaua that the African forces are gathering for an attack, Colonel Rico instructs Captain Lionello to take his troops through the forest and mountains on a skirmishing expedition, during one of the early battles at the time of Italy's first war on the Dark Continent. Negro troops soon surround them, and, after an heroic stand they are forced to surrender. Captain Lionello is wounded by the Prince Tozo, and brought before Zubo, the ruler garbed in regal splendor, in his bamboo hut. Mara, his lovely and almost white daughter is seated beside the Prince, and an extremely dark and villainous appearing native, also dressed as a prince, stands behind his throne. Impressed by the courage and honesty of the young captain, Prince Zubo agrees to send messengers to Massaua, and bring about a withdrawal of the Italians, if possible, meanwhile holding Lionello's men here, and extending all possible courtesies to them; the captain and his friend, the corporal, are given a hut adjoining Zubo's, and placed under guard. While attempting to make love to a dark beauty, the corporal is frightened away by her ferocious husband, while Lionello laughs. Wishing to express his appreciation, Lionello offers to construct a Romanian place for Prince Zubo, and supplies are sent for, all the soldiers joining in the work.

Mara greets the captain the next day, while he is sadly examining the picture of his mother; touched, the girl tells him that her mother, too, was a lovely white woman whom her father purchased. Unable to stand his cruelty, she had run away, leaving her with the Prince, whose surface kindness concealed a cruel and cunning heart. Her student days at the University of Athens in Greece, completed, she was now betrothed to the dark and evil Prince Mosha, seated in the royal hut yesterday. Lionello takes the girl in his arms, and tells her that he loves her, and she admits that from the first moment she saw him, she longed for him, but it seems hopeless. She is to be taken to a sanctuary, followed by a procession of villagers, and plight her troth, alone, with Mosha. At once, Lionello suggests that she send a servant back with ammunition; then, his troops will overcome the guards, hasten to Massaua, and join him there after he has rescued Mara. Agreeing to this, Mara gives a note and money to Aly, her faithful servant, with which she purchases ammunition and slips into the captain's tent, while she leads the procession to the sanctuary, riding on an elephant beside her father and Mosha, and followed by all the village, save the guards of the Italians. Secretly, the captain supplies his men with ammunition, and they kill the guards, hastening across the Little Desert and a part of the Sahara to Massaua, at Lionello's bidding.

Guided by Aly, and accompanied by the corporal, Lionello reaches the sanctuary, and the three hide beneath a trap door at the foot of the altar. The priest, after much incantation and strange ceremony, joins the hands of Mosha and Mara, and leaves them, alone, beneath the same concealed door. As Mosha attempts to embrace Mara, Lionello kills him, and they escape. When this is discovered, Prince Zubo pursues them, but they join their troop in Massaua and are welcomed by an eager band of soldiers, as they approach their own fort. Soon after, the Rose of the Desert marries her captain, at a brilliant ceremony at the neighboring fort.

THE GO GETTER

Lewis Theodore Vogt Comedy Drama File No. 10467

IN love with Jane Westover, Roy Pierson a young artist, urges her to marry him, but she refuses, saying that she does not care for him in that way. In addition, she says that the man she chooses must have a practical turn of mind, as she has endured poverty all her life, because of her father's visionary schemes. When Harley Trumble, a stranger in the city, joins Jane's church, the girl is attracted by his bold, frank manner of approaching members of the most conservative families in the congregation, although many of them, including her own family, resent his familiarity. He monopolizes Jane's time at a church banquet, and wins permission to call at her home. As the two are seated on the porch swing, Harley tells Jane that he is the youngest of a large family. While still a child he left his father's home on a Vermont farm and worked his way through high school and two years of college by selling various articles and opening a student loan bureau. Relying solely on his wits, he won success as a press agent and newspaper man; then, becoming interested in the idea of installment selling, then in its infancy, decided to market various electrical appliances on that basis, and had come here for that purpose. Applying his strenuous methods of salesmanship in courting Jane, Harley wins her hand, in spite of the disapproval of her family.

Following up the associations he has made at church, Harley presses his articles on these people, and, influenced by their friendship for Jane and lured by the easy payment plans he outlines, many of them purchase "on time." Still admiring her young husband whole-heartedly, Jane says nothing, although she resents his method of gaining entree by imposing on friendship. A son, David, is born to the young couple during the second year of their marriage; at an early age the child shows evidences of marked musical ability. When Jane discovers that Harley has persuaded the Masons, her father's oldest friends, to purchase an electric sweeper and washing machine she asks her husband to cancel the sale, as she knows they cannot afford to pay for these appliances, but he advises her that business must come before sentiment, and, for the first time they quarrel bitterly. Complaints begin to come in about the articles Harley has sold; his customers state that he has misrepresented their ability to last over a period of years, but he proves that his contract is so worded that they can take no legal action against his charges. Utterly disgusted, Jane wishes to leave her husband, but remains with him for the sake of their little boy. When she finds that Harley is backing the election of a certain congressman because he has been promised political favors in regard to a paving contract if this unscrupulous man is placed in office, she can stand it no longer, and returns to her father's home, with David, refusing financial assistance from her husband, and telling him she never wishes to see him again.

Harley receives a position in another city, and as the years pass, Roy again urges Jane, now divorced, to become his wife. She receives a check, signed with Harley's name, and bearing the statement: "For David's musical education," from a small southern town. Taking the train, Jane finds Harley running a small restaurant there, his former business ruined, and when he tells her that he realizes his mistake, and wants his son to be something better than a go getter, Jane replies that all three of them will solve that problem—together.

A THING APART

H. E. Cockrell Drama File No. 10444

TENDERLY drying the tears of her little brothers and sisters and consoling her mother when her father, under the influence of liquor, shouts at the family, Neva Haywood vainly pleads with him to give up his vicious habit for their sake. His only answer is to push the girl roughly aside, advising her that children should obey, and not command, their parents. Confiding her troubles to Mrs. Cole and her daughter, Nedra, the girl's closest friends, Neva states that she will never marry after seeing her mother's unhappiness, but Jim Cole, the young son of the house, wagers that she will someday change her mind. Encouraged by Mrs. Cole, who admires the plucky girl, Neva studies hard, spending many evenings with Nedra in the peace and quiet of her home, and when graduation exercises are held at their little high school in Clayton, Oklahoma, Nedra is valedictorian of the class. Following this, she secures a position as waitress in the Elite cafe where her efficiency and business-like conduct win the respect of her clientele. Charles Lenox, an agent for a nearby oil field, comes to admire her intelligence, and urges her to accept a loan from him in order that she may take up commercial studies and become a secretary, but, determined to accept no favors, she refuses. Shortly after this, Neva wins a scholarship from a university in Cheyenne, and, at the insistence of her mother and Mrs. Cole accepts it, making her home with relatives. Her keen mind and application to her studies again places her at the head of her class, but when her mother becomes ill at the end of the girl's second year, she again returns home, taking up her former position at the Elite cafe until she has another opportunity to continue her education.

Clayton becomes a center of the oil industry when rich deposits are found in a field on the outskirts of the little town, and several prominent executives and geologists make their headquarters in its one hotel. More than one man, dining at the Elite, becomes interested in the cultured and attractive young waitress, but she courteously refuses all social engagements or offers of financial assistance extended by the little town's visitors, thinking only of the day when she can return to her studies. Just as the girl's friends have decided that she will never marry, Ellis Manly, a childhood playmate of Neva's returns from college, and for the first time the girl finds herself deeply attracted to a member of the opposite sex. She spends the little time she can spare away from work and family duties in his company, dancing and riding with the young man. Discovering this, Neva's father warns the girl that if he finds her with Ellis he will kill him, and knowing that he means what he says, she informs her lover that they must not see one another again. However, as Ellis and Jim Cole are friends, she encounters him occasionally when visting Nedra, and one night consents to ride in the country with him. Alone, they are swept away by the depth of their love, and Neva yields to his embraces. Jess Stewart, a drunken friend of the girl's father, in company with several other men, severely beats Ellis, at Mr. Haywood's instigation. While she is visiting Nedra, now a teacher of a country school,

Neva discovers that she is to become a mother, and knowing her father may kill Ellis if he finds this out, yields to the pleas of Tom Brady, a member of the local school board, to become his wife, first confessing the truth to him. Soon after the marriage, Tom Brady openly abusese his wife, and spends the major portion of his time away from home, drinking heavily. She does not tell Ellis that the child that is born to them the following fall is, reality, his son. In gratitude to Tom for the protection of his name she tries her best to be a good wife to him, ignoring his cruelties, and not forsaking him even when he becomes associated with a gang of bootleggers. Her devotion wins his support, and he tries to reform, but one of the gang kills him. Shortly after this, Mr. Haywood dies, telling his daughter he regrets the mistakes he has made in his duties as a parent.

Free at last, Neva goes to Ellis, telling him the truth, and they are soon married. Neva and Ellis resolve never to dominate the life of their son, as he grows into manhood.

DENIED SINS

Paul Kukan Drama File No. 10520

AS she is returning to her parents' summer cottage from work, seventeen year old Judy Daniels is seen by Bobby Drake, the young son of a wealthy stock broker, and Jim Lang his friend. In order to demonstrate his prowess as a "ladies' man," Bobby introduces himself and walks away with Judy in front of his astonished friend. Later, Bobby invites Judy to attend a dance at the Palm Beach Club, and she finally wins her father's permission. As they waltz together both realize that this innocent flirtation has developed into love. While driving through the country a few weeks after this, a storm arises, and, as Bobby's car is an open model, both take refuge in a deserted house. Teasingly, Bobby tells Judy that it is supposedly haunted and when a bit of plaster falls on the stairway, she clings to him, fearing the ghost of a man who killed his wife and himself at this place. As he takes the frightened girl in his arms, Bobby cannot restrain his love, and, unwillingly, she yields to her consuming emotion, as well. Angry when he hears of his son's attentions to a little stenographer in a bank, Bobby's father informs his son that he must marry a woman of wealth and social position, as the family fortunes are at a low ebb, and arranges to send him to San Francisco for two years, to finish his education and forget Judy. At first, he refuses, but, fearing poverty as much as his father, yields to his wishes. While he is away, his son is born to Judy; her father informs Mr. Drake, senior of this, but, although he knows in his heart that the charge is true, he denies it, and Judy urges her family to make no further claims.

Upon his return from San Francisco, Bobby is greeted by his sister, Bonnie, who tells him that there are rumors that Judy has married again. Shortly after Mr. and Mrs. Drake return from Europe, Judy reads of Bobby's marriage to Patricia Roberts; heartbroken, she takes poison, and soon dies. Finding little true love between himself and his wife, Bobby devotes much of his time to business, while Patricia complains of neglect. His father urges him to accompany the querulous young woman to a dance, and reluctantly he consents. Hermann, a prominent lawyer, cuts in on the couple, and thus begins his friendship with Pat. After this, they are seen constantly together, and their affair is an open secret. When Hermann is discovered by Bobby as he is kissing Patricia, the two men fight, and the meetings are held with more discretion thereafter, but just as frequently as before. During a skiing party, the two become isolated from the rest of the group, and it is not until hours later that Pat joins her husband. Judy's little son grows into a handsome, healthy child, the pride of Mr. Daniel's heart. A cousin, Marge, looks after the child, giving him a mother's care, and finally wins Mr. Daniel's permission to take the youngster to her home for the summer months. After Judy's death, Mr. Drake tells his son the truth of the whole affair, and sadly, Bobby visits the grave of the only woman he has ever truly loved. While Bobby is vacationing alone in Honolulu, Patricia and Hermann drive away together, leaving a note to this effect for Hermann's wife. In resisting his embraces, Pat causes Hermann to wreck the car, and it falls over a mountain cliff, fifty feet below, instantly killing both occupants. Bobby is deeply shocked when he receives a telegram to this effect.

Free at last to find his son, Bobby hastens to Marge's home, with the full permission of Mr. Daniels, and discovers the youngster playing ball with his gang. When the boy conducts him to Marge, Bobby is overcome with amazement at her striking resemblance to Judy. Believing it is for the child's best interests, Marge consents to Bobby's claims, and agrees to accompany them on the trip to his home, at the little boy's insistence. During the trip, Bobby finds again his lost love for Judy in this girl, and Marge, also, cares for him. Both families are delighted when the two decide to marry, and Judy's little son is overjoyed, when he realizes he will have them both as his parents.

PUBLIC NUISANCE

Joseph Azzaro Drama File No. 10294

HAPPY in spite of their poverty, Mr. and Mrs. Silver and their five children live in an eastern city, a few miles from New York. Joe, the eldest boy, finds work as a policeman, while, Mary, twenty, is a successful beauty parlor operator, and May, the youngest of the family, is employed as a hostess in a restaurant. Tommy, two years her senior, calls for his sister every evening, as it is unsafe for her to be on the streets alone at night. Jef, a veteran policeman, teaches the new recruit, Joe, his duties, aided by Bill, who works on the same beat, and the three become firm friends. When Jef is retired on a pension, the members of the force, at Joe's instigation, give him a farewell banquet. His parting advice to his successor, Joe, is to keep a sharp watch for Flint and Spike, two dangerous New York gangsters who have caused trouble before. Shortly after this, Flint is brought into court, charged with beating and robbing Mr. Gibbons, a banker, but his accuser becomes frightened and drops charges against him. Rose, an old schoolmate of Joe's sees him keeping order at the trial, where she has been sent as a reporter, and their friendship is renewed, as they talk of old times. A few months later they marry, and a daughter, Marie Ann, is born the following year.

Tommy is walking home with May when two strange men make an insulting remark, directed at her. He demands an apology, and knocks one to the ground when it is refused. The other man, who is in reality, Flint, stops his companion from shooting, and trails brother and sister, but loses them; he then orders Spike to find the girl before sundown, tomorrow night, or he will kill him. Bill goes to May's restaurant in search of Joe, and struck by her resemblance to him, introduces himself, and questions her. As they talk, Spike sees May and enters. Bill at once takes her away, and warns her not to return to work, as this man is a dangerous criminal. While she and Tommy are shopping that afternoon, Flint spies her, and drawing her aside, forces her to make an appointment with him the following evening, promising harm will come to her family if she does not come. When Bill calls after dinner, and takes her to the movies, she relates this conversation with Flint, and he warns her not to go to him.

Torn between this advice and love of her family, the girl decides to meet Flint, and drives away from the restaurant with him. As they leave, Tommy sees and follows them to "lovers' lane," at the edge of town. Flint attacks May, but Tommy confronts him with his revolver at that moment, telling him he will count three before he shoots so that he may have a sporting chance to defend himself. Bill, discovering May's absence, tells her father of the rendezvous with Flint, and the two men search for her. Before Tommy finishes counting Flint is shot and killed from ambush; Tommy goes to May, who has collapsed and takes her home. Two days later, Flint is found, with Tommy's gun beside him. Bill confesses to the murder, but his gun is thirty-two caliber, while the coroner's autopsy proves Flint was killed by a thirty-eight caliber bullet. Tommy is sentenced to the electric chair, and his mother drops dead from the shock; he tells the jury they are murderers by their accusal of an innocent man, but there is no one to convict them, as he takes his mother's body in his arms, and places her on a stretcher. Deeply moved, Mr. Gibbons, scarred past recognition, confesses that he shot Flint, and did not confess, as he meant to kill Spike first. He falls, dying, before the judge. Tommy is acquitted, Spike imprisoned for life, and Bill's loyalty rewarded when May promises to marry him.

RIDE 'EM, COWBOY

Walter Hendricks Western File No. 10511

TALL, lanky Joe Turpines and his short, rotund partner, Tony Suvear, decide that they do not enjoy their present occupation, as they are rounding up cattle for their employer, Jack Blackston, and at the close of the day, hand in their resignation. In their own little cabin, on the few acres of barren ground that comprise their ranch, they discuss ways and means to enter the wholesale brewery business, but conclude that they must first find some way to earn a little capital. The next morning the two boys elbow their way to the town bar, but after ordering a glass of beer and taking a pickle, they are forced into the street, as the town is crowded due to the fact that several prospectors have come in from the hills. One of them, Frank, greets the two, and shows them a bag of nuggets which he has collected. Joe and Tony go into consultation, and decide to purchase these nuggets from the old prospector, and sprinkle them liberally over their land, in the hopes that they will be able to sell the property for a good figure as a result of this ruse. After the transaction and business is completed, the boys wait impatiently for a customer, and when Frank Moreres, Blackston's foreman, passes by with several of his cowboys, they call his attention to the gold on their property. He relays this news to Blackston, who offers to buy the land for eight thousand dollars, and signs the deed that afternoon.

Gleefully, the two take a room in the town hotel, where Joe dreams that he is chosen as the husband of an Indian chief's daughter, and upon refusing to wed her, is tossed in a blanket until he consents. He awakens to find himself embracing Tony, who orders him to hurry so that they can begin their business. The two purchase a site and open a wholesale brewery; wearing a placard which proclaims this fact, Tony parades up and down in front of the establishment, but business does not thrive as it should. The boys advertise for a model, and an attractive young girl by the name of Mary Sommit, niece of Jerry Philco, a rancher, applies. Mary tells them that as her uncle must pay a mortgage immediately or lose his property, she has run away so that she may help him, if she can. Explaining her duties, Joe tells the girl that she is to be seated in their beer garden, and anyone who purchases a glass of the beverage is entitled to shoot for a basket; if he places it, she is to reward the winner with a kiss, but this will seldom happen, as it is very difficult. Hiring two hoboes to drink beer, in order to lend an air of prosperity to the garden, the boys open their establishment, and are soon crowded with customers, due to Mary's charm. Blackston orders a case of their beer, and finding it is cut, has the boys arrested, but as they are being taken to jail, they see Philco's cattle being taken by rustlers from Blackston's men, and, breaking away, capture them.

As a reward, charges against them are dropped for the false claim of gold on their mine and the cut beer. Mr. Philco gives the boys a part of his ranch, and when they promise to "go straight," Mary consents to become Joe's wife. One of their wedding presents is a baby buggy, and the young couple wheel Tony away in it, to the amusement of the crowd.

THE FOG

Margaret L. Ernst Drama File No. 10572

THE automobile moved slowly through the heavy rain, then skidded off the lonely lane into a mud puddle. Swearing softly under his breath as the wheels dug deeper and deeper into the yielding earth, Ramon Neilson got out and walked toward the distant gleam of light. Through the window he stared in amazement at a beautiful girl cowering before a huge man and grimly knocking on the door, Ramon asked shelter for the night. At first the man flatly refused, then learning that Ramon was the brother of Louise Wellington and was coming to pay a surprise visit to her for the first time since her marriage to George Wellington. Joe Saunders gruffly extended his hospitality to the stranger. Introducing the girl as his niece Amy, Joe presided over the supper table and warned Ramon that he was to keep to his room and under no circumstances to come out until morning. Retired, Ramon found sleep difficult as he brooded over the strange house. He heard doors slam and picking up a book tried to read. Awakened by plodding steps on the stairs, Ramon found he had slept and it was now one. With a fine disregard for his host's instructions Joe peered cautiously over the bannister and saw Amy, boots and dress covered with mud, exhaustedly climb the stairs. To his amazement her eyes were glassy and unseeing, and she seemed not to hear him when he spoke. The next morning, Ramon managed to corner Amy but to his astonishment found she had no knowledge of having walked last night other than in one of her terrible dreams!

Thoughtfully Ramon proceeded to his sister's house to find his brother-in-law a likeable but sickly writer, and his sister in a highly nervous state. When Ramon inquired if she were gambling lately, Louise flared up and refused to be appeased. From George, Ramon learned that Joe Saunders was a money mad tyrant whose only weakness was for his niece Amy. In celebration of her second anniversary, Louise gave a party but fiercely refused to invite Amy. However, Ramon observed Amy handing Louise a note and later found it crumpled in a ball. When he read that Louise could make good her gambling losses if she met the writer to-morrow at the regular time, Ramon communicated his suspicions to George who refused to believe until Ramon foiled Louise's attempt to drug them both the next night. Pretending to have succumbed, George and Ramon retired, but later, followed Louise whom she met Joe Saunders. George told how he had never doubted his wife's retirement each night since she had always stolen into his room to kiss him as he dropped off to sleep. In pursuit, George and Ramon made their way through a curio shop into a gaudy gambling den. They learned that Louise and Joe used to win regularly until their luck seemed to change, and now as Louise lost her engagement ring, she became hysterical. George unable to stand it longer stepped forward and the near fight was terminated by the arrival of a police raiding party. Joe led Louise, George, and Ramon to safety then disappeared. At home Amy, eyes glazed, came to George's room, kissed him and hurried out. Ramon, comprehending now, followed and found Joe panicky because he was unable to bring his niece out of her hypnotic trance. Ramon brought her to, and Joe succumbed to his heart attack, content, at the end, in the assurance that Ramon who loved her, would care for Amy, and George forgave Louise who was forever cured of the gambling fever.

QUESTION

Anne Curtin Drama File No. 10473

AS he opens his morning mail at the breakfast table, Jed McKevitt is shocked to find a note from Peggy Borden, stating that she will not marry him and does not wish to see him again. Unable to believe this ultimatum, Jed hurriedly calls the young woman who was to become his bride within a month, on the telephone, but her mother informs him that Peggy will not speak to him. Ignoring his various duties on the McKevitt farm, Jed hurries to Peggy's home, but is denied admittance; a few days later he is deeply shocked to learn that his former fiancee has married Robert Purcell, owner of a mine in Argentine. During the first six months of her marriage, Peggy studies advertising, and when her husband makes a journey for the purpose of inspecting his mine. she takes a position in Kansas City instead of accompanying him, soon becoming one of the leading copy writers for the agency. At a social gathering, Peggy is introduced to Emily Norman, a widow, who, by virtue of her diplomacy and subtly aggressive tactics is gaining a foothold as a political job holder. Peggy finds much to admire in the older woman's frank, though at times unscrupulous, methods of promoting her interests, and Emily, in turn, likes the ambitious and attractive young wife who is determined to carve a place for herself in the business world. The two become fast friends, sharing the same apartment and helping one another to achieve success in their respective careers.

Five years later, Jed, through the small opening of securing a road making contract, has become political boss of the state. Fearing competition from Olive Hoyt, who is dispensing favors to her party in the hopes of securing an appointment, Emily begs Peggy to speak to Jed on her behalf, but she refuses. Peggy does, however, readily agree to attend a convention at Capitol City for the purpose of checking up on certain scandalous rumors regarding Olive, in order to prove that she will not be a suitable successor to Emily. She is a bit disappointed to find her hotel room small and dingy, with a semi-private bath which is locked, but philosophically settles down to the business of making herself alluring when the door to the bathroom is opened by a skeleton key and Peggy confronts—Jed! Assuring her that Emily is not responsible for his presence here, but that it was arranged. at his instigation, by his agents at the hotel, Jed locks the outside door, and informs Peggy that she may climb down the fire escape or telephone the main office if she wishes. When she refuses to follow either of these plans, Jed knows her love for Robert is not an important consideration; he tells her that he arranged this trap in order to force her to explain her broken engagement to him. Touched by Jed's earnestness, Peggy explains that her mother's life was unhappy because her generous, improvident father would neither take his financial responsibilities toward his family seriously or allow his talented wife to seek her own career; knowing his temperament, she feared a similar experience if she became Jed's wife.

Their conversation is interrupted by political enemies of Jed, who break into the room, but Peggy calmly informs them that she is divorcing her husband and will soon become Jed's wife. Alone, she tells him she will be glad to carry out this plan if he wishes, as she has always loved him, and he takes her in his arms. Much later, Jed promises to look out for Emily's interests.

THE MOTHER

Bernice L. Shirk Drama File No. 10545

DEPRIVED of all the little tendernesses that a child longs for, little Sue Thomas grows up in an atmosphere of discord. Her stepmother, demanding, selfish, has no use for her and her father, to keep peace, denies Sue any luxuries. At last Sue rebels and when she announces that she is going to work for herself, she finds her father more than willing to sever all relations with her. Hurt, hungry, Sue begins a search for employment and is finally given an opportunity in the dress shop of Peter Wells. Her unusual ability as a designer wins Peter's recognition and tied down to a nagging, ailing wife, Peter finds the few moments talk with Sue his sole escape from his harsh existence. Then Sue meets Jack Mere who offers her marriage and a home. When she informs Peter she is leaving, he clasps her hand wordlessly and at last in a voice that is not entirely steady, he wishes her every happiness.

Marriage is for Sue everything she has ever dreamed of. At last she can have a home of her own and someone to love her. With a song on her lips she goes about making of the little bungalow a Paradise for Jack. Two children are born to her, and her cup of happiness seems to run over. Then Jack begins staying out nights and Sue, realizing that he has become infatuated with a cabaret entertainer, tries desperately to maintain the pretense of happiness for the sake of her children. Peter, whose wife has finally gotten a divorce, admires Sue for the struggle she is putting up, but one night Jack is shot by an admirer of his mistress, and Sue, crushed, realizes that she has to start all over again. It is Peter who offers her her old position back, and Sue begins working again. Denying her two little girls nothing, she gives them musical educations and sends them to college. Peter asks her to marry him, but Sue tells him her career is making her children happy and that is all life can offer to her.

Mary Jane goes on the concert stage and soon her success turns her head. She has little time to spare for her mother, for her press agent has given out the story that she is a war orphan, while Sally, talented, pretty, marries a fine young man and feels her time belongs to her husband rather than her mother. In her infrequent meetings with her daughters, both of whom love her but have outgrown their need of her, Sue finds consolation and as they compliment her on how young she looks and how proud they are of her, Sue smiles brightly to keep back her tears.

Once again Sue comes to Peter to tell him that she is going away, that she has enough money now and she is going to take a long deferred trip to Europe. Peter understands but when at last she stands on the decks of the boat and waves goodbye to her two daughters, she feels someone beside her and there is Peter. Wistfully he offers his arm and with a little sigh of happiness Sue takes it.

SECOND CHANCE

C. A. Wicklund Drama File No. 10504

"JOE SHYWORK, you ought to be ashamed of yourself," counsels his friend, Alfred Logan. Going to the Logan home. Joe has just related his misfortunes to his old schoolmate.

During those incredible days before the crash, Joe had enjoyed prosperity on his small farm. With little effort, he had secured a good income, and spent it lavishly on his wife, his daughter, Emily, and his two boys, Dick and Arthur. Happy in this easy existence, he had never thought of the future, saving none of his plentiful and easily secured living, but when adverse conditions appeared, his whole outlook on life had changed. Forced to give up his farm, Joe felt too "proud" to accept work as a laborer in other men's fields, scorning the low salaries of a dollar a day, with maintenance. He had not been too proud to allow his wife and children to accept charity, however.

When the local aid groups were unable to care for them longer, they had secured a position for Mrs. Shywork and her daughter as servants at a neighboring farm, and found work for the boys in the fields, at separate establishments.

At the conclusion of this story of a father's negligence, Mr. Logan tells his friend that he provided for his own family hy taking any work that he could find, regardless of whether or not he considered the salary suitable to a man of his position, as he knew the situation was only temporary. Agreeing that he should have followed this method, Joe promises to carry out the plan that Alfred suggests to regain his former position of respectability.

The following day, Alfred introduces his friend to Bernard Benson, a noted pyschologist. In studying Joe's name, they discover that it has played its part in developing undesirable. negative qualities in his character, according to the science of numerology, and hy implication.

Choosing a new name which adds up to the positive number one, he is rechristened Joe Works, and told that the man, Joe Shywork, was killed hy fear and cowardice, and must be properly buried. This new individual, in a different environment, will face the future squarely, taking up his obligations, and assuming any duty, however unpleasant, that will help him to find his place as a useful member of society. Meanwhile, Joe's eldest son, Arthur, becomes worried over his father's absence, and calls at the Logan home. His father has departed by the time the boy arrives, and since he has pledged himself to secrecy until his friend can become established in this new role he has chosen, Alfred cannot reveal where he has gone, but advises the boy to remain with him a few days, as he expects to hear from him.

Catherine, Alfred Logan's daughter, soon becomes a friend of the boy, admiring his courage in caring for his mother, and appreciating the fact that he does not criticize his father's negligence. She approves when her father secures a position for him in the bank.

Several months later, Joe sends for his family to join him in Ohio, where he has become successful as the foreman of a factory, after starting at the bottom.

Selina Eldred, the town gossip of Joe's former home, writes to Arthur, telling him that there is a mysterious grave in the cemetery, at which his father was seen recently, and that the caretaker will explain nothing. Fearing his father has committed a murder, Arthur tells Emily he must examine it, first expressing his love, which she returns. Inside, the grave he finds a suit of his father's old clothing, with the announcement that this is Joe Shywork, killed by wrong living. The stone is inscribed "Verhum Sat Sapienti," and while the town gossips, the happy family are united in Ohio.

THE DIVORCE MARKET

Charles W. Wilson Drama File No. 10479

AS she lies, dying, in the hospital, Joanna Bradfield pleads with her only child, Gail, to devote her life to an attempt to fight the evil of divorce, since separation from Mr. Bradfield, when her baby was only two, wrecked her life. Earnestly, the girl promises to carry out these plans, and when she is twenty-two, accepts a position as hostess at the Lakeland Hotel, a famous Michigan resort, with a view to later beginning her campaign at this place. Cleveland Atwood, handsome young owner of the hotel, greets her, and introduces Nina Farland, his secretary, and Clinton Latshaw, his friend. Making a partial investment in the hotel, Joanna secures a five year lease. Both Cleveland and Clinton are attracted to the reserved and lovely hostess, but it is to the impetuous Atwood that she is drawn, and, in an unguarded moment, yields. Although he has often spoken of marriage, Atwood makes no direct offer, even after his, and one day tells her that he does not favor the institution for himself. He leaves for Florida shortly after Gail discovers that she is to become a mother; fortunately, Nina, who is jealous of the popular hostess, is away on a vacation, and Latshaw is called out of town. Slipping away to another town, Gail gives birth to twins, whom she leaves in the care of a nurse, returning to her duties. Energitically, Gail launches a series of programs over the radio and in the hotel uaditorium, against the evils of divorce, winning hundreds of supporters by her eloquence, as she describes the unhappiness her parents brought into her life, as a typical example. Inventing the campaign slogan No-Re-No, Gail sweeps the country with her splendid reform.

In Florida, Kingston Chase, a gambler and associate of Atwood, hears one of the stirring programs in his apartment, which he shares with Della Braxton Cuthbert, divorcee, once charged with the murder of her former husband. When Gail describes the father who deserted her, he realizes she is his own daughter, since his name in reality is Bradfield, changed because of charges of gambling which he wished to avoid. Followed by Della, he takes the next train for Lakeland. Meanwhile, Atwood, Nina and Latshaw have returned, ready for the summer season. A fashion show is held in the horse shoe of one of the ball rooms, and Gail, wearing a gown selected by Atwood, wins the applause of the crowd as she appears, more beautiful than ever. When she appears the second time, she is dressed simply in a street costume, wheeling a baby carriage with her twin sons inside. Feeling at once that they must be his children, Atwood is scarcely able to pin the ribbon for first prize on the calm, young mother; smiling graciously, she accepts a bouquet from the governor, amid wild acclaim from her followers. Nina is furiously angry, since she had secretly exchanged dresses given by Atwood, and felt that the award would be hers, as she had chosen the more attractive garment. She tells Atwood that Latshaw has been making love to Gail. Alone with Gail, Atwood, angry at himself, reprimands her, and Latshaw, entering the study, and seeing that his friend is intoxicated, orders him to be silent.

Atwood shoots, but the bullet wounds Bradfield, who has just entered the room, and Della, with him, also shoots, wounding Latshaw. These accidents cause Della to realize her love for Bradfield, Nina, hers for Latshaw, and Atwood that he cannot give up Gail. With three marriages pending, all agree there shall be No-Re-No.

ON THEIR OWN

Kay P. King Drama File No. 10548

"BOOKS, huh! I'm not spending any more of my hard earned money so that a lazy lout like you can fritter away your time in a classroom." Silently Storey Kane walked out, his father's outburst still ringing in his ears. As he plodded along the road, kicking the ground at intervals, he heard, "Hi, Storey!" "Hi, Jay!" The two boys walked along together, neither speaking for a while. At last Storey broke the silence. "I can't go back to school." "Me neither," Jay mumbled. Then seating themselves on a pair of empty boxes, the boys planned a trip to the city so that they could earn their own money and support themselves. Soon Fred and Joe joined them and insisted on being let in on the mystery. Immediately they pleaded to be allowed to come too, and Sunday was set for the departure. The ensuing days were filled with secret signs and plans, and Storey's sister, making an excuse to follow him to the woodpile as he chopped wood, questioned the lad and learning of his plans at first hesitated, then wished him luck. Saturday night, Storey informed his fellow conspirators of the itinerary. They would walk twelve miles and then take the ferry to Yonkers. Twelve miles! Fred and Joe began to raise feeble objections and the next morning Storey and Jay waited impatiently at the station until a youngster came up to inform them that if it was Fred and Joe they were waiting for, they could go on, those two had changed their minds. So began the great adventure. That night the boys found shelter with Storey's aunt who sympathized with the son of her hard hearted brother-in-law, and preparing a hot breakfast for the two youngsters, she packed a supply of sandwiches, and with tears in her kind eyes, wished them well. At last alone and friendless, the youngsters arrived in the city. Hopes high they applied for one job after another only to be turned down. Night came, and each tried to hide his fears from the other. That night they spent on a bench on the windy pier, and in the morning. Storey bought a dozen huns. Again they started looking for work, and as their last dimes went for food, their sallies of wit became more and forced. After a sleepness night and foodless hours, the youngsters again applied for work and one foreman, recognizing them as the kids who had returned each day, realized how desperately these youngsters needed work and at last took them on. Storey and Jay bluffed their ages, and despite his misgivings, the foreman gave each a dollar in advance of their salaries. At the boarding house, they were turned away by the landlady who didn't feel they would have any money to pay and wasn't getting herself involved with runaways, but her pretty daughter, Jean taking pity on the forlorn lads, showed them to a room, and blushed as Jay stammered his gratitude.

At the factory the boys worked like Trojans and it was several weeks before the big boss showed that he had been watching them and raised them both to executive positions. Proudly, the pair bought shiny new outfits and on Easter Sunday returned home. Their mothers who had written regularly and wept over the "babies" embraced them and wept tears over the gold pins the boys had brought, but as Storey gave his father money to fix the ragged fence, and Jay 'loaned" his Dad a few dollars, the two adventurers knew that from now on they were men to be respected, men who had come into their own.

LONESOME ROAD

Pearl L. Rademacher Drama File No. 10537

HOMELESS, jobless, two victims of the Depression meet at a "Jungle fire." They share the food with the others but Duncan Reynolds, the older lad, is instantly drawn to the sensitive Ronald Holmes who confides his futile scarch for work has broken his spirit. Drawing apart from the others they discover how many interests they share, and Duncan reveals himself to his new friend when he tells of his disagreeable stepmother who had, an extra-marital affair observed by Duncan, framed the boy so that he had left a hasty note for his father and departed.

The next morning the boys start down that Lonesome Road which leads to nowhere. Duncan keeps up his friend's spirit and sings as they trod the road. Later that day he rescues a child from the wheels of a racing roadster and he and Ronald are invited for dinner to the home of the grateful Croswhites. Motherly Mrs. Croswhite gives the boys clean clothes and at dinner that night Duncan's ready wit wins the Croswhites. Ronald, shyer, says little but his eyes stray frequently to the lovely dark eyes of Nancy Croswhite. Her father, interested in the boys, offers them a position with him but they feel they must work out their own salvation and at dawn depart. Ronald lingering for a last word with Nancy. Duncan finds that the thoughtful Mrs. Croswhite has put a small sum of money in a coat pocket and both of the boys feel a great sense of warmth. Working their way as they proceed, the boys at intervals stop off with other wanderers and one great celebration is held when a newspaper is found telling that Uncle Sam intends to shelter, feed, and train all lost wandering boys. Duncan after a rousing cheer for his song, Lonesome Road, sets off with Ronald and arriving at a beautiful plantation somewhat gone to seed are directed by two little pickaninnies to Mammy Chloe who gives them work. They learn that the plantation and all its debts has been inherited by Diane Worthington from a suicide father. Ronald jeers at Duncan for romanticizing Miss Worthington, reminding him that she may be a dour old maid. Mammy Chloe is so pleased with their work that she offers them shelter and a job fixing all the fences. The next day the boys are rendered speechless as they catch their first glimpse of Miss Diane among her flowers. Duncan falls in love and subsequently when Diane realizes that she is not unmoved by him she acts the more stern, lest she give herself away, although on occasion, dining with them informally, now that they have taken over work on the plantation, the coldness falls away. Duncan notices Diane's agitation one day after a visit from Edward Stuart, a neighbor and learns from Chloe that Diane's father had left a last request that Diane marry Stuart. Duncan contrives to do some work for Stuart, gets his hands on the paper and proves it to be forgery. He induces Diane to turn the front part of the mansion into The Sugar Moon Tea Room and Chloe's chicken and waffles soon make the place famous. Diane and Duncan are married and against a background of softly crooning darkies, Duncan is reconciled to his father whom Ronald had sent for, and Ronald finds his love for Nancy Croswhite who has arrived with her parents for the wedding, still glowing.

HOLLYWOOD COWBOYS

Susie Anderson Comedy Drama File No. 10510

AS he finished rounding up the cattle, Dick saw Selma watching him from the brow of the hill and rode rapidly up to her. Slowly they walked their horses toward the ranch house and as she raised liquid eyes to his, Dick stopped over and pressed a warm kiss to her yielding lips. The next day, however, Selma received a telegram and dazed by the suddeness of it all she called Dick and showed him the notice that she had just inherited a million and a half dollars. As she waited for Dick to take her in his arms, he said, "You're a millionaire now," through stiff lips, and rode away. For a moment, Selma stared after him in bewilderment but as the succeeding days showed that Dick's pride would not let him marry a girl with a fortune, Selma's anger rose within her and furiously she packed her things and decided to travel.

Arriving in Hollywood, Selma found herself beseiged with invitations from movie heroes among them Ken and Rex two western stars who strove with each other for her favor. One day at Malibu with a party of people, Selma suddenly got an inspiration and leaping up she invited the whole crowd for a vacation on her ranch. The suggestion was greeted with loud cheers and as Dick drove to meet them at the station, Selma could scarcely suppress a wicked twinkle as she saw him wince at the attention paid her by the handsome Ken and Rex. Determined to make him suffer, Selma saw to it that Dick was present when Ken and Rex danced with her, sang to her, and boasted of their pictures. Then wtih the air of a ranch owner to a cowhand, Selma gave orders that a rodeo should be started for the entertainment of her guests. Somewhat to the dismay of the celebrated Western stars, Dick took the directions seriously and set before them beans, sow bosom and coffee without sugar and cream—real cowboy fare. Neither dared protest, but Dick grinned as he saw them pale as they tried to down the food. However, Selma, angered at his making sport of her guests treated Dick with greater disdain than ever, and when Dick called to Rex and Ken to mount bronchos, both started to object only to realize that the other was looking for just such an opportunity to show his superiority to Selma. Rex gingerly mounted a broncho and as the wild animal started bucking Rex pulled leather. The broncho hurled his inexperienced rider into a mud puddle and made a wild rush at the unseated star. Worried that Rex would get hurt, Selma stepped into the ring and as a steer made for her, the others shouted for Ken to save her. Panic-stricken, Ken hurled his rope but missed, lassoing a calf, and thrown off his feet, Ken bumped along the ground, back stuck full of cactus. With a bellow the mother of the calf made for Ken, and while the two Western stars sheepishly returned to Hollywood where such shots were doubled for them, Selma rescued by the ever-watchful Dick, nestled close in the strong arms and warned him that unless he married her and stopped this nonsense she would find some more Hollywood heroes.

MARRIAGE FOLLY

James Liberatore Drama File No. 10489

ALTHOUGH she is in love with Al Clayton, a salesman, Eunice accepts Frank Donovan's proposal of marriage, eagerly offered while the two are walking through the park. Almost unable to believe that he has won the girl of his choice, Frank tells her that he has loved her since she was a child, but felt that he had so little to offer her, as he has worked in the tiny grocery store which he now owns since grade school days, while she has occupied a prominent social position, won by her father's wealth and her own beauty. Happily, he promises to work diligently so that in a few years time, he will be able to provide her with the luxuries to which she has always been accustomed. Knowing his daughter's capricious temperament, Eunice's father advises her not to marry for a few years, as she is only eighteen, but the girl secretly feels that the ambitious Frank will one day be a prominent citizen in the town, and scorns this bit of parental advice. Frank whistles joyfully about his work, eagerly waiting for the day when he can carry his bride across the threshold of their tiny home, but Catherine Martin, who has known Frank all her life, can scarcely hold back the tears when she hears of this wedding, for she loves him deeply. In order to forget her unhappiness, she enters training as a nurse at the city hospital. Eunice, while assuring Frank of her love, secretly sees Al, and goes to his arms, saying that she will always belong to him, but must marry Frank as her father's income may not provide her with sufficient luxuries, in the years to come.

Settled in his own home with his beautiful bride, Frank's happiness in unbounded, and he whistles joyfully as he hangs pictures and draperies at her direction. Every evening he works, devising new plans for the store. When Eunice complains that he spends too much time in this fashion, and that his desire to save money is curbing her wishes, he explains that he hopes to own a chain of grocery stores within a few years, if she will only be patient. The young wife continues her association with Al, deceiving Frank, and when her husband is called away on a business trip, she allows Al to spend the night at her home. When Frank discovers Al's pipe in the bedroom, he readily accepts Eunice's statement that it belongs to her father, without questioning him. Five years later, Frank, now only thirty, has become one of the leading retailers in the little city. His devotion to Eunice is as sincere as the day they were married, and although it is common gossip that she is having an affair with Al, no one mentions this to Frank, knowing how deeply he would be wounded. Returning home earlier than Eunice expected one evening, he finds his wife, clad in a negligee, in Al's arms, and seeing him, she pretends to struggle. His Irish temper rising, Frank fights with Al, and during the battle, Al strikes him with an iron, breaking his arm; then he hastily withdraws from the house. Frank is taken to the hospital, and Catherine is assigned as his nurse. Tenderly she cares for him, and one day, believing him to be asleep, tells another nurse that she loves him; as he overhears this confession, Frank realizes that Catherine has always meant a great deal to him.

Calling every day at the hospital, Eunice expresses her gratitude and great devotion to her husband, but makes her visits very brief. When he is discharged two days before schedule, Frank hurries home, and discovers Eunice in Al's arms, as they are seated in his roadster. When he accuses her she replies that she has always loved Al, and loathes Frank's concern over business, his continual whistling, and lack of romance. Disillusioned, he divorces his wife, and when Eunice later tries to win him again, ignores her unjust pleas of infidelity. Realizing he truly loves Catherine, he weds the little nurse.

MOUNTAIN GIRL

Phil G. Bauman Drama File No. 10469

ERECTING a log cabin in the mountains, Ned Harris, with Mary, his wife, and their only child, Sue, attempts to cure himself of the habit of excessive drinking. For a time, he is successful, hut Sue learns, as she grows older, that Ned, whom she adores, often slips away to the nearest town, and returns, intoxicated; although he is always remorseful for the unhappiness he causes his wife and daughter he cannot seem to help himself. After Mary dies, Sue's grandmother offers the child a home, but she refuses to leave her father. Brought up like a boy, Sue is well able to defend herself, and wins boxing matches, held with Ted, a neighbor boy. Together with him, and a puppy whom she names "Ted," in his honor, Sue roams the hills, hunting and fishing. While under the influence of liquor, her father often brings home many undesirable companions whom his daughter is forced to entertain; among them are Tom and Mac Seely. Finding her alone one evening, Tom and Mac plan to attack her. While she is sleeping, Tom enters her room, and Mac waits outside the window to seize her if she attempts to escape; however with her superb strength, Sue manages to throw the dissipated Tom out of the window, and, after pouring tar on the two, chases them with a bull whip to the cabin next door where a group of friends are playing poker. Deciding that she must find a means for herself and her father to escape from this environment, Sue goes to the cabin of her friend, Jim Brite, a retired trapper. He tells her of a rich fur district which he discovered many years ago, but was driven away from by two men, who threatened his life; his description fits Tom and Mac.

Determined to earn enough money to discover this district and trap for a season, Sue goes to an employment agency in town, but finds nothing. Offering her a position as a companion, a woman takes Sue to her home, but when a man giving the name of Floyd Warner attempts to enter her room, and places money in her bag, she fights her way to freedom and leaves. As Mr. Warner hastily leaves town, she cannot return his money, and purchases a pack string with it, setting out alone for Jim's old cabin. Caught in a snow storm, Sue builds a little cabin, and is forced to shoot her horse, as her supplics are inadequate. The Seely brothers murder Jim, and set out for the rich trapping region, shortly after Sue leaves. June and Cleave Whitemore, in reality the children of Floyd Warner, since his name was assumed for purposes of disguise, fly together over Yellowstone and surrounding regions. A cracked wing forces them down, and Sue, who has seen a plane dropping a candy box a few minutes before, traces them by this method. Before she can reach them, the Seelys, also attracted by the box, discover them; Tom, now living in Jim's old cabin, carries June there, while Mac is on the point of shooting Cleave, when Sue intervenes, and giving her gun to Cleave, beats Mac with a rod, and orders them both away. After a few days' rest, June and Cleave return with Sue to her cabin, where they are snowed in for two months. Sue inspires the city boy to build up his strength, and June follows suit. Before they leave, Cleave urges Sue to marry him, but as she does not wish to leave the mountains she refuses.

After many crimes, the Seelys return to Jim's cabin, and kidnap Sue, while she is swimming, but her dog, Ted, who has followed her attacks them, and Cleave, returning for Sue, comes upon her at this crucial moment. He beats them, and turns the two over to the police, taking his sweetheart in his arms. They are married, and, a year later, a little son is born to them. Cleave's father, returning from South Africa comes to visit the happy couple, with June, in their mountain home. Sue at once recognizes him as Floyd Warner, but forgives him; however, he confesses to his children, and attempts to drown himself, when Sue and Cleave save him, and persuade him that they wish him to make his home with them. Since her own father has recently died, Mr. Whitemore partially takes his place in her heart.

GUN PLAY

Joseph L. Chinn Melodrama File No. 10465

CHARLES W. NANTON, a distinguished archeologist, is exploring the backwoods of Louisiana in search of data concerning Indian life, accompanied by his wife, Sydonia, their baby son, and Langshan, the guide. Uncovering a mound which contains a small fortune in treasures and relics, Charles hastens to his shack with the precious find, and leaving the baby in the care of a nurse, returns to the spot the next day, with Sydonia and Langshan. While they are examining the mound, Langshan shoots them; death is instantaneous, and the guide carries their bodies to a swamp, where they are lost in the quicksand. Returning to the cottage, Langshan bribes the nurse to say nothing of her employment with the young couple, and, taking the child and the treasure, departs at once for New Orleans. Newspapers carry the story of the disappearance of the noted scientist and his family, concluding at last that they were lost in the quicksands of the treacherous region, or destroyed by wild animals. Fearful of arrest, Langshan dares not destroy the baby, and hires Lusiller, his landlady's sister, to care for the unfortunate child. When Lusiller discovers that the guide has deserted her, and taken a steamer for England, leaving her without funds to provide for the baby, she gives her friend, Craco fifty dollars, instrueting him to destroy the child, hiding its body in a swamp. Taking the baby near the spot where his parents were so cruelly slain, Craco enters an abandoned cabin, and prepares to commit his crime in the morning. That night, he sees two ghostly figures, and runs away in terror, upsetting the child's crib.

The baby's cries attract the attention of Dr. Carfield and his wife, who are hunting nearby, in company with four young men. At once, the men hasten to the spot, and rescue the child just as wolves are about to end its life. Tenderly, Mrs. Carfield cares for the baby, and agrees with her husband to adopt the little fellow. Nicknamed "the doorstep baby," it is decided that the child will never be told of this adoption until he is old enough to fully understand. When the Carfields return to New Orleans, they examine an old satchel found in the shack with the infant, and discover pictures of Langshan and a woman, who signs her name as L. C. Junetta. A letter, written by her, urges Langshan to secure five thousand dollars to pay a mortgage, and abandon his life of crime, suggesting that the money might be raised by murdering Dr. and Mrs. Nanton. Turning this information over to the police, Dr. Carfield instructs them to investigate thoroughly. Shortly after this, a little daughter, Eve, is born to the Carfields. At last the whole tragedy of the "doorstep baby" is uncovered, but it is decided to keep these facts from him for a few years, in order not to destroy the happiness of his childhood. Christened Edward Carfield, he grows up believing Eve is his sister, and is awarded the title of the "bold winner," because of his prowess in athletics at school. During a hunting trip on his sixteenth birthday, Dr. Carfield gently explains the whole situation to the boy, whom he loves as his own son.

When his education is completed, the young man traces his parents' murderer, although Eve, whom he loves, pleads with him not to endanger his own life. At last he discovers Langshan at Lusiller's boarding house, where he has returned hoping to extort money from the child he abandoned. Edward traps him through a false telephone call, and police arrest all implicated in the crime, while the young man turns, free at last, to Eve.

PLEASURE GODS

Grace Mel Murray & Margaret Dees
Drama File No. 10527

AWAKENED by the clatter of Mexican Olas dropped by the young man-servant, Juan, fiery Jovita Garcia rises from the hammock and slaps Juan so that the marks of her fingers show livid against his cheeks. As his mother, Manuela hurries out and begins belaboring the boy with her broom, Juan swears revenge upon his mistress. The scene is interrupted by the grave-faced Padre who comes to summon Jovita to the bedside of her dying father. Before Robert Garcia dies, he sends for a young American attorney, David Finley and entrusts Jovita to his care.

Jovita arrives at El Paso, David's home accompanied by a parrot, a rooster, and Manuela and Juan. Lawrence, David's younger brother, seeing her, immediately christens her " Senorita Vesuvious" but Saxon, David's blue eyed little ward, seeing Jovita's slumbrous eyes follow David, shudders involuntarily. In the days that follow, Jovita is alternately fire and tenderness in her efforts to win David, and Saxon finds herself more and more excluded. Then Jovita wheedles from David a Pierce Arrow roadster and crosses the border to Juarez where at the gambling casino she whirls into a magnificent dance. The proprietor of the casino, Joe, becomes infatuated with her, but Larry, whose secret rendezvous this is, although half-drunk, brings Jovita home safely. Saxon, misconstruing David's attitude toward the ardent Jovita, accepts half-heartedly Larry's proposal of marriage but when David finds her outstretched upon the ground, weeping, he takes her in his arms and tells her for the first time of his love. In her great joy Saxon forgets about Larry and promises to marry David.

Meanwhile Jovita, observing the new turn of events, encourages the increasingly importunate Joe to kidnap Saxon, promising her favor as a reward. As she is watching Joe flee with his burden, she is startled by the sinister approach of Juan who has come to take his revenge for the slap. Disarming him by whispering words of love and stroking his hair, Jovita sees the peon waver and in that instant she pushes him violently so that he falls backward over the balcony and is crushed on the concrete paving below.

From the hut where she is kept captive, Saxon sees Juan's funeral cortege pass but is unable to call out. At this time Larry unable to stand exposure for his gambling debts and drinking goes off to sea, leaving an ambiguous note that infers he has drowned himself. Jovita insinuates that Larry killed himself for love of the fickle Saxon who had encouraged both brothers and then decamped, and David is forced to believe this story. At last David is caught by Jovita's practiced wiles and he marries her. Manuela comes to strew flowers on her son's grave, and Saxon tosses out David's pearl encrusted engagement ring to her. David frees Saxon, who, however, learning of his marriage, becomes a Nurse in the Mercy Hospital. Jovita soon tires of respectability and goes for a last fling to Juarez where Joe gets her drunk. Suddenly, however, Jovita screams as she realizes she is blind. David sends for Saxon who nurses Jovita through her delirium but the hootleg whiskey proves fatal and Jovita dies begging forgiveness. David prosecutes Joe and after all the suffering, takes into the shelter of his strong arms, his Saxon.

LOVE HUNGRY

Betty Dunn Drama File No. 10543

DISCHARGED from an orphanage, beautiful Dorothy Kimball secures a position in a stuffy bookshop. One day, however, as she is getting a book down from a high shelf, she is observed by Mrs. Linn, an unusually well dressed woman who sounds Dorothy on her ambitions and offers her a position in her fashionable Charm Dress Salon as a model. Delighting in the feel of the luxurious satins and laces, Dorothy attracts considerable attention as a model and when Lorain Barry, pampered debutante plans a style show as a feature of a house party on her Long Island estate, Dorothy is sent to model. Almost immediately Lorain senses the admiration of Roger Glace for this girl, and with superb insolence, Lorain forces Dorothy to turn and pose for her until the girl begins to feel like a racehorse that is being appraised. When the ordeal is concluded, Dorothy finds that no provision has been made to drive her back to the city, and rather than pay her fare out of her own pocket, she begins walking. Some minutes later Roger and a group of the other men get into their cars and head for the city. Roger, seeing Dorothy walking, stops and calls for her to get into his car. She refuses politely, but instead of letting her proceed he makes a point of insisting that she come and when he infers that she'd be a fool not to take up his offer considering the clothes and jewelry he can give her, Dorothy taunted by the laughter of the other men, slaps him. Roger reddens and as the others ride him for choosing the wrong girl to pull that stuff with, Roger sullenly vows he'll make her sorry. Bill, one of his friends tries unsuccessfully to kid Roger out of his black mood.

The next few weeks are uneventful for Dorothy. Then she gets a call from Lorain to model some sport clothes. While the other girls congratulate her on the extra money she is making, Dorothy knows in her heart that Lorain is only doing it to humiliate her out of a personal dislike. After a torturous afternoon, Lorain coolly suggests that Dorothy take her car instead of hiking this time, but Dorothy replies that she has already arranged for a taxi. Roger goes out, bribes the taxi driver to let him borrow his uniform and cab to play a trick on a friend, and drives the unsuspecting Dorothy to an unfrequented spot. Darkness has fallen and suddenly Roger parks. Climbing into the back seat of the cab he takes the struggling Dorothy into his arms and forces his mouth down on hers.

Weeks drag by and Dorothy pales as she reads of the forthcoming society wedding of Roger Glace and Lorain Barry. Needing money desperately, she dares not refuse when Mrs. Linn informs her she is to model Lorain's trousseau but in the shelter of her own room she gets hysterical. With burning cheeks Dorothy goes through her paces but at last, unable to stand it longer she faints and Mrs. Linn coolly fires her when she learns Dorothy is going to have a baby. It is Gill who finds out about Dorothy's plight and tells Roger. Proceeding to the hospital Roger is torn at sight of Dorothy's wan face and as he lifts the tiny blue bundle he resolves to protect Dorothy. His father disowns him, and Lorain seeking revenge, sues for breach of promise, leaving Roger penniless. Reformed now, Roger takes Dorothy and the baby to a small town and there they begin life anew. However, the wily Lorain steals their address from a letter in Bill's desk, while on a visit, and sends a blackmail letter saying that unless they pay her fifty thousand she will reveal to the small community that Dorothy's child was born out of wedlock. It is Bill, however who takes the letter and warns Lorain that if she ever tries to threaten the happiness of Roger and Dorothy again he will prosecute her for blackmail. Frightened, Lorain takes a trip to Europe and Bill comes to see Dorothy and Roger whose happiness is now unmarred.

EXPERIENCE FOR SALE

Lucie M. Guillotte Drama File No. 10544

UNTIL the letter from Peabody Co., Publishers, came telling Elaine her stories were good but cold and advising her that "to write, one must live and suffer," Elaine had refused the invitation of her young friend Erin Wellborn to join a week-end party at Wildwood. Then, deciding impulsively to accept the opportunity to find adventure, Elaine stood at the window of her New York room and enviously watched the sign on the Strand marquee twinkle, "My Supreme Hour."

At Wildwood Elaine met Erin's handsome, grey haired father, and as their eyes held he informed her he was going into the city for a day but hoped to see her before she left Wildwood. That evening while the other guests were dancing, Elaine, passing through the hall, dropped her handkerchief. Neal Guilford, wealthy young roue picked it up and seeing the initials returned it to Erin with his unchanging formula, "As dainty as its owner." A smile crossed Erin's face as she disclaimed it and hazarded that it belonged to Elaine. Neal grimaced as Erin pointed to the top of Elaine's head visible over the top of the balcony bench, and as Erin informed him now she had looked up to Elaine, her senior at college, Neal murmured, "An old maid." Just then Elaine came by, looking for something. Neal straightened up, eyes brightening at her unexpected prettiness. "As dainty as its owner," Neal whispered to Elaine and Erin smiled faintly. The following morning a tennis ball rolled to the secluded spot where Elaine was busy writing. Neal, coming to recover it, stopped to speak to Elaine and Erin called out, "You know Neals is editor for Peabody Co." Elaine bit her lip. "To write, one must live and suffer," had been Neal's admonition. She fled, but later in the garden Neal found her and pressed a long kiss to her lips. Shaken, she broke away. That evening Wellborn returned and drawing Elaine aside asked her to be his wife. That evening flowers came for Elaine from Neal and Wellborn, but seeing the butler bring a tray with a glass and a bottle into Wellborn's room, and seeing Neal pick up the handkerchief of a lady entering a car, with the line, "As dainty as its owner," Elaine came down to dinner without a corsage, and later incurred Neal's jealousy by dancing with Erin's father. From his balcony, Neal saw Erin get into Ted Waters' roadster. Knocking softly on the door of Erin's room he was admitted by the maid and with his finger on his lips, Neal offered to give the girl her chance in the movies if she helped him in a scheme. The maid came to Wellborn's room informed him that Erin had not yet returned from a drive with Ted, then whimpered she had promised not to tell and would now lose her job and she had no money. As she sobbed bitterly Wellborn wrote out a check for the hysterical girl who pulled down his head and kissed him violently just as Neal entered with Elaine. Refusing to listen to an explanation, Elaine asked Neal to drive her into town. Erin came back to say that she had married Ted but all Wellborn's efforts to communicate with Elaine failed. Elaine at last yielded to Neal's plea that she come to his apartment, but the maid, wincing under the contempt of the chauffeur for associating with Neal, broke down and arriving at Neal's studio exposed him before Elaine and Wellborn. As Elaine lifted her lips for Wellborn's kiss the lights above the Strand twinkled, "My Supreme Hour."

SONNY GAL

Boisey De Legge Drama File No. 10470

SLIDING safely to the home base, sixteen year old Corinne Green, familiarly known as "Sonny Gal," wins the cheers of the eight boys who comprise the rest of the Mannings, South Carolina, baseball team, and in response, she skillfully executes a tap dance for the benefit of those on the bench. Charmed by the verve of this golden-haired, smiling girl, Al Stewart, a New York producer, and his friend, Frank Williams, a composer, who have come to the southland in search of material for their next revue, introduce themselves and accompany Sonny to her home, where they at last are able to persuade her parents to allow the girl to complete her education in New York, so that they may groom her, at the same time, for a musical comedy debut. Tommie Wheeler, a neighbor boy who has always loved Sonny, begs her not to go, but she replies that she must aid her parents, who are in financial difficulties, as soon as possible, and chaperoned by her old nurse, Sonny boards the train with Stewart and Williams. In addition to her regular studies, the girl practices dancing every day, and cultivates her golden voice. Stewart and Williams take her to a social gathering of their friends, and she enchants them by singing "Sonny Gal," composed especially for her debut. Following this, Stewart plays a hauntingly lovely waltz, "Remember Me," which will be the theme of the revue. Rehearsals begin, and Sonny is presented to Clarence Walker, an accomplished young baritone, who is to sing her opening number with her. They are soon seen together constantly during their brief moments of leisure.

Eager to see Sonny Gal, Tommie Wheeler runs away from home and school to come to New York. Before going to her apartment, he stops at a speakeasy, and a group of gangsters persuade him to drive their car while they attempt to rob a bank. Under the influence of liquor, Tommie does not realize what he is doing, and while the criminals escape, he is taken into custody and sentenced to a year in prison. Sadly, as he is seated in his cell, he looks at a small picture of Sonny Gal, and sings "Home Town," softly, thinking of the happy days he spent in the little, southern village. Sonny signs a contract for five hundred dollars a week with increases in salary after success is assured, and sends for her parents, who are given choice seats for the opening night. Clad in silk overalls and bandanna, the little southern girl is an immediate success, as she takes up her song, after Walker sings the first verse. The entire revue, based on colorful incidents in the south of today, is enthusiastically acclaimed, as is its star. Many offers of other contracts pour into her mail box, but she ignores them, and tells her admirers who request a little of society that she is soon to become the bride of Clarence Walker.

His sentence served, Tommie encounters Sonny as she is entering a Fifth Avenue store, and seeing that his clothing is in poor condition, she presses a fifty dollar bill on her old playmate, asking him to call at her apartment that evening. He appears, in a new suit, and is welcomed by Sonny's parents and presented to her fiancee. Tommie pleads in vain with Sonny not to marry Clarence, and shortly before her wedding, comes to the apartment and threatens Walker with a gun. As he fires, Sonny steps forward and receives the bullet; she is rushed to the hospital where her life is despaired of. Waiting in the corridor, Walker sees a vision of the girl, softly singing her song, and smiling. He begs her not to leave him, and just then the doctor informs him that Sonny will recover. A few weeks later they are married, and Tommie asks, and receives, forgiveness.

THE WOMAN QUESTION

Victoria M. Hayes Drama File No. 10505

MRS. CREIGHTON, recently widow, applies at the emergency hospital where she was employed as a nurse before her marriage, and is given her former position, by the superintendent. Returning home each night after a hard day's work, she cheerfully prepares for her two boys, Dick and Jerry, both students in high school. Mary Turner, a neighbor girl, often comes over to help the brave widow, and is regarded almost as a daughter by the household, although Mr. Creighton's discerning eyes see that Mary's attention is focused particularly on Dick, and she remarks that she hopes someday they will marry, while the younger woman blushes. With hard work and careful saving, Mrs. Creighton is able to send her boys to college, and, when they return four years later, she feels her sacrifices well worth while as she regards these fine, young men who are her sons. Jerry, the younger boy, marries first, and his mother welcomes Gertrude, a young woman whom he met at the university, into the family. Unable to conceal her happiness at Dick's return, Mary eagerly resumes their old companionship, but one day he tells her that, while away on a business trip, he fell in love with another woman, and shortly after this announcement, he marries this stranger. Mrs. Creighton is bitterly disappointed, and feels that Stella, her new daughter-in-law, will not make her son happy, as she is a much older woman, with obviously bleached hair, and a worldly, affected manner.

In spite of this, Dick's mother does her best to win the affection of his wife, and says nothing when she discovers that Stella drinks frequently, and is seen in the company of other men. Three little girls are born to the couple during the next five years, and devoted to her grandchildren, Mrs. Creighton goes to their home, braving all sorts of weather, when Stella asks her to care for them. Mary often accompanies her on these expeditions, when she finds that Stella does not object, and the youngsters become warmly attached to her, as she plays with their dolls, as if she were their own age. Finding her one afternoon, as she is giving a tea party for his little daughters, Dick wistfully acknowledges to himself that she, and not Stella, should be their mother. Mrs. Creighton dresses to attend a reception one day, wearing her only valuable possession, a string of amber beads which her late husband had given her on their first anniversary, when the telephone rings, and Stella informs her that Patsy, the baby, is ill, and she must leave to keep a social engagement. At once, Mrs. Creighton cancels her own plans, and hastens to the child. When she changes to a house dress, she places her amber beads in her satchel. Several hours later, Stella returns, and Mrs. Creighton goes home, driven by Mary, who calls for her; in her own room, she discovers that the beads are gone.

Stella telephones Gertrude, asking her if Mrs. Creighton has said anything about the missing beads, and she replies in the negative. Calling on Mary, she persuades the girl to return them to Mrs. Creighton, saying that they fell out of the car, which she does, but the story is not credible, since the satchel has a firm clasp. Later, Stella is killed, while driving with an intoxicated companion, and Mary can tell the truth. Joyfully, Mary accepts Dick's proposal of marriage, and Mrs. Creighton makes her home with them. Happy at last, Dick tells them he should have known he could only truly love a woman like his mother.

THIS FREEDOM

Giles E. Mowrer Drama File No. 10480

OLIVIA GREYMORE affectionately embraces her younger sister, Eleanor, at the railroad station, upon the girl's return from boarding school. As they are seated in Eleanor's apartment, the discussion inevitably turns to men; Olivia, recently divorced, advises Eleanor, to whom she has been a mother since the death of their parents, years ago, that freedom is to be desired above all else, and cautions her against a hasty marriage, especially with a poor man. Remembering this, Eleanor refuses to be more than a friend to Harry Wier, a young reporter, whom she meets at a party, in spite of the fact that he makes love to her, and she feels a kindred emotion toward him. Olivia, also, has fallen in love with Charles Gibson, sales manager for a firm of lingerie and women's hosiery, but as her divorce is not yet final, marriage is out of the question, and she conceals the fact that she has become his mistress from her innocent, little sister. Secretly, Olivia steals to Charles's hotel room, and, passionately jealous by nature, tells him that if he ever deserts her for another woman, she will kill them both. As she lies in his arms, Charles assures her that she need never fear, as she is the only women he desires. When she encounters him on the street with his sister, she almost loses control of herself, until Charles hastily assures her of the relationship.

Idly viewing a display of lingerie in a window, Charles is surprised when a feminine voice states that her choice is the pajama suit in the center; he turns to confront an attractive platinum blonde, who is smiling at him. Recklessly, he invites the young woman to join him at supper at the Tinkle Bell, a speakeasy, and she accepts. As they dine, she tells him that she is June Kleiner, the divorced wife of Bill, a factory worker, whose brutality and constant drinking destroyed their marriage. Even now, he occasionally attempts to enter her apartment, overcome with jealousy at the thought that she may be in love with another man. Sympathizing with his problem, so like his own, and drawn by her vivid appeal, Charles arranges to see June again, advising her to call him on the telephone before she comes to his rooms. Ignoring this caution. June knocks at the door, and Charles dressed in a bathrobe, after his hasty shower admits her, but quickly sends her away through a side door when he sees Olivia coming. However, Olivia witnessed this hasty dismissal, and questions Charles, doubting his assurances that the young woman she saw had knocked at the wrong door. While calling at Olivia's apartment, Charles is introduced to Eleanor, and is attracted to her, but Olivia warns him to stay away from her little sister, when they are alone. Harry pleads with Eleanor to marry him, but she refuses.

As they are dining together, June and Charles are seen by Bill Kleiner; later, he discovers his former wife in the arms of a man, as they are seated in a car at the edge of town, but before he can recognize June's lover, they drive away. Entering the apartment where June lives with her aunt, Bill shoots and kills the young woman, at the same time seriously wounding her aunt. Papers next day carry the story, naming Charles as corespondent. Olivia has just been told by her physician that she is to become a mother, when she reads of the murder. At once, she drives to Charles' hotel, preparing to kill him, but a truck turns over her car, on the way. Harry covers this accident, and, as Olivia is dying, promises her he will take care of Eleanor. When she finds that her sister has taken a pistol, Eleanor goes to Charles' hotel room, and here Harry finds her. As he informs the girl of the tragedy, and she turns to him, Charles sighs with profound relief at his deliverance.

A CHECKERBOARD ROMANCE

W. B. Garry Drama File No. 10562

AT college after a rivalry that has lasted through four years Bill manages to wrest the checker championship from his friend Fred Hamilton. At graduation the two clasp hands fondly as they separate, Fred to take his place in his father's business and Bill to go abroad to England to represent the United States in the International checker matches. Bill returns the undefeated champion and on board the transatlantic liner generously offers to take on all comers, the proceeds of the match to go to charity. Before an absorbed audience Bill wins every game until a pretty girl seats herself opposite him. The crowd winks and Bill looks indulgent, remembering this is for charity, but as the game starts Bill realizes this slip of a girl offers genuine competition. As the game proceeds Bill looks up over the board at the pretty face and his interest in the game becomes secondary to his interest in his opponent. After a long battle, Bill, intent upon Miss Medford's dimple and her cockney accent, overlooks an obvious play and to the astonishment of the large audience the girl triumphantly takes the match from the champion. Bill congratulates her warmly but she accuses him of having thrown the match and making a fool of her. It is the last day out and Bill searches for the girl frantically but despite all his efforts she eludes him and after the last passenger has docked, Bill realizes that she has vanished unseen. Then begins a long search for her but he soon discovers that Miss Medford is just the incognito under which she was traveling. Discouraged, he combs New York and as he is passing Tiffany's, several days later he is astonished to see Fred. Calling him he pumps his friend's hand and as they go to Bill's office where they can talk, Fred admits that he was buying an engagement ring. Envying his friend the successful outcome of his love affair, Bill asks for details. Fred tells him how he was working for his father and had been sent to get the account of Harrison, one of the hardest men to deal with. After gaining admittance to Harrison's inner office, Fred had tried in vain to convince the adamant financier to give his business to Fred's firm, and just as they had reached an impasse, Fred had noticed a beautiful ivory and ebony checker set. Harrison had visibly beamed at Fred's interest and when Fred asserted that he had played checkers at college, Mr. Harrison had boasted of his niece's invincibility. A few moments later Edith Wayne had entered and before long she and Fred were battling it out over a checkerboard. To the amazement of Harrison, his niece took her first beating and as she acknowledged the superior playing of Fred, Harrison invited Fred up to his home for a return match. So had started the romance of Edith and Fred and now they were going to be married. "Lucky fellow," Bill mumbles, but as Fred proudly exhibits his fiancee's picture, Bill blanches. It is "Miss Medford." Dismayed, Bill turns away but Fred insists that Bill be his best man. Unhappy and silent, Bill accompanies his best friend. He dreads the moment when he is to meet Edith Wayne, but as the curtain parts, Bill stares in amazement at two "Miss Medfords" and learns that one is Edith Wayne, Fred's fiancee, the other her cousin, Laura Wayne, alias Miss Medford. And there is a double wedding as a climax to a checkerboard romance.

LIFE'S PAWNS

Gertrude B. Weeden Drama File No. 10578

THE solemn notes of the wedding march, the time-honored rites, and Evelyn raised adoring eyes to John as he kissed her— his bride. Through the next few minutes Nick, their best man steered them to the train and waved to them as they left on their honeymoon. It was three years before Nick's business took him to town again, and as he danced with Evelyn, John looked on beaming. Still swayed by their perfect rhythm together, Evelyn had drifted on into John's arms and as she clung closer, John interrupted the magic of the waltz to comment about the football scores. Dear John.

Then, once Nick had dropped into John's office. As they clasped hands warmly, John deplored the work that kept him tied up and insisted that Nick drop in to see Evelyn and the babies in their bungalow at the seashore. Supper had been simple and rather confused with baby chatter and many interruptions. Later, the dishes washed, Nick had looked out at the clean stretch of beach, and acquiescent to his suggestion, Evelyn had joined him for a moonlight swim. Suddenly Evelyn ran breathlessly down the beach, and raising her hands above her head, danced lightly over the sands. At last she dropped sobbing, and as he held her she moaned that she was suddenly tired of mopping and washing, and of "plenty of cream in her coffee." They had returned to the house in a strained silence and bidding her goodnight, Nick went back to the beach and for hours sat vainly trying to analyze while his desires warred in him. At last he returned to the bungalow and found beside his bed Evelyn's note begging him to leave before morning—because she dared not to see him again. All night he waited in the station and took the earliest train out. By noon in a fever pitch of emotion, he sent a hurried desperate telegram. RETURNING EVENING TRAIN. and added LET ME FIND YOU ON THE BEACH.

Torn by the sudden release of long pent up emotion, Evelyn stared unseeing in the darkness and sighed with relief as she saw Nick leave. Then, because she had not called him back, she cried herself to sleep. She knew she loved John, but that sense of excitement, that moon madness, John could never understand. Feverishly she read Nick's telegram and that night as she tucked her babies in, one of them asked, "What goes 'bumpty-bump' inside you, Mummie?"

Just before dark, Evelyn dressed in an old chiffon evening dress of flaming scarlet and as the breeze swept her hot body, she trembled. "If only this were for John!" She shivered as a purply cloud glided for a moment across the moon. Suddenly she heard the thud of footsteps in the sand. And as strong arms clasped her, she swayed. "Why! Why, John!" Holding her tightly he murmured his gladness that she had sent that message, "Some one is waiting for you on the sands, in the moonlight." His secretary had said that Nick left it on his desk, and that he had seemed ill as he rushed out to catch his train. And as John murmured little half-forgotten words of love, Evelyn looked up and saw the moon shining strangely bright.

EYES OF THE WORLD

H. G. Willson Drama File No. 10525

IN love with the daughter of his surgery prof, Jack reads the questions on his examination paper and a feeling of exultation mounts within him as he realizes this is going to be easy. He is writing steadily when suddenly he is stunned to hear his name called out and before the entire class Peggy's father accuses him of cheating. For a moment he stares in bewilderment as he tries to deny the charge but like a lash the professor's voice cuts him and orders him from the room. There is a confused mumbling from the other medical students but Professor Murphy raps for silence and as the door closes behind Jack, the other students finish their exams. That night there is a faculty meeting and Jack pleads innocent but it is his word against the noted professor's and despite regrets he is informed that he cannot receive a degree from the school.

Dazed by the completeness of his ruin, Jack prepares to leave town. Peggy comes to him and placing hr hand on his shoulder professes her entire disbelief of her father's charge, and when Jack maintains his silence she begs him to take her with him as his wife. For a moment the thought of losing her is more than he can stand, but realizing that it won't be fair to permit her to share his disgrace, he puts her gently from him and tells her he has to go on alone.

Arriving on the coast, Jack applies at a Medical School for admission and admits to Dr. Grayson, the great nerve specialist, the entire circumstances of his disgrace. The physician looks grave, but at length he agrees to give Jack a chance and as the boy rapidly shows his merit, Grayson takes a special interest in him. Still smarting from his shame, Jack eschews all companionship and social life and graduated, soon wins distinction as an interne and as assistant to Grayson. After years of work, Jack, now known as Dr. Mintor branches out for himself as a brain specialist and is soon achieving fame for his phenomenal work.

Meanwhile back home, Professor Murphy has been becoming more and more morose, and is advised hy the other members of the faculty and his own family to rest, but he continues to work long hours until one day, during an examination, he suddenly tears up a student's paper and shouts, "Cheat!" A stunned silence falls over the students and as the affair comes before the honor board and the boy protests his innocence the faculty realizes that the professor's brain has snapped from over-work and this is but a recurrence of the affair that has resulted in the previous expulsion of a brilliant student. They try to locate Jack, but unsuccessfully while specialists diagnose Murphy's case as one that would grow progressively worse. In desperation they send for the celebrated Dr. Mintor who comes immediately. "Jack," Peggy gasps. Steadily Jaok wields the knife on the brain of his enemy and after many days knows at last that Murphy will completely recover. Outside Peggy is waiting with tear-dimmed eyes, and as Jack takes her in his arms there is nothing now, to keep him from asking her to marry him.

THE CHURCHYARD MURDER MYSTERY

Mary E. Bicek Comedy File No. 10575

WRAPPED in gloom over the latest cut in his salary, Mr. Heming boarded his train, and refusing the invitation of his fellow commuters to join them in a game of cards, opened his newspaper. As his face screwed up disgustedly and he emitted indignant snorts, a pleasant white haired commuter asked him what the trouble was. Banging his fist down on the paper, Mr. Heming pointed an accusing finger to the headlines and gruesome pictures of child murderers, and declaimed about the newspapers ruining the youth of the nation. Recipes for murdering, Mr. Heming called them, and as Mr. Truby uneasily assured Heming that normal, healthy children never be guilty of crime no matter how tempted such as his own for instance, would they were. Mr. Heming answered, "You never can tell." The train pulled into the station and when the conductor observed that it was pretty late for Mr. Heming to be getting home, wasn't it, he replied that he was always held up like this the last day of the month.

Looking up at the clock on the Church steeple, Mr. Heming groaned as he realized how late it was, and mumbling about how dark the road was, cut across in back of the Reformed Church, taking a short cut. Suddenly, however, he heard voices, young voices, and as he stopped to listen his blood ran cold. "I had an awful time getting the head off. . . I'll never take a chance like this again. . . . I've got the body wrapped up. . . . I dumped it in the bushes until dark . . . Got the spade" Then as the sound of digging and dirt falling struck Mr. Heming's ear, he could stand it no longer and racing noiselessly from the spot he burst into the police station and breathlessly reported what he had seen. "Hurry, hurry!" he shouted wiping the perspiration from his face. Agitatedly he watched the heavily armed policemen set off and calling his wife he said, "Hello, Emma. I'll be late. I'm at the police station." Then stammeringly he tried to explain that he hadn't been arrested, that it was all right," and looking up he saw two policemen enter with two handcuffed lads. Mr. Heming shuddered. "So young, so callous." The boys tried to explain, but shutting them up the policeman started to open the packages. "Don't!" the boys pleaded. "You ain't afraid, now?" mocked the officer while the sergeant asked the names of their fathers and their phone numbers. Reluctantly the boys gave the information while their tortured eyes kept roving to the clock overhead. Every time they opened their mouths to speak they were silenced. Before the bundles could be opened, Mr. Truby came rushing in. Mr. Heming hastened to explain to the grief stricken father he didn't know who the boys were, he just did his duty. The long bundle was pared down to its last wrapping and the sheet was drawn off — an old dress form. The second bundle held an old human skull. The third a phonograph which when wound up gave forth awful moans and wails. As the truth dawned on the audience the boys pleaded to be allowed to play their joke on the gang. The party hadn't broken up yet, the officers and Mr. Truby rocked with relieved laughter. After the others had gone, Mr. Heming meekly made for the door. "Better get a taxi, Mr. Heming. It's late and you look tired. And don't forget this is Hollowe'en!" the sergeant said, adding under his breath, "Poor old fool."

NO MORE STRUGGLE

Bertha R. Biggs Drama File No. 10472

DWIGHT HARLOW, an inventor, is delighted when he finds his two little sons, Peter and Dicky playing a "war game," in which they pretend to have invented a bomb which will destroy an entire city. When he proudly calls his wife's attention to this, she replies that she wishes they would devote their energy to studying their school lessons and helping her with household tasks, but Harlow assures her that the boys are showing early traits of genius and creative ability. When the boys quarrel with the other children and succeed in domineering them, Harlow feels this is an indication of leadership, and congratulates his sons. Mrs. Harlow again is doubtful, but, not understanding children, does not attempt to contradict her husband's unique theories, although she does protest when the boys chase a frightened kitten to the top of a telephone pole, but they tell her they needed the animal so that they might perform an experiment on it. Neighbors continually complain about the boys' behaviour, which is corrupting their own children, and the Harlow family is obliged to move continually on this account. Mrs. Harlow remarks that it seems scarcely worthwhile to unpack, since she knows they will soon be requested to leave. Peter and Dicky grow into handsome, brilliant boys, but their classmates avoid them because of their arrogance and lack of consideration. Their father will brook no interference until the hoys are arrested for a petty theft, and sentenced to two years at the state reformatory.

Admitting that their environment has been wrong, the parents decide to take the boys to Europe for a fresh start, when they are released from reform school; meanwhile, a third son, Jack, is born. Two years later, the Harlows select a home in southern France, but when they hear a neighbor boy complaining to his father about their sons, in voluble French, they know that their cause has not been helped by crossing the ocean. Despairingly, the two parents look at each other, mutely acknowledging the hopelessness of the situation. Mr. Harlow goes to his laboratory, where he is attempting to build a rocket which will reach the planet Venus. Climbing inside the rocket, he starts it off, and sails through a skylight in the laboratory toward his destination. After a swift journey through the heavens, he lands at Venus, and is greeted by a group of natives, who courteously conduct him through their country. He is amazed to find that these intelligent, healthy people have never heard of war or crime, and when he asks them how they avoid these evils, he is taken to a theatre, where they present, in a play form, a picture of their methods of child training. Toys symbolizing war are taken away from the children, and in their stead, they are given constructive playthings. Parents teach their boys and girls to take pleasure in helping with household tasks, planting the gardens, and caring for pets. In walks through the parks, they are taught to understand and appreciate the beauties of nature, and in all their games and pastimes, parents help them to love their playmates and associate with them in harmony.

With a start, Harlow finds himself seated in the rooket, and realizes he has been dreaming. Calling his family together, he relates his experience, and is amazed to find his sons are eager to try the "Venus plan." Together, they bury their toy cannons and guns, and resolve that little Jack shall be trained as a useful citizen from the start. Mrs. Harlow, on the point of leaving her husband, agrees to help them start again.

BOMBS OVER EUROPE

Gaspar Semperger Drama File No. 10486

POWERFUL and autocratic, Gustavus Nasdady is feared by servants on his vast estate a few miles north of Monoster as much as his gentle wife is loved. Believing that he must rule his retinue with an iron hand, Gustavus is tender only to his wife and two children, little Gustavus and Emma. An impoverished nobleman, Louis Molnar, is sent to the Nasdady estate by John Hollos, chief of police, in order that he may apply for employment. While being conducted there by Alexander Fuzes and Anthony Hajdu of the police force, Gustavus and his wife pass Molnar in their carriage. The horses become frightened, and Molnar saves the lives of Lord and Lady Nasdady by seizing the bridles of their runaway steeds; he is rewarded with the post of first servant, and is given a comfortable cottage on the estate, where he brings his wife and little son, Colman. A few years later, both Molnar and his wife are striken with a fever prevalent in the community, and as they lie at the point of death, Lord and Lady Nasdady promise to care for their son. The little boy grows up as a playmate of their own children, and shares in their educational instruction, yet he is made to feel his difference in station. When Colman reaches young manhood, he and Emma are deeply in love, and, unable to restrain himself, he takes her in his arms, as they are strolling through the woods; Lord Nasdady, who has been hunting, finds them in mutual embrace, and shoots Colman, in his anger. He dresses the young man's wound, but tells him that he must leave the estate at once, as he is only an orphan, and must not think of marriage with Emma.

Sadly, Colman weeps a farewell at the grave of his parents, and sets forth for the town of Egar. Shortly after this, war breaks out between Russia and Hungary, and Colman, now twenty-one, enlists with the Hussar regiment, stationed in Kassa. When the Czar orders the kozyak army to advance against Hungary, the general of the Hussar Division, hearing of this, begins to advance with his army of 2400 cavalry into Galicia, to stop the Russians before they reach the Carpathian Mountains. Packed in box cars and bravely singing military songs, the troops, including Colman, advance to Lemberg, within fifty miles of the kozyaks. Here they are joined by their first lieutenant, none other than Lord Nasdady's son. He greets Colman warmly, and although the private is assigned to care for his officer's boots and clothing, their friendship remains as firm as in their childhood days at the estate. Gustavus assures Colman that Emma still thinks only of him, and tells his sister that he has found the man she loves. Colman is placed in charge of a spying expedition of fifty men, and, in advancing to the kozyak front, is taken prisoner, after a desperate struggle, in which he kills ten men. Capturing the attention of his guards by showing them his gold watch, Colman overpowers them, and escapes from the fort, bringing hack news to his regiment. On the basis of this information, their general leads them in an attack on the Russian soldiers; they are outnumbered, however, and, although ultimately victorious, many of their men are taken prisoner, including Gustavus. Risking his life, Colman again approaches the Russian fort, and, taking one of the guard's uniforms, after the man has become intoxicated, secures the release of Gustavus through a forged order. When this is discovered, Colman is sentenced to death, but Gustavus, leading troops against the fort after his release, saves him as he faces the firing squad, and takes possession. A week later, peace is declared between the two nations, when Russia agrees not to further molest Hungary. When Gustavus tells his father that he owes his life to Colman, Lord Nasdady relents, and rewarding the orphan boy with a share of his property, sends for him to become his adopted son. Soon after, he marries Emma.

BRIDES WANTED

Inez C. McKenzie Comedy Drama File No. 10498

OLD JIM NANTZ, owner of the Lazy M Ranch, tells his two grandsons that, as they are twenty four, it is time they married, but the boys reply that they do not know any girls suitable for the position. In talking the situation over with his hrother, Old Jim, a settler in the Colorado community since his prospecting days in the eighties, says that since his sons were killed in the war, and there are no other surviving members of the family, the boys must carry on. Finally he suggests that the two young men, Jim Nantz the third, and Nantz Galloway, make a trip to the city, and engage two young women to work on his and his brother's ranches for a year, without communicating with any of their urhane friends. If, at the conclusion of this period of isolation, they prove adaptable and happy, the boys can propose to them. Eager for a visit to the city, the boys agree, and insert an advertisement in the paper. Over twenty young women call before noon, but upon hearing the stringent terms of the contract, refuse the position, although it pays a hundred dollars. When Al Canfield roughly pushes his four year old son, Bobby, to the floor, and tells his wife, Lou, that her sister, Belle Mayes, cannot remain in their home, she decides to leave him, and applies for the position advertised by Jim's grandsons. After conferring together, the young men tell Lou that she and her sister are engaged for the work, and may take Bobby.

Disgruntled at first when he sees that Lou is a married woman with a child, Old Jim is rather caustic in his welcome, while Belle is conducted to his brother's ranch. In a short while, however, he becomes devoted to the little boy, and spends many hours telling him of early Colorado days, and helping him construct toy boats and wagons. His friendship soon extends to Lou, who one day tells him that she married, hastily, when she was seventeen, and bore her husband's neglect and infidelity in silence until his cruel treatment extended to her little boy and her sister, whom she had brought up. Realizing these factors, Old Jim, completely won to her side of the case, helps her to secure a divorce. Belle, meanwhile, becomes a close friend of her employer, and listens with amusement while he recounts his experience with a travelling circus troup, or sympathizes as he describes battles in which he lost an arm and a leg. Although the two grandsons are on friendly terms with the sisters, their work keeps them on the range all day, and they are so inexperienced in social intercourse with members of the opposite sex that Old Jim fears the twin romances he hopes for may not develop. In their new surroundings, the young women soon gain radiant health, and memories of their unhappy circumstances in the city fade away. On Sundays they often picnic with Nantz and Jim, going to a stream a few miles distant, and laughing as the boys clumsily cook dinner for them. Afterward they ride through the hills, singing cowboy songs. On one of these occasions, Belle's pony becomes frightened and runs away. Jim follows, and stops the horse, but she is thrown to the ground. As he takes her in his arms, Jim pleads with her to recover, pouring out his love, and she smiles at him. They ride home on his horse, planning an early wedding.

Al Canfield traces his wife, when he receives notice that she is suing him for divorce, and, forcing his way into the ranch house, demands that he must leave at once, which he does, that she return with him, but Nantz informs him cringing. Realizing his love at last, Nantz takes Lou in his arms, and in the spring a double wedding is held, at the ranch, while the two old men, smile.

DESTINY

Ida Valentine Drama File No. 10522

IN a valley of the Dolomite Mountains in Italy at the close of the Seventeenth Century, Adelaide Alvani is the talk of the countryside for her beauty and unaffected charm. Educated in a convent, Adelaide is wooed by the wealthy Theodoro, most eligible young man in town, and by a dashing young army Captain who designs to offer his hand to the lovely young girl. But to them and to all who seek to win her, Adelaide returns the same gentle but positive refusal and continues her studies. However, while at the convent, she is hurriedly summoned back to tend her family which has fallen a victim to the epidemic that is sweeping the vicinity. With heart breaking zeal, Adelaide tends her loved ones and one day as she kneels before the statue of the Madonna and prays for the recovery of her parents and all the sick of the village, she senses someone standing in the open door and sees a tall, broad shouldered young man looking upon her tenderly. As she turns in confusion, he assists her and that night when her mother dies, the young man consoles Adelaide in her grief. He is loathe to go, but there is a stamping of horses' hoofs outside and as his party impatiently waits for him, the young man reluctantly bids Adelaide farewell.

Adelaide's father recovers but he remains an invalid for the rest of his life. All their resources are consumed in trying to find a cure for her father, and when at last the need for money becomes pressing, Adelaide learns that the Baron Avila requires the services of a housekeeper. Arriving, Adelaide meets with the approval of the middle-aged sister of the Baron but shudders as she is introduced to Avila, himself, and finds him a grinning brute of a man. When the Baron tries to corner Adelaide, however, the gardners, Frederico, interferes and Adelaide learns that her protector is the Baron's younger brother. Adelaide finds that she is virtually a prisoner and her fears mount. Then, that night, she is awakened by oaths and hears Frederico threaten to expose Avila for the brigand he is, and as Frederico's voice rises to a scream in telling of his brother's murder of Madame Castellane whom he has lured to the castle for the purpose of robbing her of her $50,000 necklace. Adelaide winces as the Baron strikes his brother a heavy blow and carries him down to the dungeon where his talk will be unheard. Pity and helplessness seize Adelaide for the young Frederico, and as his groans grow louder she slips food in to the boy who is almost too weak to eat.

Meanwhile the authorities, investigating the death of Madame Castellane, hear groans. The Baron tries to prevent them from discovering his brother, but Adelaide, braving the threats of Avila and his sister, urges them to investigate. They break in the dungeon and Frederico dies in their arms. The Baron is captured and convicted for his many crimes, and Adelaide, forgotten in the confusion, escapes from the dreaded castle and rows feverishly across the river. As she reaches the other side, drenched and shaken, she weeps and looking up is startled to see again the young man who had consoled her the night her mother died. Gathering her in his arms tenderly he tells her he is the eldest son of the Empress of Austria and he has returned to the little girl he met in the valley of the Dolomite Mountains, to ask her to be his bride—the future Empress. And a new life begins for the beautiful Adelaide.

THE DEVIL'S PLAYTHING

Modesto Fernandez Seijo Drama File No. 10573

WITH the blessing of his bride's father, Luis leads his Rosita to his farm. Two years of ineffable bliss follow and when Rosita informs Luis that she is to have a child, his happiness and tenderness know no bounds. However, in the agony of childbirth, Rosita dies, Luis' kiss on her lips, and like a man distrait, Luis cradles his child and tries to face a future without Rosita. The next few months are torturous as he is constantly reminded of his loss, and as the house goes shabby and little Manuel suffers the want of a woman's care, Luis looks sadly at the oil painting of his beloved Rosita and questions the picture if he wouldn't be doing Manuel a service by taking a second wife, one who would mother their child. At last, gathering his courage, he calls upon Maria, who sympathizes with him over Manuel's frailty and advises Luis slyly to secure a good woman's aid. Luis struggles against his own thoughts and Maria, pretending to fix her garter raises her skirt high above her knee. Maria plays upon Luis's sympathies by crying over how lonely she is, and when he guilelessly asks what of Enrique, Maria replies that she has long been through with him. At last Luis is drawn into Maria's web and they are quietly married.

Three years pass. Luis' home shows the influence of a woman's hand, and Luis is unreflectively happy with Maria and their child Rafael, not realizing that the uncomplaining little Manuel is slowly being starved in favor of Rafael. When Manuel begs his spoiled half brother for a little food, the youngster petulantly knocks over the dish and the dog laps up the porridge. Manuel, weeping, goes into the inner room only to stare dumbfoundedly at sight of Maria in the arms of Enrique. Maria furiously raises her hand to strike the child but Enrique stops her and Manuel escapes. Outside he stops his teacher and grandfather and explains to the former that he cannot come to school because he has to take care of Rafael.. When his grandfather starts for the room where Maria is, Manuel holds him back fearfully and as the two older people realize Enrique is within they shake their heads sadly. It is the grandfather who informs Luis that Manuel is being starved to death, but Luis refuses to believe the truth. However, when he happens upon his son praying to the picture of his mother, Luis is moved and returning home is appalled to discover his wife in the arms of Enrique. In self defense Enrique is about to kill Luis, but Manuel comes between and Enrique flees. However, Maria blames Manuel for exposing her, and she whips him until the child strikes his head against the table and falls to the floor, bleeding. Believing she has killed the child, Maria snatches up Rafael and induces Enrique to leave with her. Hard pressed for money, Maria induces Enrique to hold up a shoots killing Maria, her baby and her lover. Luis payroll car but from the wrecked car a guard returns to find Manuel unconscious, and night and day he is at his son's side until Manuel regains consciousness. As the boy drops off into his first untroubled sleep, Luis agrees to get some rest himself, and for the first time learns of the fate of his wife and son. Before Rosita's picture he swears to live, henceforth for Manuel alone, and make up to the child for all his neglect, and in his sleep, Manuel smiles happily.

THE ROAD TO ROAM

William Diener Drama File No. 10517

WHEN Ned Parker's nephew, Jerry, visits his uncle in Spokane in the summer of 1880, the young man boasts that the West, with all its beauty, cannot compare with the thrill of Eastern cities. Determined to change his mind, Ned invites the boy to accompany him and his friend, Herman, when they make a prospecting trip through the northwestern part of Washington. He gladly accepts, but before he leaves, proposes to Herman's pretty daughter, Rose, saying that his father is giving him a place in his New York firm, but the girl refuses him with the statement that she could never leave the West. The first night after the party leaves Spokane with their teams of horses, a combined rain and snow storm arises, and the winding roads become slippery, but passable. Jerry is amazed when his uncle and Herman often catch thirty to forty trout in the mountain streams, in an hour's time, and the three enjoy the fish, cooked over an open fire, varying the menu from time to time with venison meat or blue grouse, which they shoot enroute. They reach the Marcus Junction, where the powerful Columbia River joins the Kettle River, and safely cross at this point. Tired from the long day's drive, Jerry throws himself on his bed, made from the boughs of fir trees, and is refreshed with deep, dreamless slumber. The party reaches the little trading post of Republic and stops for fresh supplies, continuing along the majestic shores of the Okanogan River country, prospecting by means of placer mining, occasionally.

Determined to prove his prowess as a hunter, Jerry starts out in pursuit when he sees a silver tipped grizzly, and informs his comrades that he will bring the animal back as a rug for Emily. Following him, they see the young man take a good aim at the bear, but miss fire; infuriated, the bear charges, and in running from him, Jerry stumbles over a pile of brush and drops his gun. Hastily, he climbs a tree, and, drawing a bottle of ammonia, which he carries to use in case of a sprained ankle, he hastily saturates his handkerchief with the fiery liquid, and slaps it on the bear's nose. A second application is needed before the animal retreats, and Jerry joins his comrades, who laugh heartily, in reaction from their fright. On the Fourth of July, all three cross the border into Canada, and celebrate the day on its shores. The following morning they begin their return to Spokane, by their old route. As they are preparing to hitch the horses, after a night spent on the mountain side, Ned catches his ankle in the lariat, and as the horse becomes frightened, is dragged down the incline, toward the edge of the mountain, until Jerry is able to overtake and stop the animal; Ned unhurt, although his trousers are sadly damaged. When a neighbor tells Emily that her father is approaching, she rides to greet him, but is thrown from her horse by the unexpected swiftness of a mountain stream, and carried away herself. Jerry leaps into the swirling water and saves her. Scarcely recognizing the sophisticatd and somewhat blase Easterner in this rugged and vital young man, Emily gladly promises to become his bride when he announces that, he, too, will never leave the West. Today, their children speed over the same trails, now beautifully graded, but Jerry tells them that no motor car can equal the thrill of the old pack train, and Emily smiles in agreement.

SCARLET GOLD

William Scott Caddy Drama File No. 10478

AT the close of a day of fishing, Antonio turns eagerly to his books, while Benito, his brother, jeers at him, and his father abuses the serious, ambitious youth. Unable to stand their cruelty longer, and not wishing to be a fisherman all his life, Antonio leaves the little cottage on the coast of the Adriatic sea, and becomes a stowaway on a liner bound for New York. In mid-ocean he is discovered by the captain, who puts him to work peeling potatoes in the kitchen. At last, the shores of the country of Antonio's dreams are reached; swimming ashore, in order to elude immigration officers, the young man walks the streets of the city, penniless, in search of work. As he cannot speak English, he is unsuccessful, and wearily sinks down on the steps of a mansion when night falls. Concealed by bushes he is not seen by three robbers, who gather near him, and discuss plans for rohbing the house, in Antonio's native tongue. Understanding their plans, he calls police headquarters, and an interpreter carries his message to the chief. As a result, the burglars are apprehended, and Antonio rewarded. Mr. Barlow, the owner of the house, listens sympathetically to the boy's story of long days spent hauling in the fish nets, while all his father's love went to Benito, and admiring his ambition, arranges for Antonio to work in the bank of which he is president, and attend school at the same time, after adjusting the matter with the authorities at Ellis Island.

Gratefully, the young Italian works diligently, and wins promotion. Irene, Mr. Barlow's only child, helps Antonio gain social poise and experience, inviting him to various functions at their home. The girl's mother disapproves because of Antonio's anoestry, but Mr. Barlow tells her that he has never employed a man whom he trusted more fully, and she agrees that his character is above reproach. The entire family take a vacation to the shores of Italy during the summer. Shortly after they leave, the vice president of the bank receives word that they have been kidnapped, and that fifty thousand dollars in ransom money is demanded for their release. Antonio hastens to the designated spot, after drawing the money from Mr. Barlow's account, at his request. Acting as intermediary, Antonio pays the ransom sum, and the Barlows are released, but he is kept in their stead. Unwilling to notify police, since the gang warn him that they will kill Antonio in that event, Mr. Barlow remains silent, but his protege escapes and sends his own message. When the kidnappers are captured, it is discovered that Benito is their leader, and during their battle with the police, he is killed. Returning to his old home, Antonio tells his father of this tragedy, and is informed that he is an adopted child, taken from an orphanage, and raised with Benito, his own son, that he might be forced to help with the fishing. Tracing his ancestry, Antonio discovers that he is of good, but impoverished family. He forgives his repentant foster father for his deception and cruelty, and returns to America with the Barlows.

With the full permission of her family. Irene becomes Antonio's bride, and one day he succeeds Mr. Barlow as president of the bank.

THE SILENCED WITNESS

Peter Berg Drama File No. 10514

LARRY WILLIAMS, reporter for a leading metropolitan paper, is seated at his desk idly chatting with a fellow worker one afternoon in March, 1932, when he is summoned by Len Gregory, the city editor, and informed that the infant son of America's most prominent aviator has been kidnapped from the nursery of his home in New Jersey. With a crew of other reporters, Larry is sent to the scene of the crime, while the ghastly news spreads throughout the country, horrifying everyone. Charles and Anne Stevens, the unfortunate parents, show reporters the broken ladder down which the baby was carried, and Elizabeth Dow, the nurse, relates that she put the child to bed, and a short time later, went to the nursery to see if her little charge was sleeping quietly, as he was suffering from a cold at the time, and screamed in terror as she saw the crib was empty. Beyond this, no evidence can be given. Through the medium of his paper. Larry gives out a message, at the instigation of the baby's mother, advising the kidnappers that they will safeguard them from the law and co-operate in supplying the fifty thousand dollar ransom demanded in a note pinned to the empty cradle, if their child is safely restored. Constance Boe, a young woman on a rival paper, handles the human interest angles of the situation, attempting to awaken the sympathy of the heartless kidnappers by stories of the parents' grief, the prayers of orphan children and youngsters in grade school for the child's safe return, as well as the significance of the crime to society as a whole. Becoming acquainted while they work together, Constance and Larry are soon fast friends, and Frank Pierson, another reporter, in love with Constance, regards his new rival with jealousy.

After an exchange of cryptic messages, Jim Condor, accompanied by the flyer, goes to a lonely cemetery in the Bronx, in response to a message, presumably from the kidnappers. Alone with them, he gives them a package containing fifty thousand dollars in marked bills, and exchanges a few words, but returns without the child, and tells the distraught father, waiting in the ear that they took the money without explanation, and disappeared. A volley of false reports and clues torture the brave parents, who try to regain their little son, at all costs. One of these messages, from a Norfolk shipbuilder of good reputation, is so convincing that the aviator agrees to go with him on a yacht, and turning a substantial ransom sum over to him, allow him to be the agent for securing the baby, as he swears he is in touch with the kidnappers. Frank Pierson overemphasizes the probability of the boy's return through this medium, while Larry, in his speoial column, ridicules the idea, although sympathizing with the child's father deeply, since any reasonable chance of recovering his little son seems advisable to him. At this time, a negro truck driver discovers the body of the baby, and the whole country mourns with the parents, as all hope is gone.

Eager for revenge because of Larry's humorous views of his theories regarding this horrible crime, and angry because Constance is attracted to the young reporter, Frank, when he accidentally is given one of the marked bills at a filling station, places it in Larry's wallet when he is not looking, and orders his arrest. Due to the fact that Condor has maintained a formidable silence, Larry is placed under arrest, but subsequently released on bail. When she definitely refuses to marry Frank, he confesses the trick he played on Larry to Constance, and she goes to Larry. They plan to marry, and agree to devote their lives to an attempt to solve this dark and mysterious crime—together.

THE JEWELED DAGGER

Fannie T. Fiore Drama File No. 10485

REARED by old fashioned Italian parents who forbid her to go to the movies or meet men, Fada longs for a taste of life. Then one day her father has two friends over, one Armand Abati, handsome young countryman and the other his father. Fada sits demurely in a corner, but to her dismay she learns that everything is settled, that she is a very lucky girl since Armand wants to marry her. Fada protests frightenedly, but her mother assures her that when she was eighteen she already had two children. Armand comes often and as he kisses the trembling Fada he exults over her purity and drawing out a curiously jeweled dagger the same with which his great grandfather killed his bride, swears that he will guard her virtue with this weapon. Fada shivers as she realizes the threat in back of his words and some days later, at a wedding, she is induced to sing for the guests. Ricardo, a wealthy young engineer, stares at her vibrant young beauty and as the music starts again he comes forward to ask for the dance. In his arms Fada feels a strange excitement she has never experienced before and as Ricardo's arm tightens about her, Armand, eyes blazing, cuts in, claiming the rest of the dance. Jealously Armand demands that they leave immediately, and as she sits, troubled, at his side, he places his hand over the ever present dagger and grits through his teeth that he will kill anyone who dares to come between them. The next day Fada goes to shop for her wedding finery. In the shop the clerks and patrons gasp at the beauty of Fada in her bridal veil, but through the window Fada sees Ricardo staring at her, face pale as death. Suddenly he darts off and his uncle who is invited to the wedding, explains that Ricardo has gone to New York. When Fada learns that Armand is planning their honeymoon in New York, she begs him to take her eleswhere, but he insists. Hurrying his bride away from her wedding, Armand seizes her in his arms, triumphant in his right of possession, and Fada moans as his lips come down over hers. The jeweled dagger gleams in the moonlight.

In New York they meet Ricardo and his uncle again, and while Armand speaks to the older man Ricardo strains Fada to him as they dance and in a broken voice tells her he loves her and can't live without her. As he kisses her, he begs her to come away with him to the continent, but Fada frightened, remembers the gleaming dagger and refuses. "You love me," Ricardo cries, but Fada puts him off and at last Ricardo bids her farewell and leaves. Suddenly Armand appears. Seizing Fada's wrist in a grip of iron, he brings her inside, and holding up his hands for the music to stop, announces that his wife will sing, Il Bacio, The Kiss. At the end of the song, Armand kisses his wife roughly before the crowd which senses something is wrong and soon leaves. Alone in their house, Armand turns on his wife and accusing her of having a lover, tells her to go.

For a while Fada lives on what little money she has, then as her funds diminish, she is offered singing lessons by a famous teacher. Fada dreads the concert her teacher is arranging, but she dares not let him down, and the great night arrives. Fada is a sensation. Flowers fill the dressing room of the mysterious "Dolores," but with them comes Ricardo who has at last returned. He takes her in his arms for a kiss and suddenly the door flings open and Fada gasps as Armand stands wildly there. For a moment he raises the dagger to strike, then his hand sinks and brokenly he realizes that he cannot kill the woman he loves. "I'll go away, free you," he whispers, and as Ricardo gently kisses his Fada, the dagger gleams on the floor, forgotten.

ANTI-CLIMAX

Bebe Gaynor Comedy File No. 10583

"KEN, you've got to help us teach Johnny a lesson. Those practical jokes of his are making him unbearable." For a while Kenneth argued that Johnny was all right, but as each of the young people recounted a grievance against Johnny, Kenneth agreed that the next time Johnny tried to pull one of his pranks, he'd help punish his friend. Walking down the street, Kenneth heard a familiar whistle and greeted Johnny cordially. "Going to the William's party?" Johnny asked. Ken nodded. "You know it'll be a grand opportunity to try some new gags." Kenneth groaned, then suggested that for once Johnny try to come to a party without pulling any of his tricks, but as Johnny held out, claiming everyone would have a good time, Ken withdrew his objections and a dangerous glint shone in his eyes.

At the party everyone was having a gay time. Suddenly Johnny pulled Ken aside and showed him his contrivance to stretch a taut cord on which he had threaded a piece of cellophane which would, when spun, emit strange noises, like human groans. As Johnny climbed the stepladder to spin the device, Marie Williams came through the door carrying a large basin of water. The opening of the door upset the stepladder and Johnny, thrown off balance, catapulted into the water. The entire party rushed in, and discovering Johnny dripping and unhappy, burst into loud laughter. Marie, touched by Johnny's woeful expression led him upstairs and gave him a dry suit of clothing belonging to her brother. Groaning as he saw his arms and legs protruding from the suit which was several sizes too small for him, Johnny descended the stairs. But as he entered the room he tripped over the threshold and fell backwards into a large dish of St. Katherine candy. Ruefully he rose but the candy, pot and all, glued to him. Ken tried to aid him by tugging and Johnny at last pulled free only to discover that the seat of his trousers had remained with the candy. Again Johnny raced upstairs and Ken picked out a larger suit of clothes for him. Afraid to come down lest he be laughed at, Johnny dawdled upstairs until the others finished eating, and while they danced in the parlor, Johnny came down to get some food. Discovering that he had been completely forgotten and nothing had been left for him, Johnny saw behind the locked door of the pantry tarts and pastries to make his mouth water. Dashing out to the woodshed, Johnny returned with a large board with which he pried open the pantry window and squeezed through. Then, having eaten his fill of cakes and pies, he cautiously made his way out only to stick half way. The party coming out belabored him with his own board and Ken fastened two old shoes to Johnny's wagon. Running out, Johnny climbed into his wagon and rode furiously home. Hearing a patter of footsteps, he drove faster but the invisible stalker seemed always to stick close. Shrieking with terrror Johnny burst into his house. And while his father investigated and found the shoes, his mother held her weeping giant of a son close and comforted him while he vowed never to play a practical joke again.

BREAKING INTO SOCIETY

Peggy Ann Shaw Comedy Drama File No. 10523

NEIGHBORS who hear the angry shouts of two women quarreling conclude among themselves that Ma Dabb and Ma Dubb, who live next door to one another, are at it again. After many exchanges of verbal blows, the two in question vow they will never speak again, but as both of their houses lack modern plumbing conveniences, they meet on the path to the old fashioned substitute for a private bathroom, which they share in common, and exchange greetings through force of circumstance. Pa Dabb, a none too prosperous iceman, is the father of Pat, ten, Nancy, twelve, and lovely Sis, just sixteen; his wife, Tilda, is a large and thoroughly capable woman. The Dubb family consist of Polly and George, who runs a hot dog stand, Sid, ten, Sylvia, twelve, and Clancy, twenty-one. As he is calling "Ice!" a woman tells him to bring twenty-five pounds, and Pa slowly mounts the stairs, only to find that what she wanted was rice. At the next house, he has trouble fitting his piece of ice into the required space, until the housewife informs him that he is trying to put it in the victrola. The Dabb family plan a picnic, and the Dubb children, in spite, as they are not invited, fill the ice wagon with dirt, but at last the Dabbs set forth, and slowly drive their horses, ignoring the protests of motorists who are delayed by their conveyance. Sylvia, who has followed the family with her father, finds Pat and pushes him in the duck pond; when he relates this, his mother takes the little girl's lace panties away from her, and places them on her protesting son, who hides in the ice wagon, as a result. The Dabb children buy hot dogs from the Dubb wagon, and Ma Dabbs finds they are so stale that she concludes they must open a similar business, as soon as they can find the capital.

Dressed in overalls, Ma Dabb goes with her husband to beer gardens and saloons, soliciting ice trade successfully, until too many glasses of ale make her incapable of continuing, and she wildly drives the horses home, at a great rate of speed. The Dubb family purchase a rattling old model Ford, which the Dabbs christen the Crock. Pa Dubb buys a pair of suspenders at the ten cent store, but recognizing his salesgirl as Sis, takes back the purchase, ashamed that she should know he trades at such a place. At last the Dabbs family purchase their hot dog stand next to the space occupied by Pa Dubbs' business, and as Sis works for them, soon trade comes flocking to the new stand. A group of young college men become regular patrons of Sis, and, more interested in talking to her than eating, often throw the hot dogs away, forming a pile of them in front of Dubb's stand; passing motorists conclude that his hot dogs are unfit for consumption, on seeing the large pile in front of his stand. In retaliation, he offers free sauerkraut and mustard, printing this information in small letters, under the large word, 'Notice," and when Ma Dabbs finally meets this competition, Dubbs offers free soda pop as well.

Both families become wealthy, and move into a fashionable neighborhood, when their property is found to be valuable due to sand deposits. Ma Dabbs soon lectures her servants roundly when she finds they are laughing at her, and wins their respect. Neighbors again in their new surroundings, Ma Dabbs and Ma Dubbs vie with one another in breaking into society, and learning to drink cocktails and smoke, while the men of the families are forbidden the use of chewing tobacco. When Ma Dabbs invites some of her old friends to a party, and they are ignored by her recent acquaintances, she scolds the society folk, and moves them to shame for their false standards. Both she and Ma Dubb move back to their old neighborhood, and forget past quarrels when Sis and Clancy, just returned from college, announce their engagement.

THRICE BORN

Jennie Cartland Callister Drama File No. 10577

EVEN as his community heaps honors upon him, changing the name of the town to Alton Center, Robert Ashmore Alton finds his wife Annette longing unhappily for pleasures he has not given her. The conviction that he has failed her, overwhelms him. Later, when Robert, who doesn't dance, sees Annette dancing by in the arms of Jack Broman, recently arrived in town, notices how her eyes sparkle and her old vivaciousness has returned, he believes that Annette is in love with Broman. Subsequent glimpses of them together bear out his belief, and realizing that Annette would never do anything to hurt him and the two children, Ted and Elsa, Robert decides to free her. Accordingly he writes a note of suicide and fills a tumbler with a deadly poison. However, as he tastes the deadly potion, one of the recurrent fits of dizziness about which he has told no one, seizes him and he crashes heavily to the floor. On the evidence of the death-like stupor, the poison on his lips, and the shattered glass in his hand, Robert is pronounced dead by the incompetent coroner. Hours later Robert regains consciousness and grows desperate as he realizes how he has bungled. Abhoring the thought of being buried alive, yet unwilling to take his place in society again and destroy the freedom he has given his wife, Robert flees and from his place of temporary concealment watches his own funeral procession go by, burying the andirons and rug that he has placed in the casket. Then, quitting the town, Robert pushes on and with only the barest necessities begins a solitary existence far from civilization.

The years pass. Annette, blaming herself for her husband's supposed suicide, devotes herself to her children. Broman soon marries a girl who loves him, intensifying the irony of Robert's action. Young Dr. Lee, son of the family physician, falls in love with Annette while trying to help her adjust herself, and at last, Annette consents to marry him although the memory of Robert is ever the specter in their home. Then, one day, while rescuing Ann, child of her second marriage, from the wheels of a trolley, Annette is killed.

Time marches on. Completely unaware of the progress of the rest of the world, Robert on his isolated mountain is frightened by the crash of a flaming air machine, but discovering a man within, drags from the wreckage the injured body of the pilot. Torn between saving his home which has caught fire, and rescuing the man, Robert places the broken body on his home made wagon and reenters the city. Like a blind man recovering his sight, Robert walks down the streets, jostled by people and narrowly escaping being run over. His outlandish appearance and queerer actions cause him to be taken to the hospital for observation, but the pilot, in his delirium has been calling ceaselessly for "Old Scout" and Robert is brought to his room. It is Robert who gives his blood for a transfusion discovering then for the first time, that the pilot is his own son. Ted, recovering, feels an undying gratitude to the old man, Patiently Ted explains to his friend the modern wonders of the world—radio, telephone, subway, skyscrapers and even induces Robert to come up in a plane. However, when Ted lands in Alton Center, Robert is overcome by a rush of memories. Learning that Annette is dead, Robert at last conclaims he knew their lives where somehow bound up, and gradually even the dubious Elsa is confides his identity to Lee. Triumphantly Ted convinced that Robert is really her father. But it is Ann, child of Annette and Lee, who, herself a Hollywood star, secures a position in the movies for Robert, and as en route they stop off and visit a stupendous Worlds Fair, Robert feels himself to be before these wonders he has never seen before, a veritable Rip Van Winkle, thrice born.

BEAUTY CONTEST

J. R. Entwistle Comedy File No. 9685

WHEN young go-getting Charlie March fell in love with Winnie Willows, everything seemed rosy to him, and he enthusiastically confided to his pal and co-worker, Stan Harris, that as soon as he had enough money saved, he would make Winnie give up her job as box-office girl for an amusement park. Charlie had never seen Winnie's boss, but heard many stories of his bad temper and grouchy disposition.

However, one fine morning, Charlie and Stan reported at their office, and learn that they were fired because they wasted too much time. Before they had time enough to be properly indignant, Winnie phoned the boys and tearfully announced that unless business picked up at the amusement park, she was going to lose her position. Expecting Charlie to propose instantly and advise her to quit before she was fired, she was astounded when he mumbled a faint reply, and hung up. Just as she hung up, Mr. Grober, her employer, rushed up to her ticket booth, and accused her of neglecting her work. Crushed by all her misfortunes, Winnie sat dejectedly in the office, wondering how to keep her job and keep Charlie.

Meanwhile, Charlie and Stan, who always did what Charlie thought best, were racking their brains trying to think of a plan to make money for themselves, and save Winnie's job. Struck with a bright idea, Charlie immediately called Mr. Grober, and glibly promised him that if Mr. Grober would let him have full charge of the park, and not ask any questions, he would make five hundred dollars for him in one day, provided Mr. Grober gave an equal amount to Charlie and Stan. Hopefully Grober agreed, and left the park just before Charlie and his pal reached the box-office and confiding their plan to Winnie, placed huge posters all around stating that a beauty contest was to be held, with a prize of $1,000 to the winner. The news spread like wild fire throught the town, and Grober, watching the parks from his car, almost danced with glee at the number of people who had already begun pouring into the park. Unable to restrain his curiosity any longer, he entered the park as a spectator, and there watched with hundreds of others, Charlie, who was busily measuring the contestants with a huge yard-stick and tape measure, and calling out the numbers to Stan who faithfully wrote them, on a blackboard for all the audience to see and laugh at. A hurried word with Winnie, who was taking care of the tickets told Charlie he still had to make four hundred dollars more, and growing reckless at his success, he offered an additional prize to the men. Mr. Grober howled with laughter as loud as the rest of the audience, at the sight of a few timid men stepping up to the platform, but his hilarity was going on the stage. A fresh roar of delight from suddenly choked at sight of his fat son actually the spectators only increased Grober's anger, and determined to stop the spectacle, he rushed up to Charlie, puffing with rage. Charlie, who had never seen him before, mistook him for a candidate, and before Grober could protest, was measuring him and pinning a huge placard on his back, while the audience screamed with mirth. Winnie, frantically appraising the situation, gesticulated in vain to her boy-friend, until writing Grober's name in large letters on a card, Charlie let go of Mr. Grober, grabbed Stan's arm and Winnie's, and with lightning speed the trio disappeared down the road. Stopping for breath hours later, Charlie managed to gasp, "Well, it was a good idea, if it worked!"

YESTERDAY'S LOVE

Linda Threlkeld Drama File No. 9973

GAY lights, streaming confetti, soft music! It was at the annual Teacher's dance at the Reno Pavilion that Meriam Craig met Bob Winters. Two hours whirled by dancing, and then the long ride home in Bob's roadster. The weeks that followed, the two were inseparable. Bob's face was on every page of Meriam's trig book and when the science teacher advised Meriam to put more time on her work, Meriam resolved that she didn't care a rap for school anymore and quit because she and Bob were going to get married. Night after night they were together, riding for hours and hours and when one night Bob flipped a coin to see whether they'd stop for a snack at the Winter's summer cabin, Meriam, hesitating only a moment against the toss, agreed. They giggled over Meriam's faulty cooking and later, sitting in the big arm chair not quite big enough for two, Bob told her how much he loved her, and they played at being husband and wife after a long day at the office. It was almost morning before Meriam rose suddenly and cried, "We must go. Auntie will be furious." Meriam couldn't explain how unreasonable Auntie was, she didn't let him know she had been sent packing. But when the rumors Auntie started about Bob going with an older woman, reached Meriam's ears, she didn't stop to think that might be part of Auntie's plan to have her forget Bob, who was too much the man of the world to suit Auntie's sober tastes, and when for the first time they quarreled, Meriam accepted Bill's proposal. At the last moment she wanted to back out, but Bill seemed so pathetic. That is until the baby was born and seeing that it wasn't his, he divorced her.

It wasn't easy for Meriam to find a position and for four years her life was bound up with the little mite that was so much trouble but so dear to her, because he was all she had of Bob. Then Johnella told Meriam to snap out of it. Twenty-six was too young to go into a Victorian decline. Leslie and she would take Meriam to a dance tonight. Meriam refused when she learned it was to be at the Reno Pavilion where she had met Bob for the first time, but Johnella informed her that was four years ago. Pudgy old Aunt Sally didn't mind at all staying up with Jimmie, and Meriam went, feeling nervous as a schoolgirl for she hadn't danced for four years. But the masked Mexican cavalier didn't seem to think her stiff and although he begged her to take off her mask, she refused. She noticed his eyes searched the crowd restlessly, but when he told her he had lost the girl he loved and hoped, still after four years, she'd come back, Meriam whispered, "Bob!" Home they went to talk and Aunt Sally put up coffee for them as they sat there too rapt to talk. 'Jimmie's all right, Miss Meriam," Aunt Sally assured. "Jimmie?" I'm too late then?" But Meriam smiled softly and led him into the bedroom. The Wedding bells again! Jimmie was sleeping upstairs resemblance was unmistakable. and Bob drew Meriam tenderly into the shelter of his arms.

THE MARRIAGE SACRAMENT

Catherine Rizzi Drama File No. 10122

IN the moonlight, Tony sings a throbbing song of love and Laura who has come to the well to draw some water puts her jug down and softly comes to him. Suddenly he turns and as he takes her into his arms these two who have known each other since they started to go to school together realize they are in love. That night Laura sits at her window waiting for dawn to come up and creeping into her mother's room she confides the tremendous secret of her love. The next day Tony comes to her to take her to the town festival and as he helps her into his cart, Laura realizes something is wrong. At last he tells her that he has to leave for college and the thought of having to leave her now, is driving him insane. As Laura lifts her face for his kisses, she tells him softly that after all they are young, nothing can come between them, and when he returns they can be married. At the dance everyone murmurs at their happiness, but oblivious to all save each other they dance through the night. At home, Laura learns that her father is returning from the United States for one of his brief but stormy visits, and her sympathetic mother advises her to say nothing about Tony. But young as they are, and passionately certain that nobody can see anything wrong in their love, Tony and Laura meet for a brief instant in the garden and Mr. Palmer, terrible in his rage confronts them. Tony pleads for their love, but Laura's father tells him he is not good enough, and long after Tony has been dismissed, when Laura dares to plead her love, her father beats her until she sinks moaning to the floor. Gently her mother tends her bruised body but Mr. Palmer is inexorable in his commands and after selling his wife's property, he forces his family to accompany him to America. Only the weekly encouraging letters she receives from Tony keep up Laura's spirits but at last even these stop and soon there is nothing. America enters the war. The Borelli brothers enlist and Laura is at least freed of the fear that her father will press her to marry one of his two friends. Months drag by and still no word comes from Tony. The Armistice is signed and Luigi Borelli returns. Everywhere she moves, Laura can feel his eyes upon her and her father encouraging him. Then one day Laura is told she is to marry Luigi. Futile are her protests and lest her mother who has been confined to an invalid's chair for years now be fatally excited, Laura, whose heart within her has died since Tony's last letter, accepts her doom. On every side the people gasp at her loveliness as she comes down the aisle to be given to a husband twice her age, but Laura's eyes are pools of misery. Within a year her baby is born and as she feels the tiny body pressed to hers a new feeling comes to her. She must live for her child. Soon another child is born to her and another. Luigi is kind, tender, and when Laura suffers a breakdown, he urges her to go to the country for a rest. There Laura again meets Tony. With a wild cry he folds her to him and tells her how he had been lost in the war, how he had been unable to get mail through to her. Only then does Tony find out his Laura is married to another. Held against his fast beating heart, Laura feels that he is right, they belong to each other, but out of the terrible inner conflict comes the knowledge that she does not live only for herself, that her children will suffer. That out a backward look lest she weaken, Laura bids farewell to her Tony and returns to the affectionate Luigi who is never to know there is another who she cannot bear. Even for Tony, and at last withholds his wife's heart thrall.

LAZY E. BAIT

Mack Martin Western File No. 10037

THE CIRCLE 3 RANCH in southern Arizona is left to Allan Peters and his younger sister Edith by an uncle who stipulates in his will that they must successfully manage it for a year before becoming owners. They decide to try, leaving New York for the west. They are met at the train by Arthur Willis, the foreman, who warns them that their neighbors at the Lazy E. Ranch are suspected of stealing cattle from the Circle 3. As he drives them to their new home he advises Edith not to ride alone in the hills, but she tells him she is not afraid. The Lazy E. Ranch is owned by Lem Ellis and his two sons, Ike and Clyde. They have stolen a few choice heads of cattle from the Circle 3 and are planning to take the remainder in the spring. Pierre Dalstrom, a French Canadian who works for the Circle 3, secretly advises them. Realizing that Arthur Willis is loyal to the new owners, he attempts to kill him when he finds him riding alone that evening. The bullet pierces Arthur's hat, but he is uninjured, and does not know who fired the shot.

The next day Arthur takes Allan and Edith around the ranch. They meet the two Ellis brothers who advises them to stay on their own territory and not look for lost cattle on their ranch. Arthur proposes a way to make certain whether or not they are the thieves. He brands the cattle once with familiar Circle 3 brand, and again with a secret brand. A few weeks later, after more cattle have disappeared, Arthur inspects the animals at the Lazy E. Ranch, stealing into the corral at night. He finds that the Circle 3 brand has been removed but the secret brand, given at the same time, is still there, on several of the cattle. Planning to notify the sheriff the next day, Arthur believes the interests of Circle 3 can be proteeted in court, as this evidence will put the Ellis family in prison.

When he returns to the ranch that evening to tell Allan his discovery he learns that Edith has not returned from riding and her brother is searching for her. As he is preparing to look for her he also overhears a conversation between Pierre and Lem Ellis. Lem tells Pierre that he will pay him after they escape with Edith, and starts to ride away when Arthur confronts them and demands to know what they have done with Edith. Pierre shoots and wounds Arthur, enabling his to escape, but a few minutes later, binding his wound with a handkerchief and sending a cow-boy after the sheriff, Arthur follows him to the Ellis Ranch. through the cellar where he finds Edith imprisoned. Clyde Ellis comes into the room, but finding Arthur beside Edith with a gun, calls for help. Arthur is able to defend Edith until the sheriff and his men arrive and arrest the Ellis boys and Pierre.

Returning from his search for Edith, Allan learns what has happened. He tells Arthur that he will Leaving his horse he manages to enter the house remain at Circle 3 the rest of the year in order to become its owner, but wishes to then turn the management of the ranch and a share in it over to Arthur as he wishes to return to New York. Alone that evening, Arthur tells Edith that he loves her and asks her if she will remain at Circle 3 as joint-owner and his wife. She promises that she will.

FREE WILL

Fred Gardner. Drama File No. 10218

ADOPTED by an aunt and uncle after the death of his own parents, Howard lives the happy life of all normal, healthy children, until one day when he is four years old, he is seized with a severe pain, while playing in the back yard sand pile. Hearing his cries, his Aunt Mary hastens to him, and finds the boy trembling violently. She at once summons a doctor, who informs her that Howard has infantile paralysis; both Mary, and her husband, Richard, urge him to do everything possible for the child, saying they will gladly spend the last cent of their slight savings to help him, but in spite of medical care, Howard is crippled, and loses the use of his left arm. The following year, Richard, who is a sea captain, goes down with his crew during a terrific storm. Howard is in the back yard, helping his aunt carry in the wood, with his one good arm, when the tragic news is brought to them, and Mary loses consciousness. She is taken to the house by neighbors, but her grief is too much to bear, and, sadly telling her little nephew that he must go to an orphanage as there is no one to care for his, she dies. He is kindly treated at the orphans' home, but there is little time for play.

Mr. and Mrs. Fremont, a banker and his wife, seek a companion for their only child, Gregory, and attracted by Howard's quick intelligence and cheerful manner, adopt him. The boy is happy in his new home, playing games adeptly with Gregory, although he has the use of only one arm, and advancing ahead of him in his studies. Catherine, a neighbor girl, regards the two boys as her brothers, and the trio spend many pleasant days together. When he graduates from high school, Howard announces his intention of continuing his studies at Amhurst Agricultural College, but refuses to allow Mr. Fremont to finance him, and supports himself by working in the power plant of the school, shovelling coal with one arm more speedily than his co-workers who are not handicapped. Visiting his home at Christmas time, Mrs. Fremont tells him that she hopes her son will marry Catherine when he graduates, and asks Howard if he has found anyone he cares for, but the boy replies that perhaps he never will.

Gregory and his mother, accompanied by Catherine, plan a vacation, inviting Howard to go with them, but he secures a summer position with the railroad company as a flag-man, which will help pay his tuition the following year, and declines. The train they board is wrecked when the boiler explodes, near the station where Howard works, and Catherine is slightly injured. Howard rushes to her, and takes the girl, who has fainted, in his arm. Realizing that he loves her, Gregory tells him that he has no right to marry her, as he may have difficulty in earning a living, and Howard agrees that perhaps it is true, and leaves. In the years that follow, he wins success in the railroad company by hard work and study. Taking his first vacation in four years, he visits his foster-parent, and finds Catherine at her old home. In surprise, he questions Mrs. Fremont, who says that she thought he knew that the girl had refused to marry Gregory, saying she loved someone else. While Howard is still at the Fremont home, Gregory also comes to see his parents, and tells Howard that he wrote a letter, which must have mis-carried, stating that Catherine loves him. Going at once to the girl, Howard finds this is true, and they are married at the Fremont home.

SECOND FIDDLE

Don Corbo Drama File No. 10427

AT home Mary Rowe and her brother Bob are quarreling over her friendship with Tony, an orchestra leader, whose father Joe De Luca is a bootlegger. At length Mary persuades her parents to invite Tony for dinner so that they can judge for themselves how fine he is. Bob shouts that if Tony is invited he will not come down to dinner, but when Mary assures him that if he snubs Tony there will be no more darning of his socks and pressing of his ties, Bob agrees reluctantly to act the gentleman on Sunday when Tony comes. Mary hurries out to the park to find Tony eagerly waiting for her. Sunday night, however, Mary is forbidden to see Joe's son again.

Meanwhile Bob dresses in evening clothes, and telling his mother not to expect him since he is sleeping at the club to-night, he goes out, after a pleased look in the hall mirror.

At the home of Sue McGuire, Tim O'Hara, burly shouldered lover is kissing the blonde girl, and as she draws her wrapper up over her exposed shoulder she promises to be ready in a few minutes to leave town with him. Both of them laughed over the way she has put it over on that Bob kid. Sue packs and pulls a jaunty hat down over her rebellious curls. The doorbell rings and she flies to answer it but to her dismay it is Bob. He forces his way in and kisses her warmly, then noticing she is all packed, questions her. When she tells him she is through, that she cannot waste time on a small time guy, he furiously pulls her into his arms and kisses her fiercely. Tim enters and with one blow knocks out Bob and leaves with Sue. Recovering some hours later, Bob staggers to the Smoke shop operated by Tony's father and drinks heavily. Tony enters to induce his father to give up this business and go into the legitimate restaurant business. As he comes out Bob drunkenly reveals that he wouldn't let his sister associate with a bootlegger's son, and Tony realizes now why Mary has been avoiding him. Tony quietly asks why he patronizes speakeasies if he thinks so little of them, but Bob staggers out, ignoring the question.

In the park Tony meets Mary again and pleads with her, but they only quarrel and part again. At home, Joe De Luca looks over his accounts and deciding that all his profits are going for protection agrees to re-open his place as a respectable restaurant. Surprisingly business increases now that he is operating within the law. Mary learns from Bob about the change, but pride prevents her from sending a note to Tony. Then, one day Mary sees Tony walking with another girl, and not suspecting she is Tony's sister Carmela, heartbrokenly proceeds home. Meanwhile Bob is introduced to Carmela and falling in love with her is astonished at learning she is Tony's sister. Mary swallows her pride and meets Tony at the theater exit. Happily he assures her he has nothing to forgive and as he returns home to tell his father of his joy, the jovial Joe De Luca throws a grand banquet dinner and invites the whole Rowe family. At the gala affair, Mrs. Rowe rises to announce the forthcoming wedding of Mary and Tony and in the general happiness Bob's eyes hold Carmela's as they are chosen best man and maid of honor.

DIXIE

Willie Huggins Drama File No. 10394

ASSISTING her father with missionary work among the negros on their plantation, June Wilson, daughter of a southern minister, wins the love and respect of every white and colored citizen in Rome, Georgia, her native town. When she returns from school in Vermont, she is welcomed by a negro band, led by old Tom, their faithful butler, Richard Jones, the superintendent of a farm at the edge of town, asks June to become his wife, but she refuses. In Boston, Don White, a brilliant young lawyer, stoops to unethical means of winning a case in which his friend, Stephen Wright, is justly accused of petty larceny. For the sake of the boy's mother, Don attempts to bribe a juryman, but is reported and subsequently disbarred. Understanding his son's motives, although not sympathizing with him, Mr. White sends him to his ranch, now managed by Jones, in order to give him another chance. Soon after his arrival in Rome he is presented to June, and the two become friends. Wishing to discredit him in the girl's eyes, Jones produces papers which prove that the major portion of the Wilson estate belongs to Don's father. He discusses the matter with Rev. Wilson, who becomes angry at the charge, and going into the matter at length, Don discovers that the papers have been forged, and Jones' claim is false. He at once apologizes to Rev. Wilson, and discharges Jones. In revenge, Jones partially destroys machinery in the power room which supplies water for the pasture reservoirs, and the ground is dangerously flooded.

Don leads the plantation hands in an attempt to stop the broken pipes and drain the land, eventually restoring it to its former condition. His interest aroused, he inaugurates a series of improvements on the plantation, finding his new occupation absorbing. Don's father deeds the property over to the boy, stating that he is delighted with the way it is being managed, and had always hoped his son would take up this work. Alone with June, on the porch of her home, Don tells her of his love for her, and she answers that she, too, cares for him, and will gladly become his wife. He then confesses his unfortunate conduct in Boston, and when the girl hears that he has been disbarred she tells him she must talk the matter over with her father. Valuing honor and truth more than anything in the world, Rev. Wilson forbids June to marry Don, and, with tears in her eyes, the girl breaks her engagement, although telling her sweetheart that she will always love him. Saddened, Don returns to his father's home, as he cannot be happy in Dixie without June. The young man secures a position with a publishing firm. June changes into a sad, pensive girl, gazing at Don's picture for hours, but unable to hurt the father she has always adored by marrying against his wishes.

After Don leaves, Jones calls again at June's home, asking her pardon, and begging her to marry him, but she orders him away. He seizes her, and is about to make away with her when Tom, hearing her call for help, shoots at him, but the bullet strikes June, instead. She is rushed to the hospital, and calls for Don in her delirium. At the doctor's orders, her father sends for him, and he comes by airplane, making a parachute jump when the gas tank breaks, and the machine catches fire. Jones is captured, and Tom's innocence established. Relenting, Rev. Wilson gives his consent wedding, the negroes croon songs of the old south to the marriage of Don and June, and after the in celebration.

ROSETTA

Cecelia Sgorbissa Drama File No. 10342

NERVOUSLY waiting at the marriage bureau, Howard Burke and his bride-to-be see another couple trembling too as they await their turn. "Our first wedding," explains Charles Nichols apologetically and as the four young people laugh, a friendship springs up between them that continues when they discover they are both headed for Niagara Falls. As they part they promise to write to each other each year on their wedding anniversary. The first anniversary the Nichols write they have a brand new baby, Richard. Three years later, the Burkes, now grown wealthy, write they have a child June. Letters continue regularly but on the sixth anniversary, Mrs. Burke writes briefly that little June was kidnapped while in the park with her nurse, and her husband is ill. The Burkes hold their own son close as they express their sympathy and when Mr. Burke dies and his wife goes abroad to recover from the double sorrow, the correspondence gradually drops off.

Many years have passed. Richard is now grown. While visiting the circus, on a lark with some of his friends, Richard is attracted to a lovely gypsy who tells his fortune. The next night he comes back and she smiles as she recognizes him. "But I told you your fortune," she insists but when she has told him all she can he crosses her little palm with silver and insists now that she tell him about herself. He watches her teeth flash as she shrugs her expressive shoulders and tells him that her mother and father were gypsies, she has always traveled about, and that is all. Richard finds it hard to believe that she is a gypsy and soon his doubts begin to raise doubts for the first time in Rosetta's mind. The Richard's parents find out he is spending all his time with the gypsy girl of the circus, and they forbid him to go on. Angrily, Richard tells them that he loves Rosetta and if they insist on trying to prevent him from seeing her, he will run away with the circus. When Rosetta sees that Richard is troubled, she suspects what the cause is, and she pleads with him not to give up his promising career as a lawyer, his friends and his family for her. After all she is only a gypsy. Richard lifts her sweet face and almost fiercely tells her that he doesn't care what she is, he loves her. However, when the old gypsy who is Rosetta's grandmother finds out that Richard has quarreled with his wealthy parents, she trembles. For more than anything else she wants Rosetta to be happy. Calling Richard and Rosetta to her, she tells them that Rosetta is not really her grandchild. Rosetta had been kidnapped by gypsies and when the gypsies had died, the old woman had brought up the child, fearing that if she tried to return her to her parents, the Burkes, she would be arrested as the kidnapper. "Burkes!" shouts Richard. Hurriedly he summons his parents and with the proof that Rosetta is realy June Burke, the Nichols embrace the lovely girl and send for Mrs. Burke, who with tears of happiness in her eyes stands beside the Nichols as her daughter is married to their son.

SHIP OF DESTINY

THE shrill voice of Ruth Keating's mother warning her that if she married a sailor she was just courting disaster rang in Tim's ears as he brought his bride to the little home he had bought with his savings. Ruth tried to be brave when Tim left on the Nancy G. on his last trip, but as she clung to Tim she whispered, "You'll come back to me, Tim. I love you so."

While the other sailors joked about native women, Tim kept to himself thinking of his Ruth, and when Jack, one of the seamen made a ribald remark, Tim knocked him out. Thereafter the sailors were careful what they said, and Tim counted the days until he could return to his bride. A few days out at sea, the storm came up and with nightfall the fury of the monsoon increased. Two steersmen were swept out to sea and as the ship sprang a leap, the captain leaped to the wheel. One terrible streak of lightning revealed the seaman bobbing once in the churning waves, but the ropes thrown to him were useless. Tim lashed himself to a mast and took the wheel. A moment later the ship crashed asunder and Tim knew no more. When his smarting eyes opened, Tim found himself drifting tied still to the great mast. It was a miracle that he still lived, but now it was just a question of hours. Day had come again before Tim was picked up by excited natives who had discerned him floating in the sea. On the tiny island Tim was surrounded but it was a girl who brought fresh water for his parched throat. For several days Tim could not speak. His eyes followed Talu as she moved with the grace of a gazelle about the small hut and when at last he could express his wonderment, she informed him she had learned her few words of English from an old native. It was the old man who told Tim that once the island had been a port of call for ships, but now tramp steamers only stopped at rare intervals to take on fresh water. Long hours each day Tim scanned the horizon in the hope that a ship might come in sight, and Talu, drawing close to him would try to take his mind from thoughts of home. Gently Tim put her from him, and once he told her about Ruth whom he loved. Talu hated the unknown Ruth and at last, despairing of winning Tim's love, she secretly administered a "love potion" to him. It was her idea that Tim would forget home when the effects of the drug had worn off, but Tim became stricken with high fever, and moaned constantly of Ruth. Day after day Talu watched him toss on his bed of leaves and despite the application of every native cure, Tim grew weaker and weaker. It was then that a tramp steamer pulled into port. Savagely Talu rejoiced that Tim could not depart from her, but as she remained at his side, she saw how pale he was and when she went among the natives and found that the ship's doctor was giving cures to many of the fever-stricken natives, she made her sacrifice. Drawing him to her hut, she pointed to the stricken white man. Talu wept as the doctor said Tim could be cured and Tim realizing the girl's devotion kissed her gently upon the forehead as he left for his own country. Long after the ship was out of sight Talu remained on the brow of the hill.

Softly Tim climbed the stairs of his home and took his wife into his arms. "Tim!" she cried incredulously, "Tim, you've come back."

HIS nerves ruffled by the discouraging reports of poor patronage at the chain of moving picture theaters he owns, Arthur T. Sparley arrives home to find the table has not yet been set for dinner. Storming into the kitchen he finds his wife, his daughter Janet, and his spinster sister Mary huddled over a jig-saw puzzle. Mildly they glance up at him as he storms and rants about a man having a right to come home and find dinner waiting. Dinner is eaten in an ominous silence until Aunt Mary darts up and exclaims she knows now where that red feather belongs in the puzzle. Arthur rises from the table, stamps into the living room and busies himself in his paper, only to throw it down in disgust as he sees a headline, "Jig-saw puzzle craze sweeps country. Movies empty." That night Janet's friend Jimmie comes over, and as she shyly admits him, he hands her a jig-saw puzzle of his own manufacture. She squeals in delight, but Arthur Sparley has had enough!

The next morning while he is gulping breakfast, he can hear the women folk still talking jig-saw, and he strips his gears as he starts his car with a jerk. As he enters his office, his secretary, hastily sweeps a jig-saw puzzle into her desk and in a blue funk, Arthur picks up report after report confirming the poor receipts at his box office. Then Jimmie Sawyer comes in. A. T. scowls at his daughter's young man and stammering, Jimmie manages to blurt out that he and Janet love each other and they want Mr. Sparley's consent to their marriage. "Y-y-you haven't even got enough money to keep Janet in j-j-jig-saw puzzles," splutters her harassed father, and as Jimmie attempts a word of explanation, A. T. bellows, "You'll have to show me a financial rating of several thousand before I give my consent." He'd been a bit harsh, A. T. admitted to himself a few minutes later, but what did those youngsters know about business or marriage.

From then on it seemed there were more jig-saw puzzles than ever about, and A. T. found himself toying with the fascinating little fragments more than once only to throw them aside. One time he found Janet and Aunt Mary huddled over some scraps of paper, and he shouted in an outraged tone as he realized they were making a jig-saw puzzle of his photograph, which, they explained, the new maid had accidentally torn up. In a few months, A. T. learned that unless he could put up ten thousand dollars to tide his theaters over the depression, he would lose his whole chain. Frantically he tried to raise the desired sum and at last, beaten, he returned home to sink wearily into a chair.

That night Jimmie came. A. T. looked up weakly as Jimmie explained that he learned of A. T. difficulty and he had the money to loan him. Startled, A. T. looked at the check for ten thousand and Jimmie explained he had made it manufacturing jig-saws. A. T.'s jaw sagged, but Jimmie hurried on to explain, that he had retired from that business. The fad was going out. Movies were coming in again stronger than ever. There was, A. T. remarked slyly, room for a Junior partner in his business, and as Janet rushed into Jimmie's arms, A. T. Sparley discreetly retired, and in the next room, began fiddling speculatively with the pieces of a jig-saw puzzle.

THEY KNEW NOT

R. Alexander Bate Historical Drama File No. 10328

COLONEL RICHARD TAYLOR and his wife are discussing the acquittal of Aaron Burr on charges of treason, with their guests, Major Croghan and General Clark, as they are seated beneath shady trees at their home near Louisville, in the summer of 1806. Their children, William Strother, Zachary, Joseph, George, Emily, Hancock, Elizabeth and Sarah, accompanied by their tutor, Professor Elisha Ayers join them, and the eldest boys state that they wish to answer Jefferson's call for volunteers against Burr's filibustering expeditions in Mexico. Although loathe to see them go, Colonel and Mrs. Taylor are proud of their sons, and cannot but grant their permission. Zachary is made a lieutenant, and sent to the barracks at New Orleans, where General Wilkinson discovers him, in the library, reading books on military strategy. He commends the young man, who is just recovering from yellow fever, for this industry, but adds that an inborn instinct for leadership is of even greater importance, reflecting to himself that he had such power, he and Burr might now be rulers. Through his skill and courage, Zachary rapidly wins promotion, and has been made a captain in a few years. He attends a ball at Woodlawn, the beautiful home of Major Lawrence Lewis and his wife, the former Nellie Custis, and is presented to President Madison and the beautiful Dolly. Major Smith and his daughter Margaret Mackall are among the other guests; before he leaves Captain Taylor wins the hand of Margaret.

Captain Taylor, Dr. Clark and fifty soldiers are holding Fort Harrison against five hundred Indians on the fifth of September, 1812, despite the fact that most of the soldiers, including Zachary are suffering from malarial fever. "The Prophet," (brother of Tecumseh) who has played upon the superstitions of the Indians by foretelling an eclipse, is advising them to unite their tribes and exterminate the white man. Believing they will all be massacred and the women and children in the fort destroyed, some of Taylor's men advocate surrender, but he is firm, and fires on the Indians, standing his ground when they set flame to the barracks, and at last "The Prophet" calls his men away, defeated. Later in the Everglades of Florida, seated in their tent, Lieutenant Colonel Thompson, Captain Joseph Taylor and Surgeon Satterlee discuss Zachary's sagacity in military tactics, observing how he has combined methods of attack used by the Indians with his own, used bloodhounds to trail the savages through the woods, determined the fitness of the rations used by seeing whether or not his horse passed up the grain as mildewed before using it, and in a thousand other ways maintained order and efficiency. Captain Gentry tells how "Rough and Ready" with Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln under his command pursued Black Hawk beyond the borders of the Illinois line, although orders to proceed had not come.

Although outnumbered four to one, Taylor prevents Mexicans from cutting off his supplies, and saves the day at Palo Alto, forming a blockade with his men which cannot be dispelled. He is made a brigadier for this courageous stand. He marks the future boundary lines as he marches into Mexico. Here his efforts to end the war are thwarted because of President Polk's failure to send him sufficient men, and he is unjustly criticized. At last, in a brilliant attack against General Santa Anna's forces, Zachary wins a decisive victory, overcoming the Mexican army's greater number through sheer strategy, in the battle fought among the Sierra Madre foothills. His country awards his heriosm with its greatest honor, the presidency, and on March fifth, 1849, Zachary Taylor promises to protect its traditions, if possible with peaceful arbitration, in his stirring inaugural address. "Let us enlarge our patriotism to a true acknowledgement of limitless and widespread functions of a great Republic," concludes this loyal patriot.

BACK FROM HELL

Mabel Baugh Drama File No. 10374

AT sight of the branding iron raised to mark his father's slaves, Roger Frie rushed forward in protest and winced as it descended on his own forhead. That night he pleaded with his aristocratic father to free the slaves, but while his brother George shouted that Roger was a traitor, Roger's father ordered him to cease his anti-slavery talk or leave the plantation. That night Roger kissed Margot Pickens for the last time and gently refusing her plea that he accept the time-honored custom of slavery, pushed on toward the North.

Across the Mason-Dixon line, Roger joined the Union forces as a drummer boy and fought for the freedom of the blacks. Then, one day, surrounded by the rebel forces, his battalion surrendered and for four days the prisoners were marched across the country without stopping. Those who dropped were shot and deserted and the survivors were herded in a stockade and fed doughy cornbred with maggots that sickened them. Roger recognized one of the guards as a boy he had gone to school with, but instead of consideration, he was more harshly treated than the others because he was considered a traitor to his own people. At sight of his comrades dying from the rancid water, Roger climbed over the stockade and brought back a supply of fresh water. A feeble cheer went up from the prisoners for the first man to climb the stockade wall who escaped without being shot.

When the war ended Roger was the only survivor of his battalion and a free man at last, he went to work at the wharf, having no money to travel. When winter set in, he went north with a sawmill crew and there met and fell in love with beautiful Jean Lemaire, a french girl. Together they went west to settle on a claim. Amid the hardships of frontier life Roger and Jean together spent the happiest days of their life. One day while Jean held their baby close and looked out at her stalwart husband, chopping down lumber, she whispered that sometimes she was afraid they were too happy. Roger cupped her heart shaped face and kissed her. A week later he went to the post for provisions and on his return found Indians had visited the site and killed his wife and baby. At that Roger went mad. Standing on the charred ruins of his home, the spirit went out of him and when at last he came east again it was as a beggar, careless of self, a man whose burning eyes reflected the anguish of his soul. Once, hopping a freight, he raised bloodshot eyes to discover he was back in his home town. Slowly he wandered to his family estate, and recognized by his old negro mammy who had remained on after the other slaves had been freed, Roger was given shelter in the hayloft. He learned that his father had died, forgiving him and that Margot had married and given George a son before she had gone to the Great Beyond. Lonely now and arrogant, George laughed harshly when the negros told him his brother had returned, but after his first hostility, pity overcame him at sight of his brother's tortured look, and bringing him into the house, he showed him their father's will leaving half of his property to Roger if he should ever return, and silently the two brothers clasped hands.

THE LOVE QUEST

Bertha E. Baker Drama File No. 9390

ONE day Harry Long was sitting at the piano happily accompanying Hazel Bentley as she sang a song of love to him. The next day he learned that she had eloped with Will Rand, owner of the general store. To Harry the blow of losing Hazel whom he had loved since they went to school together, was sufficient to upset his entire mode of living. Exposed to the curiosity of the townspeople who knew his feelings for Hazel, Harry retired to his little farm and locked up the piano which he had enjoyed so, because it reminded him of Hazel. For years Harry isolated himself, losing all ambition and finally accepting the mail route. He became accepted as a bachelor until the day when the town met in small groups to discuss the startling fact that Harry had received a telegram informing him he had fallen heir to a considerable sum of money. Immediately predatory females determined to snare him and when next he made his rounds, he found himself bewilderingly being invited to dinner at the home of May Darning, a conscientious young girl who kept home for her father. Tired of his lonely life, Harry accepted the invitation and May immediately began outlining for him a bright future. He was to spend more money on clothes, start a business of his own, and develop himself. Harry listened politely, made his escape, and thereafter avoided May like the plague. Still, with the money to his account, and the girls attentive, Harry didn't suspect he was being victimized until he had been led on by Irene Hirman to an engagement. Irene gave publicity to their engagement the while she spent her hours apart from Harry with other men, and Harry, inadvertently happening upon some old gossips discussing what a merry chase Irene was leading him, called Irene and told her she could keep the ring and his gifts. He was through.

Returning to his farm, Harry fed his beloved chickens and patted his collie as usual, but he felt a great emptiness. An old magazine lay upon his favorite rocker and he hurled it aside only to pick it up again, embarrassed by his own show of temper. Reading it he noticed ads from lonely people and as he sympathized, he dashed off a letter himself. Immediately he regretted his hastiness, but the letter was already delivered to the post office. Replies swarmed in. Harry read them disgustedly. Amid all the ridiculous proposals there was one whose sincerity appealed to him and after a short correspondence with Edna MacVey, a lonely young widow, he asked her to marry him. Constraint fell over Harry as he drove his bride from the station amid the eyes of the curious. In the stillness of his little house, Edna found it even more difficult to speak than Harry, and in an icy voice, Harry assured her he would not harm her. Edna put fresh curtains on the windows, cooked delicious meals for her husband, and in town walked with her head high while gossip everywhere termed her a mail order wife.

Then Hazel came, telling Harry she had divorced her husband and if he still wanted her. . . Harry looked at the girl he had once loved standing in the garden he had bought for her. From inside the house came the sound of music played by Edna on the piano that had been locked for so many years. Harry excused himself and Hazel slowly walked down the path. In the parlor Harry sat down beside Edna. "I didn't know you could play," he said. As she smiled, he added, "Many things I didn't know 'til now."

PAWNED JEWELS

Bebe Bee Drama File No. 9196

IT was Miss Audrey, the village old maid, who encouraged Ruth, downhearted because she and her mother faced ejection from the home Mr. McCaskill, Ruth's father, had left them; and it was Audrey who sent Ruth to her sister in San Francisco to learn manicuring. In a few weeks Ruth was earning enough money on tips to send money home to her mother and the children and help pay the mortgage off. Then she met Lyle. Falling in love with her at first sight, he showered her with expensive gifts and begged her to set the date for their wedding, while Ruth, uncertain whether she loved him and worried about leaving the whole burden to her mother, hesitated. Then came a note from home in which her mother distractedly wrote that although she had the corn all cut for the market, she could find no purchaser, and unless she could raise $100 in a few days the mortgage would be foreclosed. That day was a nightmare for Ruth. She scarcely noticed what she was doing to the nails she manicured. "Pardon me," she breathed to one of her customers, without even raising her head, and it wasn't until Queto, the colored shoe shine boy flashed his teeth at her and commented on the generous tip the customer had given him that Ruth realized he had left her two dollars for a very bad manicure. Forlornly she pleaded a headache and hurried down the street trying to figure out how she could raise a hundred dollars when the three gilded balls of a pawn shop caught her eye. In a daze she exchange Lyle's engagement ring and diamond wrist watch for the money she needed and posted it off. That night she explained to Lyle, but he looked at her aghast asking if that were all she thought of his gifts. Then he demanded that she marry him immediately and when she refused, pleading that she couldn't leave her family, he stormed at her, saying her father had no right to bring brats in the world that he couldn't provide for. Shocked, Ruth watched him walk off and she pressed her fevered head against the cool pane of glass.

When Miss Audrey visited San Francisco she told Ruth her mother had sold the corn and used the money Ruth sent to fix the house up with pretty curtains it had needed for a long time. Ruth smiled grimly as she thought of the days without food to redeem Lyle's jewels and send them back to him. She twisted a letter from her former fiancee, telling her he had found another girl who didn't have to support a family and was ready to get married, and Miss Audrey, realizing for the first time how paled Ruth looked advised her to get married. Surprised at this from an old maid, Ruth turned her head as Miss Audrey confided that she had never gotten married because she too had had a family dependent upon her and never had time to go out. The last payment had been made on Lyle's jewels and as she sat behind her manicuring table she was so happy she hummed. A man in overalls was her first customer and Ruth with unwonted cheerfulness commented upon what well kept hands he had for a mechanic. The proprietor almost choked but then the customer asked Ruth for a date and she refused. Time after time he asked and at last she consented. When Bob sent her flowers or candy she remonstrated, but he assured her he liked to give her gifts and when he asked her to marry him, Ruth accepted although she had once promised herself she would never marry a poor man. Bob laughed at her assurance that she loved him from the moment she saw him. It was then he told her he was the man whom she had cut the day she was so worried. "Then you're . . . " And Bob explained he had come from a fishing trip and being in a hurry he had borrowed a pair of overalls and been mistaken for a mechanic. As he kissed her he murmured, "Anyway I always wanted to marry a girl who didn't love me for my money."

THE DIAMOND MYSTERY

Louis J. Grieco Drama File No. 10274

SECRETLY in love with Gretchen, the lovely fiancee of his adjutant, Toller, a Bavarian pink-cheeked lad of noble birth, Captain Vandermere, ruthless German officer, is stunned when he is informed that he is to be in command of the submarine which is to carry to the United States a fortune in diamonds. It is these diamonds, compensation for the sinking of the Lusitania and Hispanola, which the Germans hope will keep the United States from entering the World War, and the commission is one so dangerous as to be a certain sentence of death. Aeeepting palely, Vandermere suggests that the young Toller be sent with him and his request is granted.

Aboard the submarine the tension is terrific. Each man feels that the submarine will be struck ere the ocean voyage is completed and as the journey nears an end the rebellious erew decide to mutiny, seize the diamonds and become wealthy. Only Toller refuses to join in their plans and when he appeals to Vandermere for aid, Vandermere surveys the earnest young lad coldly and tells him of his scheme to escape when they are a few miles from shore. Toller is aghast when he learns that the plan means almost certain death to the rest of the crew but for his beloved Fatherland, the young Bavarian agrees. As they near shore, Vandermere plies his men with his best liquors and cigars, then descends to the engine room, destroys the machinery, and with the aid of Toller, floods the conning tower and shoots to the surface. The strain is so great he faints but his preserver keeps him afloat. At the last moment Toller decides not to desert his comrades, but as he tries to send others to safety, he realizes that the bestial Vandermere has deceived him, there is no escape for any other, he has left the hatch open. Bravely the nineteen men perish on the sea bottom while Vandermere lands, buys clothes with a diamond, then kills the old man lest he bear witness. A fortune in his pouch, Vandermere becomes a wanderer over the face of the earth, haunted by his crimes. The diamonds he dares not dispose of, his mind picturing capture and court martial. United States declares war. As a German he is despised by the Americans, yet he dares not return to his own country lest he be captured. For years he remains in virtual seclusion, hoarding his fortune. The war ends. Germany is defeated. He travels to the continent, prepared at last to spend his fortune, live like a prince. But the memory of the men he has killed, of the trusting Toller haunts him and at last he enters a world famous sanitarium to recover from shattered nerves. There he sees Gretchen, who, since the death of Toller, has retired to the hospital to be of service to others. A young doctor loves her, one who has ideas for a great experiment to heal the sick, but has not the funds to carry it through. In his deranged mind, Vandermere fancies that Gretchen will recognize him and expose him, and leaving her the fortune in diamonds, anonymously, he flees through the streets, toward the docks. In the murky waters he fancies he sees the face of Toller, holding out forgiving arms, and Vandermere leaps. The waters close over him. While at the hospital Gretchen stares in wonder at the anonymously presented diamonds, and she and her doctor realize their dream of the great experiment.

MINUTE MAN

Walter Max Davis Drama File No. 10296

WINNING the title of "minute man" from his friends because he insists on strict punctuality, Jack Duval courts titian-haired Jane West with the same promptness that he applies in his business dealings. When she consents to become his wife, he tells her that he is a one woman man, and as long as she is faithful to him, all will be well, but if another man enters her life, he will leave her. His bride agrees to observe this code, but he discovers that she later violates it, and although she tells him it will never happen again, and begs him to give her another chance, he goes to Boston, in spite of the fact that he still loves her. Jack secures employment with the postal department, and boards at the home of Mrs. Nichols, on Shawmut Avenue. Longing for his wife, he asks her to come to him, then changes his mind, and writes, stating that he wishes her to divorce him. Jack looks up Lena Phipps, his childhood friend, who has now become Mrs. Harold Kelly, and goes to her home while she is giving a small party. When she recognizes him, she faints with surprise, then joyfully welcomes him and presents him to her guests. He is attracted to Violet, a beautiful young widow, and in the course of a few weeks, asks her to marry him. Harold and Lena plan to arrange the marriage beforehand, then suddenly suggest it, at a party, and stage the ceremony as if it had not been previously planned; Vi and Jack consent to this arrangement.

Evelyn and Jack White, friends of Violet, come to live with the young couple, and Nat Dorsey, a business associate of Jack White, calls frequently, until Violet confesses to her husband that she is afraid of Nat, and he is requested not to come again. Returning home from work, Jack finds his wife gone, and most of his possessions taken. Frantically, he goes to Evelyn's room, but she and her husband have left. The distracted husband searches in vain for Vi, and returns, sadly, to his boarding house on Shawmut Avenue. Mrs. Nichols persuades him to try the occult powers of Professor Charles, a medium, in his search, and here he is told that his wife will return in less than two weeks, but that she is under the spell of Madame Neverfail, a spiritualist. Six days later, while he is visiting his faithful friends, Harold and Lena, Mrs. Nichols tells him his wife has returned. He hastens to Violet, and she relates that Evelyn told her to go to an address in Everette, a suburban city, to look at a house she believed they would like. Here she was greeted by Nat Dorsey, and commanded to send for her things, accompany him to New York, and marry him. Although not wishing to obey, she was under a spell, and was powerless not to do his bidding, until the spell lifted this noon, and she hurried home. A year later, Jack returns home early from his duties in his new position as hotel clerk, and finds Vi in the arms of another man, and observing that this time she is not under a "spell," he divorces her.

Longing for the wholesome love of Jane, but feeling he has lost her permanently, he goes back to New York, and one day accidentally encounters his first wife on Forty-Second Street. She tells him that she still loves him and he persuades her to start over again with him.

GAMBLING QUEENS

Julia Cooper Drama File No. 10381

HER ten gallon stetson beside her, Jewel gives a low chuckle as her brother comes up behind her and watches her play a magnificent game of cards. Smiling at the perplexed cowboys, whom Jewel takes over. Bob waits until she finishes, then arm in arm they march into the ranch house. Sprawled out before the fire, Jewel fingers her cards speculatively as Bob brushes back his hair and asks her if she wants to come into town. Jewel shakes her head. "Cards again," Bob laughs. Jewel nods. Her greatest ambition in life is to play cards better than anybody else, and already she is famous throughout the west.

Riding into town, Bob dismounts in front of the dancehall and enters. As he leans up against the bar and orders a drink, his eye is held by a slim flame of a dark eyed girl. Approaching her he orders a drink and the two begin a conversation. Pete, the owner of the dancehall comes up, and tells Rosa Belle the next number is hers. With a smile for Bob she whirls onto the floor and her teeth flash as she darts and twists while the watching men stand by with heavy lidded eyes as her young body describes graceful undulations. As the music comes to an abrupt end, Rosa Belle bows again and again to the tumultuous applause, and a fierce jealousy stirs Bob as he sees avid hands reach for her lithe body. Later, Bob kisses her and as he holds her close, urges her to give up this life, but she smiles provoeatively at his possessive air, and accepts the invitation of another patron to dance. Furiously Bob stamps out and Rosa Belle watches him leave. As the patter of hoof beats is heard, she breaks away from her bearded partner, and returns to her own room. A week later Bob comes again, but Rosa Belle, believing he would never return has finally gone back to her work and as he enters her heart skips a beat. After one disdainful glance in her direction, Bob chooses another girl and all that evening he dances with everyone except Rosa Belle who, hurt, aecepts the invitation of a hilarious group to join them at a party later. Bob drinks sullenly. Suddenly his sister comes riding up, in cowboy regalia, and waving her hat. With a group of men from their ranch she enters and soon is playing cards. At first she loses, but is soon cleaning up. When she is ready, she leaves to the amazement of the veteran gamblers, she is with her disconsolate brother.

Meanwhile, at the party, Rosa Belle regrets her impulsiveness and when a drunkard tries to kiss her, she pulls herself free and dashes out. In the night she stumbles over the road and finally exhausted, sleeps. It is dawn when she awakens, lost, and she goes to a nearby ranch. As she is about to knock, Jewel, whose brother has, after the roundup, taken the cattle to town to sell them, comes to the door and gives the girl breakfast. Rosa Belle is fascinated by the ranch activities and Jewel invites her to stay on. At first the dance hall girl has a difficult time getting acclimated but when Bob returns, Jewel enthusiastically tells her brother of her new find. Bob is indifferent until Rosa Belle comes riding up. For a while both stare, then Jewel, understanding, whistling takes up her cards and plays solitaire, while Bob takes the yielding Rosa Belle into his arms.

ON THE WINNIPEG TRAIL

E. O. Quesseth Drama File No. 10348

THE HUDSON BAY TERRITORY resigns its political rule to the Dominion of Canada, in 1869, causing much apprehension among the half-breed Indians, who fear they may lose their property in this transaction. Led by Louis Riel, they organize, and threaten the white settlers. Fort Garry marks the beginning of the Old Winnipeg Trail, and the starting point for wagon trains which carry mail, passengers and supplies into the district in exchange for the valuable Hudson Bay furs. Jim Barton, a trusted settler, affeotionately called "Old Barry" by Indians and white people alike, is preparing to lead a wagon expedition to Strathcona when his scout, Tim Bairsto, breaks his ankle, and he is forced to replace him with Joe Nischo, a half-breed. Suspecting that he may cause trouble, Barry consults with his military escort, Fred Hemden, and they discuss the situation with Captain Hamilton at the military barracks, who appoints Lloyd Harrison, a young veteran of the Civil War, to assist them. Mrs. Stratford and her guest, Jean Bradley, are the only women on the expedition; accompanied by her son, James, she is taking the girl to Strathcona where her uncle, Commander Bill Bradley, will meet her and take her back to their home in England. The only other passenger is Berth McNeil, a soldier of fortune.

Harrison rides beside Jean's wagon, talking to her as they travel, until James takes him aside and informs him that she is his fianeee, and an heiress, after this, he carefully avoids her. All goes well on the journey until Harrison sees six men on horseback outlined against the sky. With all the other men in the party except James, who eannot be found, he trails them, and attacks their camp when they fire. The men, who prove to be half-breeds, are easily captured; one of them who is dying admits that Joe Nischo, working under the orders of Louis Riel, had informed them of the trail they would follow, and planned an attack. Harrison discovers that Joe has disappeared, and at Barry's suggestion, rides back to Fort Garry for reinforcements; a group of trappers instantly volunteer, and return with him. As they approach the Saskatchewan River, Barry sends Harrison on a scouting expedition, and he discovers a number of Indians in a nearby camp. Advising the two women to remain in their wagon, Barry leaves a guard with them, and instructs Harrison to lead an attack on their enemies. A terriffic struggle follows, but at last the half-breeds are conquered, and Joe Nischo taken prisoner with the others. Fred Hemden tells Harrison that James hid himself in the woods when he heard sounds of warfare. Delighted that he is safe, Jean throws her arms around Harrison when she sees him, alone, at the creek. Overcome by his emotion, he tells her he loves her, but has no right to ask her to become his wife. James witnesses this scene, and later tries to shoot Harrison in the back, but is frightened away when Fred, discovering him in this cowardly act, gives a fearful war whoop.

The wagon train at last reaches Strathcona, and Jean tells her uncle of her love for Harrison, assuring them both that she has never been engaged to James. Rewarding him with promise of a future in England, Jean's uncle witnesses her marriage to Harrison.

NIGHT DUTY

Ruth Willis Drama File No. 10568

RADIANT with happiness as she sweeps onto the floor of the High School gymnasium where the annual dance is being held, Janet looks up adoringly into the eyes of Dick Carver, president of the Student Council. As she sees the other girls angle for Dick's attention. Janet attributes his tenderness to her to his neighborly feeling and when her father dies Dick comforts her. However, when the estate is settled, it is discovered that the once wealthy Mr. Dixon has left his widow and two children with little save their home. Regretfully Mrs. Dixon informs her children that they will be unable to go on to college as they had planned. However, Dick writes that he is unable to make it and sends Janet a bid to his fraternity dance. Skimping on lunches, Janet manages to get a dress and the thought of seeing Dick again keeps her up during the distressing days that follow. However, the night before she is to leave, Freddie, who has been dissipating despite all Janet and her mother can do, gets drunk and Janet, forced to take eare of him misses the train that was to get her to the prom. The months drag by until Dick returns on his summer vacation, but his sister has invited a house guest, Monica Nast, and despite Dick's anxiousness to be with Janet he is forced to escort Monica about. Janet's heart sinks as she realizes that college has matured Dick while she seem the same and she realizes hopelessly that they seem to be drifting apart.

Dick returns to school and Janet's maiden aunt sends for them. Aunt Ellen takes an immediate and unreasonable fondness for the weak willed Freddie and determines to send him to Harvard Law. Rather than inform Aunt Ellen that Freddie's flunking marks will not permit him to be admitted, Mrs. Dixon lies that Freddie is suffering from an obscure malady, and when Aunt Ellen insists on having him taken to doctors, it is discovered that drink and dissipation have actually affected Freddie's heart. Whereupon Aunt Ellen offers to send Janet to a nursing school so that she will be better fitted to care for her brother. To Janet the hard work is a blessing as it keeps her from brooding over Dick, but one day Freddie, having gone on another rampage is brought to the hospital mangled and bleeding. Janet cares for him faithfully, and when the doctor advises that Freddie should be taken to Hot Springs, Janet goes as constant companion to her wheel chair-confined brother. At Hot Springs, Janet meets again Monica Nast, who dismayed by the news she receives in a letter from Dick's sister, that Dick is coming to see Janet immediately upon graduation, becomes jealous and lies to Janet, that Dick is coming soon to see her. Janet at last believing decides to avoid Dick upon his arrival. He is immediately usurped by Monica. Monica fingers Dicks fraternity pin to impress Janet and much upset, Janet flees. At the same time Freddie suffers a relapse and Janet does not stir from his bedside. Freddie sends for Dick and dies entrusting his self-sacrificing sister to Dick's care, and Dick reveals that he has always loved Janet. Later it is Dick who finds Janet, weeping in the moonlight, and as he tenderly kisses her tear-stained face, Monica is forgotten.

SON OF THE WEST

M. James Flood Drama File No. 10579

A FEW moments before giving the signal to go over the top, Lieutenant Harry Moore draws a locket from his shirt pocket, and regards the beautiful features of the young woman whose picture is contained inside; the word "Lander" is inscribed on the beaten gold surface of the old fashioned piece of jewelry. Left on a doorstep in Alberta, Canada when a baby, this was the only piece of identification found with him, and when Harry's kindly foster mother was on the point of death, she had given this to the young man. Blowing the whistle, Harry leads his men against the German forces; one of the enemy soldiers pierces his shoulder with a bayonet, and when he retaliates with a thrust at his side, the young German falls near him; as they lie together on the battle field, they smile faintly at one another before losing consciousness. A few months later, Armistice is declared, and Harry leaves these fields which have been a living hell, to sail back to the United States. Deciding the strange name, Lander, perhaps indicates the town where he was born, Harry travels everywhere that he finds it, without success. His journeys finally carry him on the train to Lander, Wyoming, outlined against the Copper Mountains, and here the local paper publishes his and his mother's pictures. Through the former sheriff of the county, Harry secures work as a hay hand on the ranch of Jake Hammon; as his taciturn employer takes him to his quarters from town, Harry remarks in surprise that the Popo Agie river flows underground and receives a curt reply which encourages no further conversation.

Two men who work as irrigators for Hammon live in his home with the man, and accomplish so little in the fields that Harry becomes suspicious, and borrowing boots and mosquito netting, secretly follows them as they set out for the Popo Agie's underground cavern one night. He throws them to the ground and almost wrenches the arm of one, when he discovers them about to murder a man, and throw him in an open grave. Harry is amazed when he sees that he has been benefactor to Reinhart Lorentzen, the German who almost killed him during the war, and the two shake hands, cordially. Taking him home, Reinhart introduces him to his aunt Elizabeth, a sweet, motherly woman, and his beautiful young cousin, Dorothy. Afraid to return to Hammon's ranch, Harry makes his home with these grateful people while he searches for employment, but Reinhart will not explain the incident of the previous evening, except to say that he was digging a grave for a dead horse, obviously not the true story. Seeing a riderless horse at the same spot, Harry follows a trail, and discovers a cave, where Hammon and his two irrigators are in conference. Hiding on the ledge above them, he hears Hammon relate how he took Lorentzen's gold twenty five years before, and hid it, then kidnapped his son, after the older man died, taking the baby to Alberta. If they find the gold, they will each receive twenty thousand, but it will be necessary to force Lorentzen's widow to reveal its hiding place.

Harry rides away to warn the family, and is followed by Hammon. They struggle, and Hammon accidently is shot by his own gun, while his two aides are held and turned over to the police. Recognizing the locket, Elizabeth tells Harry he is her own son, and Reinhart his cousin, but he is happy to learn that Dorothy is an adopted daughter. A map which Elizabeth finds in her husband's old suit reveals the treasure, and as Dorothy returns his embrace, Harry is doubly rewarded.

FORBIDDEN POWER

George E. Fox Drama File No. 10558

AS the eyes of his father, a man who has given his entire life to the study of science, grow dimmer and his hand shakier, Alfred grows rebellious against the whole plan of life. Evelyn whom Alfred has loved since they were both children, tries to cheer him up, but Alfred grows weary of the music and dancing at the fraternity house party and sitting alone in the garden expatiates upon the injustice of things—how the first thirty years of a man's life are given to acquiring experience and then when he has his background he gets too old and tired to be able to really do big things. Lee, president of the fraternity, tries to tell Evelyn how much he loves her, but she puts him gently from her saying that all Alfred's life he has looked to her, and if she failed him now when he was so unhappy and maladjusted, he would lose his entire faith in everything.

Alfred returns home and as the house itself seems to shake from the force of some tremendous current, hurries to his father's laboratory. He finds Vinson exulting over a gigantic discovery and even as he watches his father turns ray upon an egg, and in a few seconds it is hatched to a full grown chicken. Enthusiastically Vinson explains how he has used the sun's rays to condense life. Alfred is astounded and urges his father to show him all. Thereafter the boy works ceaselessly, but his father, too wearied to continue experimenting, cautions him to go slowly. Alfred places a puppy under the ray and as it changes into a powerful and full grown dog, the vast potentialities of the ray begin to dawn upon Alfred. Evelyn comes to beg him to rest for a while, but Alfred refuses to leave the laboratory until he has proved a hypothesis of his. Turning the ray upon himself, Alfred emerges shaken from the room, and staring into a mirror sees that he has the face of an old man. He comes to Evelyn. At first she does not recognize him, then she gasped with horror as he explains that he has aged in such a way that although he has the background of a man who has lived his life fully and richly, his vigor and strength are still with him. Evelyn weeps as she recoils from the embrace of this prematurely aged man, and back in his laboratory Alfred broods over losing the woman he loves. However, believing that the only basis for her distaste is the disparity between them, he comes back and under the pretense that his father is ill, inveigles Evelyn into his laboratory. Lee, whom Evelyn has called on the phone, rushes over and finding she has left with Alfred, fears the worst and rushes to the laboratory. As he nears, the house shakes and too late he forces his way in. Alfred exults as he sees Evelyn, old as he, but she winces as he comes near and cries desperately, "Don't touch me. I hate you." And Lee, still loving her although now her loveliness is gone, comforts her as she sobs heart breakingly. For the first time the impetuous Alfred realizes how he has bungled and determines to reverse the working of the ray and restore Evelyn's vanished youth. His father begs him not to attempt to as the power generated will destroy the machine and probably the operator. But Alfred grimly proceeds and as Evelyn emerges radiant and young again, there is a terrific explosion and the machine and Alfred go up in smoke. Vinson is disconsolate but Lee and Evelyn gently lead him from the scene.

MONEY, MONEY

Roy Lockhart Comedy Drama File No. 10570

WITH the daily newspaper full of accounts of bank closings all over the country, Ab acts more and more strangely. At last, one morning his wife Martha calls up Ab's twin brother, Abe, and in a hysterical voice urges him to come right over. Abe loses no time in covering the three miles between the farms and as he nears the farm he sees Martha waiting tremulously. Worried Martha explains that Ab han't been himself lately at all and that she is beginning to be a little afraid of him. Abe reassures her and goes out to see his brother. To his amazement he sees that Ab is plowing zig zag furrows going every which way across the five acre lot which now looks more like a jig-saw puzzle than a plowed field. Ab explains that he is looking for twenty-five hundred, and shaking his head gravely, Abe leaves. Proceeding directly to the town banker, Mr. Norris, an old friend of the family, Abe explains how strangely Ab has been acting and Mr. Norris purses his lips as he explains that a few months ago Ab drew out all his money from the bank. They agree then, that the best thing to do is to bring Ab in for observation before he harms Martha. Whereupon the sheriff phones Ab that he has some papers he wants him to sign and before Ab can grasp what is going on, he has been tried, and pronounced insane by a judge, on the evidence of his wife, his twin brother, and the town banker.

As Ab is being led to the train he suggests that if he is brought to the asylum by the sheriff, the family will suffer from a lot of unnecessary notoriety. Accordingly his brother is deputized and Ab accompanies peacefully. A few minutes before the train pulls into the station, Ab asks if he may see the papers of commitment. Abe hands them over and Ab is still looking at them when the train pulls into the station. As they walk up to the office, Ab continues talking, giving Abe no opportunity to break in and ask for the papers, but as they reach the place Ab authoritatively turns his brother over to the authorities and shakes his head in burlesque sadness as the dumbfounded Abe begins raving like a maniac. As he leaves, Ab calls out the folks will be up to see Abe in a few days, meanwhile, cheerio.

Returning on the next train, Ab takes Abe's car which is parked near the depot and driving it home tells the astounded Martha that he is going out to plow some more. As he gets his team ready, Martha dashes to Abe's house and learning that Abe has not yet returned, gets hysterical as she fears the worst. Calling the sheriff, the banker, and a couple of neighbors, she drives back to find Ab just coming in from the field, a piece of two inch pipe slung dangersouly over his shoulder. Martha screams, "Oh, he was such a good man." but Ab breaks into a grin and unscrewing the cap of the pipe explains that when the bank scares were prevalent he withdrew his money from the bank and buried it in the field. Realizing that the situation had cleared up with the NRA he had begun searching for his money and if that were any reason for clapping a man in an insane asylum, well, he gives up! Abe is freed, and Martha, brushing a tear from her eye enters the house with her husband's arms protectively about her.

HERITAGE OF THE JUNGLE

Cornelia M. S. Rice Melodrama File No. 10512

THE droning of an airplane arouses the attention of a group of young men, resting on the porch of a country house after a day of active sports, and several young women, inside the house, leave the tea tables also gazing skyward at the approaching plane. After it lands, a short distance away, June Banford, hostess of the house party, rushes forward and greets the pilot with a kiss, then presents him to her guests, who have assembled for her wedding two days later, as Lord Guyford Walling, her fiancee. As they offer congratulations and greetings, all admire the powerful physique of this young English lord whom June met while visiting in London with her father. Conrad Traylor, a young physician who is also in love with June, reflects that she will find happiness with this fine, and brilliant man, renowned as an athlete, and rejoices for her sake. As the bridesmaids are dressing for dinner, Gloria Kent, one of the most charming of the group, states that her brother knew Lord Walling during the war, when he was only Guy Winston, a brave young officer, and she relates the story of his strange childhood. Guy's father, an adventurous youth, persuaded his family to allow him to visit certain of their holdings in Africa, after his graduation. Enchanted with the opportunities for hunting and adventure, he decided to make his home in the Dark Continent, after his marriage to the daughter of an English curate, who shared his love of outdoor life.

The young couple made an expedition into the heart of Africa, taking a group of natives with them. Erecting a hut, they planted a bomha of thorns for proteetion, and prepared to study the wild life of the vicinity. One day the Bwana, as the natives termed Guy's father, went out alone to watch Ugugla, the Dawn Bearer; when he did not return, they searched for him, and found him, severely injured, beside a dead female gorilla, while the animal's baby sobbed and chattered hysterically, following the group back to camp. The story is interrupted by announcement of dinner, and June proposes that the group shall go for a swim, following the wedding rehearsal the next evening. Alone, Guy tells her he cannot swim, but she believes he modestly does wish to demonstrate his prowess in this field as he excels in praotically every sport; however, she agrees that he may referee the meet in a canoe. Continuing her story, later when alone with the bridesmaid Gloria narrates that when Guy's father was brought back to his hut, his wife sent natives to the nearest white village for a physician, but, frightened, they tarried at one of their own tribal gathering places, and a leopard killed all but one boy, who continued the trip. Guy's uncle, on the verge of conducting a searching party for his brother, now gone for almost two years, followed the native boy's instructions, at reaching the hut, surrounded by an impenetrable barrier of thorns. Hearing a woman's scream, and seeing a giant gorilla in the trees, the brother finally cut his way through, and discovered his brother, dead and horribly mangled, and his sister in hysteria. He carried her away to Leopoldville where Guy was born, two months later; ever since she has lived in Africa, mysteriously.

Guy astonishes them all when he rescues a kitten from a high tree the next morning, climbing with amazing dexterity. When he and June are alone in the canoe, he suddenly feels it sinking; June swims ashore, sure that her lover will follow, since she has arranged this trick to force him to demonstrate his ability. To her horror, she discovers that he has not yet returned. The next morning his body is found in the lake, and as Conrad examines it, he discovers a closely knit silk suit covering his outer skin; cutting this away, a mat of wooly hair, resembling a gorilla's is disclosed. Agreeing that death was merciful ,the young doctor conceals knowledge of this dread birthmark from June, as she turns to him for comfort.

SACRIFICE

Elna E. Collins Drama File No. 10535

TREMBLING with fright, little Garnet Wilbur answers her stepfather's call ,and tries to hold back the tears when he beats her brutally. As she takes the child in her arms, Garnet's mother explains that her husband is mentally unbalanced, as the result of excessive drinking, and a few months later it is necessary to have him taken to the state hospital for the insane. Although work on the little ranch is difficult for the mother and daughter, they are happy together, relieved of the fear of Mr. Wilbur's cruelty, and Mr. Miles, a youthful admirer of Mrs. Wilbur often leaves his farm at the little town of Twin Oaks, five miles away, to help them. Placing his business in the hands of his assistant, Mr. Miles finally boards at the Wilbur Ranch, and Garnet comes to love him as she never could her step-father, while the old romance between this kindly man and the girl's mother is obviously renewing itself. Mr. Miles' only son, Donald, a youth, of twenty-four who is studying to become a physician, visits his father, and encounters Garnet, now a beautiful girl, as she is drawing a bucket of water from the well. Carrying it for her, the young man follows the girl to the house, where he is joyfully received by his father and Mrs. Wilbur. As he sees Garnet every day on the farm, Don soon loses his heart to her, and when the girl shows him a family of four baby kittens, he is competely won by her naive delight, and takes her in his arms, kissing her. Angrily, she pushes him away, and he apologizes for his impulsive act, but when the two are riding together on their favorite hroses, Trixy and Birdy, Donald assures Garnet of his sincere love, and she consents to become his wife after he graduates from medical school the following year.

As he is packing, Garnet gives Don her only valuable possession, a locket, with her picture inside. Returning from the station where she has bid him farewell, Garnet finds a robin with a broken wing, and as she nurses the bird back to health, wishes she might as easily join her mate. Although still in love with Garnet, Don marries Marian Pumley, feeling that her social contacts will be valuable to him. Garnet is en route with Mr. Miles to visit her Aunt Lucy in New York, and study voice culture, when she is severely injured as the steps of the train give away, and hears from Don's father of his son's marriage, as she lies in the hospital, since that was the purpose of his visit to the great city. The railroad company awards Garnet fifty thousand dollars as a result of their criminal negligence, and after a long illness, the girl is finally able to leave for New York, with her mother. The two make their home with Garnet's Aunt Lucy, and the young woman studies at a leading conservatory for two years, then becomes the pupil of the renowned Professor Silverton. Through him, she secures an audition with the Metropolitan Opera Company, and is subsequently given the leading role in Rigoletto. Returning from a visit to a patient, Don sees the name of his former sweetheart in electric lights and enters the opera house, where he is enchanted with her voice and beauty, but when he visits back stage she tells him he must not see her again, restraining her tendency to throw herself in his arms. The next day, while inviting her to ride with him, Don is injured in a car accident and rushed to the hospital; Garnet visits him, and encounters Marian, who is furiously jealous, especially when she discsovers her husband looking at his former's sweetheart's picture in her locket. Realizing she must not see him again, Garnet marries Ronald Kent, tenor in her company, and sails to Europe with him. Mrs. Wilbur and Don return together to Twin Oaks for a vacation, and here Mrs. Wilbur, now a widow, opens a boarding house for miners. While he is away, Don receives word that Marian has died, as the result of pneumonia. When Garnet comes to visit her mother, she again encounters Don, and tells him that she is suing for divorce, since her husband is unfaithful to her. Don severely beats Bill Crag, one of Mrs. Wilbur's boarders, who is annoying Garnet with his attentions, and their old love is rekindled. When her divorce is final, Garnet leaves the stage to attend her mother's wedding to Mr. Miles, and Don acts on the same impulse. At the conclusion of the simple ceremony, Don and Garnet slip away to the garden. Here he pretends he no longer cares for her, but seeing his sweetheart's tears, tells her he only wished to know if she could really love him, and as they embrace, Garnet and Don find their lost happiness once more.

THE FOOLISH VIRGIN

Sylvia Franz Drama File No. 10509

AT nineteen Grace Nixon stands in the divorce court receiving her decree. Returning to her parents, she determines to patch the broken places in her life by absorption in a business career. Beautiful, talented, she is soon placed with a large firm and is transfered to the Dallas office. There she meets Janet Hale who shares her apartment, her joys and her heartaches. Arriving home tired from business one night, Grace finds the apartment crowded with friends whom Janet has invited to celebrate Grace's birthday. Radiant as she faces them, Grace is introduced to Kenneth, the Western cousin of one of Janet's friends. Laughingly Janet warns her friend to be careful of Kenneth but Grace counters boastfully that she always takes things slow; until her eyes met the steady grey ones of Ken and her words die on her lips. That evening they are together constantly and for the next three days they are inseparable. As they are driving to a dance, a feeling of desolation comes over them for Ken is to return next day to his ranch in Colorado. Suddenly he stops his car and tells her that he cannot leave her, he loves her. For a moment Grace is stunned, but as he sweeps her into his arms, she returns his kisses with all the fire of her being and when she goes to Colorado as Mrs. Kenneth Kare it is with the conviction that never was a bride happier than she. Her letters home overflow with her great joy and when her parents write that they are coming to visit, she is transported. But on the way to the railroad station, the automobile breaks down and when Grace is crushed by the telegram telling of the instant death of both parents, it is Ken who comforts and soothes her. Just as she becomes reconciled to their death, comes word that Janet has been the innocent victim of a bullet from the gun of a bank robber and the specialists report that only a change to a dry climate can save her pierced lung. Grace and Ken invite Janet to come and stay with them in Colorado and to Grace's joy Ken and Janet become great friends. Ken is promoted Junior partner and Grace, who has been studying voice is urged by her instructor to make her debut. However, Ken objects and happy that he loves her so much, Grace drops her feeble protests. In the months that follow Janet rides with them, swims, motors and dances and it seems the most natural thing in the world when Grace is busy at the club for Ken to take Janet with him to the chase rather than let the ticket go to waste.

Then comes the depression. Ken's wages are cut and when Grace again suggests a tour, Ken assents. Janet takes a position as secretary but her cough gets worse and she is urged to drop it. At first away for just a day or two, Grace begins making longer trips and to her great disappointment is unable to be home for Christmas. However, in a fit of generosity her manager releases her, and planning to surprise Ken, Grace arrives home only to hear Janet refuse to destroy Grace's happiness by revealing their love for each other. In agony, Grace presses a divorce upon them and gives up thoughts of suicide for the sake of her child, Kareen, who is born shortly before the final papers arrive. Ironically Grace is discovered by Jim Morgan, producer, and achieves fame as the star with a sense of humor, the most sought after actress of "other woman" roles. Jim begs her to drop her pose of sophistication and marry him, but Grace looks at him fondly as she explains that to-day for the first time in five years, Kareen's father is coming to visit. Jim presses her hand in understanding and with the promise that Grace will call him if she wants him, goes.

WHEN DREAMS CAME TRUE

Eric Larson Drama File No. 10506

ALL Rosine's life she had saved so that she might take one vacation to Paris and travel like an heiress, and now as she stood at the dock, she noticed with dismay that her former employer, Paul Ferguson, wealthy financier, had come to the same boat to see someone off. Dodging out of sight lest Ferguson give her identity away, she came up on deck only after the boat had pulled out of the harbor. As she looked about to see whether the coast was clear, a deep masculine voice asked, "Hiding from someone?" Confused, she shook her head and as James Ferguson introduced himself, Rosine's head began to whirl. For the remainder of the trip James was her constant escort, and Rosine wondered what he would say if he knew that she was just his father's stenographer traveling first class on the savings of her lifetime. The last day out as they sat together on the moon-bathed decks, James whispered, "I love you," to Rosine and as she shivered slightly he drew her close to him. At least she thought, the game could continue until they docked, and rather than risked being scorned by James when he found out what a sham she was, Rosine gave him a false address in Paris. To James' consternation when he came to her hotel, he found that Rosine had never registered there at all and he had lost her in Paris.

Meanwhile Rosine tried desperately to forget her impossible love for James and to continue her plans for seeing the world. However, in a Parisian cafe an apache became over-friendly and as she struggled with him James entered and with one blow outstretched the fellow on the floor. As he was leaving with the frightened Rosine, the apache raised himself on his elbow and shot at James. Rosine screamed and James was carried to a hospital. The days that followed were a nightmare to Rosine but at last the doctor told her to go into the hospital room, the patient had been calling for her. Held close to James' heart, Rosine promised she would never leave him again, and despite her confession that she was penniless, James insisted on taking her home and marrying her.

The moment the boat docked, James proceeded to the home of Angela Fenton, and as she raised languid arms to him, James begged her to release him from the engagement which their families had engineered. At first resentful, Angela shrugged, lit a cigarette, and with a little gesture of resignation said she might have known she'd lose him if she let him out of her sight. Returning to Rosine, James exultantly took her in his arms and learning that his parents were on a weekend party made plans for their reception of Rosine. In James' arms Rosine felt such happiness as she had thought impossible.

However, when Mrs. Ferguson learned that James intended marrying a poor girl, she informed Rosine that James was already engaged, and at last Rosine fled. Unable to stand the separation from James, Rosine humbly took back her old position so that she could at least maintain some feeling of nearness. Then one day her employer beetled his brows over a telegram telling that his son was drinking himself into a stupor, and hearing Ferguson mumble that the boy would have been better off marrying that little girl he met on shipboard, Rosine fainted. It was Ferguson who brought the youngsters together again, and once more in James' arms, Rosine knew that at last all her dreams had come true.

DANCE HALL

Mrs. M. Hirshfeld Drama File No. 10129

IN rebellion against the deadly monotony of life in a small town, Margot joins the thousands of girls who come to a big city in the hope that their youth and beauty will bring them fortune. Soon she learns the bitter lesson that nobody cares what becomes of her and when she manages at length to get a position, it is to find that the pittance she earns as a salesclerk is barely sufficient to pay for her board. Utterly discouraged, she enters a restaurant and tears come to her eyes as she contemplates returning home and facing the "I told you so's" of her former neighbors. Across the table she can feel the pitying eyes of a girl upon her and when Violet asks, "Hard up?" Margot nods. In her eagerness to speak to somebody after the weeks of loneliness, Margot pours out her hard luck story and Violet tells her that she can make money in an easier way. Taking the girl to her employer who is the owner of a dance hall, Violet gets her a position there and takes her into her own apartment.

The following evening, Margot is bewildered by the blaring jazz music and clinging couples and she discovers that her salary is to be a percentage of the checks given for drinks. New at the game, Margot thinks she has to drink every time a man buys some for her and at closing time she is intoxicated and uproariously certain that it's a great life. Elizabeth Carr, one of the older girls tells Margot she doesn't have to drink all the liquor set before her, but Violet urges her to have a good time and Margot soon is as free as any of the girls. Two weeks later Elizabeth calls Margot to her room and finds Jim, who used to run a poker game at the dance hall packing Elizabeth's things. The older girl explains they are leaving to be married, going west. Margot is surprised, wishes them luck, and accepts the little gifts Elizabeth leaves with her.

Soon the novelty wears off. Margot begins to wish herself out of the life, but she is caught. Violet is killed by a jealous wife and when Margot gets letters from Elizabeth telling her how happy she is, she feels a great void. Then one day while Margot is debating whether or not to accept the proposition of a wealthy infatuated youth, she receives a telegram from Jim saying that Elizabeth is ill. Without hesitating a moment, Margot goes west and a worried Jim meets her at the station. With the help of Will Martin, soon Will's visits extend longer than necessary. the doctor, Margot pulls her friend through and Margot realizes she is in love with Will but when, while riding one day, he tells her he has loved her from the first, she begs him to take her back and withholds her answer. All night Margot struggles with the realization that she is unworthy of Will's love. But when he comes for his answer, she turns from him and tells him about her past but Will places his finger over her lips and tells her he knows, Elizabeth told him. It is a hard life that Will offers, that of a country doctor's wife, but they will have each other and that to Margot and Will is happiness.

BARBER SHOP BLUES

Frederick Wigand, Jr. Comedy File No. 10477

WITH an admiring glance at the shiny fixtures within, Hardy puts his key to the lock of the Trimlock Barber Shop and enters, violently dragging after him the trembling-lipped Laurel who has paused to look after a pretty girl. After much business of showing pleasure over their new shop and the two neatly framed diplomas qualifying Laurel and Hardy to practice barbering, the pair don their jackets. Hardy has a strenuous struggle but manages while Laurel succeeds in getting his half way on and gets stuck. Hardy jerks it on only to discover that Laurel has put it on backwards and the ensuing scene is interrupted by the arrival of the first customer. Stealing a last glance at the book, "How to Trim Hair," Hardy begins to hack violently at the hair and causes his victim to howl with pain as he combs violently over the bald spot. Meanwhile Laurel is standing before the large mirror sampling each of the tonics and perfumes and looking tremendously pleased after each application. Hardy completes his sorry mess of a job and dusts off his customer with so much powder that the fellow leaves in a cloud of talcum, coughing and sputtering, but unaware of the hilarious condition of his hair.

A tough guy enters. Laurel has difficulty laying the chair back and Hardy in an attempt to help jerks the chair back so that the giant topples over the two barbers, and is only calmed with the greatest difficulty. Laurel prepares a hot towel in a dense cloud of steam and as it is too hot, drops it on the protesting customer, who jerks it off so that it falls on Hardy's scalp and scalds him. Laurel strops his razor, cutting off the strop at each stroke and with a violent noise tears at the dense crop of whiskers, badly nicking his razor. Laurel goes out to lunch, stops to look at a girl and runs into a fellow who socks him and jams his derby down over his eyes. Blindly Laurel stumbles into a fat man who catapults him head first into a street cleaner's refuse wagon. The cart rolls down a steep hill, barely missing trucks and cars, strikes a curb and tosses Laurel into a baby carriage. A woman shrieks, "Kidnapper" and Laurel dashes off followed by a growing crowd. Rounding a corner he stops. The crowd runs past and absent mindedly Laurel joins the chase until exhausted he drops off at a lunch wagon. He emerges licking an ice cream cone and as he enters the barber shop his customer, whom Hardy has finished, comes out, face covered with adhesive tape.

The next scene shows both at work on customers. A girl goes by and a mischievous urchin lets go his balloon so that the hook attached to it by a string, catches the girl's skirts, raising them high. Laurel stares. Hardy follows. The two customers and various men from the building form a procession after the unsuspecting girl. Hardy taps her on the shoulder embarrassedly trying to explain. Accidentally he touches the balloon which explodes and the girl slaps him violently. Loud laughter ensues and Hardy chases Laurel who laughs hardest of all. Laurel hops a sprinkling wagon and just as Hardy comes abreast the water turns on. Hardy tugs Laurel who falls bringing off one of the sprayers and the rush of water almost drowns both.

The next morning at the shop a tall customer comes in for hair tonic and Laurel pours hair remover over him causing all his hair to come out. The customer gets violent, and knocks Laurel and the interfering Hardy about, leaving the pair forlornly sitting in the debris. As he bangs the door, the large plate glass window crashes causing a sign, "Out of Order" to fall between the two dazed barbers.

THE STING OF THE SCORPION

George W. Smith Drama File No. 10142

WHEN the Scorpion pleads for the life of his son, Judge Greely retorts that he would not save a guilty man from justice even if he were his own son. As the death sentence is passed, the Scorpion mutters the Judge will yet feel his sting.

By profession leader of a dope ring, the Scorpion returns home to find Ann Jolson, pleading with him to release her husband from the gang so that he can cure himself of the dope habit. The Scorpion refuses, but when she hysterically threatens to expose what she knows, he agrees to send Bob away on condition that she help him with one of his plans. After a hard look she agrees. The Scorpion's plan, however, is to kill Ann for knowing too much and he intends to incriminate Judge Greely's prodigal son, Jim, who stops in at the Hollywood, one of the Scorpion's night clubs for drinks. However, when the car of the Scorpion's niece, Madge, stalls, Jim Greely comes to her rescue and they become friends. The Scorpion's henchmen, Spike and Gorilla, agree to their leader's plans but Spike reminds his boss that he gets Madge for his wife. Accordingly, Ann is sent for and without explanations is ordered to be "nice" to Jim Greely. "And then you won't bother Bob or me again?" she asks, and reassured goes out and sits beside Jim. He realizes she is unhappy and falls right into the trap by asking if he can take her home. However, when he leaves her at her door and rides away, he is seen by the landlady and when later, Ann is found choked to death, Jim is incriminated. The simplicity of his story convicts him and his own father is forced to pass the death sentence upon him in accordance with the jury's findings. Scorpion smiles grimly as the Judge faints from the strain. However, Madge soon finds that her uncle is insisting on her marriage to the bestial Spike and when she tries to escape she is guarded as a prisoner. Having fallen in love with Jim, and believing him to be innocent, she promises to marry Spike if he and the Scorpion do something to free Jim. Permitted greater freedom, Madge overhears the Gorilla attempt to coerce Scorpion into paying him a thousand instead of five hundred for killing Ann. As she watches, the Gorilla begins to choke Scorpion who, however, digs his gun into the other's stomach and laughing grimly says nobody is smart enough to put anything over on the gorilla. Meanwhile, a reporter Jerry, friend of Jim's has been searching for evidence to free him, and finds a scuffling at the murdered woman's window that attests to a ladder there, and the imprint of huge shoes that would indicate some nocturnal marauder the fatal night. He follows the trail of Ann's dope crazed husband to the Hollywood but there gives himself away and is overpowered. Madge tries to free him but Spike forces her into marriage. She manages to escape before the ceremony, free Jerry and together they escape, pursued by Spike. Meanwhile, the Gorilla, determined to get the Scorpion, falls upon him and chokes him so that he is dying when the police arrive. The police wring a confession from the Gorilla that frees Jim. Spike is caught, and Jerry tells Jim how much he owes Madge. With his arm about the girl who promises to marry him, Jim comes out where his father and mother welcome him and his bride-to-be.

HAPPY ENDING

Addie L. Williams Drama File No. 10555

IN despair because she cannot find work, Wynne wanders toward the waterfront and decides to end her life. However, as she looks down into the murky waters, irridescent from the discharge of oils, she shudders and losing heart retraces her footsteps. Like a wounded animal she pauses outside a cafe from which sounds of laughter and nickleodean music drift. At last squaring her shoulders she walks in bravely, orders hot food and ravenously falls to eating. When the waiter comes with the check, Wynne tells him simply that she has no money but is willing to work off her debt. For a moment the irate proprietor looks as if he will strike her, but as his eye traces th appealing curves of her body he agrees to let her work, realizing that a girl like this will be a drawing crowd to the rough sailors. A few minutes after Wynne starts working, she feels the hot eyes of Captain Frank of the Maria, upon her. Wincing she tries to draw away but his hairy paw reaches for her and as he draws her to him her hand comes back and she administers a resounding slap to the brutal face. The sailors roar with amusement but Captain Frank staggers out, bent on revenge.

Meanwhile in the offices of the U. S. Secret Service, Operator 4109, David Wilton is commissioned to the dock to try to clear up the smuggling situation. Large shipments of dope are being brought in and David, having no dependents undertakes to ship as a common sailor aboard one of the boats in the hope of finding some clue from the sailors' talk. Watching the loading of the Maria in the dead of night, he enlists and is gladly accepted by Captain Frank whose crew is largely composed of shanghaied men who break under the strain. In the cafe David sees Wynne and is drawn to her, but before he can ask what she is doing at the waterfront, the sailors are summoned aboard the Maria. However, Captain Frank, determined to have his revenge, abducts the waitress who dared to insult him and carries her, unconscious, aboard.

In the hold of the ship Wynne awakens to see the leering face of the Captain entering. In terror she throws everything she can grab at him and fights tooth and nail until he is obliged to retreat. The First Mate Walters superstitiously insists that the girl will bring them ill luck and at last the Captain agrees to put her off on an uninhabited island. David, however, finds Wynne and recognizing her determines to help her. He dares not leave the ship, being under orders, but rounds up all the malcontents and inspires them to mutiny against the cursed Captain. While the Captain is giving orders to put the girl off the ship, David advises that she is liable to be picked up by a passing steamer and urges that she be executed on deck. Grinning evilly, the Captain agrees to let David handle the execution in a way to strikes terror into the hearts of his crew. Lining up the crew, David put guns in the hands of six and marches Wynne to her post. captain and his supporters and a pitched battle However, at the signal fire, the crew turn on the follows. David's men are outnumbered but at last they triumph. The ship is manned by the mutineers and its cargo of opium and opium smugglers is turned over to the authorities, while David and Wynne find love.

TWO TO GO

Roy Childs Drama File No. 10055

INSEPARABLE friends, Roy and Fritz arrive at Texas University and take their places on line with the freshmen. The first week up there, Fritz falls head over heels in love with Mary, a vivacious co-ed and Roy kids him good naturedly, claiming that love makes a fool of a fellow. It soon becomes apparent that although Mary loves Fritz, she likes a good time better and Fritz has his heart set on making the basketball team. It takes hours of training with Roy who has been a high school star to make Fritz into a player, and while he is busy dribbling balls down the field, Mary is finding Dave Wilson, wealthy playboy who is at college so he won't have to work, more than interested. Roy warns Fritz against Mary, but seeing that his friend is genuinely in love he drops his scoffing attitude.

At basketball practice, Roy distinguishes himself and Fritz makes the team too. Soon, after vigorous practice they become the mainstay of the Texas team and one day the coach's sister, Lora watches the players and grows enthusiastic over Roy's playing. When the practice period is up, Roy sees Lora and makes it his business to get the coach to introduce them. Thereafter Roy understands how Fritz feels about Mary, for he knows now he loves Lora. Each game Texas plays brings headlines for Roy and Fritz, but although Lora is proud of Roy, Mary is beginning to tire of early evenings with Fritz who has to keep training and after a quarrel with him, she accepts the invitation of Dave Wilson to go out with him a few nights before the game. Dave is expelled from college when the authorities learn he has an interest in a disreputable roadhouse, but Mary, not suspecting goes with him and at the prodding of the other people enters the Red Devil. When Fritz learns where Mary has gone he becomes distrait and determines to go after her. Roy warns him it means breaking training but when he learns the details, he goes too, to help Fritz in case of trouble. At the Red Devil, the two players fight their way through the bouncers and rescue Mary from Dave who has gotten her intoxicated. She weeps and begs Fritz to forgive her, telling him if anyone ever learns about her escapade she will be expelled. But when Fritz and Roy return to their room, battered from their fight, they find the coach waiting for them and when they offer no explanation he tells them they can't play in the big game with A. & M.

During the game their presence in the sidelines is conspicuous and the radio broadcaster keeps mentioning how Texas is taking a drubbing because Fritz and Roy aren't playing. Lora, having learned that Roy was at the Red Devil the night before the game cuts him while Fritz, miserably blames himself for spoiling Roy's chances. It is Mary, however, who tells the coach the truth. Fritz and Roy go into the game in the last ten minutes and by brilliant playing pull the score up to 36-35. Lora's kiss means she will marry Roy and in his hand he holds a contract to act as coach for a nearby University next season.

A WORLD APART

H. L. Rodgers Drama File No. 10278

ABSORBED in the management of the toy factory he has inherited, Robert Van Alcot, wealthy manufacturer is infuriated by the demands of his employees for higher wages and union hours. Instead of granting the agitators what he considers their unreasonable requests, he fires their leader, Joe Satello, a radical. When, as a result the mass of employees strike, Robert stubbornly refuses to yield, and closes his factory altogether just before Christmas. The resultant unhappiness to the numerous little families dependent upon regular wages for Christmas cheer is touching, and Robert's wife begs him to yield as she watches tearfully her own child happily playing among his toys.

Among those thrown out of work is Tony, an Italian laborer who, desperate for money manages with a hand organ and a monkey to get enough pennies to sustain him. However, one day when he is playing on the estate of Robert Van Alcot, to the amusement of the child's nurse and little Robert Junior, Van Alcot comes by, and, temper tried by his closed factory, violently ejects the innocent Italian, and breaks the hand organ. Tony feels the pitying eye of the nurse upon him and humiliated, he wanders on. When Tony tells the incident to Joe, the agitator, who has been mulling a plan Joe lets Tony in on his scheme to kidnap the Van Alcot baby and hold him not for ransom, but until he puts all his former employees back to work at a living wage. With the aid of the baby's nurse who hates the autocratic Van Alcot, Joe kidnaps the baby, leaves the nurse bound and gagged to avert suspicion, and gives the baby to the care of Tony in the tenement district where there are so many thousands of babies that another does not arouse suspicion. Alcot, receiving the kidnap note, however, refuses to come to terms and hires a mass of detectives who are, however, thrown off by Betty's faked description of the supposed kidnappers. The nurse is, however, breaking under the strain, and the Union which Joe thought would aid the cause, disclaims any responsibility for so dastardly a crime. Frightened that his plans will miscarry, Joe induces Tony to return to Italy with the baby and Betty.

Meanwhile, after months of grief Mrs. Van Alcot finds some solace from the dull ache in her heart by going about her charities with renewed interest and when her husband at last acknowledges defeat and concedes the required conditions, the baby is not returned because now the kidnappers fear prison if they return the baby. When Mrs. Van Alcot fixes her heart on an adorable orphan, her husband, softened now by grief, at last agrees to adopt the child, Grace, who grows up into a lovable and talented young lady.

Meanwhile, the kidnapped child, rechristened Columbus, grows up in Italy as a peasant, never suspecting that Tony is not his own father. Displaying a remarkable musical talent from the first, Columbus, sensationally rescues the child of a wealthy wine merchant from a runaway horse and as a reward is given a scholarship to a world famous conservatory of music, the same to which Grace is sent. The two gifted young people soon fall in love with each other but Grace meets with the disapprobation of her father when she admits she wants to marry a boy of peasant stock. She returns home, thinking she can convince her father, but he, anxious to marry her off to the son of his friend, a banker, is implacable. When, a year later, Columbus, increasingly successful as a concert artist, works his way across, she secures a place for him in the charity theater which her parents are interested in (her father having originally contributed his toys to charity affairs for publicity's sake, has through his wife, gradually taken a more altruistic interest. Thus the young people can meet regularly without exciting suspicion, while plans for the stupendous Christmas charity fete progress. Meanwhile, Tony, at first rejoicing in the boy's love for a wealthy American, discovers Grace is a Van Alcot, and terrifiedly books passage for America and confides his terrible fears to Joe, who, through the years, reinstated with the others in the factory, has worked himself up to chief electrician.

Grace warns her mother that if consent is not granted, she will marry Columbus regardless, but Van Alcot blows up when he learns that Columbus has all this while been engaged as musical conductor for the big show. However, he allows the performance to go on. Out front the thousands of charity children who are to receive gifts later and the social luminaries whose expensively priced tickets have insured the success of the event, look on in wonder at the magnificent performance. Something goes wrong backstage. Joe moves to fix the wheels and falls to the stage. Fatally injured he confesses to Van Alcot that Columbus is his kidnapped son. The Van Alcots rejoice, but Columbus and Grace are stunned. In her happiness, Mrs. Van Alcot sees the grief of the young people and for the first time reveals to Grace that she is free to marry Columbus, since she is only a sister by adoption. Van Alcot refuses to prosecute Tony, and the performance goes on in a burst of glory.

AMBITION

E. Connolly Drama File No. 10344

BECAUSE she knew there was a rich uncle in the background, Lena had run off and married Jim Patterson, a struggling young artist. But when her baby, Judy was born, and Lena learned that the uncle had left his money to charity, her dissatisfaction with the drudgery of her married life reached a climax, and when Gerald Taylor's letter arrived reminding her that if she ever cared to return to him he would see that she gained her life's ambition as an opera star, Lena ran away leaving a curt note to Jim and the baby, and changing her name to Leonora Spencer.

Seventeen years passed. Leonora was at the age of thirty nine a prima donna, world traveled, and the idol of the musical world. Insatiable in her demands for attention, Leonora enjoyed the idolatry of Harold James and the half-concealed antagonism of his son, Richard. It amused her to know that somewhere she had a daughter who must be eighteen years old. That daughter now, was in a little back apartment deploring her inability to make enough money in the factory to get her father into the country as the doctor advised. The years had brought no demand for Jim's pictures and broken in health now, he fretted constantly at being such a burden on Judy's slim shoulders. A fit of coughing seized him and as he leaned forward, his head struck violently against the mantle and he sank to the floor. When Judy returned home cheerfully with packages that night, she was met by the sallow-faced landlady who, screwing her face up grotesquely blurted out, "Your father is dead." The shock almost unnerved Judy, but unwilling to accept the charity she was offered, she packed her father's pictures and left forever the sad little house. For hours she wandered through the streets and as the crowds hurried by, unnoticing, tears filled her eyes. Hopelessly she considered her chances to support herself and as pangs of hunger made her feel faint, Judy began singing. Before the open fire in his home, Richard James wondered what in the name of goodness that girl was doing, singing in the streets at that hour, and as he went to the window he saw her sink to the ground. Running out to her he carried her inside and when Judy opened her eyes, Richard and his father induced her to spend the night in the guest room the servant was preparing for her. Above her protests they persuaded her it was folly to go outside now, and at last, wearily she yielded. It was Richard who insisted that she do something with her voice, and promising her he would exact a manager's fee when she became successful, he set about having her voice trained. Very soon Judy showed she was really the "Find" Richard claimed she was.

Then one night he came to her room to find her looking at a miniature of a girl of eighteen, her mother, Judy explained and in a hard voice she told of her mother's desertion of her father. Richard searched his memory to recall whom the picture reminded him of, but it was when he had taken Judy to her first opera and watched her breathless attention to Leonora Spencer, lovely at that distance in powdered wig and billowing skirt, that he realized who Judy was. However, it was when Leonora came down with pneumonia, and her understudy, whom she had struck in a jealous rage, was nowhere to be found, that the elder James suggested Judy for the role. And Leonora, tossing feverishly on her bed, cried out as she learned that Judy Patterson was to play her role. Sending for Gerald Taylor whose Rolls Royce had been bought for him by Leonora, the hollow eyed prima donna revealed the irony of fate. And little Judy heard from the dying woman, that she was Leonora's daughter. All Judy's bitterness melted as she saw the hard mouth quiver as it asked for forgiveness, and that night a new star rose in the world of opera. But a month later, Judy made an important decision. It was not a career she really wanted, it was Richard, and happily he took his bride-to-be into his arms.

ENOUGH ROPE

Jerry Drama File No. 10422

THE toast of a cheap cafe in post-war Munich, Laura is seen by Erich, moneyed and middle aged. He falls violently in love with her and fiercely jealous of the other men who drift into and go out of her life, offers Laura security as his wife. Willing to do anything to get out of her present life, Laura consents and as Erich's wife is soon accepted in society. Beautiful, poised, Laura presides over perfectly managed dinners and dances and smiles to her guests while Erich, standing beside her, viciously pinches her arm as he whispers that she is maddening lovely. One night Pauldy, twenty-two year old son of one of her friends arrives and as he dances with Laura, some eight years his senior, falls in love.

That summer they all go to Cannes and since Laura's husband can only get away from Paris for weekends and Pauldy's mother is busy playing bridge and poker most of the time, the boy and Laura are thrown together constantly. They swim, row, play tennis, and drive together and Laura who was at first merely attracted to the boy falls in love with him and lavishes upon him the love she could never give her old husband.

The lovers spend two delightful months and the end comes much too soon. Back in Paris they meet often and Pauldy rents a little home in Passy where they can spend many happy afternoons. Once, however, Erich passes by just as they are entering their house. That night he tells Laura he knows everything and she is to choose between making the boy go to Algeria for his military service or having him know where and how Erich found her.

That afternoon in Passy Laura tries to make Pauldy go to Algeria but he refuses, pleading their mutual love. Back home Laura finds her husband in a fierce state of jealousy. Does she think he married her so that she could continue her old life under cover of his name and money? Is she going back to her old trade? Goaded, Laura slaps him in the face but he only laughs and takes her into her arms, warning her she must send her lover away immediately, or else. . .

That night at the de Chartres' ball Laura dances with Pauldy twice but cannot bring herself to speak. Her husband warns her it is her last chance, they are leaving in half an hour. She goes to the terrace with Pauldy and there urges him to go to Algeria. Why? Doesn't she love him any more? She makes no answer. So that is it! She, the virtuous wife had her little holiday and now she is flying back to the safety of her home. Of course his feelings are of no account, he cannot have fallen in love with her! He rushes from the terrace, then turns back to plead one last kiss. The boy rushes to the ballroom and the husband comes to the terrace. He laughs. What was it like that last parting kiss? Taste it again and he kisses her. . . . . She flinches. He forgot she was not used to being kissed by men, eh! Well here is another kiss and she'd better like it! They leave the terrace, say goodbye to their hostess and go back to the privacy of their home. The door of their bed room closes behind them. . . .

A month later Pauldy's boat sails to Algeria. The boy is at the bar, dead drunk. Laura is at home dressing for dinner, while her husband reads the evening paper. With her head high she goes down to receive her guests. . . .

JUDGE NOT

John P. Martin Drama File No. 10518

YOUNG Minister of the Gospel, Hiram Walton is fired with zeal, and taking over his new offices, he begins a passionate crusade against vice. His congregation listens to his words with mixed sentiments, but when Hiram carries his attack over to personalities and from his pulpit denounces those respectable citizens who are secretly engaged in illegal enterprizes, everyone knows he means Charlie Brown, richest man in town who is a bootlegger on the side. Lila Connelly stops him one day as he is preparing his sermon for the following Sunday and warns him that Charlie will not stand by meekly, but the young Dr. Walton replies that he is not afraid.

Some night later during choir practice, Dr. Walton is talking to Lila when Bessie Norton, the beautiful organist, comes over to say that she will have to be leaving because Mr. Brown, who was to have taken her home has been unable to come and she is afraid of the walk alone. Having no other alternative, Dr. Walton offers to see her home, and as they leave together, Lila shakes her head in a troubled fashion. Bessie lives a mile away past the loneliest part of the town and beyond a tract of timber. Suddenly Bessie stumbles and claiming she is unable to walk on her sprained ankle, begs the troubled minister to carry her. Lila, seeing them thus, is startled, but as they enter the wood, Bessie urges Dr. Walton to stop and rest a moment. The moon makes the spot enchanting, but Hiram pushes on. Then, seeing a huge rattler he sets Bessie down and advances toward the snake which disappears in the underbrush. Suddenly Dr. Walton is appalled at Bessie's screams as she runs toward her house. Following he calls anxiously, "Bessie, are you all right?" and at last returns dejectedly home. An hour later, he is stunned at the clamor of voices without and learns that Bessie, hysterically has claimed that the minister attacked her, and a lynching party has gathered. Only Charlie Brown's interference saves Walton's life and disgraced, he is lodged in the county jail.

His congregation turn upon him, his fellow ministers revile him, and freed, Walton is relieved of his parish. Only Lila believes in him in the days that follow, Bessie, now with child, becomes a living symbol of his shame, but Lila braves the gossips in her defense of Hiram. Then Bessie's child is born and in her travail she calls constantly for Charlie, and when she learns he has left town, between sobs, she confesses that Charlie is the father of her child, and had promised her a large sum of money and marriage as well if she would accuse Dr. Walton. Charlie is finally brought to trial, and Dr. Walton is offered his Church back. However, he receives a better offer from another parish, and leaving, he calls on Lila. With tears in her eyes she wishes him well, but Hiram asks if she will come with him, as his wife, and crying a little for happiness, Lila accepts.

EYE WITNESS

Joseph Panello Drama File No. 10550

THREE people are startled when they read the newspaper account of the coming marriage of Dirk Fallon, irresistible but ruthless scion of a wealthy family, to Iris Marne, pretty heiress. The first is Albert, young law student who works in a drug store to help defray expenses. Penniless as he is, Albert has long worshipped Iris from afar, saving every society clipping about her. The second is Ellen, Dirk's mistress, a little waitress whom he has seduced. The third is Richards, a gangster, who has just been released from prison to-day having served his sentence for attempting to assault Dirk who has ruined his daughter. During Richard's prison term his daughter has died and now, everything gone, Richards swears to make Dirk pay.

The bell rings in Dirk's apartment. It is Ellen. Biting his lip, Dirk tells her he is busy right now and to get rid of her promises to take one of their picnics together on the outskirts of the city. Because she wants so much to believe in Dirk, Ellen goes home, puts up a basket lunch, and deludes herself into believing Dirk's explanation that the notice of the marriage is just a newspaper publicity stunt. As Iris enters a moment after Ellen has gone, Dirk breathes a deep sigh of relief and while he kisses his fiancee, he tries to think of some way of getting rid of the little waitress. The next day he meets her at their favorite spot and smiles grimly at Ellen's lunch and the camera she has brought along—"like old times." He decides to give her one happy afternoon and then pay her money to go away. As he is chopping wood for the fire, however, he hears a noise and turns in time to see Richards, who has followed vindictively, point a gun at him. With a catlike leap, Dirk kills Richards with the axe, and shuddering draws the body out of sight so that Ellen won't suspect. However, she has come to take a surprise picture of him chopping wood, and witness to the ghastly crime, she has unwittingly snapped the scene. Neither can go on with the party although Dirk does not suspect Ellen has been witness to the murder. As he takes her home, he gives her the money he has prepared for her, and tells her to go away and begin life again with somebody else.

Ellen discovers that she is going to have a baby but when she calls Dirk she is told he is out. She calls for her pictures and Albert, who is behind the counter explains that she has gotten a double exposure of two men on the same picture. Startled Ellen looks at the picture and realizes she has proof of Dirk's guilt. Albert rushes to her as she sways faintly, but she recovers and leaves hurriedly. Downstairs in the rain she waits for Dirk and tells him if he doesn't marry her now she will show the picture to the police. Dirk, trapped, promises, but meeting Ellen, he murders her and tears the picture into a thousand pieces. The next day Albert reads of the murder of the little waitress and recognizes her as the girl who left her pictures behind. All are there except the doubly-exposed picture. The police are baffled by the crime, but Albert has the negative of the missing picture redeveloped. This he turns over to the police who seize Dirk and break down his alibi under grilling. And Iris' father, prominent Attorney learning that the boy is soon to graduate offers Albert a clerkship in his law office, and in Albert's heart there is a song, for now he can at last be near Iris.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE

(TRADE MARK)

VOL. VI NOVEMBER-DECEMBER, 1933 No. 6

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 10863

AT the Hollywood studios where Carl Delancy is a stunt flyer and Gloria Ford is a glittering star, they meet and fall deeply in love. Gloria soon realizes that Carl is allowing pride to stand in the way of their happiness and she tries to convince him that nothing is so important as their love. Carl decides at length to win some publicity for himself so that he can earn enough money to meet Gloria on her own grounds. Accordingly he sets off in a plane he calls "Hollywood Folly" to break the flight-around-the world record. He crosses the Atlantic without mishap, but his arrival fails to stir Paris and he wins an obscure notice in a corner of the newspapers. Pushing on he reaches the Coast of Africa and as he is winging over the Dark Continent, flies into a great lightning storm. Compelled to make a landing, he comes to earth near Camcinbar where a tribe of ignorant blacks have been holding a savage ceremony to appease the ire of nature. At first appalled by the strange visitant from the skies, the natives rally and surround the plane. The storm ceases and the blacks imagine the white man whom they take to be a god has interceded in their behalf. Taking him in tow, they make him a prisoner extending him every hospitality. The witch doctor warns them that if their God escapes, the storm will return and the whole tribe be killed by its fury. Every day at daybreak, the tribe worships Carl and offers him human holocausts. In vain he tries to escape and at length, resigning himself, determines to better the tribe. To show his divine power he pulls his automatic cigarette lighter from his pocket, easily bewildering the natives with his magic. Under Carl's direction the tribe soon becomes Christianized, giving up its human sacrifices, and building a temple to Christ in the jungle. The neighboring tribes become jealous and learning that everything has been brought about through the white God unite in a single bloc to kidnap Carl. War breaks out. During the heated battle, Carl tries to escape only to discover to his overwhelming disappointment that his plane has been irreparably damaged by curious natives. At length, however, he seizes a canoe and paddles rapidly down stream. The river carries him out to sea where he is picked up by a Moorish pirate ship and carried to Morocco. There he explains his plight but is held for ransom. However, at the threat of the United States government, he is released, the bandits are made an example of, and Carl is given a plane with the compliments of the Spanish Government. He returns home for a triumphant welcome, and upon going to his room to rest, is disturbed by a knocking at the door. He finds himself the recipient of dozens of attractive offers to write and act in the strange drama of his life, but, discovering that Gloria's popularity is waning because of poor vehicles, Carl refuses to accept any contracts unless Gloria plays the leading role in his film. And the new co-starring team of Gloria and Carl makes its first appearance before the public in the roles of very happy bride and groom.

VEILED SINNERS

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 10863

WRITER of strangely involved novels, Robert Langdon is vacationing at Atlantic Beach when he meets Dinorah Collins, a beautiful widow. Attracted by her charms and her brilliant mind, Robert pays her court. Subsequently he comes to meet Dinorah at her hotel one day, only to stare in amazement at the beautiful young girl standing beside her. Robert is introduced and learns the girl is Ann, Dinorah's daughter, who has taken a run up from boarding school. Ann receives daily calls from Bud, a college lad who loves her, but having seen Robert, she becomes so infatuated she has no further use for the youngster. Dinorah sees the danger and warns Ann. But the girl beside herself in her adolescent love, quarrels violently with her mother and finally returns to school. Robert, at first disappointed that Ann should have left, soon becomes resigned, and without the distracting nearness of Ann's vibrant young body, Robert again comes to Dinorah who loves him sufficiently to forgive everything. At length Robert and Dinorah are married. Robert gets a commission through a newspaper to write a series of stories about Paris and amid a fanfare of publicity leaves. However, when Ann reads that Robert is sailing, utterly unaware that he is married to her mother, Ann takes passage on the same boat, after a furious battle with young Bud, who tries to save her from her indiscretion. At first Robert is going to tell Ann he is her stepfather, but as he realizes that she is romantically in love with him, and as his eyes trace the lovely contours of her beautiful young body, he withholds the information and being an opportunist, agrees one night to be married to Ann by the captain. Soon his head clears of the champagne he has been drinking so heavily and he realizes he has committed bigamy. Distressed he determines to have the marriage dissolved. He soon discovers how little he has in common with the youthful Ann, but when she discovers she is going to have a child he knows he is trapped. In his cowardice he determines to return to the United States, providing well for Ann to stay on in Paris until after her baby is born. Ann at first rebels tearfully, but unable to make the ocean trip at present she agrees. Robert returns to the States. He determines to run up to see Dinorah and ask for a divorce. However, having fortified himself too well with drink, his car crashes before he can reach her apartment, and with a sardonic smile on his lips as if he realizes the deplorable jest he has played, he dies.

Months pass. It is Decoration Day and Dinorah goes to strew flowers on her husband's grave. Meanwhile Ann, having returned to the United States with her baby, comes too to pay her respects to Robert. The two women meet and after a strained silence each reveals she is the wife of Robert Langdon. As full realization of Robert's gross deception comes to them, they cling to each other and weep, in that moment every bit of love for Robert, dying out of both their hearts. Reconciled, Ann and Dinorah return together, and in time Dinorah is to insure Ann's happiness by finding Bud and bringing him back to Ann. And held closely in Bud's arms, Ann is to know refuge at last for herself and her baby, while Dinorah smiles wistfully upon their joy, knowing that for her Robert will always be a diabolic but magnificent memory.

OTHER MEN'S MORALS

Hildo Dejardin Drama File No. 10715

DESPERATELY in love with Victor Marlowe, a young artist, Gloria Williams, his model learns his wife refuses to grant him a divorce. Although Victor dejectedly tells her he has no right to accept her love, Gloria silences his objections with her kisses. Soon, however, she discovers she is going to have a child and rather than let Victor reproach himself, she quietly drops out his life.

One day at the factory where she has found work, Goria faints as Henry Carlton, the wealthy owner is passing. While the others crowd about sympathetically, Henry, always a great poseur, orders Gloria to the hospital and asks that the bill be sent to him. Weeks later he visits her and falling in love with the girl's remarkable beauty, asks her to marry him. At first hesitant, Gloria accepts to insure the future of her son. However, from the first Henry makes her life miserable with his jealousy and even resents her love for her baby. Then one day she meets Victor who has been searching for her ever since he has freed himself of his wife. But Gloria tells him it is too late now, she is married and has a child. Victor leaves. Some days later, however, Gloria is appalled at the discovery that her child has been kidnapped. She does not suspect that Henry, wildly jealous, has superintended the kidnapping and has placed her child in a religious school in Paris. The boy is to be released upon his majority and informed that he is an orphan. But for all his careful planning Henry is unaware that the infant bears about his neck a miniature of Gloria painted and presented to her by Victor Marlowe.

Nineteen years pass. All Paris has heard of Maurice Le Banc, who in a religious school has developed a remarkable artistic talent. At an exhibition the wealthy traveling American, Henry Carlton, buys Maurice's enlarged portrait made from the miniature although Henry fails to realize the painting is done by his wife's son. Henry arranges to have his own portrait done by the young artist. Meanwhile, Gloria entering her house, sees the painting and realizes intuitively its origin. She prepares to visit Maurice at once and investigate. A discussion with Maurice rapidly convinces her not only of Maurice's relationship but of Henry's guilt. She embrace her son with all her pent-up love, but Henry enters and enraged with jealousy, kills "her lover" before her very eyes. Glassy-eyed Gloria stares at her son's body, but when Henry is led to trial his lawyer paints Gloria as a wicked woman who has been caught in flagranti. No jury, he pleads, would convict a man for killing his wife's lover. Dully Gloria takes the stand but as she faces the hostile eyes of the jury she tells her story from the beginning. Henry winces as the jury returns and sentences him to death.

Brokenly Gloria returns to her hotel room where Victor awaits her. "I came," he explains softly, "the moment I heard." Gloria sways and Victor catches her with infinite tenderness. "Victor," she moans, "our boy . . . " His long slender fingers smoothe her hair. "Not now please, Victor," she pleads, and as she closes her eyes and sits very straight, a tiny figure of tragedy, Victor says softly, "I'll come back for you Gloria," and the door closes leaving Gloria alone with her grief.

I KILLED HIM

Edward Tolen Mystery File No. 10673

ACROSS the breakfast table, Lillian looks adoringly at her handsome father and as he finishes his coffee, jumps up to drive him to work in her roadster. At the office she leaves him with a kiss while Mr. Openheimer importantly enters his place of business and nods slightly to his deferential employees. His secretary, placing his letters before him, reports that his son George is doing exceptionally well in the business, and as Mr. Openheimer approves the accounts, the secretary reminds him that the girls are coming up to-day to be interviewed. Mr. Openheimer again asks if she doesn't want to come back after she is married, but the secertary, looking down, replies, that her fiance will not stand for his wife working after she is married. Girl after girl is turned down, but the moment Mr. Openheimer sees Helene Doran, his eyes light up and she is hired. George, passing through the outer office, stares for a moment in admiration of his father's new secretary, and she is similarly attracted. Instantly they recover and both smile as George proceeds into his father's office. In a few days that follow, George captivated by Helene, asks her to lunch, but she replies that she doesn't think his father would like it, and refuses. Meanwhile, Lillian grows more and more attached to her father and when several of the boys she knows plead their love for her, she refuses them because none can take her father's place. Several days later Mr. Openheimer loses his temper at a minor fault in his gardener and fires the hulking negro. In a paroxysm of rage he returns to the house and only Lillian can comfort him. The next night George stops his father in the office and stammeringly advises his father to retire since the business seems too much for him lately. Giving way to a burst of temper, Mr. Openheimer accuses his son of trying to run him out of business and with a violent, "No!" leaves for his club. Irascibly he seats himself in his favorite chair and when his competitors good naturedly jibes him about his business acuity, Openheimer rushes at him so violently that fellow club members separate the two and an enmity that has slumbered for years is rekindled. Only at home with Lillian murmuring her faith and trust in him does Openheimer relax. Then, rising brusquely he goes out for a walk, the thought that he is growing old preying on his mind. In passing cars he sees men older than himself with richly jeweled girls his daughter's age, and lost in thought he returns home. The next day he keeps Helene with her work and when the office is deserted seizes her in his arms. Shocked she struggles with him and darts out of the office, her agitation observed by the elevator man and newsboy. Minutes later Lillian who has come to call for her father, shrieks as she points to his dead body. Among the suspects are the fired negro, the business competitor and the secretary. But when guilt points at Helene, George dramatically confesses he killed his father. The jury finds him guilty but a woman screams and mounting the stand, Lillian hysterically admits that the shock of witnessing her father's attack on Helene had caused her to kill him with the paper knife. Insane from grief, Lillian is taken in custody and with George's arm about her, Helene leaves the court.

THE DEVIL FINDS WORK

Edwin J. Davis Comedy File No. 10690

SATAN sat in his office gromily regarding the ticker tape that covered the floor. If only, he thought, some of these bears and bulls might come to dwell in Hades! The telephone interrupted his delicious revery and Satan rang for his Secretary of War, a former Chicago Hi-Jack king, who cheerily reported there was a bunch of new recruits in the receiving room. To reach the reception room, his Satanic majesty had to pass through the heating plant of the Underworld. Sweating engineers directed madly shovelling crews but Lucifer entering, shivered and complained of a draft. Discovering that the temperature was only 200, Satan roared, "Some nitwit was let his fire run down!" A search of the premises revealed the culprit, Machine Gun Al, asleep in a corner. Unceremoniously Al was hustled to a cell to await trial for endangering his Majesty's life by allowing Hell to freeze.

Entering the reception room, Satan returned the salute of his soldiers with the traditional thumbed nose and surveyed the recruits dubiously. One impressed him favorably—an Efficiency Expert who had been run over by chance. "An accident, eh," sympathized Satan, "my, and you so popular!" One dizzy blonde with a remarkable criminal recrod, had been electrocuted for shooting her husband. "He was a guy I was suing for breach of promise, and he double crossed me," she explained. "The bum married me." Satan tugged at his mustache reflectively as his eyes travelled down. "I need," he said," a new secretary. Report to-morrow."

The next day was trial day. In his own defense Machine Gun Al explained on the stand that he had taken time off to think. Hell ought to be modernized. Followed a long spiel, and Satan took the Efficiency Expert and Al in chambers where he learned that with the proper boilers they could cut down half the help and reduce expenses. Outside Al divided Satan's cash for a dozen boilers at $10,000 each, with the Efficiency Expert. "Those boilers," he grinned, "only cost five grand each. He sure is a sucker."

A few days later, Satan pressed the button starting the works. But despite the lay off of 660 men in one room alone, the Efficiency Expert explained that he had to hire an Engineer at a hundred grand a year and the oil costs more so the saving was not $150,000 but $5,000 on an investment of $120,000!, Followed new efficiency methods in other departments. Everywhere workers were laid off but the profits somehow failed to materialize. Then The E. E. and his brain trust fired the Navy and built bridges across the oceans, fired the Secretary of War and laid off the army, of the Treasury since there was no more money, and the Secretary of Labor because no one was working anyway. "But," protested, Satan, "These are the men who elected me." When they had all gone. Satan tried to borrow a dime from Butch. He had, he explained, been King until the E. E. laid him off. But Butch had an idea he could get his Majesty a job. "What doing' haunting a house?" asked Satan in a discouraged voice?. "Naw, better'n that." Two months later Satan gloomily inspected the label of a bottle that bore his picture in red. "Just think," Satan muttered, two months ago I was a king in my own right. Now I'm just a trade mark for a guy that manufactures bottled water." "That," grinned Butch sitting nearby, "is the Hell of it!"

BODIES FOR SALE

E. L. Connell Drama File No. 10688

FROM infancy every whim and desire of young Thomas Van Dyne had been indulged. Only the influence of his wealthy father had gained admission for him in a medical school after his erratic record at college, but in young Thomas the one desire to be a great surgeon and hold a man's life under his knife burned fiercely and his grades in his science courses had always been excellent. During a vacation from school, Thomas was driving his high speed roadster through a small town about a hundred miles from his home when his motor developed trouble. Impatiently he strode about while the mechanic tinkered with the engine. Then suddenly his eyes fixed on the daughter of the garage owner, Velma Hoskins a tall graceful girl. Instantly alert to adventure, Thomas strode over to her and while Velma dropped her eyes becomingly, Thomas paid skilled compliments. Her father, looking up from the car, advised Thomas to wait over night to test the engine, and with a sceond glance at Velma, Thomas agreed. That night Velma raised adoring eyes to Thomas who represented to her all the romance for which she had been starved. The next morning Thomas rode away promising to return. Back at home, however, with his own friends, he soon forgot his brief escapade with the small town girl, while he danced with Patricia Trent, lovely heiress. As she sipped her cocktail Patricia laughed deliciously at the thought of playboy Van Dyne working among dead and diseased bodies. Thomas begged Patricia not to toy with him and as he kissed her beautiful provocative mouth he made her promise to marry him.

Several months later, working in the laboratory, Thomas smoked cigarette after cigarette as he faced his first actual dissection. Some of the older men warned him he'd probably get ill the first time but he'd get over it. Reading the tab of his stiff he saw, "Female. Death from childbirth." Then as he removed the sheet he gave an agonized cry —the body was that of the once beautiful Velma. Pale and haggard, he investigated and found out it was the usual story of the betrayed girl, ejected by stern father. The baby would be put in an orphanage. Face to face with the consequences of his irresponsibility for the first time in his life, Thomas decided to look after the child whose unwanted presence in the world he had brought about. Hiring a girl whose quick sympathetic eyes seemed to take in the situation at a glance, Thomas decided to save little Janet from growing up in the grim walls of an asylum. As the days passed and he grew attached to the little tyke, Laura, the nurse, asked him how his fiancee was going to take the news of the child, but Thomas assured her Patricia would understand. However, when Patricia heard about the baby she laughed shrilly and broke off the engagement. Dully Thomas returned home, and as Laura's eyes met his in understanding, he knew suddenly that it wasn't going to matter so very much about Patricia, because there was Janet,—and Laura.

THE MYSTERY WONDER

Stanley Marty Drama File No. 10636

BATTLING his way against the driving rain, the tall young man made his way to the isolated mansion of Dr. Rudolph Finedorf. Face to face with the scientist, Frederick drew from his portfolio documents crumbling with age and while Dr. Finedorf exclaimed happily over them, Frederick told of his years of excavation in Egypt until he uncovered at long last The Book of Atlantis, The Secret of Life and Death. The next morning, refreshed by a long sleep, Frederick found the doctor still engrossed in the yellowed pages, which crumpled to dust even as he held them. Drawing up blueprints, the doctor gave them piece by piece to different machine shops and weeks later Frederick and the doctor assembled the curiously wrought device. Drawing forth one dead and one live dog, a similar pair of cats, and another pair of tigers, the doctor, trembling with excitement turned the powerful ray upon each of the pairs in turn, and to the amazement of Frederick and the gratification of the scientist, those that had been dead before now breathed, while the others were stark and stiff. Ordering Frederick to throw the dead animals into a fiery crucible, the doctor rubbed his hands together exultantly.

Reading of the remorse of a millionaire whose daughter had killed herself when her father annulled her marriage to a chauffeur, Dr. Finedorf offered, for the sum of one million dollars to restore Jesse Trent to life. With mounting doubts, the millionaire gave his daughter's body to the scientist and even as he waited alternately blaming and being blamed by his wife for permitting such experimentation, Jesse walked from the chamber alive. Jesse returned to her husband, but Frederick rebelled against killing the other woman and refused to be thoroughly appeased even when the doctor poohed the charge of murder and explained that an ignorant servant girl had been remade into a beautiful and well loved society woman. Meanwhile the press printed column after column of comment, calling Dr. Finedorf a charlatan. Enraged, the doctor arranged a public demonstration. Using the corpses of a beautiful courtesan who in life had been branded heartless, and a millionaire philanthropist, Dr. Finedorf secured from the state a condemned ax murderer who was to have been electrocuted in any case, and a girl who begged him to take her for ten thousand dollars since in life she was useless because of her hideously deformed body. Frederiok begged the doctor not to kill the hunchbacked girl who would give her life to get money for her mother, but Finedorf accused Frederick of being a sentimentalist and proceeded inexorably. Before an amphitheater of absorbed spectators, Finedorf invited his medical colleagues to assure themselves of the lifelessness of the corpses by piercing their hearts. Women fainted. Men paled. The current and eerily beautiful ray were turned on and soon, before the aghast eyes of the watchers, the actress and the philanthropist twisted and struggled as they returned to life again. Honored now, Finedorf ordered Frederick to throw the dead bodies into the crucible together with several parts of the machine which he would replace when he wished to use it again. While Frederick pleaded that the doctor was playing with souls as well as lives, Finedorf, exulting over his success, murmured that he had destroyed all the prints and now he alone knew the secret of life and death. Hours later, the world was shocked to learn that the once noted philanthropist had, in his new form, murdered the celebrated Dr. Finedorf with an axe! Brokenly Frederick walked toward the river, only to be met by the street walker with the soul of the martyred hunchback. And as her eyes filled with pity for him, Frederick suffered her to lead him away from the river.

HASH

Kathryn P. King Comedy Drama File No. 10623

"THUNDERATION! HASH AGAIN," There was dissatisfaction among the inmates of the Old Folk's Home, and John confided to the other three Jays, Joel, Jake and Jesse (ranginng in age from seventy to eighty four) that he was tired of the food, tired of being told to wash his hands and comb his hair, the others agreed with him even to the point of running away. Only Jesse seemed a little wary but when the others chided him for thinking so much of the red haired waitress that he didn't want to leave, Jesse too joined forces with the others. The next day John slipped away from the grounds on a little investigation exploration and returned elated over the finding of a deserted shack which would, he was convinced, do nicely. For a few days nothing more was said. Then on Tuesday—Hash! Looks passed between them. Jesse looked too but he ate more than usual that night while the others glared. The next morning first one and then the other confessed he had a headache and went off by himself. When lunch time came the four Jays were conspicuously absent. When the red haired waitress heard she laughed and said, "I heard them planning for weeks. Don't worry they'll come back," and the authorities, finding out where they were decided to let the boys rough it for a little while.

Meanwhile at the shack the four runaways sheepishly speculated on the effect of their departure. Jesse seemed inclined to relapse all too frequently into nostalgic references about how happy they had been at the Home, but the others violently silenced him and John took out some food which the others made a dive for. "Better than hash," was the unanimous verdict. But soon Jesse complaining there wasn't enough shade and the flowers would probably aggravate his hay fever. Flowers! John had an idea. They'd sell flowers on the road. All morning the four picked black eyed Susans and passing motorists, touched by the hard luck stories told them would pay more than they were asked for the posies. Joel, more aristocratic looking than hte others, made more money, and in violation of their promise to share all they made, hoarded his earnings in an old tin can and buried it in back of the house. Soon Fall came. The flowers died. The Jays began to grow testy and secretly long for the Home. Jesse quarreled with everybody and one day disappeared. The others were surprised, envious, annoyed, and Joel, who discovered that Jesse had vanished with his money, was furious. But he dared not ask for sympathy from the others since he had agreed to share everything and had no business burying the money in the first place. At last, each longing to return to the Home, they decided to go back merely to report Jesse's disappearance. The superintendent tried hard to keep a straight face as the fellows sheepishly assured him they had only come to report Jesse's absence. Their interest in the red haired waitress betrayed their home-sickness, however. Then came a knock at the door. From the ground up the three stared at yellow shoes, striped trousers. striped vest and coat, and blue and white shirt. "Jesse!" they gasped while Joel glowered and Jesse grinned. They'd stay, they said, only for lunch. What was there for lunch today? Today is Tuesday . . . . "Hash," the three cried, "Hooray! Come on, fellers, Hash!"

BLAME

Mary Sceeles Drama File No. 10602

LIGHT hearted, gay, Lynn smiles at her serious-faced bridegroom as he bends to kiss her. The townspeople shake their heads in grave misgiving, as they talk of the city girl Will brought home as his bride, and Will's mother accepts their sympathies with a show of resignation that confirms their suspicions. From the first Lynn finds her every action open to doubt. When the baker shows her a cake he has made specially for her, the other customers sniff and exchanges glances. When the laundry man comes down the drive, the gossips look at their watches to time his visits, and Lynn begins to rise in rebellion against the hostility of the town. However, when, one day, hurt by the open sniff of her next door neighbor, Lynn cries a little on Will's shoulder, he holds her stiffly and advises that she be a little more discreet about her actions. Incredulously Lynn springs free, and in a broken voice cries, "You too, Will?" But in the weeks that follow she is to learn that jealousy is growing by leaps and bounds in Will. When she is out shopping, he demands a full account of her day and frequently he waits outside the door, listening, before entering. Even after her children are born, Will continues to regard his wife with suspicion, and when little Dorothy comes down with pneumonia Lynn frantically urges that they get a specialist. However, the small town people including Will's mother assert that the village doctor is fully as competent as any city educated fellow and only when her daughter begins choking, does Lynn frantically send for the specialist. Dr. Fellowe examines the child and straightening up says, "You should have called a specialist sooner." Lynn is heartbroken, and when the child dies, Will sits apathetically at the window while the doctor comforts the stricken mother. Even in her grief, Lynn is exposed to the gossip of her neighbors who tell each other that it isn't natural for a mother not to cry. Will, himself, not understanding her grief is too deep for tears looks at her accusingly, and Dr. Fellowe. leaving, stops to tell Lynn that she is too young and beautiful to have to bear all this. In her great sorrow, Lynn doesn't realize the young doctor is in love with her, and with a last handclasp he leaves her. However, Will's mother who has been gradually breaking down her son's faith in his wife, now makes capital of the Dr. Fellowe episode and the weak willed young husband, at last believing everything said against his wife, waits until she returns from Church and then before her very eyes swallows poison and dies, accusing her. Thereafter, Lynn is openly shunned by the entire village, and Will's mother who is directly responsible for the tragedy, tells her she needn't expect any sympathy.

Lynn leaves town with her son and manages to get a position. However, in her efforts to forget, she overworks and at last is taken to a hospital. It is there that she meets again Dr. Fellowe and as he learns bit by bit how much Lynn has suffered, he takes her in his arms and tells her tenderly that he asks nothing more of life than to make her and her child happy, and for the first time in many years Lynn feels the happiness that is every woman's birthright.

BACK FROM HELL

Joe Carm Drama File No. 9054

FOR years the dearest wish of Tony Peppini's life had been to own land of his own, and succumbing to the sales talk of the unscrupulous Lorenzo, Tony exchanged the savings of a lifetime for the deed to what Lorenzo described as a beautiful farm land. Elated Tony packed his meager possessions and with his wife, Angela, and his son, Tony went forth to settle down on his own property. When at length the little family arrived at the place that was to be their home, they stared in dismay at a strip of soggy swamp land. Brokenly Tony returned with the deed to Lorenzo only to find him gone, and as he slowly returned to the swampy lot, Tony decided to wrest from the sodden earth the homestead of his dreams. For years Tony worked night and day and as little Johnny grew into manhood, he too slaved to make the harsh ground yield a living. Neighbors shook their heads and claimed it was a fruitless labor, but the Peppinis had their dreams and at length slowly the bog began to flower under the patient tilling. Flowers grew in the filled in soil and vegetables health-giving and valuable broke through the ground. When the Williams, the only ones to encourage the little family, came to visit, they were astounded at the change and loud in their congratulations; and as young Johnny found himself falling in love with Carmelita Williams, the elders nodded in approbation. Then the blow fell. One day Rosetti, one of Lorenzo's dissolute relatives, arrived and ordered the Peppinis from their property. When, astounded, they refused to leave, he told them that Lorenzo had left years ago and his property, no record of whose sale was available, reverted to Rosetti. Excitedly Johnny consulted a lawyer and found that Lorenzo had arranged the sale of the property in so faulty a manner that unless proof of the actual sale was forthcoming, nothing could he done to prevent Rosetti from seizing the land. The deeds Tony held would not be recognized in a court of law.

Not only were the Peppinis penniless but without the land he had slaved for, the land every inch of which he loved, Tony was unwilling to go on. Losing all interest in everything, the old man went about dazedly and Angela proved little better. Johnny tried to induce Rosetti to let them buy back the land, but he fancied it himself. With a fierceness born of desperation, Johnny began a search for Lorenzo and at length traced him to a tropical country whence he had fled from the law. Despite Carmelita's pleas that money meant nothing to her and she would marry him even if he were penniless, Johnny put her gently aside and said he must find Lorenzo if he had to go to Hell for him. And a veritable Hell the jungle proved. Many times Johnny found himself giving up the search but remembrance of his smitten parents under Carmelita's care made him push on until in a fever-infested hut, Johnny found Lorenzo delirious. With superhuman efforts, he dragged the derelict back to civilization together with a store of ill-gotten gains which had not sufficed to buy needed medical attention in the jungle. Lorenzo confessed the sale had been consummated, and the bank to which the gold bullion was returned gave Johnny a reward for its return. Tony and Angela happily returned to the land once more their own, and Johnny found Carmelita waiting.

THE FIRST WALTZ

H. Alethe Barnes Drama File No. 10597

AT school Betty Blake had adored Fred Hastings, the Senior Class President, who, considering her a baby, had teased her good naturedly. Upon his graduation, Fred had gone off to college and from time to time reports would come to Betty of his prowess n the football field. Then, when he graduated he returned to town. It was at a dance that Betty met Fred again. Selecting her as the prettiest girl there, he had cut in on her, and as the orchestra played, "The First Waltz" Fred had bent to her hair and whispered, "When did you arrive in town?" Betty laughed happily at his distress as she informed him she was Betty Blake, didn't he remember? "I'm never letting you go again," Fred said at last, and taking her in his arms he sealed the compact with a long kiss.

For Betty the next few weeks were a whirl of happy hours with Fred. When Herbert Clark, a boy who had always liked Betty called on her, she was always busy, but one day as she lilted along the street, Herbert stopped his car and invited her in. She shook her head, thinking of the appointment she had with Fred who had something "important" to tell her before leaving town. But Herbert looked so forlorn as he promised he would take her straight where she wanted to go, that wanting everybody to be as happy as she, she got in. To her consternation, Herbert headed out of town, and as Betty pleaded with him to take her back, he informed her they were eloping. Frantically Betty shouted that she had to go back, that she hated him, and when Herbert stopped the car in a lonely spot and drew her into his arms, sobbing, Betty slapped him and ran. Hours later, she arrived home, exhausted and worried about her broken date with Fred. But at home she learned that Fred had waited for two hours and then, saying no girl could give him a stand up, had left. Brokenly Betty tried to explain, but Fred had left town. Weeks later, she learned that he had met a dizzy little blonde girl and married her, believing the ugly reports the vindictive Herbert had circulated about Betty.

Then Betty's father became ill, and when the doctor prescribed a change of climate, Betty was grateful for the opportunity to get away. Securing a position, she buried her pain over Fred's actions by working desperately hard. Several times she was noticed by Frank Bowers, who fell in love with the quiet, hard working girl. One night he asked her to marry him, but although she was found of him, Betty explained it wouldn't be fair since she loved another man. Frank begged her to give him a chance to make her forget, promising that as his wife she could follow her bent for writing and that he would give her everything she wanted. At last Betty accepted and although Frank lavished every tenderness upon her, in Betty's heart there was always the memory of Fred. Then, through her writings, Betty achieved some measure of fame, and when her name was mentioned as sponsor for a charity ball, Fred, who was very unhappy with his extravagant wife, managed to attend. Betty paled as she saw Fred, and Frank, realizing that this was the man his wife loved, managed with a great effort to urge Betty to dance with Fred. The orchestra, bribed by Fred, played "The First Waltz" and as Betty danced in the arms of the man she had so long loved, she heard him whisper the words of love that she had dreamed of. Suddenly, however, she saw Fred for what he was, and as the dance ended and Fred begged her to meet him, she said, I'm sorry Fred I love my husband," and crossing the floor she joined Frank, who smiled at her with a new happiness.

RESTLESS CITIES

Bessie Robertson Drama File No. 10601

THE gruff voice of the farmers demanding food made Doris wince. As she set the dinner on the table and felt the worshipping eyes of Victor, the hired hand, upon her, a distaste rose in Doris and at last feeling she would rather die than spend the rest of her life on here on the farm, never knowing gaiety, the feel of silks, glamorous lights, never knowing life, she decided that she would run away. Her father's voice urging her to stop dreaming and get to work, recalled her to her duties. But that night, with a few dollars in her purse, Doris stole to the door. A shadow made her start, but it was only Victor telling her he knew how she felt, and if she ever needed help he'd be there.

In the city Doris found work in a factory but in a few weeks realized that the deadly routine was in no way an improvement upon the farm. Leaving her position, she sought work and after numerous discouragements found another job. Then one day Gene Wilson, handsome and well dressed saw her. Doris' breath acught, but the girl working beside her warned her not to let Wilson go too far; he had a wife and child. When she finished work that day, Wilson was waiting downstairs for her. A little thril of excitement raced up Doris' spine, but she firmly refused his invitation to drive her home. The next few days Doris looked up frequently from her work to find Wilson watching her and once Doris winced as the sharp voiced superintendent scolded her for something she hadn't done. One bitterly cold morning Doris waited for a trolley but the crowds were so thick she couldn't get aboard. Panicky as it began to grow late, Doris saw Wilson's car passing, and with a start of pleasure, he insisted on driving her to work. Suddenly the motor stalled. Wilson explanied it had never happened before. A half hour later Doris appeared at her desk, but the superintendent told her she was fired, that lateness was not countenanced. Dully, Doris returned home to begin a long and futile search for another job. At length her landlady, tired of excuses, told Doris she had rented the room to somebody else. Hungry, discouraged, Doris heard a familiar horn and saw Wilson at the curb. Excitedly he told her he had been looking for her everywhere, and learning what had transpired as a result of his stalled motor insisted on getting a room for Doris in a hotel. Suavely he told her she could pay him back when she was making money. Grateful for his sympathy, and too weary to object, Doris closed her eyes exhaustedly while Wilson kissed her. In the next weeks Doris was to learn the sting of the world's scorn and when Wilson's wife sued for divorce, Doris' name was dragged through the dust. Listlessly Doris saw her picture spread over newspaper front pages as a home breaker, but as she walked unsteadily from the court, Victor ran to her and as she swayed faintly, his strong arms held her up. On a park bench, Victor told her he didn't care what they said, he loved her, and as timidly he asked whether she thought she could be happy with him on a farm, tears of happiness forced their way down Doris' cheeck. A farm and Victor—rest and happiness.

UNTIL ONE

Wayne Nevin Heist Drama File No. 10617

EXULTANTLY Ned lobbed the ball back over the net and a burst of applause broke from the sidelines. Finishing his game, he accepted the congratulations of the watching students, and walked down the court. A concerted giggle called his attention to the pitiful efforts of a blonde girl, obviously on the court for the first time. He saw her face flush as she recognized the tennis champ, then on an impulse he said, "Be around to-morrow before breakfast and I'll give you a couple of pointers about the game." Already bored as she tried to thank him, Ned went on to his dorm while Wilson, his room mate asked impatiently, "What's the idea. Have you gone gaga?" Ned threw a pillow and proceeded into the shower room.

The following morning Ned was awakened by Wilson's violent shaking, and before he could rub the sleep out of his eyes, he learned that he had succeeded in getting the leading roll in the varsity play. "Lucky guy," Wilson sighed enviously. "I've spent weeks learning every line of the blamed play, and then you casually drop in and cop the ole." A knock on the door brought in Ned's friends, all coming to congratulate him. The first whistle blew for class, and with a start Ned remembered the little co-ed. Swearing under his breath he raced down to the court to find her just leaving. "Sorry," he said. She smiled wistfully eyes suspiciously bright, and in dismay as he realized she was on the point of tears, Ned begged her to let him make it up by taking her to a picture Saturday night. Helen shook her head firmly, but grasping her arm, Ned told her he'd be up at seven thirty. Rehearsals continued. Sally Hicks, most popular girl at the University, playing the leading role opposite Ned, made her kisses realistic enough to make rehearsing a pleasure. Enviously Wilson watched their progress and as they returned to their dorm together, began kidding Ned on the date with the "shy violet." Resenting the date himself. Ned showed no trace of it when he called for Helen and as her eyes sparkled with excitement, Ned found himself enjoying the evening more than he had anticipated. At the door, however, he explained, "I'll be busy with the play," and Helen realizing it was an excuse for not making another date, sobbed a little in her own room. In the next few weeks, Ned saw a lot of Sally. Once, meeting Helen backstage where she was assisting with the designing of the costumes, he was about to ask her for a date, when Sally came along, and linking her arm through his possessively, asked him if he'd drive her home for the weekend. Then, the night before the show, Ned sprained his ankle, after taking Sally to her door. Limping home, his face contorted with pain, Ned found his leg swelling so rapidly that by morning he was utterly unable to step down on it. His part was out of the question. Wilson was hurriedly groomed as his understudy, and Ned's questions were ignored as everyone rushed by the fallen hero. At last, hobbling on a hastily improvised crutch, Ned limped backstage and watched Wilson getting all the honors that were to have been his. He saw Sally look adoringly up at Wilson and as he turned away he found Helen beside him. "Does it," she asked tremulously, "hurt much?" As he looked down into eyes he never realized were so lovely, a great warmth came over Ned.

STUNT FLYER

Samuel Torcaso Drama File No. 10496

"SORRY MISS WHITE, I can't locate Curley anywhere." Worriedly Virginia White paced the floor of the radio room, waiting for the operator to pick up her brother's plane. At length she leaned against the table, restlessly reading the weather forecast. A resounding whack made her straighten up indignantly as she turned around and saw Johnny Larsen grinning at her. As she flared up, he seized her wrists and kiss her, while she scolded. "Where's Curley?" he asked at length, and as she explained they hadn't found him yet, Johnny tightened his helmet, and leaving her, raced out to the field. In the rain the other pilots tried to stop Johnny, but, yelling contact, he started the motor, determined to find his pal.

For hours Johnny flew while Virginia at the airport listened absorbedly to Johnny's racy report. At last he shouted that he could see Curley's plane below, wrecked, and after maneuvering for several minutes landed his plane on the mountain side. It was a three mile hike to Curley's and thoroughly drenched, Johnny searched for several minutes unable to find any trace of the pilot. At last, determined to take shelter he crept into a bear hole only to come tumbling out as he felt something sofe. But a moment later hearing a cough he went in again and prodded Curley into wakefulness. The two elasped hands, swearing in relief, and carrying fuel from Curley's wrecked plane in a boot, proceeded back to the airport. Returning, Johnny flew his plane so low that the two pilots who waved to them were forced to drop into the mud. Virginia ran out to them hugging them both and as they walked home together, Curley told them he was through flying, this was his fourth crash. After some discussion, Johnny insisted that Curley go up first, he had something to say to Virginia, and as he took her into his arms, Johnny asked her to marry him. Upstairs Virginia murmured dreamily, "He's a grand guy." "Yea," Curley replied, "But don't tell him you think so, he's tall millinery ,enough right now." A few minutes later, while having supper, Curley jumped up at sound of a scuffle downstairs and running into the alley found a lad knocked out and some thugs disappearing. With Virginia's help he carried the boy upstairs and between the two of them they managed to reduce the swelling of the lump on his head where the blackjack had caught them. The kid was Francis Shea, a stunt flyer, arrived a few hours ago from Houston, and in need of a job. It was Curley who suggested that Franics sleep over and the next day he'd get him a job at the airport. All that night, however, Curley kept puzzling over Francis, and Virginia razzed him mightily when he observed that Francis was too good looking for a boy.

At the airport they gave Francis a trial and the seasoned pilots whistled with amazement at the figure eights and inverted loops the kid made, and afterwards, in their rooms, Francis took a show and came out smiling. Virginia had gone out with Johnny and Curley was looking at Francis intently. "Why don't you admit you're not what you're pretending to be?" he asked at length, and Francis, realizing that Curley had pierced her disguise, admitted she was a girl but coudn't get anywhere in aviation so had donned men's clothing. In clothes borrowed from Virginia, that night Frances went dancing with Curley and ended up by waking a Justice of the Peace and being married. On the way back she explained she was really the owner of the International Airport but wanted to marry someone who didn't know she rich. "We're married," Curley and Frances reported excitedly to Virginia," "So what?" was the calm reply. "So are we!"

HUMAN BONDAGE

Wymer Lloyd Harrison Drama File No. 10561

THE prison gates swing open and Mike Sloley walks out a free man. But at his own home his bluster vanishes as he learns that his wife, who had begged him not to steal, has, during his incarceration died in giving birth to their son, Dick. As he holds his small child, Mike vows that he will give up his life of crime and in the ensuing months Mike avoids every temptation to go back to his old life and devotes himself wholeheartedly to his lovable youngster. One day his employer sends for him. The other workers look on enviously, but in the boss' office Mike learns that his prison record has just come to light and his services are no longer required. Each of the succeeding jobs he gets ends the same way and at last, growing shabbier each day, he can no longer get work. Dick gets anaemia and the doctor advises good food. Driven to desperation, Mike follows two prosperous looking gentlemen and deftly picks a pen from the pocket of Mackers. "Can you spare a match, buddy?" Mike jumps as he looks into the face of his victim, but a moment later his face blanches as he sees the pen back in Macker's pocket. Mackers extends a card and Mike reads, "Chief of Detectives." Mike pleads his poverty, and suspending judgment, Mackers accompanies Mike home and seeing the guilty man holding his starved youngster, recalls his own baby, showered with every luxury, and giving Mike the pen to remind him of the incident, Mackers leaves believing Mike's promise to go straight. Mike gets a job as a truck driver only to discover after a skirmish with cops, that he had been transporting booze. He quits and from then on he cannot get a job. Hot summer sets in. Dicks ails. But Mike grimly staves off temptation until the doctor says only a change can help the boy. Then, passing by a store that has just been robbed, Mike's resolution fades and he enters. However, at the last moment, he thinks of what would happen to Dick if he were arrested, and turns to flee. Suddenly he stumbles over a dead body and as his hands come away blood-stained, he rushes madly toward the door only Although his guilt of the murder cannot be proved to be caught by a policeman, arrested, and tried. by the eloquent District Attorney Mike is convicted of the robbery and sent up the river for five years.

Upon his release he is unable to trace Dick who has been adopted by Judge Myers, and blaming the law for taking away from him everything, Mike turns ruthlessly to crime. Relentless vindictive, fearless, Mike is soon a gang leader and when he is held for one of the murders he has directed, his lawyers get the case thrown out of court and Mike smiles grimly at this new irony. Then one day rival gangsters open fire on his car. Wounded, Mike seizes a gun and from behind a barrel in an alley defends himself against the men who have him on the spot. Maddened by pain and frenzy, Mike mows down two innocent by-standers and discovers one has the dimpled chin of his son. Brokenly he returns to his room. Mackers takes the case and finds Mike, now a spent, pitable creature. Realizing the law cannot make this man suffer any more, Mackers helps him escape aboard a tramp steamer. Mackers takes a personal interest in the boy, Dick, who slowly convalesces, and months later, Mike, now working in a South American town, receives a letter and a newspaper in which is marked the item announcing the engagement of Dick to Mackers' daughter, Margaret.

THE CRUSADER

Stephen Harnett Drama File No. 10668

ABSORBED in the typing of a fiery editorial against the eviction of the bonus army from Washington, George Banning, editor of The News, fails to notice that Mark Touhy, owner and publisher of his paper is standing over him. As George lifts his eyes, Touhy furiously reprimands him for daring to print an article on rackets and before the gaping copy-writers and rewrite men, delivers a choice lecture to his editor. George grits his teeth and makes no answer while Touhy sails grandly into his inner office. Minutes later, George rises and proceeding directly to the publisher's inner sanctum, waves his arms dramatically and exolaims that he is through being dictated to by a dirty politician. While Touhy hastily dismisses his new secretary, Mary Dana, George warns Touhy that he is going to start a paper of his own and expose all the crooked politics that Touhy is responible for. Despite the publisher's suave warning that Banning may not live long enough to carry his threats into effect, George strides out of the building, and withdrawing his savings of many years, buys a small printing press and begins publishing "The Eagle" a tabloid edition promising a new deal. From the first "The Eagle" courageously attacks the malpractices of the city government and indicates the directions for public reform. The city, eyes opened to the widely practiced frauds, begins to hum, and Banning begins getting threats. Then one day Mary Dana, former secretary to Touhy, applies for a position as cub reporter and is hired. Banning warns her this job is going to be no cinch, but Mary, who has had an unbound admiration for Banning ever since the day he dared to tell Touhy where to get off, promises her loyalty at any cost. The circulation of "The Eagle" grows. George buries himself in work until Mary, concerned for his health, at last takes the initiative in asking him to take a Sunday off with her for a ride into the country. After a moment's hesitation, George consents, and for one whole day both drop all their cares and enjoy hours of complete relaxation. At last they return, but as they reach the city, both stare in consternation at the charred ruins of what has been "The Eagle" building. Mary places her hand sympathetically on George's arm, but he is a man distrait. Silently he escorts her home, and Mary, heart out to him, offers her love to him. George, however is blind to everything except the loss of "The Eagle" and as he grits out, "I'm going to even my score with Touhy—to-night," Mary vainly tries to reason with him. Proceedingly to Touhy's home, George makes his direct accusation, and Touhy, swaying from drink, laughs drunkenly. As George lunges forward, Touhy shoots him and is about to fire again when Mary bursts into the room and shouts, "Father." Dazed, Touhy turns on her, but between gasps, Mary assures him she is really his daughter, that she had only learned when her mother died, that it was Mark Touhy who had deserted and caused the broken life of her mother. Groaning, Touhy falls back heavily in a chair, while Mary quickly bandages George's wounds. Three weeks later, George is ready to be on his feet again. Mary's eyes shine as he tells her her father has offered him his old job back on "The News" again, and that he is to have free rein to express his opinion. Old Touhy withdraws his support from the party which George lampoons into defeat, and George asks Mary an important question.

NOT WITHOUT LOVE

Lillie Lanier Drama File No. 10622

AS the solemn procession of graduates broke up, Ira found Madge and together they walked down the campus. Under the full June moon the words of parting came hard, but at last Ira promised that as soon as he opened his office up at home he would come to Trenton to meet Madge's parents and ask for her hand in marriage.

Meanwhile, in Trenton, Madge's father, Mr. Gervais, had been having increasing financial difficulties. As he sat bowed over his accounts, his secretary announced Harry Nyles, an old schoolmate of his. Well dressed, bluff of manner, Nyles announced that he had been passing through the town and remembered that Gervais lived here. As Nyles talked of his succesful operations on the stock market and hinted that he was "in the know," Gervais' envy grew, and at last he suggested that his friend come home to dinner with him. Apologizing for the humbleness of his little house, Gervais explained that things hadn't been looking any too bright lately, but Nyles quite won over Mr. and Mrs. Gervais by his assurance that the place seemed very cozy. The next morning, the Gervais went down to the train to meet their daughter who was coming home from college. Nyles accepted their invitation to come too, and his eyes fixed on Madge admiringly. Introduced to the house guest, Madge saw at a glance that he was her father's age and promptly dismissed him from her thoughts. A thousand times she tried to tell her parents about Ira, but each time she was interrupted. Scarcely noticing the warm pressure that Nyles gave her arm as he helped her from the car, Madge went to her own room and threw her arms about Elsie, the maid, a pretty orphan who, had been with the Gervais for years. Madge turned up her pretty little nose as she asked who this Nyles was, and Elsie explained that he was a wealthy friend of Madge's father, who seemed to be investing Mr. Gervais money for him. Meanwhile the Gervais were delighted at Nyles interest in their daughter and when he suggested that he would like to make Madge his wife and give her the luxuries she deserved, their joy knew no bounds. However, Madge agitatedly told her mother about Ira to whom she was engaged, and when her mother assured her that Ira was just a child while Nyles could make her happy, Madge gave way to a paroxysm of sobs. Realizing that her parents were adamant, Madge slipped out of the house to meet Ira at the station and inform him of her parent's hostility. However, in his eagerness to see her, Ira took a plane to the nearest landing field and arriving directly at the Gervais home, where met by Mrs. Gervais, he was startled to learn that Madge was engaged to another. Brokenly Ira left. When Madge returned home to learn what had happened and to find that plans for the marriage were being hastened, she locked herself in her room, and when Nyles tried to force his way in, drained the contents of a bottle of iodine. Prompt action saved her life, and during the ensuing weeks, while Nyles unaccountably disappeared, Elsie helped Madge and Ira to elope. Resigned at last, Mrs. Gervais wrote in forgiveness, but as she picked up the newspaper, and read of the arrest of Nyles, a notorious bank robber and confidence man, she sobbed unrestrainedly on the shoulder of her husband, as she realized what a terribled mistake they had almost forced on Madge.

ERRANT WIVES

Lila Jean Bruce Drama File No. 10642

ALL the glamorous dreams of her youth fading as day after day she teaches in the little rural school, Greta longs in vain for some escape. When Olaf Peterson, giant farmer asks her to marry him, Greta at length yields, knowing how gratified her mother will be to know that her daughter has won the richest farmer in those parts. However, Greta is soon to learn that between Olaf's forty-one years and her twenty there can be but little in common, and the great blow falls when Olaf, taken in by a scheme to double his farm, loses everything. Then comes a letter from Greta's cousin saying that there is an opening for a girl in her city advertising firm. To Greta, two years ago, such an opportunity would have meant life itself, now it means some way out of their straits. Accompanied by her husband, Greta comes to the city and secures the post. Each day she hurries home to find Olaf, hunched pitiably near the window, broken by his own unsuccessful search for work. Then one day, as she waits in a drizzle for the "L" train, a tall young man greets her. Greta ignores him even as he explains, laughing, that he has seen her day after day in the office and night after night on the train. He tells her he is John Salerno, and recognizing at last that he is one of the talented poster artists, Greta finds herself laughing at his sallies in spite of herself. However, as she returns to the dejected Olaf she is suddenly aware that John and gaiety are ruled from her life. Thereafter she avoids John asiduously. But several days later, while she is working at the files, he comes to her and chides her for vanishing Cinderalla-like. At length he offers her a position modeling sport outfits for him, and Greta, yields. John is business-like and absorbed in his work until one day at five-thirty as Greta is admiring the beauty that John has put into his picture of her, he seizes her shoulders and tells her he is terribly in love with her. Aghast at the sudden turn of events, Greta confesses she is married, that she has never told him sooner because the agency hired only single women. She resigns her position with John, but she cannot forget him and several days later, when, pale and haggard looking, John stops her on the street and asks her to tell him more about her marriage, Greta realizes that she loves John and he her and the only fair thing is to tell Olaf. When she returns home, however, she finds Olaf excited over the possibility of getting his farm back. Unable to spoil his happiness now, Greta waits until his return only to get a telegram telling her that her brother had met Olaf at the station and crashed the car, killing himself and gravely injuring his mother and Olaf. Greta's heart sinks as she sees Olaf lying in a plaster cast. Months drag by that are agony for her and John. Then Mrs. Murphy, a prying neighbor, whose sharp eyes have seen Greta's renunciation of John comes to visit and leaving, advises Olaf to watch his wife more carefully. Greta stares at Olaf's face contorted with rage as he accuses her and when Greta assures him quietly of her innocence, he raises his mighty fist and strikes her to the ground. Face cut, Greta rises and the door slams after her. Sobbing she runs to John and as his arms fold protectively about her bruised shoulders, Greta knows at last, that with that blow Olaf has forever freed her of his hold. Henceforth she belongs only to John.

TABLE FOR TWO

Gertrude B. Weeden Drama File No. 10635

"TABLE for two, please, two ladies." Alicia winced at her mother's invariable formula, and as the tall waiter pulled out her chair for her, Alicia looked enviously across at the other diners. "Alicia, dear, you're not eating," her mother complained. Alicia groaned. She had every luxury a girl might want, every one save that of laughing, loving, living! In the lobby of the hotel, Alicia listened to the feeble but exquisite note's of the caged canary. A young girl passed, in a chiffon dress, looking up into the smiling face of a youth. "Come, Alicia. You must go to bed. You know the doctor gave us a very early appointment."

At luncheon next day Alicia rebelled. "You have everything," her mother reminded her. "Everything, yes,—but love." Sbocked her mother remonstrated, then rising exclaimed, "There. You've ruined my dinner." With belpless appeal, Alicia glanced up at the waiter. Even he, she felt might understand. Indeed Jacques did, and even dared, "But the mousse, Madame, the young lady might care for that."

Night after night, the girl sat and looked on, dreaming shameless dreams. She flushed as she saw an older man at a table nearby regard her intently. Even he lent interest to these two weeks spent in New York for the care of what her mother vaguely termed her melancholia. At times the girl's eyes and those of the "man across" would meet, and hers would drop under the intensity of his stare. Once, looking down so, she started as upon the table cloth she saw. "Je t'aime." Thank Heavens ber mother did not understand French and the flowers were sufficiently high to conceal the words. All that night she lay awake. The waiter couldn't have delivered the message for there was a strange one that day. So the days passed. The doctor told her mother he couldn't diagnose Alicia's case and suggested a change of climate. That night as she sat down to table, the waiter adjusting her mother's chair, she gasped as she saw anotber message on the cloth. Suddenly she slipped quietly from her chair and lay limp upon the floor. For a moment she wondered how she dared. As the "man across" dashed over to her table, the waiter quickly picked her up and winding his way between the tables carried her to elevator. As the car started, Alicia's mother with the "man across" assisting her hurried up and took the next car. "I'm so happy," Alicia whispered as her mother and the "man across" came up. The tall waiter had laid her on the bed and obsequiously left. Flowers arrived, gorgeous flowers from the "man across." Alicia's mother phoned to her husband to come, then off-handedly to her daughter said, "That man is a gentleman, my dear. And obviously a man of means." Jacques, bringing in her breakfast tray, interrupted. Her mother went to her room. Alone Alicia picked up the single rose and read the note in which Jacques explained that her father was coming to help them out. That meal he had missed had given him time to enlist his aid. He had gotten more atmosphere than he had hoped for when he took this waiter-job and last night, when he returned, he found that his last story was going to be produced this season. It had been Heaven holding her in his arms, and he had meant everytbing he said as he held her. The "man across" next evening found a new flirtation, but Alicia and Jacques, better known to the writing world as Morison Bentley were dining at a "table for two."

BONDAGE

Verna McKenzie Drama File No. 10534

IN the shadows of the oampus poplars, Sallie caught her breath as Steve kissed her. She didn't know how she was going to endure life back at the parsonage without him near, but as he whispered, "I love you," he promised that he'd come to see her as soon as he could. Months of dreary teaching in a one teacher school followed for Sallie, and then at last Steve, and that faint aroma of cigar smoke and bay rum that she adored because it belonged to him. After dreary talk with her family, Sallie and Steve escaped outside and with Steve's lips on hers, Sallie moaned happily. If only they could always go on like this. But when Steve left it was without saying anything about marriage—only that he loved her. "I'll see you in two weeks," he said in parting. But in two weeks the world was blown asunder. War was declared on Germany and in place of Steve came a note telling Sallie that he had joined the marines. Sallie's heart cried out as she saw men and boys leaving for the front, but even as she saw the agony of their last parting with loved ones she knew that Steve wanted to spare her that. Meanwhile there was Tom. Stolid, adoring, Tom owned a large grocery store and again and again asked Sallie to marry him. As the months passed with the terrible record of dead and dying, Sallie felt life slowly slipping by her. Patiently Tom pleaded with her to marry him, and at last Sallie told him she would.

As Tom's wife, Sallie found herself absorbed by his large family. Tom's mother, happy in her acceptance, insisted on doing the work lest Sallie's white hands get rough. As two little girls, Patricia and Margaret were born to Sallie, she realized that she had grown lazy, content, like the other housewives. Tom had built a house for them and everywhere, in the townpeople, in the ladies who belonged to the Bronte Literary Society, Sallie saw the complacency that dulled the senses. Sometimes Sallie thought sharply of Steve, who had returned and was living in San Antonio. Then Sallie was elected delegate to the Affiliated Clubs convention that was to be held in Steve's city. Tom, absorbed in his grocery, insisted that she go, she needed the change. At the side of the two fat delegates Sallie planned her telephone call to Steve. On the hotel mezzanine he met her, and as he grasped both her hands he exclaimed, "You're prettier than even, Sallie." When they parted Steve asked her to meet him at eight. All afternoon she determined she would just say goodbye, but Steve helped her into his car and as he drove out beyond the lights he turned off the motor, and leaning back told her how he had loved her. He hadn't asked her to marry him because he was bead over heels in debt and didn't feel it fair to tie her to a long engagement. Suddenly his lips were on hers. Faintly she cried, "Steve! I must go back." Without a word he turned the car back, but before they parted he begged her to come back. Anytime she called him he would be waiting. Returning to her family, Sallie felt everyone must know she loved Steve, wanted him. But life flowed on. There were routine tasks, the children to take care of, and Tom peacefully going about his work, taking her for granted. Then one day Sallie wrote. "Will be in San Antonio." Sallie's arms were about her. "You'd better go," Sallie gasped. Steve was gentle. "I can go if you want me to, Sallie, but please, please dont ask it." His lips were against her hair. Suddenly she knew she didn't want him to go.

The years that followed were lightened by many fleeting moments with Steve. She knew it was wrong. She was married. Had two children. And Steve was married. "After I found out you were married, I went nearly crazy. I got to chasing around a bit,— well, in fact, she said we would either have to get married or quit, and I thought I might as well," he finished lamely. His wife knew all about Steve having loved Sallie. But no conviction that she was wicked could make her give up Steve. As she sat in the Church and heard the righteous sermons, as she watched the town gossips sneer at a woman who lived openly with the man she loved, Sallie felt that she must rise and tell everybody about herself. But she knew she couldn't hurt Tom and the children. Neither could she give up Steve. Steve. who even after all these years had the power to tear her heart when he was late or couldn't come. And in his arms there was no wrong. She belonged there, even though in her head there was the insistnt voice of her parents' teachings, so far behind her now.

It couldn't go on like this. Something must happen. They would take her children from her, brand her as an adulteress, but she'd have to tell them. Then one day Sallie heard Tom cry out. Rushing to the porch, she saw him bending over the still figure of Margaret. "The doctor! Quick!" Margaret had fallen out of the swing, struck her head. With her child pillowed against her, Sallie rode the long miles to the hospital, hovered over the bed while Margaret called the nurse, "Mother!" and talked wildly. Her pulse failed. The operation took hours. For days Sallie didn't eat, sleep. And when at last Margaret regained consciousness Sallie allowed Tom to take her to a restaurant. Dully she swallowed the food he pressed on her. Suddenly she knew. She would never see Steve again. Nothing could ever have forced her to give him up. Now she was doing it of her own free will. She knew it was right. There was no other way. It was Christmas. With her arms full of packages for her family, she met Steve. Quietly he heard her decision. This then was the end. He patted her hand then disappeared into the holiday crowds. With head held high, Sallie returned home. Tenderly Tom's arms went about her. There was an approving look in Tom's eyes. For one startling moment Sallie wondered if Tom had known all along. . . . . .

MURDER IN THE PENITENTIARY

Harmon Bellamy Drama File No. 10584

WHILE a baseball game is in progress during recreation period at the state penitentiary, four prisoners discuss plans for escape, unobserved by the guards. Bob Davis, a quiet, forceful man, who has never discussed his past life, suggests that Durgin, the Rat, a trusty at this institution, take guns from the warden's office, so that when Durgin faints during chapel Sunday morning, the four will be able to overpower the guards and escape by forcing Doctor Sanderson's daughter, Roslyn, to drive them away in her car; Killer Tim Barclay, vicious murderer and shifty Gentleman Reggy Dumont, a forger and con man, agree to this well developed plan, although ignoring Davis' statement that they must not harm Roslyn. The next morning as Father McNeill addresses the men, the Rat faints, and Barclay attempts to crash the way to freedom by knocking down two of the guards, since Durgin has been unable to supply the guns, as the drawer where there are kept was locked. Barclay shoots one of the guards and slugs another starting a general riot, but order is restored and all are taken into custody at the orders of Warden Thomas Peterson and Deputy Warden Ralph Borden The body of an unidentified man in prison garb is found, and Inspector Blackmer and Lieutenant James Flannigan are called, but records reveal that the murdered man was never at any time been an inmate at the penitentiary.

Examining the benches near the spot where the man was found, they discover one of them free from dust, where his body was obviously concealed. While interviewing Barclay in Durgin's presence, they are suddenly told by the killer of the Rat's original plans, which he failed to carry out, through cowardice; the heart attack was real, brought on by nervousness, although Durgin had abandoned his part of the attempted escape. Blackmer requests the warden to put Durgin and Barclay in the same cell, despite the Rat's fearful protests. Examining the body again, Flannigann discovers that although the uniform is soaked with blood, there are no stains on the floor. Roslyn is questioned, and informs Blackmer that she occasionally stays at the penitentiary with her father, since she is studying medicine, and assists him with his work. Reluctantly, the girl relates that she drove to the Hartman Apartments in response to a note from Jack Harding, a young broker whom she had known for over a year, as he requested her to come, but upon arriving, found anotber note, stating he has been called away, and she returned immediately to the penitentiary. The detectives take the girl to the dead man to she if she can identify him, but a guard carelessly strikes ber with his stick and renders her unconscious as they are on their way. Reggy is questioned, and nervously repeats only the facts they already know well, while Davis coolly states he has nothing to add, and assists the doctor with the injured men. That night the hospital is burned, obviously the work of an incendiary, and identification of the murder man is impossible. When a wall of the cell block crumbles, the men are released, and order restored by Federal troops, but one man is killed. After Barclay almost strangles Durgin, he is put in a cell with Davis, and later found dead; Davis produces a gun, but calmly protests his innocence, and it is discovered he was murdered witb a scalpel. When Davis saves Roslyn from a similar death at the hands of Peterson, the warden confesses that he is the father of Harding and Davis, whose real name is Bob Harding. Bob is serving a sentence for Jack, and Jack came to the prison in Roslyn's car, concealed, in order to force bis father to free Bob. Fearful lest his own criminal past he discovered, the warden kills all who might disclose it. Peterson commits suicide, and as freedom looms ahead for Bob, Roslyn goes to bis arms.

WITH BANNERS FLYING

Albert A. Feldman Drama File No. 10546

THE stands go wild as, after a thrilling battle, the Windsor College Lacrosse team wrests the championship from the hitherto unbeaten Stratford team. With a rush to the fields, the enthusiastic crowd lifts to its shoulders the three stars of the game, Dwight, an English boy, Eddie, of Jewish parentage, and Ahmed, son of an Arab chief. After the game the boys plan a celebration and take in the new show that has just opened. As they sit in their box, Eddie's eyes glow as he watches the graceful body of Virginia Richards, star of the musical comedy, and during intermission when he keeps raving about her Dwight asks why he doesn't send a note backstage asking for a date. Angered by the possessive attitude of George Meadows, an importer who is infatuated with her, Virginia accepts the invitation of the college boys and gets two of the chorus girls to come along on the date. When she returns home, however, after a delightfully gay evening, she finds George waiting for her, jealously. She orders him out of her apartment, but is shaken by his tantrum.

Meanwhile Dwight and Ahmed tease Eddie unmercifully about his love for Virginia and as graduation nears a feeling of sadness comes over the three inseparable friends as they realize that soon they must be parted. Then Dwight learns that English troops are being sent to Palestine to quell distrubances there. He signs up but Eddie is unwilling to leave Virginia. However, George forces his way into Virginia's dressing room and with a mad light in his eyes warns her that if she sees Eddie again he will kill her lover. Knowing that George is soon to leave on one of his trips, Virginia writes a note to Eddie at George's dictation, telling him she cannot see him any more, thinking that will keep him away until George is safely out of England. However, when Eddie gets the note, he distractedly signs up with Dwight and leaves that day for Palestine, grieving at the supposed fickleness of Virginia.

When Ahmed returns to his own people he finds that they are in the process of killing all the Jews. He pleads whole heartedly for Eddie's people and at last succeeds in convincing his tribe that England has not come to grief by being tolerant toward the peaceful Jews and that they would do well to emulate her attitude. However, George Meadows, to protect his own interests which are being threatened by the competition of Jewish merchants, continues to incite the Arabs to revolt and a tribe of them descend on Tel-Aviv where Dwight and Eddie have gone to visit the Iraelsons, Jewish friends of Eddie's family. As the Arabs surround the house Eddie rides to warn the populace, while Dwight, defending Rose Israelson and her mother, is gravely wounded. Ahmed, learning that a portion of his people have been stirrred by lies to attack the Jews, rides furiously and arrives in time to prevent further destruction. Two Arabs are captured and held, but the Jewish rabbis ask for their release. George is exposed, and one of the Arabs he has bribed to incite his people, discovering that George is evading payment of the promised sum, contemptuously kills him. Dwight is nursed back to health by Rose who promises to marry him. Ahmed is happy in the respect of his people and promotes understanding and peace between the Arabs, Christians and Jews of Palestine, while Eddie returns to Virginia and the night her show closes, is married to her in a colorful stage ceremony before a cheering audience.

MARRIAGE FOR LOVE

Alicine Riesenbeck Drama File No. 10492

PEARL HAYDEN is voted the most beautiful girl in the graduating class when she receives her diploma, entitling her to become a doctor. Eager to begin her career, the young woman returns to her home in New Richmond, Ohio, but agrees to help her father in his dry goods store for a few days, since her brother, George, has just been called to the front, and he has found no one to take his place. During a rush hour, Pearl hastens to the front of the store to serve a customer, but when he asks for a cigar, she laughingly replies that he has wandered into the wrong store. Instantly attracted by the beauty and poise of this young woman, the customer introduces himself as Major Bernard Allbright of Virginia, and Pearl, in turn, presents herself to the handsome officer, accepting his invitation to dinner that evening. As they are dancing at the Nelson Rathskeller Club at the edge of town, both confess that they are experiencing love at first sight, which they had never before believed in. When Pearl accepts his proposal, the Major calls at her parents' home, and although they realize there is a great difference in the ages of the two, they consent to the marriage appreciating the fact that their daughter has chosen a man of splendid character.

Donna Grey, George Hayden's sweetheart, is seen frequently in the company of Guy Summers, in an attempt to dispel her loneliness while her soldier boy is at the front. During an important battle, George is wounded, and later taken to the Sisters of Mercy Hospital, where he is cared for by Lily Amcs, an attractive nurse. She falls in love with him, and he feels a deep attraction, but says nothing, remembering Donna in the United States. On the joyful day when the ringing of bells and whistles proclaims Armistice, Guy forges a telegram from the War Department, which declares that George is dead, and persuades Donna to marry him. When she later sees George in the parade of returning soldiers she realizes how she has been deceived, and tells him of the incident; he fights Guy, and leaves them both, but later, Donna forgives her husband and remains with him. Once more safely at home, and welcomed joyfully by his family, George tells his sister of the little nurse in France, and she advises him to write to her, which he does. As the family is seated around the table, George and Pearl pull the wishbone, as they did in their childhood days, and when his sister wins the contest, George asks her to tell her wish, but she refuses, smiling, and asks him to help her fasten her piece over the doorway.

The Major's family bitterly oppose his proposed marriage to a Yankee girl, and, wishing to spare his aged father a shock, Bernard suggests to Pearl that they marry abroad, certain that the necessary ajdustments will be made when they return. She readily agrees, and tickets are purchased for herself and her parents when Colonel Bradshaw orders Bernard to take Major Collier's place during his iliness, for a period of two weeks. As the passages have been booked, Pearl and her parents decide to sail on schedule, to be joined later by the major.

Aboard the Margaret, the Hayden family enjoy the exhilarating tonic of sea berezes, and observe points of interest shown to them by their genial skipper, Captain Gilmore. While the steamer is making a slight detour near the South Sea Islands, as an added feature of the trip, an explosion occurs in the boiler room, and fire breaks out. As Pearl is attempting to help a girl who is under the influence of liquor, her parents are forced into a lifeboat, and taken away. Many of the passengers are thrown into the sea, and Pearl soon finds herself alone with Captain Gilmore, but a falling beam strikes and kills him. Taking his watch as a memento of this kind friend, Pearl loses consciousness as death seems inevitable, but when she awakens again, finds herself safely ashore. David Patterson, a castaway, explains that he saw her drifting on a pile of wreckage, and saved her; he himself had been the only survivor of a small sailing party two years before, and with supplies he had rescued from his sinking vessel, had erected a home on this lonely spot, which he called Wonder Island. David conducts Pearl to his simple cabin, and she is delighted to find many of the comforts of modern civilization salvaged in this isolated bower. Clothing herself in David's apparel, and tying a bit of red from the ship's flag about her waist, Pearl wins the young man's approval in her "devilish gypsy costume." Not many weeks have passed before the couple realize that they are passionately in love, a very different emotion from the tender feeling Pearl has for the major. Holding one another's hand, and promising eternal devotion, they ask God to unite them in marriage, and believe that he blesses this simple, sincere ceremony. A year later, a little son is born to them, and Pearl fashions dresses for him, grateful that there is an ample supply of material in their hideaway. Once more assuming the duties of a minister, David baptizes his child David Patterson Junior, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

Believing her dead, Bernard tries in vain to forget Pearl. While sailing around the South Seas on a vacation, he sees a woman and child sleeping on the sands, and as a storm is arising, hastily seizes them, in spite of their protests. When he recognizes that the woman is Pearl he is overjoyed, but after she tells him the story of her marriage, he refuses to return for David, feeling that the man has betrayed his sweetheart. Returning to New York, Bernard lavishes every attention upon Pearl and her child, and discovers that David is the son of a banker, and was involved in a scandal concerning the depositor's funds, at one time. Telling her this, Bernard persuades Pearl that she must put this man out her mind, although he will see that he is subsequently rescued. Once more, the major urges Pearl to marry him, and she is on the point of accepting when she sees the old gypsy costume in her suitcase which David so loved. Torn by poignant memories, Pearl leaves a note, asking Bernard to care for her boy, and attempts suicide hy leaping from her hotel room. Physicians save her life, but fear that she will be permanently crippled; as she calls continually for David in her delirium, Bernard is advised to send for him, and this he does. When Pearl sees David, rescued from his lonely paradise, she rushes to him, miraculously regaining the use of her paralyzed muscles. Another inquiry discloses that hoth David and his father are completely exonerated in connection with the hank failure, and, since his father is now dead, a suhstantial portion of the funds, recently restored, are turned over to the young man. Rejoicing in Pearl's happiness, the major arranges for a legal wedding between the girl he loves and David. Pearl's life is clouded by the news that her parents were killed in the accident at sea, but she finds her brother wed to Lily, and, with David and her son at her side, feels that she has much to live for, as she faces the future, thankfully.

THE PRODIGAL LOVER

Freemont Lincoln Drama File No. 10508

EAGER for all the experiences life has to offer, Paul does not heed his parents' warnings, particularly when he remembers that his mother, years before had an illicit love affair, which she had constantly striven to atone for, ever since. Ignoring the advice of those who love him, the young man seeks the company of Hazel St. John, who attended the little country school house with him during his childhood days. In order to relieve the monotony of his arduous duties on his father's farm, he frequently calls at Hazel's home; one evening, as he approaches, he sees her in the company of two boys of doubtful reputation, and when he questions her, after they drive away, she answers him with a casual caress. The two walk toward his home together, through the twilight, and rest on a pile of freshly mown hay. Inflamed with newly awakened desire, Paul forgets the teachings of the little white church he has attend every Sunday of his life, and yields to temptation, when Hazel offers no resistance. After that, they are constantly in each other's company, until Paul discovers that Hazel's love is for any man that desires it. Disgusted with this cheap, common girl, he breaks away from her, feeling himself degraded. Shortly after this, a new family by the name of Turner move into the little farming community, and Paul instantly falls in love with Betty, the charming daughter of the house.

When he discovers that Betty returns his love, Paul confesses fully his unhappy relations with Hazel, and his refined and sympathetic sweetheart tells him that he must atone fully for his sin. When he has completely fulfilled past obligations, she will send him a rose, as a token that he may come to her. Striving to live as clean a life as possible, Paul helps his father in the fields, and becomes an example to his younger brother Donnie, who adores him. In recognition of the many fine traits of character he has manifested, the minister allows the young man to take part in a special musical program at the Easter service, with Betty. The night before this happy event, Paul's father is aroused by someone pounding on his door; opening it, he confronts Hazel's brother, Bill, and a gang of his friends, bearing ropes and a horsewhip. Angrily, Bill informs him that Hazel has just given birth to a son, and signed a paper, stating that Paul is the child's father, adding that if the young man does not marry his sister at once, there will be trouble. Questioning his son, Paul's father is told that the story is untrue, and, adding cowardice to his other sins, the boy leaves for the city the next morning. Heartbroken when he finds no mail from his parents awaiting him, and overcome with nervous exhaustion, Paul loses consciousness; when he awakens he is in the charity ward of the city hospital. The nurse soon brings him the desired letter from his mother, urging him to return, especially for Donnie's sake.

Manfully, he drives back to his home as soon as he is able, facing the jeers of the community. Hazel accepts a settlement out of court for her false claims, and gradually, by dint of hard labor and upright living, Paul wins the respect of the townspeople once more. When Donnie brings him a rose from Betty, he hastens to the girl, and taking her in his arms, receives his reward.

TO-MORROW'S BORDER

Agnes Chopp Drama File No. 10526

AS she prays before the statue of the Virgin, little Rita believes she is talking to her own mother, for her father has told her that his dear wife left them with a little child in her arms. Returning home, the little girl sits down beside her two elder sisters, Mary and Frances, Jack, her father's adopted son, and David, the brother who is only a few years older than herself. David and Rita share the same porridge dish, and it is a race to see who will win the largest portion of the food, but as they laugh and shout in childish glee they are severly reprimanded by their aunt, who has unwillingly come to take care of them since their mother died in childbirth the year before. When Tony, father of the little brood, enters the room and sees his youngest child in tears, he sadly reflects on the happiness that prevailed when his heloved wife was mistress of the home, and decides it will be well for him to marry again. Rose, a young woman who lives in the same, small Italian village, becomes his wife shortly after this, and Tony's sister leaves her in charge of the youngsters. Little Rita timidly calls her "mama," but is severely scolded for this, and told that she is not her daughter. As the child is skipping beside her in the field one day she cuts her ankle, but Rose chides her for her carelessness, and Tony realizes that his children have not found a woman who will take their mother's place.

Leaving all his savings with Rose, Tony sails for America, hoping he can some way make his fortune, and bring happiness to his family once again. Instead of caring for the children with this money, Rose spends most of it on herself, and neglects them even more than before, but they find solace in their love for one another, and Rita tries to mother them as they grow older. Tony purchases a little store in New York, but he finds competition with other firms is difficult, and is unable to send for his sons and daughters. Jack finally decides that he will be able to help his foster father in the new country, and, taking all his savings, prepares to sail in the steerage. With tears in their eyes, the children bid him farewell, and he tells Rita, tenderly, that someday they will always be together, as he kisses her. Anxious to be rid of the care and expense of the children as soon as possible, Rose arranges for Rita to marry Thomasino, an elderly widower of doubtful reputation, although the girl is only fifteen. She bitterly protests, but, having no one to whom she can turn, is powerless to alter these plans. Just before the wedding is to take place, Rita receives money from Jack, in America, urging her to sail at once, and join her father. Happily, she complies, and is soon in his arms, as he meets the boat at Ellis Island. With Jack's help, he is soon able to send for the other children, and positions are found for them all, in stores or homes of good reputation. Jack is sent away, when he successfully becomes an engineer, and Lawrence, a young man of sufficient means, urges Rita to become his bride. Believing it is best for her, Tony asks her to accept him, and, obedient to her father's wishes, she consents.

Lawrence neglects and mistreats his wife, reproaching her because their first child, born the next year, is not a boy, but just as she is unable to continue longer, Jack hears of the whole story, and again sends her money. When Lawrence is willing to grant Rita her freedom, she turns to face the future, with Jack at last, and plans are made to unite the little family, once again.

RETAINER

J. K. Miller Drama File No. 10547

AWARE of how beautiful she is, Vivian Lacey feels superior to all the fraternity men at the college to which her wealthy parents have sent her. However, when she meets Frank Wilson, older and sophisticated, her pulse quickens to his skilled love-making and depsite the admonitions of her sister, cuts classes for forbidden hours with Frank. One day he induces her to elope with him and a few weeks later, still in a delirium of happiness, Vivian is crushed by his admission that they aren't really married . She weeps hysterically, but he tells her not to be a fool, that sort of thing is done frequently and a girl of her beauty can have anything in the world she wants. At first loathing her betrayer, Vivian realizes she cannot face her parents and when Frank comes back, having given her time to think it over, Vivian meets him in a dangerously gay mood, telling him she is with him. The next three years Vivian plays the game of making Frank fall in love with her. Her extravagances are calculated to ruin him, and when at last he faces her, pitifully confessing he is broke, but he loves her and wants to marry her, she laughs at him and tells him this is what she has been waiting for.

Casting Frank aside, Vivian uses the allurements she has learned in the last few years to make fools of men. There is no refinement of vice which she is ignorant of, and she conducts a salon called, "The Castle" to which she lures prominent men who can only escape her threats of exposure by paying the exorbitant blackmail. For all her viciousness, however, she is able to command the love of many men and at a dinner one night she is attracted to Philip Morrow, prominent young attorney, who has just won a case by a display of dominant pleading. Vivian tries her wiles upon him but he smiles and advises, "Save that for somebody else, Mrs. Walters, I happen to love my wife." Infuriated by his scorn, Vivian decides to "get him." The next day she appears at his office and asks him to act as her retainer to recover her share of the fortune left by her parents. Philip tells her he is busy with other matters, but she pleads with him to listen to her story and at last tells him her tale of betrayal and desire to go straight. Believing her he agrees to take the case but when she cuddles close to him he tells her he is unwilling to be another of her victims. In a passion of fury for this man who refuses to be drawn into her net, Vivian tries the familiar trick of screaming that he has been attacking her. A hard look comes into Philip's eyes and warning her to be still, he plays back on the dictaphone the entire talk, threatening to prosecute her for blackmail unless she goes. All her hardness drops from Vivian, and she begins laughing hysterically, until she is utterly exhausted. Philip brings water to her and places her upon the couch. Then as she pleads with him, saying for the first time she has fallen in love, she realizes the hopelessness of the situation and turns pitiably, saying she is going back to Frank who has a new racket. It is then that Philip urges her to give up this life and devote her tremendous energy to something constructive. Vivian goes out thoughtfully.

Several years later at a woman's convention, Philip's wife meets Vivian for the first time and as she shakes the hand of the guest of honor, Vivian who has done so much for oppressed women, she says generously, "I envy you for what you have accomplished." Vivian looks over toward the door where Philip is waiting for his wife and shaking her head she replies softly, "My dear, it is you who are to be envied."

WRECKED LIVES

Honore McGuire Drama File No. 10595

SELF-SUPPORTING since the death of her parents, lovely Mona McBride lives with her aunt and uncle and contributes weekly the larger part of her salary. Life is pretty much a dull round for her until through one of the girls who works with her, Mona meets Jerry Wallace, a law student. Jerry, son of well-to-do people is attracted to Mona's prettiness and takes her out, but before long the two young people find themselves in love. At home Jerry sounds his people on the subject of bringing home a bride, but he winces as he discovers how set they are on his marrying a wealthy and well born girl. Mona, troubled by Jerry's kisses, gives her lips to him while he talks of the home that they'll have when he is established as a lawyer and can marry her. Each hour of separation is torture to the youngsters and as time passes their love becomes more and more urgent. Then one day Mona confides her fears to Jerry. Reassuring her, he goes home and tells his people he is getting married, but when they learn who Mona is and that Jerry has to marry her, they denounce Mona as a cheap girl who is trying to catch their son. Jerry defends Mona valiantly, but as his parents point out that if he marries her they will disown him and marriage to Mona will ruin his promising legal career, Jerry weakens. Hours of talk in which his parents convince him that if he marries Mona he will never be able to support her properly whereas if he drops her they will give the girl enough money to make her happy, follow. At last, beaten, Jerry takes Mona to his family doctor, and then leaves with his parents. Unable to comprehend at first that her Jerry has deserted her, Mona listlessly allows the doctor to manage things for her, agreeing to accept the money Jerry's parents have given her, and to put her baby in an orphanage. However, after hours of agony, little Geraldine is laid gently in her mother's arms, and as Mona looks tenderly on the tiny mite who resembles Jerry in eyes and hair, Mona cries that she will never give up her baby. Tearing up the check, Mona, a week later, leaves the hospital and returns to her aunt's home. In consideration of part of the salary she earns, her aunt accepts her, but Mona realizes her aunt hates her baby, and at last, unable to stand it longer, Mona leaves town. The next few years are trying ones for the unmarried mother. She never knows that Jerry, remorsefully, has come back for her but has been unable to find her. Geraldine grows up, shielding from everything by her mother. Many times men whom Mona meets in the business world are attracted to her, but for Mona there can only be one man—Jerry, and all her love is poured on her daughter.

Geraldine, grown, is sent to school, and at last she falls in love with young Stephen Kane, from Jerry's home town. Mona dreads the day when Stephen will discover that Geraldine has no father, and at last it comes. Denounced by Stephen's family, Geraldine creeps brokenly back to her mother's arms. But when Stephen's parents go to their family lawyer to arrange for an annulment of the marriage, Jerry listens to their story with increasing interest, and at last rises and tells them that in interfering with the lives of their children, they are about to make the same terrible mistake his people made. At last Jerry convinces them to let Geraldine and Stephen find happiness together, unhampered and as the youngsters happily leave on their deferred honeymoon, Jerry kneels penitently at Mona's side and begs for forgiveness for all he has done.

HILL GIRL

H. E. Khatib Drama File No. 10360

ON a vacation tour, Harry, young son of the celebrated physician, Dr. Hedley, stops his car when he hears a girl's cries and at first wary of a possible trap, sees that she is struggling against the embraces of the over-alled hired man, Brown. Running across the field, Harry knocks out the man and comforts the shaken girl. All the rest of his trip Harry thinks of the girl but it is not until several months later, in New York, that he accompanies a party of gay people to a notorious and secretly operated night club, and to his astonishment recognizes among the entertainers, the little girl from the hills, Helen. Calling her over, he learns that she had run away from John and Lena, the old people who had brought her up, and starving, had accepted at last a position offered by Frederick, the proprietor of this place. Harry is troubled by the thought of her working here, and when the place is raided, he pulls her out a back door, into his car, and escapes with her. Helen turns to him wistfully. She is utterly without friends or money and she shudders at the thought of having to return to the hills. Harry guesses what a miserable existence she has had at home, and at last rents a room for her and tells her he will get a position. With tears in her eyes Helen thanks him as he secures work for her as a dress model through friends of his, and as he forms the habit of calling for her to take her to dinner and the theater, he falls in love. However, when Dr. Hedley learns that his son is in love with a nobody, a girl who has worked in a night club, he becomes furious and threatens to disinherit Harry unless he drops this friendship. To his dismay, Harry tells his father that he loves this girl and is going to marry her. Whereupon, the noted doctor finds out where Helen lives, and distastefully knocks at her door. She admits him, but when she learns his errand, she is defiant. However, when the doctor tells her that she is ruining his son's life, Helen wistfully agrees not to see him any more and to insure the happiness of the boy she loves, Helen returns to the hills to live with John and Lena. Touched by the girl's spirit, Dr. Hedley offers her money for giving up his son, but she refuses it, scornfully telling him that she is only doing this because she loves Harry.

That night the doctor is troubled and when at midnight he is called out to attend one of his patients, he discovers that Mona Wilton is gravely ill and cries incessantly for her kidnapped child, to whom she insists on leaving her fortune in trust. The doctor shakes his head, but seeing a picture on the dresser, he starts. It is a picture of Mona in her bridal outfit, many years ago, and the face is the same as the girl his son loves.

Returning home, Dr. Hedley finds his son frantic because Helen has vanished, and when the doctor explains his visit to Helen and her promise to return home, Harry cries out. Getting out his car, Harry proceeds toward the hills, accompanied by his parent, and while Harry embraces Helen, Dr. Hedley forces a confession from John and Lena that they had found Helen when she was a baby. Hedley proves that Helen had been kidnapped and abandoned when the search had grown too warm, and returning Helen to her own people, gives his consent to her marriage to his son.

JUNGLE GOLD

William A. Fields Drama File No. 10599

DISTURBED by a long silence following the joyous report that his explorer-father has located a map to pirate gold, young Lew Rankin decides to set off in a search plane. Accompanied by his buddy Bill, Lew takes a well equipped plane with radio facilities, and takes off for the jungle. After several hours of flying over the ocean, the boys discern the wreck of a plane floating below and from it rescue an aviatrix, Wilma Cooper. Having no other recourse, they take the girl with them and learning of their destination she expresses her enthusiasm at the thought of the adventure.

Meanwhile, the Senior Rankin has been captured by the renegade Spike Martin. To prevent the map from getting into the hands of the murderous Spike, Rankin has burned it, and Spike is trying to force the information about the treasure by torture. Although he is on the verge of collapse from torture and starvation, Rankin still insists that he doesn't know where the treasure is, and Spike feeling that if Rankin dies the secret of the treasure will perish, preserves the brave old man's life. Rankin manages to escape from his captors and staggers through the jungle. Helplessly he watches a plane fly slowly overhead, the motor missing ominously. Then he hears the plane land. With his last strength, Rankin manages to make his way to the flying ship and falls into the arms of his son who has come to look for him. As they restore Rankin, he urges them to fix their damaged plane before the natives arrive. Bill and Lew work frantically over the rents and tears in the plane but as Wilma is preparing supper, Lew hears a faint outcry. Rushing to her he finds her fighting off a huge native. Lew struggles with the black and kills him. That night Lew tells Wilma he loves her. The next day Spike arrives and sends his slaves stealthily to capture the brave little band. They are all bound hand and foot and carried back to the cave. Rankin is again tortured to reveal the treasure, while Lew and Bill writhe helplessly. Wilma is carried off and prepared as a sacrifice to the Rain God. However, just as all seems darkest, there is a rumble of planes overhead, and Bill shouts, "It worked." He explains breathlessly that he had radioed for help. Rankin is dropped by the terrified natives and Bill and Lew work off their bonds and free the old man from the vicious grasp of Spike. Lew kills Spike in single handed battle and while Bill is directing the planes, Lew rushes to the aid of Wilma above whom stands a Priestess with bared knife. Inspired by religious fervor the Priestess tries again and again to lunge at the unconscious white girl, but at last she trips and falls on her great knife. Rankin at last reveals the buried treasure whose secret he has kept thus far, and Bill wishes every happiness to his friend Lew, and to Wilma, whom he loves but knows he can never have. And while Wilma and Lew embrace, Bill discusses the division of the treasure with the Senior Rankin.

STRANGE WEDDING

Susie Shelton Drama File No. 10618

On his way to hear the reading of his uncle's will, Paul Temple falls asleep in the train and awakens to find a mysterious letter cautioning him to wear the enclosed charm on the long journey he is about to take. Paul examines the small amulet and pockets it. When the will is read, Paul learns that he is the main benefactor together with his sister who was kidnapped several years ago. A personal letter to Paul directs him to find a map in the back of the mantle clock and proceed with this to find Illa. The letter goes on to explain that several years ago Paul's father and uncle, traveling together along the Amazon, spied upon the sacred temple of Uhl. Captured and held prisoner, Paul's father died of the hardships imposed, but his uncle escaped to civilization and remained safe until his niece was captured and he was warned that she would be kept as hostage for his silence. Proceeding at once to the home of his fiancee, Mona, Paul bids her farewell, and refusing to permit her or his best friend, Tom, to accompany him, leaves for the Amazon in a plane.

Landing his plane reasonably close to the spot the map indicates, Paul is startled by a movement in the underbrush. A slip of paper urges him to advance alone, and, startled by the seeming knowledge of his movements, Paul leaves his pilot to make minor repairs in the plane and proceeds alone. Suddenly he is surrounded by ferocious natives. Recalling his amulet, he dangles it before them and to his astonishment the hostility vanishes and he is brought to the chieftain of the tribe. Paul learns that the Chief is taking a new bride and in consideration of the charm, he is permitted to watch the colorful ceremony. As the bride's face is uncovered, Paul starts violently, but a cautioning movement from a giant black warns him to silence. The ceremony with its wierd chanting continues when suddenly there is a whir of an airplane motor overhead. The superstitious blacks fly to cover and in the confusion, Paul seizes the bride and follows the giant who indicates a way of escape. The natives follow with poisoned arrows seriously wounding their benefactor. The pilot, spying them, swoops down and takes the three fugitives aboard just as the natives come up. Defiantly the plane ascends while the airplane gracefully clears the ground and mounts into the skies. Illa and Paul tend the wounded man who tells them in his broken English that, many years before, Paul's father had saved his life, and in his undying gratitude Jeddo had protected Illa as long as possible. Something in the set of the pilot's head, makes Paul cry out, and to his amazement he discovers that he is none other than Tom, who had bribed the airport to let him accompany his friend. When Paul relieves Tom at the controls, Illa thanks Tom, and their friendship grows during the trying hours over the ocean. When they reach New York, Mona takes Illa under her protection, helping to blot out the memory of the dreadful hours of captivity. And months later there is a double wedding for Tom and Illa, and for Paul and Mona, while Jeddo stands by grunting his approval.

ALMA MATER

D. Philip Clark Drama File No. 10576

A FIRM believer in the effects of environment upon an individual, John Henderson is left at the death of his wife with his three dependent children. At first, John struggles along, pathetically trying to make ten year old Jack and the six year old twins, Jean and Jane, happy; but his failure depresses him, and at last he decides to put his children in different homes, where they may grow up to lead normal existences and, incidentally, test his theories. Accordingly, Jack is boarded with his maiden aunt in the college town of Waverly, and fifteen years later is working in the College Book store. Jean is sent to live with her aunt and uncle, on a farm, and grows up believing Julian, another adopted child of the Hendersons, to be her cousin. while Jane, living with Seymour Bristow, wealthy president of a bank, and his frivolous wife, is brought up in luxury. Meanwhile, poor, misguided John, having specified only that his children visit their mother's grave on Memorial Days, has joined up with a scientific expedition, and, having strayed from his party, is captured by a band of pigmies; and, unable to escape, he philosophically resigns himself to his fate and puts his theories in practice among the little men.

Julian and Jean, selling their vegetables and dairy products from house to house, stop at the Bristow home. Jane, having for once revolted against going to a bridge party with her "mother," answers the door, and Julian gapes as he marks the resemblance between the two girls. Jane takes Jean and Julian about her house; and the two farm bred young people marvel at the evidences of luxury, and part friends.

They meet again when both are students at Waverly College, and Jeans works her way through by working in the book store of Jack Ourand (in reality her brother.) When Jane joins a sorority, she insists on taking in Jean as a member, despite the protests of Gale Elder, a snobbish girl who resents throwing the exclusive society open to "nobodies." Margie Langdon, the wealthiest girl in the group, however, takes Jane's part, and Jean is admitted. The dramatic society puts on a musical comedy with Tommy Travers, Margie's fiance, and pretty Henderson in the leading roles. The theme of the show is the fostering influence of Alma Mater. Margie fancies that Tommy is putting too much enthusiasm into his love scenes, and quarrels with him; and Tommy dares not refute her claims, although it is not Jean he has fallen in love with, but Jane Bristow. To show her indifference, Margie becomes particularly friendly with Jack, and soon is genuinely in love with him. However, Gale, thinking she can even an old score, informs Jane that her missing diamond necklace has been stolen by Jean. Jane refuses to believe in the guilt of her double, and Margie, overhearing Gale's accusation, warns Jean of the lies about her, and, when things look blackest for Jean, proves that Gale herself is the thief. Gale leaves hurriedly. The months round out; and at graduation Jean and Jane show the same average, and there are two class valedictorians.

John finally escapes and returns to his own people. At his wife's grave he is reunited with his children who have, according to the old promise, met again after fifteen years, and at last their real identities are established.

Years pass. John Henderson is in the garden happily playing with his three grandchildren, the offsprings of Jean and Julian, of Margie and Jack, and of Jane and Tommy, while the parents look on fondly.

CHUMS

Ruth M. Loveland Drama File No. 10594

WHILE her wealthy spinster aunt, Theresa, is in Europe, Evelyn Gray rebels against the superficialities of the fashionable set and visits Ruth Walker, a college chum. Drawing a deep breath in the tiny furnished apartment, Evelyn sighs happily as she learns that Ruth has a position and is earning her own living. Ruth laughs as Evelyn confides she envies her but indulges her friend's whim of keeping house while she stays on as a guest. In the days that follow, Evelyn meets Jack, Ruth's friend, and learns that they are both saving toward their marriage. Then one day Jack brings a friend, Fred Mace, who works with him. While Jack and Ruth go into the kitchen to put up coffee, Fred and Evelyn roll back the rug and begin dancing. That evening after the boys have gone. Eveyln exclaims, happily, she has never spent such an enjoyable evening in her life, but Ruth assures her it is just the novelty of this life that appeals to her, if she had to worry about where her next dollar was coming from, she would feel quite differently about it. Fred and Evelyn fall deeply in love. Then one day, while they are all together, Fred picks up a newspaper and smiles as he points out a picture of a wealthy elderly bride and her handsome young bridegroom, returning from a honeymoon abroad. Evelyn smiles too until, looking at the paper she recognizes her aunt. She says nothing to explain her perturbation, and when Fred jests, "By the way Evelyn, don't you think it's about time you told me where you come from?" she spills the coffee on her lap to avoid having to answer. A few nights later, as Fred comes in, patting the pocket in which he has the engagement ring he is to give Evelyn, he meets a messenger boy in the hall and brings Evelyn's telegram in to her. "Why don't you open it?" he chides, but when she reads that her aunt has located her finally and demands that Evelyn return home immediately, for the first time Fred learns that she is an heiress. Evelyn tries to convince him she hates society, but he tells her he can never ask her to give up all her opportunities and live in poverty with him. Despite all Evelyn's assurances, Fred is adamant, and at last, unhappily, Evelyn returns to her aunt. The moment Stanley, her aunt's new husband, looks at her narrowly, Evelyn dislikes him. Her aunt bustles about, anxious to get a wealthy husband for Evelyn and scolds Evelyn for her lack of interest. But when Evelyn admits she is in love, her aunt says, "Nonsense," and goes about her own plans. Evelyn soon realizes that Stanley smirks and Evelyn slams the door as she of her way to avoid him. But one day he corners her and while she struggles kisses her madly. Evelyn beats him off, but suddenly her aunt appears in the door, and turning in fury on Evelyn orders her out of her house for trying to vamp her husband. Stanley smiks and Evelyn slams the door as she cuts herself off forever from her aunt's fortune.

It is at the wedding of Ruth and Jack, that Evelyn sees Fred again, and notices how thin he has gotten. "May I call a cab for you?" Fred asks stiffly, and as Evelyn confesses she has no place to go, Fred learns that she is no longer an heiress. With a glad cry, he folds her in his arms, then seizing the departing minister asks him to perform another ceremony and two happy couples leave for a double honeymoon.

STRANGE LANDS

Joseph Sivenofsky Drama File No. 10589

DISCHARGED from an orphan asylum, Joseph conducts a long and unavailing search for work and at last one day, huddled on a park bench, picks up a newspaper and notes an ad for a boy willing to risk his life for Science. For hours Joseph walks past the city limits and on to a deserted shack. It is pouring when he arrives and for several minutes he is kept waiting outside the ramshackle remains of what has once been a mansion. At last a beautiful girl admits him and after ushering him into a curiously contrived room, leaves him. At the other end of the room he sees a stooped over man with piercing gray eyes. After a gruelling examination during which Joseph admits that his life is practically worthless to him and out of desperation he is willing to chance anything, he is hired. In the weeks that follow, Joseph is taugh much astronomy, chemistry and geology, but the use to which his knowledge is to put is kept a secret from him. At last, however, Rose the beautiful girl he had seen first, warns him to leave. Joseph, excited over the thought of adventure, refuses, and she pleads with him, saying that her father, once a noted scientist, is obsessed with the belief that a machine he has constructed can rocket him to Mars. When Rose discovers that in spite of everything she says, Joseph is determined to go on, she pleads with her father to take her on too, but he refuses. At the last moment one of the assistants backs out and disappears but the professor shouts that they will go on shorthanded if necessary. The rocket takes off, and Joseph, knocked off his feet like the others is startled by a cry and finds that Rose has stowed away. She is unconscious from the shock but he carefully and tenderly restores her and after days of travel through space, they at last land on the strangely quiet planet Mars. Meanwhile Mike, the other volunteer, who has undertaken the job because he is an escaped convict, decides to strike off alone with Rose and while the Professor and Joseph are exploring the surrounding territory, Mike abducts Rose and vanishes. Joseph, returning, is aghast at the discovery that the pair have gone and sets off in search. Meanwhile Rose and Mike are parched and when at last they come to a stream of water, Rose reaches into the cooling waters but Mike brushes her rudely aside and drinks first only to writhe horribly on the ground and die in agony. Weakly, Rose calls for help, and Joseph, coming up, takes her into his arms. Together they return to the ship, where fresh water revives them. Under a microscope the fatal water turns out to have been polluted by the bodies of the inhabitants of Mars who have, it seems, perished violently. Returning to the stream, they find the body of a Martian, head three times the size of his body. They carry Zinju back to their ship and restore him with water. Huge birds attack them and their guns are useless but Zinju turns a strange ray upon them and they fall, blackened like the bodies that have polluted the stream. At last the earthly visitors discover what has killed off life here. The advanced Martians, super-intellects, have discovered a death ray so powerful they have entirely destroyed their race. Through blackened ruins of a mighty civilization the Professor and his crew wander and then shivering, return with a cargo of souvenirs and Zinju, their faithful slave. And as they see again living beings, happy at their work and play, the weary adventurers, clasp hands, a prayer of thanksgiving on their lips as they return to earthly life and love.

REMEMBERED TRYST

Emma Depue Drama File No. 10064

IN the little schoolhouse, Chester Upton sprang at the boy who was tying Dolly's hair in a knot. The schoolmaster rapped for quiet and although he had difficutly repressing a smile at Chester's defense of his Dolly he had the two boys remain in after school. It was a lad with head held high who marched out hours later and little Dolly waiting for him slipped her hand into his adoringly. As they neared the grove made fragrant with the breath of lilacs, Chester lifted his torn straw hat and behind it he pressed a fleeting kiss to Dolly's soft lips. Years passed. Chester was leaving for medical school. Grown now, he rode beside Dolly, adorable in her riding habit. In the fullness of their hearts the two young people could say nothing until Dolly's horse, frightened by a speeding car, leaped forward suddenly. She swayed dangerously in the saddle and Chester leaned forward, lifted her onto his own horse and stilled her fears. As he held her thus, she lifted her face to his and his mouth closed over hers. "Dolly," he whispered, "Dolly." It was with the pledge of her love that Chester left her but before he had completed his course the war broke out and, tall and handsome in his new uniform, Chester returned to bid farewell to his family and to Dolly who loved him more than life. Only a few poignant hours remained to the lovers and as they walked together where the lilacs' heady fragrance made their love more bitter sweet, Dolly wept. Kissing her tears away, Chester urged her to be brave. After all, he said, he was going into the medical corps and when he returned they could be married. Through her tears Dolly managed to smile so that Chester's last memory of her might be a happy one, and as the bugle blew the rain came down dispiritedly. Through all the horror of mangled bodies and shrieking shells, Chester held fast to Dolly's letters and he wrote constantly. Soon, however, mail from Chester stopped. Each mail Dolly ran to the post office only to return empty-handed and worried. Chester's mother and her own father assured her that all was well else they should have heard word from the front but day by day Dolly's heart sank and when the lilacs had turned brown and the trees were bare, her face was as white as the snow. Then her father got a severe heart attack and in a terrible storm Dolly ran for the doctor. When she returned drenched and shivering to learn that her father had died, she lost consciousness. Fever set in and she wept constantly for Chester. In her black dress she sat constantly among the lilac blossoms mourning for the lover who did not return.

Meanwhile, Chester, having lost his memory in a hospital bombing, recovered and returned home. His mother ran to tell Dolly of Chester's arrival but she stared uncomprehendingly and at last weeping his mother prepared for her son's homecoming. Even when Chester stood before her and called her name softly, Dolly remained unmoved, staring ahead and with a cry of pity Chester went about bringing back his loved one. At length he brought huge armfuls of the lilac blossoms and he stroked her hair tenderly, a little smile came to her lips. Wonderingly she turned and as she cried, "Chester!" he folded her in his arms with a cry of happiness. Beneath the lilac blossoms the marriage of Chester and Dolly became at last a reality.

DON'T TRUST MEN

Katherine Snyder Drama File No. 10549

WHILE hurrying home from work, Elaine sees an aged woman fall. Assisting her to her feet, Elaine hires a cab and helps Mrs. Brandon home. She is just coming up the steps, when a handsome young man steps forward, concerned for his mother, and when Mrs. Brandon tells Walter how Elaine has helped her, the young doctor thanks her heartily. Both the Brandons induce Elaine to stay for sandwiches and coffee and before the evening is out, Walter and Elaine have fallen deeply in love. Months of constant companionship follow, and Elaine learns that Walter is an interne at a city hospital but has ambitions to be a great neurologist. In order to be near him and share his every interest, Elaine gives up her secretarial work and enters the nurse's training of Walter's hospital. Only lack of money keeps them from getting married, but Elaine wears Walter's school pin and every possible moment they are together. At last Walter is given an opportunity to go to Vienna and study neurology under a world famous physician. Elaine urges him to go, and when he asserts that he can't leave her now, she reminds him how he has always wanted to be a specialist. At last Walter leaves, entrusting Elaine to his mother's care.

In Vienna, the first weeks are filled with loneliness for Elaine. Then one day in the great physician's office, Walter meets Georgia, a wealthy American widow who has come to consult the doctor about her nerves. Georgia takes an instant fancy to the young doctor and thereafter visits regularly. Gradually Walter falls under her spell and when he leaves for home, Georgia promises she will look him up when she gets back to the States. At the boat Elaine is waiting with Mrs. Brandon. Walfer is uncomfortable at Elaine's perfect faith that he is unchanged, and later, when they are alone, Walter fails to take Elaine in his arms. Hurt, bewildered, she says nothing. Then Georgia returns. At last Walter tells Elaine there is another woman. With a little cry of pain she releases him and shortly after Walter marries Georgia. With his wife's money behind him, Walter soon has an office on Park Avenue, but Georgia resents her husband's seriousness about his practice, and assures him she has enough money so that he doesn't always have to be at the beck and call of his patients. Too late Walter realizes his wife completely fails to understand his love for medicine, is jealous of his woman patients, and refuses to invite Walter's mother to their penthouse, claiming Mrs. Brandon is old fashioned and dowdy.

Then Mrs. Brandon has another of her dizzy spells, and this time strikes her head in falling. Seriously ill, she is tended by Elaine. Walter, who has been about to take his wife to the opera, learns of his mother's accident, and prepares to rush to her, but Georgia warns him if he goes away now, she will start suit for divorce in the morning. Walter accepts her ultimatum and at the side of his mother finds Elaine. As Mrs. Brandon opens her eyes she sees Elaine and Walter standing together, and a smile of content forms on her lovely old face.

MEN FOR SALE

C. A. Wicklund Drama File No. 10633

AT forty, Harry Lester is leading a comfortable existence in the employ of the Square Deal Mfg. Co. A bachelor, content to tinker about with ideas, Lester sees many of his projects put into effect in the plant while younger men who have gotten the thought from him, get the credit. When he is asked why he allows other people to get the credit for his ideas, he smiles indulgently and explains that they have families to take care of while he has a comfortable bank account and a steady job. What more can he want?

The Depression sweeps down. Lester is among the thousands stunnned to learn that his Savings Bank has closed. While others wail over their loss, Lester swallows hard and philosophically reminds himself that at any rate he has his job. Times grows worse. Salary cuts are followed by a simple announcement that the men over forty will have to go. For the first time, thoroughly aroused, Lester marches in on the foreman and asks what right they have to drop him from the payroll. Sympathizing, the foreman explains it is a machine age. They must have young blood. Men past their prime must make room for younger men. It is the price of progress. Disheartened, Lester leaves. Signs everywhere state. YOUNG MEN WANTED. MEN OVER 40 NEED NOT APPLY. At his boarding house his landlady soon tires of excuses, and Lester is at last ejected. Shabby, homeless, he contemplates suicide, but a walk in the park, the sight of children playing, flowers growing, changes his mind and he takes his place on a breadline. A well-to-do lady, Mrs. Fay, there to assist with the social work, is saying, "What the world needs most today is men with ideas." Set to thinking, Lester drops out of line and attracts the attention of Mrs. Fay. As he assures her in that line are many men with ideas who are given no chance to exploit them, she gives him her card and tells him he may call the next afternoon and she will listen to his thoughts. Shaven, clean, Lester appears at Mrs. Fay's home and at last interests her in his idea of harnessing the ideas of men over 40. With the aid of Allen, like himself reduced to breadlines, Lester, backed by Mrs. Fay's money establishes an organization where unwanted men can find food and employment. Under the proper stimulus of books, and the knowledge that they are self supporting, these men whom the world has dubbed, "too old" can properly create ideas of practical use. In a similar office managed by Allen, these ideas are developed and sold. Business soon flourishes. The Men For Sale idea sweeps the nation. In the office that fired Lester, sales are falling off. Ironically, they are rehabilitated through the aid of the ideas sold them by the Men For Sale bureau. They pledge themselves to discontinue the practice of firing men over 40, who have ideas that are practical and useful. The idea spreads for ladies. Lester finds his appreciation of Mrs. Fay has grown to love. Allen, too, marries his secretary and at last there is fulfillment for all over 40 who want to work, think, and achieve happiness.

TRAPPED

Sophie Naldrett Drama File No. 10678

THE hands of the clock move slowly around and Helen Lawson waits alone for her fiance, Daniel Craig. As the telephone rings she springs up to answer it and at the sound of Daniel's voice, she sighs in relief. He explains briefly that he has to work late again, but she is so relieved to learn that her fears about his safety are groundless, that she readily forgives him. Meanwhile, at the office, Daniel turns to Ruth Clayton, his employer's daughter and asks if she will come out to dinner with him so that he can further explain his plans to help her father's business. Late that night, after dinner and theater, Daniel escorts Ruth home and the butler tells her that Martin Sloan, her chlidhood sweetheart, had been waiting all evening for her.

Meanwhile, Daniel, dazzled by Ruth's sophistication, becomes bored by Helen, although he does not tell her and continues to accept her devotion. At the same time, in an attempt to impress Ruth he tells her that her father's business is in danger of failing unless his reforms are put through. Martin sees the danger ahead for Ruth if she lets herself be influenced by Daniel's glib tongue, but she curtly informs him she is not interested in his advice and after a quarrel with Martin, consents to marry Daniel, who desperately keeps up his bluff.

Helen is overcome when Daniel comes to her and tells her he is going to marry another woman, but ...n a great effort she manages to bear up until after he has left. Having given up her position when she promised to become Daniel's wife, she is now left stranded and at last she determines to study nursing.

Two years pass, years in which Daniel has juggled the accounts of his father-in-liaw's business to keep up the impression that he is invaluable. Helen, more and more extravagant, drives Daniel to distraction, and his shoulders have taken a decided droop. Meanwhile the Clayton Manufacturing Company, has, under Daniel's mismanagement, rapidly gone to seed and discovery is imminent. Ruth reproaches Daniel for not making money faster and Daniel goes to the office. As he looks over his accounts, his face grows more pallid and at last he reaches into the drawer for a revolver with which to end his life. As he takes a last despairing look about, his eyes fix on the open safe. Drawing a roll of bills out, he decides to leave the country and start life anew. Suddenly he turns and sees Martin Sloan watching him. In a frenzy, Daniel picks up the gun and fires at Martin. As he tries to escape, however, he runs into the arms of the watchman who has come up, attracted by the shot. An ambulance arrives with a doctor and nurse who dress Martin's wound. Dan starts in recognition of the nurse as Helen, who throws him a look of contempt as she accompanies the stretcher on which Martin is being carried out. Daniel faces quick trial and conviction during which his wife testifies against him. As her husband is led to his cell, Ruth calls up Martin and drawls an invitation, but stroking Helen's hair as he speaks, Martin explains he is sorry but he is getting married to-day to—Helen Lawson, his nurse.

JUNGLE RHYTHM

Chris Eales Melodrama File No. 10591

FOLLOWING a series of native uprisings and massacres on peaceful farmers, an expedition is sent by the government to restore order among the rebellious South African tribes. David Horne is placed in charge, and with a band of Africans loyal to his cause, makes his way through the dense jungle. As he is camping near Dar-Es-Salaam a shower of cocoanuts fall, barely missing David, and killing one of his men. Before leaving his spot, he sees a strange fish, resembling a merman, speared by Africans in fishing boats. Later, he comes across a tree with waving thorn branches, and cuts a native free from its entanglements, noticing that after the branches have been severed they are not dangerous. The native tells him that pulling the thorns away only causes them to enter deeper into the flesh and David names this strange jungle tree Wachten Bikkie Boom. While making his way through the forest, David sees a young girl crouching in terror a few feet away from a tiger; he shoots the beast, and takes the girl in his arms, as she loses consciousness. When she awakens she smiles strangely at her benefactor, and runs away into the forest, despite his protests. David's water carrier tells him that the girl and her mother are white women who escaped into the jungle and have become leaders of the outlaw tribes.

As they approach the most dangerous section of the forest, David sends goats ahead, many of which are killed by pistol shots or arrows dipped in snake venom, shot by natives. Noticing a forest fire in the distance, David concludes that it is intended to destroyed them, but checks its progress by starting a counter fire. He comes across a burial ceremony, which the tribe invites him to witness, and sees several women held by the cruel branches of the thorn tree, he is told that these are the wives of the decease, who will be allowed to join their husbands in the next world if they repent of their sins and die in this manner. Grotesquely decorated with red clay smeared on their faces, the mourners dance wildly about the dead, to the rhythm of the tom-toms. Sleeping sickness, malaria and the dread Blackwater fever, which darkens the blood, claims many of David's train, while the Tsetse fly and jigger flea destroys both men and horses. A boa constrictor winds himself about one of the men, crushing him to death, when David's pistol shot comes too late.

At last they come to the encampment or Kraal of Wannabulo, a native who ordered the slaughter of South African farmers while they were peacefully watching a war dance at his invitation, having come to arbitrate against plundering by his tribesmen. Sending word that if the chieftain does not appear he will burn down the village, David awaits in the bushes, and trains his machine guns on the natives when they attack, killing all. Inside the Kraal, David stabs Wannabulo, and discovers the girl whom he saved from the tiger besides her mother, who is fatally wounded. The mother says that when Africans soldiers killed her husband brutally years ago, she fled from the planatation with her daughter, Jean, and swore vengeance on them, killing all soldiers in the same way. Now she begs them to care for Jean, and David promises that he will do this, as the girl turns, weeping, to him.

DARING DEBUTANTE

Stella Yagoda Drama File No. 10693

WITH difficulty fitting her key to the door of her duplex penthouse, Gay Warren leads in a riotous crowd eager for more fun after the country club dance. The bar is hastily brought into service and as the radio is put on full blast, Gay is swung from arm to arm in abandoned dances. Her brother, Basil, entering with Larry Hayton, young attorney, quietly acknowledges the greetings of the crowd but both he and Larry refuse the invitations to join the party. As the hours roll on the party grows gayer and someone dares Gay to go outside and return with an extra man to replace one of the boys who has passed out. To keep up her reputation of never refusing a dare, Gay reels outside and after some indecision walks down the street and into an apartment house. Closing her eyes she presses a floor button and as the elevator stops walks down a deserted corridor. "Excuse me," she hiccups, as a woman answer her knock, and proceeding to the next door, slightly ajar, she walks in. "Hello," she greets a tall young man and swaying slightly she pulls on his sleeve and explains thickly she needs another man for a party. As she enters with King Roberts, the crowd cheers. but Greta Wing, the tall slinky blonde, says incuriously, "Hello, Roberts," and the party goes on. The next day, accepting an invitation to lunch with the other debs in a fashionable tea room, Gay enters to a chorus of greetings. Finding a newspaper, she turns the pages seriously, scolding the others with mock severity for not being interested in news. Aloud she reads the details of the latest murder trial and stops thoughtfully as she reads that Larry Hayton has taken the defense of the girl. While the others alternately jeer and applaud his gallantry in saving the down trodden, Greta suggests that if Gay is so "snappy" why doesn't she bring Larry to the club dance. Taunted, Gay recklessly accepts adding that she will get him to propose to her on the tenth dance. As the girls file out, Larry Hayton, who has been listening to the discussion from a nearby table, smiles grimly and takes his check. A day or two later, Basil leaves the office a moment leaving Larry to entertain Gay. To her complete amazement, he invites her to the club dance and not suspecting Larry has any inkling of her plans, Gay accepts in relief. Meanwhile King Roberts has been rushing Gay and one night, in his apartment, gives her cocktail after cocktail and taking her in his arms ,tells her he is mad about her and asks her to sail with him on the Bremen. Unsteadily, Gay promises to think it over. At the dance, Larry is overcome with Gay's beauty and as he kisses her her arms encircle his neck. Suddenly he remembers Gay's game and kissing her brutally he tells her he knows her plan. Knowing now she loves him, Gay darts away, writes to King telling him she is coming, and when Greta comes, Gay explains she knows she didn't put on the show for the crowd because she is going to marry King Roberts. Greta proceeds to King's apartment and when Gay arrives King tells her he never meant marriage since he is already married. He threatens to blackmail Gay unless she accompanies him. Gay picks up King's revolver. There is a shot and King falls dead. Larry, knowing he loves Gay, defends her but it remains for his cross examination of Greta Wing to reveal that she is King's wife and killed her husband through a tapestry, hanging back of where Gay was standing. Freed, Gay walks from the courtroom but Larry catches her in his arms and as his lips meet hers he dares her to become his wife.

THE LOST IS FOUND

Celest Ceglenske Drama File No. 10631

SISTERS, Jean and Annette Stone are inseparable in the grim walled orphanage where they have been sent after the accidental death of their parents. A visiting dowager, Mrs. Doerr, seeing Jean is captivated and immediately makes arrangements to adopt the pretty child. Heart broken at the thought of separation, Annette bravely hides her feelings and assures Jean that she will be happier knowing Jean is with a rich family. Jean is welcomed by her new brother, Eric, but her foster parents, seeing the melancholy of the child, decide to take her abroad with them for a few years. Eric, coming down to the boat to meet his mother and foster sister, is delighted to discover that Jean has grown up into a very beautiful young lady. However, as he excitedly makes plans, Jeans enters the house and her eyes are held by those of a handsome young man. Apologizing for staring, he informs her he is her father's secertary Clark Sabin. In the days that follow, Jean finds herself a social success and she is rush by men at dinner, dances and teas. Among her most ardent admirers are Eric, whose attentions she attributes to a brotherly feeling, and Clark. One day Clark questions her about her dejection, and she confesses she has been worrying about her sister. He offers to drive her to the orphanage to make inquiries, but Jean learns that Annette has long since left and is out on her own. Disheartened, she returns while Clark conforts her. At home, however, Eric jealously awaits them, and when he learns that Jean has been out with Clark, he quarrels with his father's secretary. Unhappy, feeling that she is breaking up the long standing friendship between the two men, Jean decides to leave home and search for her sister. Returning to the orphanage she at last induces one of the kindlier matrons to tell her where Annette went after she left. Jean goes to the boarding house, but the gruff landlady grumbles when Jean appears and saying she doesn't know where Annette is, slams the door. Leaving, Jean sees a torn picture, face up in the ash can. Banging on the door, she asks if that isn't Annette's picture and the landlady snaps, "It is indeed, and if she pays her back rent she can come back and get her clothes, and not otherwise." Excitedly Jean pays the money demanded and pleads with the landlady to tell her where her sister went. The landlady vaguely points toward the river. Sobbing as she runs, Jean stares into every face as she hurries toward the docks and at last cries, "Annette, Annette." A surprised girl turns at the name, and Jean throws herself into her sister's arms. Together they return, talking of all that has happened to them through the years. Meanwhile the Doerrs are frantic at the disappearance of Jean. Only Clark knows what to do. Taking Eric with him, he goes to the orphanage and asks if Jean has come back. He is given the same boarding house number Jean got, and the astonished landlady, convinced she is dealing with crazy people, directs the two men. On the street they meet, and Jean introduces her sister. As she chatters happily to Clark, Eric realizes the truth, that Jean loves Clark, and unhappily he turns away. However, Annette, comprehending, touches Eric's sleeve sympathetically, and as they return home together, Eric, finds in Annette those same qualities he loved in Jean.

LAUGHTER AT THE CLOSE

Frieda Pink Halpern Drama File No. 10626

GENTLY drawing a ring of horse-hair over Eliza's finger, young Gustave Race promised that he would return to make her his bride as soon as he had made his fortune. Immediately after Gustave's departure, however, Eliza's stepmother began to nag her to be more attentive to Paul Lepoe, a blustery cattle trader who flattered the susceptible Mrs. Goodwine with small presents on each visit to North Bend. It was only after Mrs. Goodwine had confided to Gustave's mother that Eliza was soon to be married to Paul, and the Races defensively let it known that, far from being jilted, their son was in love with a wealthy merchant's daughter, that Eliza, unable otherwise to explain Gustav's suddenly dropped correspondence, agreed to go with Paul to the festive Easter Ball. There before the whole town Paul boastfully announced his engagement to Eliza who shuddered even when Paul announced that he would heap gifts and money upon his bride.

Forced into the marriage, Eliza left on her honeymoon and as she looked about the dirty boarding house and winced before the greetings of Paul's uncouth friends, gamblers like her husband, she realized what a great hoax she was victim of. Still certain that with his "gambling instinct" he could yet make their fortune, Paul gambled away their funds and Eliza's child, Arthur, was born with only a midwife, the boarding house keeper, and a colored washer woman to lend aid. Months later, Gustav saw Eliza again, and shocked by her shabby dress and her alibis for her husband, wrote Mr. Goodwine to send for his daughter and her child. Paul at intervals wrote for more money and at last, at Mrs. Goodwine's suggestion, came to live with his wife's people. Sympathy for Eliza made one of the townspeople give Paul a position. Another son, Leo was born to Eliza and in her two fine lads she found escape. Proud of the honors Leo was winning as class valedictorian, Eliza was crushed when his body was brought to her unconscious. Despite Leo's brave assertion that he was unhurt, that he had only been stunned when he had swung violently across the ice while playing Crack-the-whip, a fever set in and Eliza saw her son lose his fight for life. As the mourners assembled, Paul's employer came, and apologizing for intruding at such a time, asserted that Paul had stolen and lost in a gambling house a large sum of money belonging to his firm. In her anguish, Eliza pleaded with the man not to prosecute now lest the stigma forever taint their son's name, and at last with the promise that the now groveling Paul would pay back every cent, the prosecution was dropped. Unable to see the woman he loved so tortured, Gustave, now head of a large insurance firm, offered Paul a position, warning him that at the least sign of a slip he would be dropped. Too exhausted to speak, Eliza raised brimming eyes to Gustave and promised Paul would make good, while Arthur set about helping to repay the great debt. Then one day Paul triumphantly reported that through his knowledge of horses he was landing the insurance account of the large Forest-Wood Livery Stable. Puffing on an expensive cigar, Paul speculated on the race horse he could buy, the money he would win while Mrs. Goodwine whined she had always had faith in him. But a few days later Paul staggered in dead drunk, and when at last through his fogged consciousness he learned that the clang of fire engines presaged the burning of the stables, he borrowed Eliza's last dollar and buying carbolic acid committed suicide leaving his family to face the fact that he had gambled away the money entrusted to him for insurance. In the final moment of despair, Eliza found two to comfort and encourage her, her son Arthur and Gustav who had never for one moment ceased to love, and at last free of the man who had made life a Purgatory, the gallant Eliza found life just beginning for her.

OLD FASHIONED GIRL

C. W. Justice Drama File No. 10621

HANDSOME, capable as a young lawyer, within two years Jerry Flint establishes a comfortable practice in Franklin and takes in a partner. One day he receives a call from John P. Carston, famous railroad magnate, who, retiring from active business, has bought the Maxwell estate on the edge of the town. Arriving early, Jerry finds Carston is not in, but his daughter Jane entertains the young lawyer until her father's arrival and for the first time in his twenty-four years, Jerry finds himself falling in love. His partner Bill teases him about his absentmindness lately, and slyly says, "Jerry, the young woman hater isn't falling in love, is he?" but Jerry who has always decried the loose morals of the present generation and has always refused all party invitations, colors and says nothing. Meanwhile Carston who has only with great reluctance given his business to the young attorney, finds that his liking for the boy is growing, and notices that Jane is falling in love. Jane cannot understand Jerry's apparent indifference to her, not realizing how difficult it is for Jerry to believe that he has at last found the girl he can love. Then one of Jane's schoolmates gives a party. Jerry is unwilling to go, claiming he dislikes affairs where girls drink and smoke, but Jane begs him just this once to go lest she hurt her friend's feelings. Jerry's heart sinks as he sees the girls dance wildly and mix drinks, and when Alice's brother, Peter, whom Jane has known since they were children, drinks too much and kisses Jane heartily, she laughingly pushes him off. However, to Jerry, the kiss is a revelation that Jane is the same as all the other girls, and he is silent all the way home. Hurt, Jane is unable to say anything to him and the next three weeks Jerry sends Bill to attend to all of Mr. Carston's business, instead of going himself. At last, finding he cannot escape his thoughts of Jane, Jerry suddenly entrusts all his business to Bill and without leaving any forwarding address, sets sail for Europe. The next day Jane calls, swallowing her pride, but to her consternation, Bill tells her Jerry has inexplicably left for an indefinite stay.

The next few months Jerry tries travel, even drinking and other women, unavailing, in forgetting Jane, and after a tour of Paris, London, South America and Hawaii, he returns home. Old Dad McCormack the hotel proprietor, jumps up so violently in greeting that he looses his spectacles, and Jerry finds everyone has missed him. Returning to his office, he flushes painfully at discovering Jane in conversation with Bill but he learns that during the two years he has been away, Mr. Carston has become very ill and Jane is managing his business. Mr. Carston, learning Jerry is back, insists on seeing him, and Jerry finds it harder than ever to stay calm in Jane's presence. But Mr. Carston sees and understands. When he has another attack, he sends for Jerry and smiles wanly as he sees Jerry supporting the weeping Jane. When Carston's last will and testament is read it is discovered that the entire estate goes to Jane unless she marries, in which case half goes to Jerry Flint. Some time later, Jerry waits for Jane on her vine covered porch. "Funny your Dad never said anything about both of us getting married." And as Jane blushes, Jerry's lips meet hers and cling there.

THE MASTER MURDER

A. Smith Drama File No. 10628

RETIRING from the presidency of his bank, John Hays buys a ranch in the west for his health, and settles upon it with his wife Julia and his daughter Olive. Their new neighbor, Jim, comes over to offer to help, but Hays, noticing the growing friendship of his daughter and the young rancher, testily forbids Jim to come back, claiming that Ollie is too young to have anything to do with men. Meanwhile, Ollie's brother Charles, a concert violinist is touring the country and stops off to visit his folks, bringing with him Dr. Lewis, a powerfully built man whom Charles had met on the train. Charles has to leave the next morning, but during the night his father suffers a severe attack. Mrs. Hays wrings her hands helplessly while Ollie calls the ranch hand, Joe, to get the nearest doctor. However, Dr. Lewis appears, and suavely offers his services. He shakes his head gravely and asserts that Hays is in a delicate state and requires the constant services of a doctor. Mrs. Hays, who has been flattered by the doctor's courtesy, asks him if he can accept the position, and rebukes Ollie for suggesting they send to town for a physician.

From then on Mr. Hays seems to be in a half stupor and Lewis is constantly at his bedside. Mrs. Hays soon works up a case of nerves that confines her to her room for days at a time and only Dr. Lewis can soothe her. Ollie, upset by the invalidism of both parents, has her hands full with the superstitious ranch hand, who keeps claiming the ranch is "Ha'nted" and one day runs away. Ollie, frightened, decides to run to Jim for help, but a great storm prevents her from leaving the house. During the night her father suffers a relapse, and writhing in pain, dies, trying at the end to say something to Ollie. Beside herself with anguish, Ollie runs through the rain and calls Jim who, learning that her mother is home alone, accompanies her home. Lewis immediately resents Jim taking command, and Mrs. Hays nervously claims that her husband never trusted Jim anyway. Ollie, however, turns on Lewis and confronting her mother asks why she trusts this man so completely. However, as her mother works herself up into a frenzy, Ollie wearily complies and begs Jim to go. Protesting that he doesn't trust Lewis, Jim refuses to go, but Ollie assures him she will lock the door of her room and in the morning will get rid of Lewis somehow although she fears what her mother will do if she finds Lewis is gone. Jim at last leaves, but as he approaches the canyon, he is attacked from the rear, and before he can defend himself, he is hurled into the yawning chasm. Ollie hears Lewis call to open the door, her mother is ill. Frightened, she refuses, but at the thought that her mother may really need her, she comes out. Immediately Lewis leers that her mother is well drugged and her lover is dead. Meanwhile Jim's fall is broken by a tree and dimly he hears Ollie's screams. With a tremendous effort he makes his way back to the ranch and in a terrific fight overcomes Lewis and turning him over to the authorities discovers he is an escaped murderer. Ollie weeps as she realizes now this man murdered her father, but Jim's arms are protectively about her, never to let her go.

FROZEN ASSETS

Helen Knight Comedy Drama File No. 10606

SPOILED by his doting nurse, little Rube grows up the only grandchild of the eccentric and wealthy Rueben Short. Dreamy, unreliable but likeable, Rube finds a stout defender in his sharp tongued grandfather who watches him running after the ice wagon when he is a youngster and taking pride only in his one talent, ice skating. Then old Rueben gets an idea and closeting himself with his lawyer makes out his will. Shortly after Rube's twenty-first birthday, his grandfather suddenly dies. The community is shocked, but how much more so when the contents of the will disclose that Rube will forfeit his inheritance if he does not comply with the following request. For six months, instead of a monument, the boy is to place on his grandfather's grave a block of ice at seven in the morning and replace it with a fresh one when it has melted to not less than four inches. This procedure is to be carried out from seven until eleven mornings and from four to eight afternoons with the exception of Sundays and holidays. At first only the absurdity of the request appears. But soon it becomes clear that for the first time in his life Rube has a responsibility. He must arise early, he must calculate mathematically the time it takes for ice to melt under any given temperature, he, in short, has no time left to waste. Newspaper articles bring a flock of tourists to see the strange sight. When the melting ice presents a problem Rube is forced to install a system to carry off the excess water. Old Josie, the impractical Irish nurse, pities herself and her poor Rube continuously as he is kept constantly running to comply with the request. Half-shaven, half-dressed, half-dined, when the electric bell that the resourceful Rube installs to warn him the ice is running low, rings, Rube jumps up. And Rube sees less than ever of Lila Snow, daughter of one of the executors of the will, whom he loves but has never exerted himself to win. Rube finds Bob, his rival advancing steadily, but Lila is more tolerant toward Rube now that he is proving himself before all the townsfolk. Betting is rife as to how long Rube will keep up and when he plays a lead in an amateur play, at the very moment he is about to rescue the heroine from the villain, he notices the weather has shifted and dashes out in time to change the ice. To guarantee a ready supply, Rub even builds a huge ice plant and makes it pay by securing all the business from neighboring towns. The appropriation for this project comes from the provision in the will that the Committee may make such disbursements to Rube as they unanimously think necessary to comply with the terms. Business, through the widespread interest, increases in the town, and Rube makes a small fortune by endorsing refrigerators, ice skates, and even cook books, further distinguishing himself by using this money in beautifying the town. Bob, realizing that Rube is winning Lila's heart, tries to destroy Rube by taking him for a ride in a car which "breaks down" miles from town. But Rube hails a passing car and arrives in time to replace the ice and at last the six months expire. Rube unveils a monument of rock crystal to his grandfather's memory, and wild acclaim greets Rube who has in six months changed from a likeable loafer to an aggressive and celebrated member of his community. As the crowd drifts off a feeling of loneliness overpowers Rube, and he turns away. In the distance, however, he sees a familiar figure hurrying toward him and with a little cry Rube opens his arms to Lila, whom he has never dared to hope for, believing she loved Bob. And as she creeps into his embrace, time stands still.

LOVERS' CONSPIRACY

Beulah Riffey Drama File No. 10559

THROUGH the pleading of her mother, Ellen at last wins the consent of her father to go to college. There she meets and falls in love with Don, whose father had married the girl Mr. Westville wanted. Remembering the old feud, Ellen's father violently refuses to consent to the yougsters' marriage, and when Rob, a neighbor who owns a strip of land Mr. Westille has long coveted, comes to sue for Ellen's hand, Mr. Westville makes a deal with him giving Ellen in exchange for the deed to the land. Ellen's refusal to see the red faced vulgar Rob causes her father to whip her and her mother helplessly stands by, not daring to oppose her husband's wrath. At last, learning that her father has set the wedding date for the twenty-ninth of June, a few days off, Ellen sends a note with her mother begging Don to meet her in the orchard. Meanwhile, Rob forces his caresses on the unhappy girl, boisterously claiming he likes she-cats and will tame her after she is his wife. The moon bathes the orchard when Ellen runs into the shelter of Don's arms, and as he holds her and promises he will not let her be given to another, Mr. Westville appears and strikes Don for meeting his daughter. Beside himself, Don seizes the father of the girl he loves, and tightening his hands about his throat makes him promise to let Ellen choose her own husband. Placatingly Mr. Westville admits that he has been wrong, and assures Don that when the wedding takes place he will be Ellen's groom. The plans for the marriage proceed. Dressed in a lovely white dress and veil, Ellen comes down the aisle on her father's arm, only to stop in horror as she looks up into the grinning face of Rob. Her father whispers, "Everybody is watching. Careful now," but with a little moan Ellen sinks to the floor in a dead faint. The doctor advises a few days in bed, and the wedding guests, commenting sympathetically leave. Once in the shelter of her own room, Ellen thinks desperately. As her mother tells her about a girl in town who claims Rob is the father of her child, Ellen conceives a plan. She sends for the girl, Bella, and enlists her aid, then pledging her to secrecy, informs her father that she is ready now to go through with her marriage to Rob. Rubbing his hands gleefully, Mr. Westville again invites his guests, and as the notes of the wedding march are sounded, the bride, heavily veiled, comes down the aisle and hears the words that make her Rob's wife. Rob gleefully hands over the deeds to the land and taking the arm of his bride, dressed in a heavy traveling suit and a dark veil, proceeds to their hotel. As he reaches for her, she takes off her hat, and with a start of disappointment and fury he recognizes not Ellen, but Bella. Walking out on his bride, he returns to the Westvilles to learn that while the ceremony was in progress, Ellen eloped with and married her Don. Westville reluctantly relinquishes the cherished land, and his daughter finds the happiness of her dreams in Don's arms.

SHADOW OF THE CHAIR

John H. Walker Drama File No. 10643

MISLED by the elaborate deception practiced by Kate Bryant, once the moll of Ralph Jackson, notorious gangster, Louis Waugh asks her to marry him. For a while Kate, touched by Louis's kindness to her and his confidence that she will make a good mother to the children of his first marriage, manages to get along without letting Louis suspect that she is bored with domesticity. Then one day, as she is indulging herself in a shopping orgy, she runs into Ralph. Forcing her into a taxi, he tells her how he has been looking for her and when he learns that she is married and the stepmother of two children, he roars with laughter. Desperately Kate pleads with him to leave her alone, but finally she gives him ten dollars to get a shave and some food and promises to meet him again. When Kate arrives home, shaken by the hold Ralph has on her, she finds Louis upset about a change to a branch office of his firm. Louis claims he will let the promotion go, but Kate urges him to accept it, promising that she will take care of the children. Janet Sills, who teaches the Waugh children, sees how unhappy thye are, and she invites the two youngsters to her home for cookies and milk. As they try to restrain their appetites she is appalled to learn that they are not getting proper food at home. After Louis' departure, however, it is worse than ever for the little ones and Ralph finally induces Kate to elope with him. As he waits for her below in the living room, Ralph picks up a billfold with Louis' picture in it and pockets it. Then, telling Kate he is going out to gamble, he robs a store. However, the merchant offers unexpected resistance, and Ralph kills him. Terrified, he drops the billfold with Louis's picture and arranges it to look as if it has been left behind by the murderer, inadvertently. After days of search by the police, Louis is found and arrested for the murder. Although he protests his innocence he is unable to prove a satisfactory alibi, and he is convicted and sentenced to the electric chair. Kate learning of her husband's conviction for the crime is certain he is innocent, but when, from the details of the robbery, she realizes that Ralph is guilty, he threatens to kill her if she breathes a word of it, and Kate, hopelessly torn by her love for the brutal Ralph, allows her husband to take the rap.

Meanwhile Louis' children, deserted, scorned, are destitute, and Janet, seeing them starving, takes them into her own home and cares for them as if they were her own. The execution day arrives, and Louis begs for two hours respite for prayer. Meanwhile, Kate, more and more under Ralph's spell, catches him out with another woman in a night club. Hysterically, she flies at him, but Ralph, realizing she is about to give him away, fires at her. He is seized, and Kate, dying, accuses Ralph of the murder for which Louis is going to the chair. As Louis turns to recieve the extreme penalty, he is informed that he is free. Dazed he walks from the prison, fully exonerated, and as his children tell him of Janet's aid, Louis' eyes meets hers in gratitude and a friendship that is to endure forever is born between Janet and Louis.

THE TREASURE OF INDIA

Dawood S. Passaya Drama File No. 10433

THE Honorable Sir Hidayat Khan and his wife, Lady Akbari, entertain with a feast in honor of the twenty first birthday of their son, Kamar. As the guests assemble in the beautiful home, situated in Beharabad, they offer congratulations to Kamar; Noor Khan, his cousin, and Madad Ali, young men of Kamar's age, embrace him three times, according to the custom of the country, and then join in informal discussion. The Honorable Sir Enayat Khan and his wife, Noor's parents, offer their felicitations, followed by those of Sham Das Seth, a cotton speculator, and Nergis, his adopted daughter. When the guests are assembled at the table, Sham Das notices the portrait of one of Kamar's noble ancestors, and Sir Hidayat relates that a fortune is said to be concealed in its frame, but close inspection of it revealed nothing to him; as the guests smile, he adds it matters little, since he has everything a man could wish for. Following the dinner, the guests assemble in the spacious living room of their host and hostess. It is decorated in the Western manner, but a note of the East in introduced when Dulari, a beautiful dancing girl, entertains the group, to the accompaniment of a pair of tublas, harmonium and serangi, played by a native orchestra. Kamar confides that he desires Dulari, but Madad taunts him with the fact that he cannot win her, since he will not come into his inheritance until his father dies, while Noor says that the pure, innocent beauty of Nergis attracts him more than any dancing girl.

Sir Hidayat discovers Sham Das searching the picture frame, and is told that he has speculated on his and Nergis's inheritance, losing everything. When he signs a confession of his guilt, Sir Hidayat agrees to drop charges. The following day Madad, accompanied by Noor, calls at the home of Dulari, and makes financial arrangements with the girl and her mother whereby she becomes his mistress. Later, Noor saves a puppy belonging to Nergis from the wheels of a carriage, and after a preliminary exchange of bantering conversation, both admit their love. In order to see Noor whenever she wishes, Nergis engages him as her secretary, but Sham Das forbids this, and informs her that he has plighted her troth to Kamar. When she refuses to marry him, Sham Das reveals pathetically that Sir Hidayat will make public his confession of guilt if he does not give Nergis to Kamar; heartbroken, the girl sings a sorrowful lament, but Noor offers to secure the confession, in some way. Enchanted by her appeal, Kamar showers gifts upon Dulari, but she will not yield until he signs a note, promising to give half of his inheritance to her. Then the girl presses a phial of poison upon Kamar, urging him to use it upon his father; he protests, but takes it, when Madad and Noor enter. In a rage, Madad throws Dulari to the floor, and, tripping the servants, takes the confession from Kamar, and gives it to Noor, who offers to return it in exchange for the one Sham Das has signed. All three meet at a public well for this purpose, but Kamar gives Noor only a blank sheet of paper; Madad who is hiding, attacks Kamar's servants with his sword, and takes the treacherous young man prisoner, in his apartment.

Entering Sir Hidayat's home at night, Madad and Noor open the safe and remove the picture frame. With Nergis' help, Noor discovers directions to go to a secret house, and, with her, finds the treasure, guided by a cobra, who guards it. Noor presents the money and jewels to Sir Hidayat, who returns them to him, since his actions and example have brought about a reformation in Kamar's character. Sham Das, destroying his confession, and resolving to be scrupulous in his future dealings, gives his blessing to Noor and Nergis, who sing in their happiness.

THE LAST CHORD

O. E. Belle Drama File No. 10671

ONCE a great musician, Peter Stanton had, through an accident to his right hand, lost forever the power of swaying audiences. Retiring to his great home, Peter had lived for many years a misanthropic existence, tended only by Jane, his faithful housekeeper. Once, brooding at his piano, picking out with one hand the music of which he had once been master, Peter was disturbed by the scratching of a street lad's violin outside the house. Bellowing for Jane, Peter ordered her to chase the fellow. Shaking her head, Jane went to the door to shoo the itinerant musician, but seeing a child, face pinched with hunger, the warm hearted Jane, beckoned to little David to come to the back door, and preparing some hot food for the yougster watched the famished child eat. Meanwhile, Peter carried away by memories, picked out Humoresque, and the youngster, in an excess of gratitude picked up his violin and haltingly accompanied the piano. Furiously, Peter strode into the kitchen, but seeing the bright eyed boy commending him for the way he played and wishing fervently that some day he too could produce such music, Peter was touched in spite of himself. Suddenly moved by a strange notion, Peter offered to give the youngster music lessons and in place of the emptiness that had been his life before, Peter arranged to gather a group of youngsters who, like David, were unable to afford musical tuition, and the once great musician taught the little group of urchins the rudiments of playing. Proud of their progress, Peter invited friends to hear them and entered his pupils in contests after contest, all of which they carried by storm. After their great triumph in Carnegie Hall, Peter gave them a dinner and asked of each what his greatest ambition was. Those that wished to devote their lives to music, Peter gave the opportunity to do so, and those who wished to study professions Peter sent through Universities. Soon, one of the lads was graduated with honors as a lawyer, one, an Engineer, was sent abroad on a great project, and David, now a doctor, was mending bodies.

Years passed. Peter gradually became feebler and one day the faithful Jane, coming to clean his room found him lying still upon the floor. Terrified she had him carried to a hospital where he was given up by the physicians. But remembering David, Jane stumbled through the line of fashionable ladies awaiting treatment from the handsome young doctor, and in the great doctor's office, Jane told of Peter's illness. Dropping everything, David rushed to Peter's side, but his face was grave as he looked up. At last he had an idea. Hastily sending for the boys whom Peter had taught, David gathered them all in the next room. Explaining that Peter had lost all contact with the present, David softly led the group in Humoresque while Jane watched Peter's pale face. Soon Peter stirred and gradually the light of returning reason shone in his eyes. "My boys," he whisper at length and as they filed softly into the room, his eyes shone happily. With a great effort his hand reached for Jane's and David, looking on, smiled at last on the pretty young nurse who had long adored the great Doctor David from a distance.

PALS

Roy Twaits Drama File No. 10689

THE bachelor owner of a chain of ice cream parlors, Dan Banks had long ago formed the habit of dropping in at the Sacred Hospital and remembering the patients. Once seeing the head doctor's wife, Mrs. Lukey, with a very pretty little girl, Dan stops to exchange a greeting and learns that the child's mother had come in stricken with pneumonia. Dan offers to give little Betty some ice cream, and her face lights up. On their return from the ice cream parlor, Dan learns that Betty's mother has died and the doctor adds that if he didn't have three tots of his own he would adopt the child rather than see her sent to an orphan's home. Touched, Dan returns home but that night, after having arranged a decent burial for Betty's mother, Dan decides to adopt Betty himself and the next morning inserts an ad for a housekeeper to take complete charge of a home and eight old girl. During the next few days Dan receives many answers but when he reads the one of Dorothy, a twenty-five year old woman who has lost her own husband and daughter in an accident, Dan knows he has found the person he wants and immediately arrangse to send for her.

That evening Dan and Betty meet Dorothy at the station and as Dorothy bends to the little girl, Dan knows they are going to get along well together. That night Dan has a long talk with Dorothy and learns that herself an orphan, she had married for a home and until the accidental death of her husband and adored child had found happiness. The next day Dan finds to his surprise how delicious a meal can be, and how many little comforts a thoughtful woman can assure a bachelor. He sees that Betty and Dorothy get proper clothes and that night takes them to a show. Betty's eyes shine at the dancing and when Dan asks if she would like to study dancing, she hugs him eagerly. Betty is so enthusiastic about her new life that she has to be restrained from working too hard. Some time later Bert Burns mentions, "See you've got a goodlooking woman at your house these days." Dan has to restrain himself from knocking Bert down but when Dorothy mentions Bert several times and laughingly accuses Dan of being jealous, Dan withholds his warnings. About six months later, however, Dan is appalled to discover a note left by Dorothy saying she has run away to be married with Bert Burns and begging for forgiveness she tells him she has brought Betty to the doctor's house. The doctor and his wife are shocked, too, at Dorothy's choice of the notorious rogue, but Dan blames himself for not warning Dorothy.

Two years later, Betty wins an amateur contest at a local theater and is contracted by a vaudeville circuit. The last night an usher hands her a note telling her Dorothy is waiting at the stage door. Dan seeing them, waits in the shadows and as Dorothy inquires about him and blesses Betty before running off, Dan steps forward and stops her. Dorothy tries to pretend she is very happy, but Dan soon discovers Bert deserted her as soon as her money ran out, and that to-day she was thrown out of her room for not having the rent. Dan asks softly why she didn't come back to them and learning that Dorothy was too proud, he takes her in his arms and tells her that she is coming back with them not as housekeeper but as Mrs. Banks, and, held close, Dorothy sighs happily.

THE STORY OF RUEMAN

Louis C. Marolf Drama File No. 10556

ADOPTED by Tannfred after the death of his parents in an automobile accident, young Rueman comes to live on the great farm. Tannfred ignores the tears that fill the eyes of the sensitive lad, but his daughter Alma, taking the little fellow in hand, assures him that he his going to be very happy. Soon, however, Alma leaves for a finishing school in Philadelphia, and Rueman, failing again and again at the farm tasks assigned him as his mind is occupied with his verses, finds his temperament entirely at odds with Tannfred's ambition to make a farmer of him. Encouraged by well meaning neighbors and by Caspar, the hired man, Tannfred tries to drive the poetic vagaries from Rueman's mind. Rueman's only friends are Leizy, the portly housekeeper, and Ada Edelmuth, a little girl who sings with him in the village choir and adores him from a distance. Caspar, jealous of Leizy's fondness for the sensitive youngster, is unwittingly cruel to the lad who finds happiness only at school where he can distinguish himself at his studies.

Then Alma returns, a beautiful and grown up young lady. Rueman shyly reads his verses to her and she is stirred by their beauty. Together with Bertram, Rueman's school friend, who believes in him, Alma determines to give Rueman a chance to show the country people the beauty of his writing. For weeks Alma and Bertram plan a festival, the climax of which is to be a reading by Rueman of his own peotry. The simple, good people brought to a happy frame of mind by abundant food and cider, sit around indulgently while Rueman, suddenly awawkened to the realization that he loves Alma, comes to the fore and in a voice vibrant with emotion, reads his verse. Sensing some force beyond their understanding, the country folk are moved and applaud Rueman generously and little Ada happily watches his triumph from the background. Alma congratulates Rueman in a stormy sisterly embrace, which means more—all to him—than to her. Even Tannfred, disquieted by a flood of memories of his own idealism while at school, an idealism that was soon to give way to the materialism of the farmer working to support the girl he loved, Alma's mother, feels that perhaps he has been wrong in suppressing Rueman's genius. But wandering out into the garden, he comes upon Caspar and Leizy in a hearty embrace as they ask him for his blessing, he forgets Rueman's problems in making plans for a rustic celebration at which the fruit of the wine shall flow freely.

Meanwhile Rueman searches everywhere for Alma to tell her of his love, only to come upon her in the very moment that she is promising to marry his best friend, Bertram. Overcome with emotion, Rueman repairs to a lonely spot and cursing everything he has ever loved in a marvelous poetic rhapsody, sobs hoarsely as he realizes at last he has created a masterpiece. Then, in a terrible calm, he tears up his magnum opus and turns toward the house. Within all is gaiety and noise, but Rueman's sudden appearance causes a hush to fall, and in a breaking voice, Rueman shouts he has decided he is destined to be only a farmer. All applaud him for "coming to his senses at last" but before they can reach him he collapses. Alma and Bertram help him to his room and as he sees their eyes cling, he wishes them every happiness together. In the dark days that follow the wedding of the two people he loves most, it is little Ada Edelmuth who quietly sympathizes with Rueman, and as he comes in, flushed from the completion of the threshing, Ada's eyes meet his with the adoration if not understanding that she is always to accord him as his wife.

TIPPING TOM

Sherman Baker Comedy File No. 10551

GROUCHY old Ford Sterling, determined to prevent his pretty daughter Marilyn, who helps him in his great market, from getting married, is nicknamed by the old fellows who congregate in the market place, Tipping Tom, because he is always tip-toeing and peeping around. Although Marilyn is twenty-one, Ford has managed to discourage all her suitors until Marilyn is desperate. Then she meets Leon, a good natured, but awkward chap, who falls in love with her. Leon determines to win Marilyn as his bride but all his efforts are so clumsily made that Ford manages to thwart him each time. The old fellows who gossip and wisecrack outside Ford's market, watch the affair with interest and lay bets about the outcome.

Leon arranges to elope with Marilyn. Marilyn packs all her belongings in a great suitcase and Leon makes so much noise as his legs fold under, that he causes Ford to come to the window and break the ladder into a thousand pieces. The next day, undiscouraged, Leon parks his flivver outside the market and whistles softly for Marilyn to come. The old fellows do everything they can to help the elopers but at the last moment Leon's car refuses to start, and the more Leon steps on the starter, the more noise it makes until Ford comes rushing out and enraged at his daughter's near elopement, he kicks Leon's car mightily, yelling as he hurts his toe, but happy in the complete collapse of the fragile flivver. Then spanking Marilyn as he pushes her before him into the store, Ford glares at the old men of the town who laugh at him. In his anger, Ford has all the boxes removed so that there is no place for the old men. However, they determined to get even. When Leon phones Marilyn and tells her he has the license and if she meets him in the park they can be married this time, Ford listens in and also Chester Conklin, one of the old men. Ford immediately prepares to catch his daughter and make her suffer. Accordingly, putting his too small derby on his head he strides vindictively down to the park. At last he comes upon two figures locked in tight embrace. He thinks it is his daughter and her lover, but it is really two dummies the old gossips have planted. The gossips hide in the bushes to watch the fun, and Ford swinging his umbrella violently, calls two cops and tip-toeing up to the supposed young couple whispers hoarsely, "Arrest those two." The cops part the bushess violently and grab their victims only to discover that they are dummies. The old men rock with laughter, but the cops, thinking Ford is playing a trick upon them, seize him and despit all his protests lead him by the scruff of the neck to the county jail.

Marilyn and Leon are finally married and as the scene fades out on their long kiss, the old men gossip happily in the market place, and Ford storms and frets in his cell in the county jail.

GENERAL GRANT'S CLOCK

John P. Martin Short Subject File No. 10641

STROLLING down a street in Georgetown, Ohio, with his southern sweetheart Ethel Stannard, John Hoyt attempts to prove to her that General Grant was a greater soldier than General Lee. As she protests, he leads her inside the little red brick schoolhouse, where Grant studied as a boy, and shows Ethel the clock that his youthful eyes must have watched eagerly. Listening to its tick-tock, John carries his sweetheart back in imagination as he pictures the son of the tanner who once attended school here, wearing his patched clothes and little dreaming of the great part he was to play in history, as he hurried to help his father stretch the pelts at their simple factory. Next the little clock helps them recontruct Grant's days as a student at West Point where his reserve and steady, slow mind contrasted with his expert horsemanship and keen knowledge of military strategy. A failure as a business man, unable to sell real estate, Grant's great opportunty came in the early battles of the Civil War. In quick unison the victories of Paducah, Henry, Donalson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Chickamauga, Petersburg, the Wilderness and Appamatox are pictured by John Hoyt, with Grant's figure rising above the smoke of abttle, mounted on horseback, chewing a black cigar, calm, practical, masterful. "Lee was a traitor to his country, Ethel," John teasingly informs his sweetheart. "His country was the South," she replies indignantly.

A veteran of the Civil War joins them, hobbling on his cane, but his eyes alight with enthusiasm as he says: "He was the greatest general that ever lived," and recalls Grant's gallant leadership and calm courage during those far away days. Henri Chenault, a French soldier during the World War, and decorated for bravery at Verdun, enters the schoolhouse, and recognizes John, his former buddy overseas. Presenting him to Ethel, John asks him to settle the argument for them, and he replies that he has visited the impressive tomb of Napoleon, and read of the exploits of Caesar, Hannibal and Alexander, but Grant was the greatest of them all. "Not greater than General Lee," protested Ethel, and, courteously, the Frenchman conceded that they were both great leaders of their respective causes. Then John pictures Grant's days as president, and, looking at the little clock, they see his honest face, troubled and anxious, commanding his cabinet members to end the corruption of those times, and devoting his last efforts to that cause.

In the spring, Ethel and John return to her home in Virginia. Together they stroll through the old mansion and garden where Lee was once entertained, and she pictures the beautiful, gracious life of this southern gentleman. They see him at prayer, asking God to guide him in the right way, and, later, leading his men bravely against the northern forces. Finally the picture of the dignified surrender at Appamatox courthouse comes before them. "General Grant was a great man, but not as great as John Hoyt!" Ethel states, smiling. "General Lee was a great man—but not as great as Ethel Stannard!" her lover replies. And all differences are forgotten, as they embrace.

NIGHT WORK

Edith May Parker Drama File No. 10679

"TELEPHONE for you, Miss Morrison." Mae saw her landlady's eyes follow her suspiciously. Over the wires the rasping voice warned her to carry out her instructions,—or else. "But . . ." she pleaded. The click at the other end shut off argument. As she turned toward the stairs the landlady barred the way, arms akimbo, and snapped that Mae could go back to her room when and if she paid her rent. Wearily the girl pulled up her coat collar and walked out into the drizzling rain. If she didn't follow her orders to act as a kidnapping decoy she would be rubbed out by Danny Colton's gang. Nobody had ever defied Danny Colton, and not even his own gang knew exactly who he was, that is nobody except Buck Peyton, his right hand man. Death lurked in the shadows. If she had money she could try to skip town, but as it was——. As she looked into the murky waters sluggishly moving under the bridge, her jaw set. Pausing irresolutely at the railing, she prepared to jump when a hand restrained her. Incredulously she heard a harsh voice asking if five hundred dollars would help. As she allowed the tall man to lead her away from the bridge, he told he was in love with a dame who had fallen for another guy. The five hundred dollars would be hers if Mae would frame this Jerry Norton. Giving her a hundred dollars on account, the tall fellow stopped in front of a hotel and sent her up to Room 326. If she didn't come down in half an hour, he said, he'd bring Judith in on the scene. Weak from hunger and exhaustion, Mae rapped at 326. She heard the door open. Everything spun dizzily. When she opened her eyes she saw Jerry Norton bending over her solicitously. "I was starved," she apologized, and Jerry ordered a meal. Then came a knock and a beautiful girl stepped into the room and stared accusingly. Mae felt her heart constrict at the scene that followed and as Judith swept out of Jerry's life, Mae hated herself for hurting this fine sensitive stranger. But as she tried to sympathize with Jerry, everything went dark again and Jerry, learning that Mae was ill from exposure, arranged for her to remain on under his care. It was three weeks before she was well enough to sit up, weeks during which Jerry was in constant attendance. One day he kissed her, but when a package with four hundred dollars and a note, "Thanks, kid. It worked." came, Mae knew she couldn't go on. Bleakly she decided to walk out of Jerry's life as soon as she was strong enough. Meanwhile Jerry held her in his arms and told her he loved her. Realizing it would only be harder as time went on, Mae packed. Jerry, returning unexpectedly, stared at the packed bags, and as she tried haltingly to explain he placed his fingers over her lips and told her he knew who she was since the day she told him her name. The fellow who hired her had been Buck Peyton and he, Jerry, was Danny Colton! Mae stood paralysed while Jerry pleaded for a chance to go straight with her, and as their lips met at last, the past was forever obliterated for Jerry and Mae.

OBJECT MATRIMONY

Linda H. Norris Comedy Drama File No. 10695

AT school Evelyn looked through horn rimmed glasses at the other co-eds gaily crossing the campus escorted by the handsome football men. Her smooth forehead wrinkled as she looked down at her algerbra book, and rising hastily she proceeded to her own room on a side street. Her room mate Genevieve looked up quizzically at Evelyn's tempestuous entrance and as Evelyn gave away to an outburst on how she too wanted to be loved and cared for, Genevieve gave a long whistle and exclaimed, "Boy, that from you. I thought you were a Frigidaire." Evelyn hurled a history book across the room and as she flung herself full length upon the bed in one of her rare displays of temper. Genevieve consoled her and suggested that maybe if instead of studying all day Saturday, Evelyn would come to a football game she'd feel better. But at the game it was not better. Everywhere girls clung to the arms of stalwart and admiring escorts and when Evelyn gazed with quickened pulse at Harold Stewart, the football sensation, as he made a dramatic touchdown, there was a rush of girls to the field after the game and in an instant Harold was surrounded. Dismally she realized she had been day dreaming. Back in their small room that evening, Evelyn pored over the evening paper disconsolately. Suddenly she set her jaw firmly as she read a matrimonial ad, whimsically phrased, in the town paper. Genevieve looked at her as if she had lost her senses, as Evelyn began composing an answer, and when a few days later, Evelyn waved an envelope in which the advertiser evinced interest in her, Genevieve gasped in gloomy misgiving while Evelyn grimly wrote that she would meet the advertiser on the corner of Bedford and Fulton, and each would wear a red carnation. At the appointed time, enthusiasm somewhat on the wane as she thought of the madness of this adventure, Evelyn paced up and down. Suddenly a tall young man addressed her familiarly and as she started at sight of his black face, she made excuses and tried to escape. To her horror he grabbed her purse and darting into a waiting car rode off. In dismay Evelyn realized she could hardly report him to the police since any explanation would reveal her own shameful part in the affair. Eyes blinded with hot tears, she rushed on toward her home when she became uncomfortably aware of a car stalking her. Quickening her pace, she saw the car stop and a tall young man lifted his hat and asked, "Is this your purse?" Gratefully she took it and as he asked, "For the second time, may I take you home?" she stared. Hastily he apologized for the distress he caused her but explained that it was all part of a fraternity initiation and visibly trembling, she let him explain how sorry he was, Evelyn started once again as he told her he was Harold Stewart and he thought she was a mighty good sport, that's what. Looking at the flushed, averted cheek, Harold wondered how this pretty thing had escaped his attention before, and while Evelyn blushed a fiery red, her great adventure asked softly if she would let him try to atone for his conduct at the football dance Saturday night!

THE LOST GENERATION

John Bastecki Drama File No. 10694

IN the corridor of his spacious home John Pine paces up and down. As the doctor comes out of the bedroom, John rushes to him and learns that a baby girl had been born to his marriage. "What is it?" he shouts as the doctor looks at him pityingly. "Your wife," answers the physician, "is dead." In a paroxysm of grief, John springs into the darkened room and moans at the side of the woman he loved more than life. Days later as he sits brooding before his hearth, the baby cries, and a look of maniacal loathing comes into John's eyes as he recalls that it is this child who took his wife from him. In his agony he seizes the child and walking to the forest, some miles from him home, deposits the baby under a tree and walks frenziedly back to his home. Dawn brings comprehension to him and he returns frantically for his baby only to find that she is gone.

Meanwhile the child has been found by Smith, a hermit, who, touched by the helpless baby's wails, has taken the little one into his humble hut and christening the child, Audrey, brings her up as his own daughter. Audrey early learns the freedom of the woods and grown to lovely girlhood, she often sees on her daily walks, a luxurious car speed past. One night there is a terrific storm and the next morning, while watching for the car, Audrey discovers it crashed into a tree. Hastening to the wreck, she discovers a handsome young man pinned under the wheel. She helps him out and hastily improvises bandages for his injuries. They fall in love and thereafter Bill comes every Sunday to see Audrey. On one such visit they hear a scream inside and rushing into the house find Smith dying from one of his recurrent heart attacks. Between gasps he tells how he found Audrey in the woods, then is still forever.

Bill takes the strioken Audrey home with him but while he is out trying to find passable clothes for the forest girl, Bill's father arrives and, calling Audrey unfit to take her place as Bill's wife, drives her away. A year later the doorbell rings and Bill comes out to find a basket with a baby in it and a note from Audrey saying she is entrusting their child. Dorothy, to him since she hasn't the means to bring up the child properly. Bill searches frantically for the girl he loves but she has vanished into the night and John realizes that Audrey is his own daughter. Bleakly he tells Bill how, in remorse for having deserted his child, he had adopted Bill from an orphanage.

Years pass. Audrey weak from starvation faints in a park and is rushed to the hospital where, on her recovery she is given a job scrubbing floors. One day she notices the name Dorothy Pines on a patient's bed and discovering that her own child has been struck by a car, she comes each day to tell stories to the seven year old child. There one day Bill and John discover her and after Bill has taken Audrey in his arms never to let her go again, John tells his story and begs for forgiveness, and the deferred wedding at last takes places.

RECKLESS YOUTH

Laurie M. Quillian Drama File No. 10692

WHEN his mother strokes his hair and murmurs, "No girl will ever be good enough for you, son," Jack Cleighorn, brilliant young attorney smiles indulgently. But when he falls in love with Elizabeth, a beautiful and talented girl, his mother raises every possible objections. After the honeymoon, Mrs. Cleighorn insists that her son and his wife come home to live with her, pleading that she can't bear the thought of living alone in the huge house, and Elizabeth, although she dreads the inevitable complications, is too much in love with Jack to raise objections. From the first Mother Cleighorn complains when Elizabeth plays the piano, and refuses to let Elizabeth make salads or dainty desserts for Jack, claiming that the cook will brook no interference. Then baby Ellen is born. Mother Cleighorn insists on raising the child as she raised Jack and the day the nurse quits she urges Elizabeth to assert herself. After one of Mrs. Cleighorn's high handed demonstrations, Elizabeth at last informs her mother-in-law that she is going to raise her child in her own way. Meanwhile Mother Cleighorn has been estranging the young people, making Jack feel that he has made a bad mistake in marrying Elizabeth, and when at last she insists that Ellen be sent to France and educated in a convent, Elizabeth realizes that there are no lengths to which the jealous woman will not go to break up her home. Unable to endure the thought of being parted from her baby, Elizabeth at last decides she cannot stand this any longer and she runs away with Ellen. Jack, aghast at his loss, tries every possible means of following her, but is unable to find her.

Meanwhile Elizabeth opens a kindergarten and teaches to support her child. Ellen grows up and is sent to college where she distinguishes herself as a gay, if not wild co-ed. One day Ellen comes home to find her mother crying softly over a newspaper clipping, and Elizabeth shows her the clipping telling of the election of John Creighorn to the governorship of the state. Informed that Cleighorn is her own father, Ellen decides to leave home, get a position as dancer in the capitol city and so meet and sound the new governor. However, her reckless plans meet an unexpected obstacle when, in spite of her beauty and talent she is unable to get a position. Starving, she is flattening her nose against a restaurant window when a girl offers her a meal and friendship. However, when she accompanies her new friend to a night club the rap is pinned on her when the girls and their escorts are caught robbing a patron of a bracelet. The others escape, but Ellen is jailed, and gives her name as Bessie Brown. One day, in prison where she gets herself in trouble for daring to protest against the inhuman treatment of another girl, she sees Governor Cleighorn pass, and impetuously calls out. "Father!" The governor stops, but the officials tell him the girl is crazy and put her in solitary confinement. However, one of the other prisoners informs the governor who investigates and discovers the whole truth. The prison conditions are reformed and Ellen leads the repentant governor back to Elizabeth still beautiful and charming. Mother Cleighorn, long remorseful for causing her son unhappiness welcomes Elizabeth and Ellen back and the Governor and his wife leave for a second honeymoon abroad.

THE ARROW IN THE DARK

H. C. Harbach Drama File No. 10680

IN the early morning hours, little Lizette slips into her cotton frock and sabots and prepares a steaming breakfast for Jean, her father. Following this, the child takes complete charge of the household tasks, baking and sweeping and feeding the live stock while her father drives the cattle into the picturesque little village of Chauvirey and sells them, taking time out for several glasses of wine. At night, he returns home to his motherless little daughter, falling across her bed in a drunken stupor. Attempting to fulfill her mother's place, Lizette grows up knowing none of the joys of childhood, friendless and embittered. When her father dies in the village tavern, she realizes that her sacrifice have been in vain. Cheated out of all that makes life worth while, Lizette becomes an embittered spinster, seeking the life of a recluse. Monsieur LeMaitre, prefect of the police, is her only friend, ignoring her sarcasm. He oftens calls on the lonely woman. When his son, Robert, returns to Chauvirey from school, he, too, performs many little acts of kindness for Lizette. One day he confides to her that he is to marry Marie, a village girl, whom he has loved since childhood. Shortly after this, Marie receives an anonymous letter, written on green paper, with purple ink, stating that Robert has been involved in a scandal while at school. When she confronts her lover with this, he at once denies it, and seeing that she doubts him, breaks their engagement, saying that there can be no love without faith.

Following this, anonymous notes, written in the same manner and hinting with diabolical cleverness at real or imaginary scandals, are received by several members of the community, causing many broken hearts, and not a few suicides and divorces. Monsieur LeMaitre realizes that he is dealing with a victim of graphomania, a mental pecularity causing its victims to enjoy satisfaction through making others suffer. As he collects the notes, the prefect tries to think of some way in which he can trap the person guilty of this sadistic behaviour. Realizing her mistake, Marie pleads with Roberts to forgive her, but his sensitive nature is so wounded that he feels he can no longer love her. At last the prefect hires a woman whom he introduces as his wife, and soon a flood of libellous letters against her character are sent to him, all of which he has printed in the paper, hoping that in some way he will find who has posted them. He watches the newstand, but is unable to discover anyone whose behaviour is suspicious. Suddenly the letters stop, and all methods of tracing the criminal are gone. As he is returning to his cottage one evening a veiled figure attempts to slip under his door a libellous letter, and he confronts Lizette! As he takes his old friend by the arm, and leads her, trembling and silent, he recalls a ragged, lonely child, driving the cows home while other little girls were at play, and guides Lizette to his cottage instead of the jail. Here he finds that Robert has received a note from Marie, threatening suicide by drowning, and, with his son and Lizette, hastens to the river.

Just as she casts herself into the water, Robert arrives, and saves Marie. When he takes her in his arms, Lizette weeps, and her bitterness vanishes. From that moment, her kindness is known throughout the village, and the prefect keeps his secret.

ABOARD A COMET

Leslie A. Croutch Drama File No. 10702

TERROR reigned on earth for in the year 4000 A. D., the sensitive astronomical instruments of the scientists warned of catastrophe through the coming of the great comet. In his cell in the Siberian steppes where he had been sent for daring to protest against the Bolshevic enslavement of man, Barry Keith heard his gaolers shiver in terror as they waited the zero hour. In the sky the greenish light of the great comet grew blinding in intensity. Lightning flashed. Tidal waves swept the land. And huge chunks of earth were sucked up by the tail of the whirling comet.. Suddenly Barry's cell was drawn with a mighty force through the air while its occupant, stunned into suspended animation slept as a dead man. Eons later, long after earth, sun and stars had faded into dust, a chance contact of the comet and another fiery mass shook Barry's cell so violently that he was awakened to life. More than half dead and consumed by a terrible thirst and hunger, the earth visitant dragged himself to a nearby crystal clear spring, and as he drank the strange tasting waters, a miraculous change took place, for the liquid, vitalized by a magnetic force, conveyed upon him the gifts of eternal youth and life! Leaping to his feet, Barry began an exploration of the strangely colored comet. Scaling crags and cliffs with superhuman agility he found himself suddenly seized from behind and carried, bound and struggling to a palace. There he met the breathtakingly beautiful and notorious Princess Xona, whose lovely green eyes were curiously lifeless in expression. Before Barry's startled eyes the girl turned her green death ray on one of her blundering attendants and stared glassily while he dissolved into nothingness before their very eyes. All about Barry saw the fear with which the Princess was regarded, and beside himself that one girl should combine such beauty and shamelessness, he defied her. Instantly she sent for the guard, and with his bare hands, Barry disposed of one after another until the Princess, enraged beyond endurance, turned her death ray upon him. However, the green death passed harmlessly through Barry's body, the vibrations of which were of different frequency. With a grin, Barry advanced upon the dumfounded Royal lady and turning her upon his knee spanked her before her Royal guard. That night, however, as he lay asleep a green slimy thing crawled upon him and too late he flung it from him. The deadly poisons had their effect, and to all intents and purposes Barry appeared dead although he could see, hear, and feel all. Under orders of the Princess Barry was buried under a huge slab where, three days later, he recovered, rose, and proceeded to the Princess' apartment bent on revenge. However, to his amazement he saw a deep eyed girl who, visited by a cruel black cloaked giant, was hypnotized into the evil creature Barry had met before. The next night Barry appeared to the Princess before her hypnotic trance, and learning she was under the power of her uncle, Barry awaited the giant, grappled with the cruel potentate and destroyed him forever. And with the Princess Xona as his bride, amidst the cheers of his people, Barry Keith faced eternal ecstacy.

SECRET LOVE

Myrtle D. Marmor Drama File No. 10627

EVEN from his childhood little Bill had protected his beautiful younger sister, Rosamunde, from the blows of a harsh stepfather. As the years passed and Rosamunde at last chose of her many adorers the handsome and powerfully built Ben Gorman. Bill attributed his misgivings to his old feeling that no man was good enough for Rosamunde. Time marched on. Returning to the United States after many years of absence in the Phillipines, Bill was appalled to find the farm on which he had left Rosamunde and her bridegroom, deserted now and from the neighbors Bill heard disquieting rumors that the ghost of Ben Gorman still haunted the grounds. In a frenzy, Bill made inquiries until at last he was directed to where his sister was. With a heart filled with forboding, Bill knocked at the door of the luxurious mansion and as the maid ushered him into the room, Bill gave a little cry as his sister, more beautiful than ever, flung herself in his arms. From her Bill, learned bit by bit the story of what had happened.

Shortly after her marriage, Rosamunde's love for Ben was to change into a deep repulsion as, brutal and inconsiderate, he turned to drink. Returning night after night drunk, Ben would beat Rosamunde violently and then, with the return of sobriety, would heap his penitence upon his shuddering and bruised wife. Silent, uncomplaining, Rosamunde sought to hide her suffering from the neighbors, but during a party at her home, Ben suddenly shouted that his wife had refused to invite a town woman with whom he was having an open affair. Realizing that Ben was drunk and not responsible for what he was saying, the guests had hastily left. Months of agony had followed for Rosamunde and then one night, after a debauch, Ben had returned and beaten her so violently that she had fallen ill. Remorseful, Ben had sent for Dr. Leeds, and as Rosamunde raised her eyes to the kindly face of the middled aged doctor, a sudden feeling had rocked both. Rosamunde needed frequent visits to the physician, and during each successive meeting, both realized they were in love. Not until the day Ben, suffering another relapse, caused Rosamunde to call again on the doctor, did he ask her did she really love her husband, and as he read his answer in her averted eyes, he asked if she would marry him if she were free. The next day, Rosamunde informed Ben she was getting a divorce. Drink sotted as he was, he tried to hold her, but she had suffered too much to stay on. The day the divorce was final, Rosamunde and Dr. Leeds were quietly married. Gently Leeds kissed her, and as Rosamunde compared his tenderness to the brutality of Ben a fearful commotion on without heralded the approached of Ben who, flourishing a revolver, aimed it at Leeds. With a cry, Rosamunde threw herself between the two men, and Ben, drunkenly swaying, turned the gun on himself, blaming Dr. Leeds as he fell. However when finger prints were taken, only Ben's and Rosamunde's were found on the gun, and as Ben remained in a deep stupor, Rosamunde was held for attempted murder. Weeks passed before Ben, regaining consciousness and learning that he had caused the arrest of the woman he loved, confessed the truth and, dying, left his hoarded wealth unconditionally to Rosamunde.

Greatly moved by his sister's story, Bill learned that of late Ben's ghost was seen on his old property. Investigating, Bill shot at the strange apparition and tracked down Ben's sister, curiously disguised as the dead man's ghost, to depreciate the value of Rosamunde's property. From a sealed letter to be opened only in case of a will dispute, Bill found that Ben had anticipated action on the part of his insane sister. The ghost laid, the past buried, Bill induced Rosamunde and her beloved Dr. Leeds to come with him for a much needed rest in the Phillipines and the three sailed toward a new world.

HAPPINESS RESTORED

Emily Keplinger Drama File No. 10637

CHILDHOOD sweethearts, Charlotte and Tommy had known always that some day they would marry. For a year after their wedding, Charlotte continued teaching, until Tommy, advancing steadily in business, urged her to give it up. Living simply yet smartly, the young couple found happiness in the entertainment of their friends. Then Charlotte's baby was born and from the first proved a sickly, ailing child. All the town doctors seemed helpless and at last, Leta Forbes, recently moved to town, suggested Dr. Blake ,a baby specialist. Slowly little Nancy began to improve under the handsome young doctor's professional care, and the Kerns, unable sufficiently to show their gratitude to Blake ,invited him frequently to their home. A friendship gradually sprang up between and Leta Forbes, who, with her elderly husband, was always moving from town to town as their credit became exhausted, decided to amuse herself with manipulating the lives of these three people. Charlotte, exhausted by the long strain of Nancy's illness, readily yielded to suggestion and when Dr. Blake, professionally consulted, advised a rest, Leta added her suggestions that Charlotte pay more attention to her clothes and complexion and realize the full potentialities of her beauty. Amazed by the change in appearance, Charlotte began spending Tommy's money with a reckless disregard. Gorgeous clothes, masseurs, beauticians, and regular visits to Dr. Blake had their effect in keeping Tommy more firmly chained to business as he sought to provide for the new Charlotte. Returning home with Nancy and the nurse from the resort, Charlotte began entertaining lavishly. Where before simplicity and wholesomeness had been her greatest charm, now a glamor enhanced Charlotte's appearance. Before his brilliant wife, Tommy seemed dull and staid, at least he did as Leta pointed out. Once or twice, Tommy tried to curb Charlotte's spending, but at her insistence that "they had to keep up," Tommy wearily dropped the subject.

Then Leta arranged a weekend party. Spurred on by Leta, Charlotte danced recklessly with Dr. Blake, and aroused by the feelings he tried unsuccessfully to stem, out of loyalty to Tommy, Charlotte gave him her lips. In his arms, both were swept by a wave of emotion, and before the weekend was up, Charlotte, carried away by Blake's professions of love, asked Tommy for divorce. Stunned, hurt, he yielded while Blake, embarrassed by Charlotte's impulsiveness, and unwilling to chance the effects of such a scandal on his career, put her off. Returning, a divorcee, Charlotte, eagerly called Dr. Blake, but making violent love to her, he confessed at last that he was going to be married to a wealthy society woman who could further his career. However, they could still be everything to each other. Repelled, Charlotte askd Blake to leave, and alone, contemplated the ruin of her life. Gaily Leta called, but Charlotte found gaiety had lost its charm. After a week of agony, Charlotte swallowed her pride and came to beg Tommy's forgiveness. In the small flat to which Charlotte's extravagances had reduced him. Tommy reminded her that now she had everything she wanted, didn't she, but as he saw the haughty, furred Charlotte, crumpled and pleading, Tommy's heart melted, and drawing her into his arms, he whispered, they'd have to start all over, from the beginning and Charlotte smiled happily through her tears.

Teddy is induced to elope with Archer, but Ken, learning that Archer's burning haste is due to his desire for Teddy's money, foils the elopcment, and braving all Teddy's invective as he reveals that he has changed places with Archer's chauffeur, returns with Teddy on the train. They are mistaken for honeymooners by a kindly old couple, and as they writhe in embarrassment, the old couple try to place Ken's resemblance to someonce they know. A few days later, Ken is visited by handsomely costumed foreigners, who bow low before him and greet him as Prince Cuthbert Illdorf Grelia. To his amazement Ken learns that when a baby son was born to the Queen Roxana, her brother, to gain control of the kingdom, had bribed a servant whose baby girl was born the same day, to change children. The girl had grown up as princess and Ken, the real prince had been brought up as the son of the servant, Cutler. Cutler, pressed, admits the truth, and Ken at first happy, soon learns that with the new position of Prince, goes the responsibility of marrying the Princess Ulania. Ken tries to withdraw, but Teddy stabs him with her contempt as she reminds him of the kidnapping escapade, and tells him his life belongs to his country and to his beautiful mother, Roxana.

With the blessings of the old couple of the train, who had led to Ken's discovery by his countrymen who had combed the United States for their prince, Ken leaves and with a flying of banners, a fanfare of trumpets, and shouts of joy from his subjects, the prinoe comes into his own. Roxana, Ken finds, beneath her majesterial countenance, is a mother whose joy at having her son in her arms is no less touching for being royal. But the Princess Ulania, who is already on her way as his betrothed, is a disagreeable angular woman, sheathed in precious stones. The plans for the wedding proceed, but as Ken comes down the aisle there is a commotion as a girl faints. Ken cspies Teddy, and forgetting everything, he lifts her in his arms and bringing her into an anteroom, shuts the door on the scandalized guests. Ulania gives away to an outburst which shocks her listeners, but inside Ken is forcing from the lips of the reluctant Teddy, the statement that she loves him and couldn't stay away. And as he comes out with Teddy's hand in his, he finds Ulania has left, and Roxana, being a mother, understands, and her people take up the bravos for the young lovers.

McGUIRE'S DEFENSE

Pauline B. Simkins Drama File No. 10619

DISCOVERING that his traps have been robbed of the silver foxes whose traces still remain in the steel clamps, McGuire returns to his cabin thoughtfully. That night he hikes through the snow to see Angus Lowry, brawny Northwest Mountcd Policeman, and admitted by Jean, Lowry's daughter, enlists the aid of the Redcoat. Lowry is immediately suspicious of Jules, McGuire's half breed assistant, but McGuire, remembering evidences of Jules' sportmanship, refuses to believe Jules guilty until he has definite proof. Lowry promises his aid and as McGuire is leaving he sees Jean bent over a book. They begin talking and before McGuire has left Jean has offered to lend him some books. McGuire makes the return of these an excuse for coming back frequently but one day he finds Steve Rawlings, an oily-tongued speculator, and remembering the hand to hand battle he had had when Rawlings tried to cheat him in the sale of furs, McGuire bristles. Lowry notices the hostility of the two men, but thereafter, when McGuire comes back, he finds Jean has erected a defense against him that he cannot break down. Some days later, McGuire discovers a fine silver fox in his trap and as he skins it and informs Jules of its worth he is convinced that Jules is innocent of the fur robberies. As Jules and McGuire sit before their fire, Jules, unusually voluble talks of his sister, Newana, whom he is going to see at the post. Some days later, Angus, making a call upon McGuire, is startled to find him bent over the prostrate body of a man. They turn the body over and find Steve Rawlings, McGuire's knife buried in his back. McGuire's alibi is insufficient, and Lowry is forced to arrest him, respecting, however, McGuire's wish to say nothing to Jean. The next morning, handcuffed, McGuire proceeds down the trail with his captor. Night falls and they build a campfire. The next morning, however, when McGuire wakens Lowry, the policeman asks what's the matter with him, it's still dark. Gradually the realization comes to both men that Lowry is snow blind. At the mercy of the man he is arresting for murder, Lowry stumbles to his feet, but McGuire assures him he won't desert him, and hands free of their shackles, McGuire leads the helpless policeman to the trading post and to the astonishment of the rough traders, gives himself up. The trial brings out a tremendous gathering, but as the testimony mounts against McGuire, Jean Lowry enters with Jules. Jules mounts the stand and confesses he killed Rawlings. Two years ago, he asserts, he sold furs to Rawlings and subsequently Rawlings refused to pay him. Knowing no other redress, and realizing that his sister was slowly starving, Jules broke into Rawling's storehouse, was caught, and ruthlcssly sent to prison. On his rclease, Rawlings spread the story so that only McGuire would employ him. Then, on his return to the post, Jules had discovercd that the villainous Rawlings had gotten his sister, Newana, in trouble. Swearing to get him, Jules had found him stealing furs from McGuire's cabin. He had pounced on him with McGuire's knife, but when he had confessed to McGuire, and dully asserted that no white jury would free a half breed, McGuire had given him money and helped him escape. Jules had just discovered, however, that McGuire was on trial for his crime. In an uproar, the court frees Jules and Jean, coming over to thank McGuire for saving her father, confesses that the reason for her coolness had been a letter Rawlings had read, her claiming that McGuire was a fugitive from justice. All doubts removed now, McGuire takes Jean in his arms as the courtroom clears.

FOREST LANE

Dennis J. Daly Drama File No. 10630

WITH waning enthusiasm, young Joe Dealing looked about the drab two room depot that was to serve him during his employment as night operator in Mintern. His predecessor explained carefully the schedule of trains, assured him that he faced the prospect of a pretty solitary existence here, and then, bidding him goodnight, left. For the first few days Joe amused himself by tacking up pictures and pennants on the wall and greeting the train men as they dropped off mail. One morning, just as he was leaving, Joe notice a girl looking disappointedly about the station. When he learned that she had expected to be met at the train by her cousins, the Martens, who lived across Forest Lane, a lonely strip of wood, Joe offered to carry her satchel. At first formal, Stella soon found herself liking the shy young boy, and when they reached the Martens she insisted that he come in and meet her friends. From then on Joe was to see Stella and her cousins frequently. When Stella returned home, her cousin Nellie, a good natured popular girl dropped in at the station frequently to bring news to Joe about Stella, and to invite Joe to the regular Sunday afternoon gatherings at the Marten home. After one such afternoon, Joe found Nellie laughingly offering to walk back with him. While the other young people smiled, Nellie and Joe started out and arriving at the depot, stopped to get warm before the fire. Suddenly Nellie looked up into Joe's face, and, laughter gone, asked in a tense voice, "Will you kiss me, Joe?" adding, "I'll pass it on to Stella for you when I see her." Bewildered, Joe thought it best to regard the incident as a joke and Nellie returned home. That evening, Lewis Clayton, one of the boys who had been at the Marten home in the afternoon, knocked at the door and explained he had come to the country store for some medicine for his cold, but his horse had thrown him. Seeing Lewis was ill, Joe offered to catch Clayton's hores in Forest Lane, and finding the animal with its bridal rein tangled under its foot, Joe skillfully approached the animal, reputed to be skittish, and in a few moments had freed the horse and returned it to Clayton. It was while checking up on the coal several days later that Joe discovered the corpse of a woman. In the investigation that followed, when Joe was to be unable to produce a single person who could alibi him, and when the body was proved conclusively to be that of Nellie Marten, Joe was to undergo terrific mental agony. Stella remained staunch in her belief of Joe's innocence, but although after hours of gruelling and endless protestations of his guiltlessness, Joe was to be officially absolved, the stigma of the unsolved crime remained subtly attached to him. Years passed. Joe was promoted to another station and through his unofficial service in solving a series of robberies, was given a position on the police force. Then one night, during a terrific storm, Joe was reading a western story. A flash of lightning illumined the page and suddenly he started as he read, "it took time and patience to untie the knot drawn taut by long use." In a flash he recalled the few moments it had taken him to untie the horse for Lewis Clayton who alone could have hidden the body. Instigating a long search, facilitated by his police connections, Joe finally traced Lewis to the death house where he was soon to be hanged for another murder, and from unwilling lips forced a confession. And free at last, Joe returned to ask Stella a long deferred question.

INTO THE LIGHT

Otie Frasier Drama File No. 10542

STUDENTS in the same conservatory of music, Dorothy Wright and Harold Woods become acquainted when they play a violin duet together at a recital. Both admire the other's pronounced talent, and find, as well, a mutual personal attraction. Together they discuss music, their common passion, as they are seated in quaint little restaurants, and one evening discover that they are in love. The whole conservatory is delighted when its two most talented pupils announce their engagement and plan to study in Europe after their marriage. Just two months before the event, Dorothy noticcs that the notes of a composition she is studying blurr before her eyes. She consults a noted occulist, who orders immediate treatment. As it is necessary for Harold to sail at once, in order to receive the benefit of a valuable scholarship which he has been awarded, he reluctantly leaves his fiancee, who agrees to join him abroad two months later. Shortly after this, the occulist tells Dorothy that she must go to a home for the blind and discontinue the use of her eyes for an indefinite period, since a serious condition has developed which may result in blindness, although with the proper care it can probably be eventually remedied. Alone in her room, the sensistive girl fights back the tears as she rcalizes that she must renounce her two great loves——music and Harold. Knowing that he will never consent to leave her if he learns the truth, Dorothy writes Harold several letters, each time postponing their marriage, without offering an explanation, since the unhappy girl feels that she would only be a hindrance to the man she loves.

Bravely, Dorothy attempts to adjust herself to her new life in the home for the blind, continuing her career in music and literature during the brief moments that she is allowed the use of her eyes, and listening while friends read to her. Eagerly, she follows the news of Harold's success, but no longer writes to him, and at last he believes that she does not care for him. Marilyn Grosvenor, an attractive student of Harold's, becomes infatuated with her teacher, and one day Dorothy reads of their impending marriage. Taking up her violin, Dorothy plays the sad, sweet strains of Dvorak's Largo, and later confesses to her mother that her love for Harold is undiminished, after two years of separation. Neuralgia has caused the condition of her eyes to become steadily worse, and at last they are so badly swollen that eye specialists tell the young woman that unless blood is drawn from them by leeches, all hope of regaining her sight will be gone; on the other hand, such an operation might easily result in her death if the poison circulates into her system. Dorothy insists on going through with the operation, but wistfully expresses a wish to her mother that she might see Harold once more, although denying this, later.

Impulsively, Dorothy's mother goes to Harold who is in the city to play in his first conoert tour, and relates the whole story. Cancelling his engagement regardless of what it may mean to his career, he hurries to Dorothy. She goes through her ordeal, hands clenched, with a brave smile on her lips, and is later pronounced cured. When Marilyn releases Harold from his engagement, darkness yields to dawn for Dorothy and Harold.

DREAM HOUSE

Henrietta Thompson Drama File No. 10596

THE mirror reflected the chalky white, beautiful face of Jokia as she read the death threat. Beside her, Yosham, the beautiful maid, begged Jokia to flee, but smiling grimly Jokia said, "Where? I have no money left. Where could I go that they wouldn't find me?" Then as the door bell rang they both started violently but it was only the paper boy. As Jokia read the front page with its notice of the forthcoming marriage of Roland Staunton, famous playboy, to the wealthy society widow, Jokia picked up the phone. Calling Roland she laughed at his explanation that he was very busy just now, and asserted that she would be waiting for him in an hour at her apartment. Nervously Roland entered and as the lovely, feared body of Jokia appeared through the parted hangings, Roland breathed hard and suddenly drawing her into his arms he kissed her red lips. Furiously, Jokia freed herself from his grasp, and as he stared at her, perplexed, she informed him that she had sent for him to secure one hundred thousand dollars. His mouth fell open and pleading with her that he could not possibly attain the money, he looked after her in consternation as she informed him coolly that a detailed account of his conduct, given to the newspapers would end his very promising marriage to his widow. "I shall be waiting for you at the usual table in El Dorado at midnight," Jokia said in dismissal. Yoshami begged her mistress not to risk those gangsters by a public appearance, but Jokia shrugged her lovely shoulders and reassuring the frightened maid, left.

In El Dorado Jokia sat at her table behind the palms and waited impatiently for Roland. At midnight, however, a strangely compelling figure loomed before her, and saying, "Miss Jokia Raine?" sat down beside her. In a low voice he explained that he had been sent by Roland. The money was in his country house. Jokia could have it if she dared come for it." Furiously Jokia replied that Roland would bring the money here or she'd spill her story. The eyes of the stranger mocked, "Afraid?" and, stilling her doubts, Jokia accompanied him out to the long limousine she recognized as one of Roland's. Far out in the country they stopped and Jokia entered the strangely silent house. Immediately she knew she was a fool to have come. Then Yoshami appeared and explained that she had received a telegram saying her mistress had been hurt and asking her to take the waiting taxi. Together Jokia and the faithful little maid tried to escape, but again Donald appeared and in the same sardonic voice explained that he had been detailed to hold Jokia captive for thirty days until Roland should be safely married to his millionaire fiancee. Jokia laughed hysterically as she realized that Donald's escort might save her from the gangsters who threatened her life.

In the next few weeks, Jokia fell desperately in love with Donald who preserved his superlative courtesy and indifference to her. Dully, Jokia suspected him of being in love with Yoshami whom she caught in frequent conversations with Donald. Then one day Donald showed Jokia his island retreat, a Dream House, and as she gasped at the loveliness of the cottage, Donald explained it was for the woman he loved. Realizing what he must think of her—a blackmailer and associate of criminals, Jokia mocked at his sudden tenderness, but at last Donald convinced her it was her loved, and that Yoshami had been his confidante throughout. Happy at last, Jokia gave her lips to Donald, and Yoshami coming upon them with Donald's recently arrived brother, smiled as she turned away.

WORKING GIRL

Lynn Turner Drama File No. 10605

EAGERLY anticipating the return of her parents from their trip abroad, Jean Arden is overwhelmed by the discovery that they have both been killed in an accident. When the debts are settled, Jean is left with $500 and refusing to accept the charity of friends, moves to a small apartment and taking part time jobs begins studying secretarial work. Six months later she returns to her apartment with a happy heart—she has at last gotten a position as secretary to Ross Gaynor, Junior partner of the Gaynor Manufacturing Company. For several months Jean works steadily learning meanwhile the peccadilloes of her employer a well known club man and polo player. Having frequently arranged to send corsages to Gaynor's friends, Jean feels she knows him too well to ever fall in love with him, but when several times he tries to switch their conversations to more personal matters, Jean feels a curious quickening of her pulse. Only one thing bothers Jean, the unwelcome attentions of Barry Archer, accountant of the firm, who corners her one night when she is working late, and kisses her against her will. Jean tries to struggle free and when everything else fails, slaps Archer. He releases her sullenly and the next day again tries to make advances. When at last he realizes how contemptuous she is of him, bis infatuation turns to hate. Then one day while Gaynor is dictating, he informs Jean he is going to raise her salary. She flushes with pleasure and when he asks if she won't lunch with him in celebration, she consents. In a quaint Russian tea room, they talk easily of their ideals, their likes, their lives, and two nights later in Jean's apartment, Gaynor helps her prepare supper and as he stretches luxuriously, he asserts he has never felt so comfortable with a woman before. Ross invites Jean to see his cabin a little way up in the hills and there before a glowing fire, takes her in his arms and tells ber he loves her. Kissing Jean's misgivings away, Ross tells her that in three weeks when he returns from a business trip to New York, they will be married.

Archer looks at her balefully as Ross leaves after a hurried goodbye. The next morning Jean is called into the office of J. P. Goynor, Ross' uncle and is informed that her association with Ross is open knowledge. Jean is hurt and bewildered as he implies that she is just another adventure to his nephew and when J. P. draws out his checkbook and asks how much she wants as though she is just another girl, Jean leaves believing Ross has chosen this method of letting ber know.

Work is difficult to find but at last she secures a position as a traveling representative for a cosmetic firm. Then, one day she learns she is to have a baby and as weariness seizes her at her work, she gets a position doing fancy needlework at home. One day she faints and on the shoulder of her motherly landlady sobs out her story. Her baby son is born and life goes on.

Meanwhile Ross, misinformed as to Jean's running away, conducts a futile search for her and finally seeks consolation in night life and drink until he ends up in a sanitorium and is restored to health by Dr. Pawley, brain specialist who has been his college fraternity brotber. At about this time, Jean's son, toddling to meet her, is accidently struck by an automobile and his brain endangered, Jean is informed that only Dr. Pawley can help her. She begs him to take her case, but Jean collapses when Pawley brings his friend to see the unusal case and Jean recognizes Ross. The baby recovers, and after touching explanations, Jean and Ross are married to find happiness at long last.

GAY MONTANA

Mrs. Al Young Comedy Drama File No. 10634

INVITED by the spinster, Miss Hubbard, to help themselves to some apples from her orchard, Frances and Bertha, two of the twelve Wuerl children, fill their overall pockets so full that when Miss Hubbard asks them please to carry some sacks of wheat to the granary, neither can bend over because of the bulges the apples make. Arriving home, grunting and laughing, they stop in wonder before the threshing machine that a neigbbor, Joe Young has brought over to help their father. Bertha peers curiously, but Frances, seeing Al Young, Joe's son, is lost to everything else. Whenever Al looks at her, Frances blushes furiously but Bertha stops the others when they try to tease her. Some days later, Father Wuerl grows greatly excited as a long thin package comes for him and while his children look on wide-eyed, he unwraps a black and silver clarinet. There follows for days long off-key tunes as Father practices happily, unaware of the agony of those who have been to listen to him. With her eyes raised hopelessly skyward, Frances sweeps the floor, unable to shut the fearful noises from her sensitive ears. Suddenly she sees Al Young coming up the front walk. In her excitement, she sweeps up the .22 cartridges that her brother John has left under the bed, and without thinking tosses them into the stove. A moment later such a racket is set up as one after the other the cartridges explode that Al thinks the Wuerl ranch a veritable bedlam. Frances is miserable, but a few days later, while visiting another neighbor a bell rings and she is told to answer the telephone. Never having seen one of the "new-fangled" instruments before, she picks up the receiver gingerly, and hearing Al's voice is so excited that she shouts deafeningly in a hilarious effort to make herself understood.

At last, at a country dance one night, Bertha nudges Frances as Al comes over and shyly asks for a dance. Stammering, Frances accepts, but the other couples keep bumping into the embarrassed youngsters who can only gaze speechlessly into each other's eyes. Then Frances gets a new dress. She can hardly wait until Al sees it, but arriving at a dance with Bertha, her heart drops to her shoes as she sees Al dancing with a pretty girl in a fluffy pink dress. All evening she is inconsolable, but when it is time to go home, Al somehow contrives to drive her and Bertha home in the buggy. As he reaches the Wuerl ranch, he bends over and kisses Bertha, and as Frances' face screws up in dismay, he bends and plants a hearty kiss square on her trembling lips. That night Frances talks happily until she realizes that for several minutes Bertha has been quietly snoring besides her. However, an epidemio of the grippe soon hits the Wuerl ranch and first one and then the other catches it. Frances has a high fever and prattles deliriously while Al goes about dazedly at home, unable to eat or sleep, worrying about her. At last she recovers and the first day that Al comes he tries in vain to tell her how he feels about her but speech will not come. At last in desperation, he drops into her lap a lovely gold watch, and in turn, tongue-tied with happiness, Frances throws her arms about his neck and kisses him. At last summoning up courage, Al asks her to marry him. The weeks that follow are full of sewing and preparing Frances' trousseau. The other Wuerl children, all except John who is in Japan with the navy, come back for Frances' wedding, and as Frances hugs Bertha and tells her how happy she is, both realize the passing of their childhood, the days when they ran about the ranch, milking the cows and spoiling their clothes with berries. Bertha, seeing how excited Frances is, bravely conceals from everybody the sharp pains that tear at her side, and the wedding goes off beautifully. As the bride and groom ride off in a shower of rice, Bertha's face goes white and before anyone can reach her she faints. An examination proves she has acute appendicitis. She is rushed to the hospital but whispering, "I'm—glad—Frances—had—her—wedding," she dies. Frances' grief is immeasurable, but through her sorrows Al is there to comfort and sympathize, and with his arms about her Frances finds courage to go on, and happiness beyond expression.

DARK EYES

Tation Drama File No. 10701

THE music of the ringing voice of the mysterious singer brought all Sundown to the doors. In the streets there was a buzzing of gossips speculating on the identity of the lovely girl whose song was heard in the forest beyond the village. The spinster, Miss Scofish, warned Marie to watch out for Peter, he seemed too interested in the girl, but Marie, safe in the knowledge of Peter's devotion, laughed and pressed forward so that she too might catch a glimpse of the forest girl. The song grew nearer and as the singer danced into sight, she started at sight of the many eyes turned toward her and like a bewildered rabbit turned to flee. "Sing for us, Dark Eyes," Peter pleaded, but with a smile that had the glory of the sunrise, the girl whispered, "Someday, perhaps," and was gone.

The days that followed the village buzzed with stories of the girl Dark Eyes, and of Peter who had spoken to her. Some held that there was a touch of the supernatural about the singer. Some pitied Marie who had lost Peter to a wraith. But when Miranda Scofish advised Marie to choose another of her suitors, Marie burst into tears and ran into her house. The next day Miranda set her lips grimly as she saw Peter and Marie walking together. "Going away," Marie was protesting, "Oh, Peter," and as Peter assured her that he'd be coming back, frequently, and always he'd come to see her, his dearest friend, first, Marie realized that Peter had always regarded her as a sister. Dully she watched her world come tumbling down.

Later that evening Peter went again into the forest—alone, as he had every evening since he had seen Dark Eyes. To-night he must find her, he thought as he called frantically. Finally he dropped to the ground in despair only to start up as out of the distance he heard the haunting strain of "Dark Eyes piercing thru . . . " As the song grew nearer, Peter waited and reaching out his hand held the trembling girl fast. In words that tumbled over each other Peter told her how he loved her, wanted her and as he kissed her sweet lips she answered, "I—I—Peter—I——" then pressing a soft kiss to his mouth, broke loose from his clasp and was gone.

A year passed. The young Attorney, Tom Wharton, whom Peter had sent in his place to Sundown wrote to him constantly and through his letters Peter learned how Marie at first anxious to hear all about how Peter was getting along, had at length accepted Tom's love and was soon to be his bride. Meanwhile in the city Peter had begun anew the practice of law. His partner, Freddy Houston regarded him enviously as Peter dressed to go to the opera as guest of old man Whitby and his daughter. "You're made, m'lad," Ferridy proclaimed while Peter threw a book at him and left.

At the opera the manager announced the appearance of an old favorite and as the song, "Dark eyes piercing thru" rang through the theater, Peter blindly pushed his way past the startled Whitbys backstage and as he took Dark Eyes into his arms, she lifted shining eyes to him. "But why did you leave?" Peter asked. "My career," she somehow managed, "I thought I could give love up——" and as his lips gently met hers, she added happily, "I was wrong, Peter. Love is all that matters now."

GROTEX

Henry Randolph Munroe Drama File No. 10710

LINN TIMBERLAKE, seated in the lobby of the exclusive Grotex Club, receives a letter from his father, James Duloney Timberlake, president of the Liberty National Bank, stating that he has this day deposited ten thousand dollars to his son's credit, which will be the basis of his fortune. The rest he must develop himself; it is his wish that Linn will become vice president and assistant in the bank the following year, and he is taking this means to throw his beloved son on his own resources. Making this state of affairs known to his intimate friends, Linn adds that perhaps Anne Chantiilon, the girl he loves, will look upon him with more favor if he follows these plans and becomes a responsible citizen.

In searching through his library, Lenox Denham, a member of the club, discovers documents stating that Grotex was incorporated in 1830, and since that date held an unparalled position in Baltimore's social annals, membership passing from father son, with the result that the fatber became inactive in the club in order that young blood might perpetuate its ideals. He discovers that Simon Butler, being denied membership, gained control of a portion of Grotex stocks, and his grandson, Robert, now holds it, threatening the dissolution and financial ruin of the club. With Linn's aid, Denham proposes transferring all securities into cash. Alessandro Javan, lapidiary, is introduced to James Dulaney Timberlake through a mutual friend, and a warm bond of admiration springs up between the Egyptian and the American. The latter prevails upon Javan to address the Grotex Club, following a brilliant dinner; as he is showing them facsimiles of the world's most famous diamonds, two burglars forge admission and attempt a robbery, but Javan stops them at the point of a pistol. Plans are made to purchase a cameo of Linn's mother, carved by Javan, as a gift for Anne. The Timberlake family attend the colorful Egyptian wedding of Sitsinsit, Javan's son, to Delethi, and marvel at the grace of Aseneth, the daughter of the house, who dances at the ceremony.

Dissolution of the club is proposed by the insurgent members, but John Clark Halbert proposes that the matter be determined by secret ballot and announced at the annual banquet and cruise, which is to be arranged by Potter Krone, president, Lin Timberlake, secretary-treasurer, and Barton St. Julian. Potter purchases a bloc of the stock, selling it again to Mr. Hill, at a lesser figure than a Mr. Bliss offers, in order that the interests may remain with a member of Grotex. Commissioned, then to sell the Grotex stock, through Mr. Durant of Burke and Messicke's Exchange, Potter awaits his chance, purchasing a share of Liberty National which will procide for Margaret, his wife, and his young son, in event of his death. He is stricken with endocarditis when Durant advises him to sell, and his physician authorizes the transaction, thereby making an additional fifty thousand for Grotex. After returning home, Potter dies of a heart attack while riding, and Linn, at a football game, hurries to his house. Finding he is named executor, the young man opens a suitcase with Potter's securities and discharges his responsibilities to the bereaved family and the club.

With the aid of Javan, Linn presents a delightful entertainment at the banquet, following an eventful cruise. Old Grotex is dissolved with ceremony, while a new organization is planned and each member receives his dues. Proud of his achievments, Anne now promises to become Linn's bride.

SUPREME JUDGMENT

Mrs. Glenn Temple Drama File No. 10620

HER strivings to educate herself misunderstood by the ignorant mountain people by whom she is brought up, Marie, daughter of an Irish father and Indian mother, is turned over to a reformatory. The hardened matron orders the girl to take a bath, and Marie, never having seen a shower before, tries to follow directions. When she emerges, the matron sees that the girl has not washed her ears, and cuffs her violently. In self defense, Marie strikes back and, branded incorrigible, is detailed to solitary confinement. Years pass and the stoic uncommunicativeness of the girl is triumphantly assumed to be an indication that her spirit has been broken. Only the visiting Father sees the character of the girl and at last gains permission to take her from the reformatory on probation. Free of the grim walls, Marie shows a readiness to learn that gratifies the old Priest and he teaches her all he knows. Marie interests herself in the Priest's mission work and meets Stephen Day, young attorney who is studying sociology in the slums. From Stephen, Marie gains a deeper insight into criminology, and a series of articles she is writing attracts the attention of a publisher who contracts for a weekly story. Marie soon falls in love with Stephen whose eyes are fixed on the goal of District Attorney, but she soon realizes Stephen's calculations make no place for a little half breed. The old Priest dies and Marie carries on, devoting the proceeds of her articles to the establishment of milk stations for the poor. At one of her missions, Marie sees a ragged looking fellow with haunted eyes. She gives him food and learns that he is Paul, a released convict who is trying to go straight. Stephen, appointed D. A. at last, elatedly comes to impart the good news to Marie, but finds her alone with Paul, and misunderstanding, coldly withdraws. Vainly she tries to explain, and as the door slams, Marie listlessly refuses Paul's sympathy and asks him to go. Paul makes a brave attempt to go straight, but failure to get a position because of his criminal record, and the temptations offered by the gang finally cause him to go back to the old life. Meanwhile, Stephen has carried on a ruthless campaign against the underworld, and at last gangland decides to put him on the spot. Paul is ordered to fire the fatal shot, but haunted by memory of Marie's misery over Stephen, the boy at last goes to Marie and warns her that Stephen's life is in danger. Beside herself, Marie phones Stephen and begs him not to pay his intended visit to the slums. Over the phone Stephen's voice grows harsh as he asks if she is afraid he will catch her boy friend. Helpless, Marie prays for Stephen's escape and proceeds to the intersection where Stephen is to meet his death. At the zero hour, she hurls herself in front of him and the bullet intended for Stephen plows through her body. Police seize the gangsters, Stephen has Marie carried to the hospital. For days she hovers between life and death, and at last recovering, smiles up into Stephen's anxious face. The gang is caught, Paul alone escaping with a light sentence, and Stephen finds happiness with Marie.

THE MURDER OF MRS. HALL

Austin Day Drama File No. 10645

HENRY OATIS, a young inventor, proposes that he and Jack Young, who shares the room next to his, leave the heat of the city and spend their vacation at a cottage on the beach. Agreeing to this, Jack throws his few possessions into a suitcase, and, in Henry's car, the two drive near the ocean. Here they find a quiet cottage, one of a group known as the Sanford apartments, and prepare to enjoy a restful summer. Equipping one room as his work shop, Henry busily experiments on his invention; this, as he explains to Jack, is a radio which will pick up messages and conversation through the air without an official broadcast. At the same time it will record these messages on a dictaphone. In this way, it can be planted several miles away from a given spot and record the conversation held within, an invaluable aid in detecting crime. So absorbed is Henry in his work that he takes little time for swimming and tennis, leaving Jack alone. After a vigorous dip in the ocean, Jack is lying at ease upon the sand, acquiring a tan when an attractive young girl skips past him and dives into the water. Later, she, too, is seated upon the sand. Jack attempts to start a conversation by asking her if they have not met before, but she ignores this obvious bit of flirtation, telling him firmly that she does not wish to be disturbed, and later joins an elderly woman, driving homeward. Jack recounts his experience to his friend, but Henry scarcely listens, for he has completed his invention, and eagerly displays it to Jack.

The next day, the two are swimming together when a cry of help is heard and Henry at once dashes into the water, rescuing the young woman whom Jack had encountered the day before. After applying first aid, he takes her to her home, and is informed that she is Ruth Hall; her aunt, Mrs. Hall, likewise introduces herself, and Henry presents himself and his friend. Although he refuses, instantly, a reward, he gratefully accepts an invitation to a small dinner party the following evening, for himself and Jack. While Henry is in the city the next day, arranging means of patenting his invention, Jack installs the radio near the Hall home, and hears Mrs. Hall tell her niece that she is placing all her jewels and securities in the safe, adding that should anything happen to her they would become Ruth's property. As the two young men are dining at the Hall home that evening, Jack slips a drug into a glass of punch while Mrs. Hall is not looking. The next morning, Ruth telephones that her aunt has been poisoned; Henry at once hastens to her, but Jack refuses to go. Shortly after this, before police arrive, servants discover that the safe has been completely robbed.

In the inquest that follows, suspicion falls on all the guests, but at last centers on Henry, since he frankly confesses that he is the inventor of the radio which records a conversation regarding the Hall jewels. Ruth alone protests that she believes in his innocence, and he tells her that he will always love her, even though fate may separate them. Shortly before the hour for his execution the warden receives word that Jack has been apprehended while attempting to sell his jewels to a pawnbroker, and has confessed to the murder and robbery. When Henry is freed of the charges, he turns to Ruth, who eagerly awaits him.

MEN WANTED

Frank J. Calabro Drama File No. 10723

AS the prison gates clang behind him, Rainy Howard determines to go straight. However, he soon learns that no employer is willing to risk hiring a man with a criminal record. In despair he is contemplating returning to his old life, when he is given a chance to work in the factory of Silas Drake, widely renowned for his humane treatment of his factory employees. Grateful for the opportunity to make good, Rainy works with great zeal, and once, while being complimented by Silas Drake, sees and falls in love with Eileen, only daughter of the philanthropic Drake.

Some time thereafter, Drake's young son Orville is playing in his improvised chemical laboratory on the top floor of the factory, when he causes a terrific explosion. Flames block the stairway, and Silas is frantic, but Rainy, seeing Eileen's white face, dashes through and soon staggers out of the inferno with the unconscious form of young Orville. The Drakes are overcome with gratitude for Rainy who is rapidly promoted. Eileen soon falls in love with Rainy, but aware of his criminal record, dares not reveal her feelings. One day Rainy goes to visit Orville at the hospital, and is distressed at seeing Bert Volti, a racketeer Rainy has heard of in the old days. Bert, injured in an accident, is impatiently awaiting the day of his release, and seeing all the fuss about the wealthy child, Orville Drake, plans a daring kidnapping. During the night Bert slips into Orville's room, chloroforms the lad, and carries him to the window from which his confederates carry off the scion.

The Drakes are overwhelmed at the loss of their child and Inspector McGowan, investigating, tries to pin the crime to the reformed convict, Rainy. Eileen stoutly refuses to believe in Rainy's guilt and it is Rainy himself who finds the clue the police have overlooked. The smudged fresh paint on Orville's window sill leads to the finding of Bert's paint stained bathrobe, but Bert himself has disappeared since his release from the hospital.

Meanwhile the distracted Silas Drake yields to the ransom demand of $100,000 to be placed on a barge twelve miles out from shore. The kidnappers promise to deliver the child within two hours of receiving the money and the father is to find Orville safe upon the barge, provided that the police are not called in. Meanwhile, however, without informing Drake, who is beside himself because of his wife's collapse, the police station a submarine to capture the bandits. The wily kidnappers leave the child under a double guard with instructions to kill him they are leaving, the submarine opens fire and the if the plans miscarry. They get the money but as kidnappers are captured. Rainy, appalled at the discovery of Mr. Drake's motor boat, empty, arrives at the barge in time to save the broken father from the guards who has sympathized throughout with the falling spiritlessly into the sea. Meanwhile one of tortured Drake boy, rebels when the other cold bloodedly contemplates murder and after a desperate struggle, escapes with the boy and gives him to the police. The kidnappers receive the severest penalty of the law, only the one escaping lightly, while Rainy and Eileen, brought together by adversity, find happiness at last in marriage.

THE MARRIAGE LOTTERY

Anna S. Rand Drama File No. 10696

TICKETS already engaged for the bridal suite aboard the S. S. Trans Jack Russell is appalled to learn that his fiancee has eloped with another man. As he drives blindly from her home, his car strikes a post and he is carried to a hospital where his broken leg is attended. For days he is too disconsolate to notice what is being done for him, then gradually the soothing effect of his good looking nurse impinges on his consciousness. One day he reads in the paper that his former fiancee and her bridegroom are retuning to town and as he realizes that to-morrow was to have been their wedding day, he groans. Anxiously May Boynton, the nurse comes forward to ask him if he is in much pain, and as he looks at her curiously he begins questioning her. Learning that she is alone in the world, he startles her by giving her a brief account of his prospects and asking if she is will-May is amazed, but having just come to the coning to marry him and sail with him on the S. S. Trans. clusion that she is probably to go through her entire life unwanted, unloved, she impulsively accepts. That day she hastily purchases a trouseau and Jack informs her that he means to woo her on their trip before exercising his rites as a husband. Aboard the boat, Jack is considerate and gentle and their fellow passengers all assume that the couple have been married for several months. But despite everything, May feels the shadow of the woman Jack loved between them and she imposes a restraint that Jack is sometimes grateful for. As the days pass and the ship nears the coast, Jack realizes that Margot, the other woman, means less and less to him, but remembering his promise to May, he carefully shuts the door between their rooms each night. Then the night of the ship's concert the prima donna contracts laryngitis and is unable to give her scheduled appearance. Calling for a volunteer to substitute, the captain learns that Mrs. Russell offers her services. With some slight misgivings, he announces her but as her limpid tones swell out in breathtaking purity and beauty, a hush falls over the audience and her solo brings down the house. Again and again she is recalled and her amazed husband pretends that he has known all along about his wife's talent when the others congratulate him. Back in their room, Jack rebukes May gently for not having told him, and feeling that now, when May is a success and has already been offered contracts to study voice and appear under the tutelage of a world famous figure, he has no right to tell her of his recently discovered love, Jack withholds the statement of his feelings toward her. Abroad, they travel and Jack finds it hard to keep from showing his jealousy for his wife but May refuses all offers and returns with to New York. As the skyline of the metropolis comes into view, Jack asks what May's plans are. Hurt, she makes no answer and at last she tells him that a career would be meaningless to her without love. "You mean?" he asks in amazement and as she drops her eyes, he folds her to him and presses worshipping lips to hers.

BEYOND ALL THIS

Mrs. Isaac Taylor Short Subject File No. 10672

THE sick woman turns her head slightly as her husband bends anxiously over her bed. Outside the darkies are moaning and as her fever grows higher, she can hear her husband's voice pleading with the doctor's wife to locate the overworked general practitioner. The sick woman's head seems to grow lighter. From a great distance she can hear her husband crying over the telephone, "But she's dying, I tell you," and then all is silent. Darkness comes down over all. A great wind begins to whirl like a tremendous cyclone. Around and around and the sick woman feels herself suddenly borne through the air, guided by a diaphanously clad angel. For an interminable time they travel and suddenly the road grows rough and when the feet of the woman touch the ground, they are cut by sharp rocks. The darkness grows more intense. Away in the distance there is a curious red light and silhouetted against it are the writhing bodies of many people. The woman asks, "Where are you taking me?" and in a voice like music, the angel replies, "That is Hell yonder." The woman winces but in the same dulcet tones she is assured that she is not going to remain here, except to see the damnation of others. Down below thousands and thousands of people are being rushed along the road, some laughing, some sneering, some cringing as they are moved inexorably along to where a great mist obscures the path. At the edge of the great pit, grinning imps hasten the oncoming throngs and violently prod those who would hold back. Now the woman can see Satan, grinning and terrible and as he points toward the depths where a black looking oil seethes and bubbles while souls in agony struggle waist deep and wail and cry, the woman grows sick and looks away. Again and again the imps rush at the angel and the woman but they cannot reach them and as the noise and howling reaches a crescendo, the Angel leads the fainting woman away. Up, up they are borne until fleecy clouds succeed the horrible darkness and then a light greater than the Sun itself floods everything. The path is downy and green as the softest grass and all about are happy smiling people. Heaven, the woman thinks, but the Angel informs her this is Paradise, and on they go until they reach the Heavenly gates. The gates are barred and on the right is the Angel who records all the good, and on the left is the Angel who records all the bad. And as the woman hears the recital of her small sins, her heart grows heavy and her guardian angel vanishes. Pleading for a sight of God and of those who have died martyrs to the Right, the woman is admitted and everywhere she sees visions of splendor. At last she sees the Lamb of God and as she kneels humbly, she hears out of the marvelous music that fills her ears a voice asking if she will defer this glory temporarily while she can yet return to earth and tell mortals of the life to come. And as she nods, tears in her eyes the vision vanishes and again she hears the weeping of her friends, the encomia of those who have known her. Suddenly she hears, "She moves, she moves," and as her husband bends over her incredulously, she lifts her heavy lids and smiles at him, a look of infinite tenderness in her strangely beautiful eyes.

THE BROKEN CUP

M. M. Stewart Drama File No. 10705

SWEETHEARTS since childhood, Margaret Longsmith and George Kegotank eagerly plan their wedding, as they stroll through the gardens of the girl's home in the Old South. Although all concerned are delighted at this union between two of the first families of southern aristocracy in those Civil War days, Margaret's mother warns the girl that her fiance is noted for his uncontrollable and sullen anger; but the young woman replies that she will be the one to cure this, his only fault. Jeremiah Carlton, scion of another prominent plantation family, beseeches Margaret not to marry George, telling her that he has adored her since childhood. She responds that although she has always cared for him as a friend, she loves only George, and besides, Jerry's sweet, indolent disposition would not prove compatible with her own fiery temper and restless energy. The wedding is held in the drawing room of the mansion, amid a brilliant assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. As the radiant bride is changing into her travelling suit, her mother presents her with a tea cup, given to a great uncle by Queen Anne. Established in her new home, the bride proudly displays this heirloom, cautioning George never to use it, as it is her choicest possession. The early month of her marriage pass by in a cloud of happiness, welcomed into the finest families of the community, and adored by her proud husband.

While entertaining a group of friends one afternoon, George tells them the story of Margaret's tea cup, and, at the request of one of the group, a young woman, breaks his promise and hands it to her. As he is replacing it, it slips from his hands, shattering into a thousand pieces. At that moment, Margaret, who has been resting upstairs, enters the room, and hysterically reprimands him for his carelessness, in the presence of his guests. When they leave, and the young bride is ready to receive her husband's apologies, she discovers that one of the cold, sullen moods of anger traditional to his family has descended upon George. In vain, she tries to dismiss the subject, but he will not speak to her. At the dinner table, Rastus, the faithful butler, carries prosaic requests for sugar, cream and other essentials back and forth between master and mistress, acting as interpretor, while Mandy, the cook, watches proceedings from the kitchen, in amazement. As weeks pass, and no change in this dismal routine appears, the servants speculate upon the outcome, amused, yet sympathetic over the unhappiness of their beloved master and mistress. Jeremiah calls upon them, and sensing the situation, urges Margaret to return to her mother's home with him, but being a Longsmith, she cannot bring the shame of divorce or separation upon her family, much as she wishes peace. Although feeling social ostracism would be a welcome relief from this torture, Margaret takes her place at the table, unspoken accusations fairly penetrating the air.

As if reading her mind, George suddenly asks her to accompany him on a ride, and they speed toward the lonely North shore in their buggy. Turning through the woods, George urges the horse to the brink of a cliff overlooking the Atlantic, and just before they are dashed to their death, the horse rears throwing them aside. As he gathers Margaret to his heart, George pours out his love and both agree to forget everything else as they turn homeward, united onee more. Safe in his arms, Margaret tells him that there may be a son and heir to the Kegotank fortunes, as George tenderly embraces her.

HONOR AMONG THIEVES

Ada Deborah Phelan Drama File No. 10524

TROUBLED by the marriage of her sorority sister, Marilyn, to Dick Fordon, whose escapades have long been notorious, Anne puts off meeting Marilyn's husband until, after a chanee encounter in town, she is induced to come to Marilyn's beautiful home for a weekend visit. The night she arrives Dick phones that business is keeping him in town and while Marilyn makes excuses, Anne's heart sinks as she suspects her friend's husband. Later, finding sleep impossible, Anne descends to the library for a book. Fearing to attract attention she does not turn on the light. As she is glancing over the titles by the light of the mirror, the door leading into the library opens and a man in evening clothes staggers in. Seeing Anne, lovely in a revealing negligee, he reels over to her and before the startled girl can cry out, his mouth crushes down over hers. For an eternity she struggles against the vise-like grip, then as her strength gives out, she sees a chair move and from behind it steps another formally attired man. Producing a gun, he snaps, "Drop that girl." Anne gasps as the two men face each other, and her assailant blusters this is his house. The other cuts him short and at the point of his revolver orders him to march quietly upstairs. Dazed by the strange by-play, Anne turns to her Samaritan. For a moment he stands looking at her. Then, stooping for one tender kiss. "For remembrance," he says. Then he leaves. For one blinding moment Anne puts out her hand to stay him, then slowly drops it to her side.

The next morning Anne is packing when Dick comes to her room to apologize for his conduct the night before and to beg her to say nothing to Marilyn. His explanation concludes with "I thought you were the new maid, and the intruder your sweetheart. It was only a joke, really—er—won't you stay?" Contemptuously Anne ignores him and assures him she is leaving. Suddenly Marilyn bursts into the room, she has been too excited by the report that a mysterious burglar was seen in the neighborhood last night, to notice Anne is packing. Hurrying to her jewel case, Marilyn cries out, "They're gone!" Dick picks up the telephone to call the police. Her body tense, Anne warns him if he describes their visitor of last night, she will tell Marilyn about his part in the affair. Slowly Dick replaces the phone.

With the excuse that she has received a telegram from home, a lie which Dick supports, Anne leaves. Exhaustedly she sinks in her pullman drawing room, only to stare incredulously as George, the burglar enters. "The jewels have been anonymously returned to Mrs. Fordon," he says. Breathlessly Anne asserts she is going to turn him over to the police, but he only shrugs and tells her all the stations are guarded and when he reaches New York he will quietly allow himself to be led off to jail. "Why are you here, then?" Anne asks helplessly. "I had to see you again." "Even at the cost of your freedom?" she asks. Again he shrugs eloquently. For a moment both are silent. In fifteen minutes they will be in New York. As they sit opposite each other, Anne knows this is the one man she might have loved. "For me," George is saying, "there is no future. Twenty years in prison." Anne nods wordlessly. But there are tears in her eyes. Understanding he draws her to him. The lights of New York twinkle as the train rumbles by. "One kiss," he pleads. "And then good-bye." At the station George is seized, and led away.

A week later Anne receives a long rambling letter from Marilyn telling her her jewels have been returned and saying Marilyn didn't have time to ask her friend what she thought of Dick. As an understanding at last comes to Anne of how Marilyn can love a scapegrace like Dick, she picks up her pen and slowly writes," . . . . and I am certain you and he will find every happiness together," then picks up the newspaper telling of the surrender of the notorious Gentleman George, and his conviction for a term of from five to twenty years."

THE MAN FROM MARS

Bernard Rosoman Drama File No. 10580

IN his observatory high on a peak on Mt. Everest, Victor Crane, brilliant young astrologist, points out a huge falling meteor to Grace Valentine, his fiancee, and her father, William Valentine, a noted biologist. As the falling piece of ground from another world strikes the earth, the observatory trembles as if shaken by a mighty earthquake, and the three hasten to examine this phenomenon. They recoil in amazement as they see the figure of a man, over forty feet in height, and formed with the perfection and beauty of an Apollo lying, unconscious in the center of the fallen meteor. Applying first aid, they soon revive this strange individual, and find that he is uninjured. In a powerful and musical voice, he addresses the group, in their own language, over which he has a perfect command. Assuring them that he means them no harm, he tells them that he is Williecalm Dignitas, an inhabitant of the Planet Mars, fallen from his blessed land through this accident. Victor hastens to offer him the hospitality of his laboratory, and the stranger follows the little group of earth dwellers, his beautiful brocaded robes floating after him. Standing on the height of the mountain, Williecalm Dignitas sees a panorama of earthly woe with his photostatic eyes. Pictures of man warring with his brothers, greed and avarice brought on by an unwholesome yearning for money, sickness and death, the result of disobedience to nature's laws, unfold before him, and are caught in permanent records. Sadly, he christens Earth the Lunatic Asylum of the Planets.

At the instigation of Mr. Crane and William Valentine, the presence of the Martian is made known to the world through the press, and huge crowds gather to see him. In his mechanical but strangely moving voice, he addresses them, urging them to return to the precepts of nature, and to love one another. In attacking the grave problem of the institution of marriage, now in great peril, he tells them of his wife, Erosia, whom he brought from the neighboring planet of Eroe, and the consuming love that binds them in ties of pure affection. Birth control he assails as a fallacy, pointing out that nature provides that the lower animals shall propogate in more abundance since their lives are in greater peril than the higher forms. In one eye, he pictures the evils of the past, in the other, the possibilities for a unification of mankind through bonds of love in the future. Urging Science to take its full responsibility in guiding the world, he pleads for a World Brotherhood of Benevolent Scientists, Benevolent Scientists, which is subsequently formed. With the aid of Victor, Williecalm prepares a mighty motion picture illustrating his precepts, and further makes known his purpose through television. Every day, press dispatches carry his messages to the people. When they learn that he is a benevolent god, his followers affectionately nickname him "Little Willie," and sing his praises universally.

The President plans with Willie to stabilize currency and cost production, supervise private ownership of public utility by state regulation, and issue Commodity Bonus Cheques which will limit the amount of currency in the land to the actual value of products on the market, and tours the country with him, addressing the people. Science is instructed to serve the State through public service and construction, Industry by a research institute for industrial commodities and distribution, Culture by teaching mental and physical health, and a knowledge of arts for the layman; in all these endeavors, the United States is chosen to lead the world.

A rocket plane is sent by the Martians in order that Williecalm may return to them, but as he leaves, Victor, Grace and Sir William pledge to continue his splendid work, and the world realizes that a New Era has dawned.

HIS CHOICE

Elias Emmanuel George Drama File No. 10497

HAVING devoted himself single mindedly to books throughout his school career, Sellie distinguishes himself at the graduation exercises and at nineteen is appointed teacher at a small college. Shy, handsome, the new professor becomes the target of the co-eds and Lilla Preston, attractive, vital, makes a direct bid for his attention. In class he is conscious of her always, and after school each day she waits for him to discuss trumped up problems. One afternoon she comes to him in his study and as he earnestly points out to her how to work a geometric problem he feels she is laughing at him. Confused he stops and falters, "But I thought you didn't understand . . ." and with a mocking smile she kisses him. For a moment Sellie is shaken, then his arms close about her and he returns her kisses. In the weeks that follow Sellie and Lilla dance together, ride in her car, and during classes the young professor can scarcely keep his mind on his work. When vacation time arrives, Sellie is distracted at the thought of separation from the first woman he has ever loved, and the months drag by until the new term. To his consternation, however, it is a different, subdued Lilla who returns, and as he vainly tried to meet her alone, he can feel little groups of students discussing him. At last Lilla shows him her engagement ring and informs him that she is soon to be married. For the first time then, Sellie realizes that to her he was just an amusing conquest, the more piquant because he was a professor. In his first disillusion, Sellie is torn by his conflicting emotions and unable to face his classes, he resigns. Returning home he gets a position and evenings, takes business courses. In his class he meets Vilma Foster, whose lovely luminous eyes are softly intelligent. Vilma helps Sellie who has entered late, and between them a firm friendship springs into being. One night, however, as they are walking home in the monlight and Sellie is explaining about the position his wealthy parents have found for him with an Oil Company, he sees her lips tremble, and realizing that he is again falling in love and Vilma with him, he remembers Lilla, and harshly puts Vilma out of this thoughts.

However, while working in his new position, thoughts of Vilma are always with him. Then Mavis Nunes learns that the newcomer, Sellie, is heir to an impressive fortune. She contrives to meet him and piqued by his indifference, renews her efforts. Soon Sellie's friends are urging him to accompany them to theaters and night clubs and take Mavis and at last Sellie yields. One night she induces him to remain with him and the next day, feeling cheap and lonely for Vilma, Sellie returns home. However, he receives a telegram from Mavis and worried by her insistence returns to find her demanding that he marry her since she is to have a child. Dismayed by the unexpected turn of events, Sellie feels that honor demands his protecting Mavis and he tells his family he is going to be married, although he admits he loves Vilma, whom they want him to marry. Returning unhappily to fulfill his obligation to Mavis, Sellie tells her that his parents have cut him off but they will be able to manage. To his amazement she turns upon him, and returns home. And it is with Vilma that Sellie finds happiness, far beyond his dreams.

I LIVED IN HELL

Edward Rushford Drama File No. 10516

THE dream of Eddie Mitchell's life is to be taken from the state orphanage, where he has lived ever since he can remember, and be given a real home; when he is ten years of age, the matron informs that his wish has come true as his Uncle George and Aunt May have sent for him. In a high state of excitement, the youngster drives with these relatives whom he has never known of, and conceals his disappointment when he finds that his new home is a crowded, city apartment house, rather than the spacious house and back yard that he had hoped for. He is introduced to Raymond Banks, a tenant in the apartment building which his uncle owns. Finding Aunt May in tears, Eddie presses her for the reason, and learns that it is his uncle's excessive habit of drinking, the one serious flaw in his kindly, generous character. As he grows older, Eddie attempts to persuade George to renounce this habit, but he seems unable to do it, and the boy guides the unsteady footsteps of the older man after his frequent dissipations. In this environment, with the additional drawbacks of crowded city life, Eddie develops a maturity of outlook far beyond his years. When he is eighteen, he secures a position as checker for a large dairy. One evening he is driving with Ray Banks when they see a pretty girl, evidently very tired, walking across a bridge. They offer her a ride, and after some hesitation, she accepts, introducing herself as Edith Hawley. Impressed by his courtesy, she grants Eddie permission to call at her home, and they soon become friends.

Returning that night, Eddie finds George taking May to the hospital; a few hours later, George telephones the boy, saying that May died in giving birth to a son. He is unable to keep the tears back at this sad news, and George, also, is deeply grieved, attempting to forget his sorrow in drinking, while the baby is left in care of neighbors. Edith's father discovers her friendship with Eddie, and believing his daughter, whom he wishes to attend college, is too young, he forbids her to see the boy again. In love with him, she disobeys her father, and brings him home one evening when she believes her parents are not at home. Mr. Hawley, who has arranged this trap, comes downstairs, and, talking to Eddie, tells him of his plans for Edith, but Eddie replies that he loves the girl, and they wish to be married. Sternly, Mr. Hawley orders him out of the house, saying that his family is far inferior to theirs. Assuming a girlish voice, Eddie telephones Edith the next evening, giving his name as June, and arranges a meeting at the drug store. In company with Howard, a fellow worker, Eddie and Edith drive to the beach. The car is struck by a truck on the way home, and Eddie injured, but he takes Edith to her home before going to the hospital. In applying for a license, in order that he may drive one of his company's trucks, Eddie learns that George is not his real uncle, and has never legally adopted him.

Shortly after this, George is taken to prison on a charge of assault and battery, but Eddie assumes blame for his crime, so that the older man will not be sentenced. As a result, the boy spends thirty days in jail. When he is released, a fire breaks out in George's apartment; Eddie risks his life in a vain endeavor to save him, but does rescue the baby. Learning the truth of Eddie's ancestry, and impressed by his courage, Mr. Hawley consents to his marriage with Edith, when Eddie sells a story of his prison experiences. With George's child, the young couple sail for Europe.

THE STOLEN BRIDE

Willie Hebert Drama File No. 9384

THE elder Cooper prided himself upon his sporting blood. It was a matter of pride to him, a member of the 400 that he invested money in Broadway shows. But when he learned that his son, Jerry, safely engaged to Mathilda, one of the season's debutantes and daughter of one of Cooper's former partner's, had become interested in a show girl, his blood boiled.

Jerry, while visiting a night club had stood by while a girl, resenting the clinging hands of one of the patrons, had been fired. She had been an excellent little dancer, and Jerry, was touched by her spirit in explaining she had been hired to entertain the club's guests only by dancing. As he waited for her outside, he offered his sympathy. He learned that she had no hope of getting another postiion and promised to try to get her into his father's show. Lee, the dance director, was sceptical about Jerry's enthusiasm, but he admitted he needed a specialty dancer and agreed finally to see the girl at work. Janet was taken on and her gratitude to Jerry was touching until the day that Mathilda, calling for Jerry, saw him in conversation with the little dancer and possessively drew him away. It was then that Mathilda thought Jerry's father ought to know about how matters stood. Mr. Cooper's reaction was to call Lee and order the immediate dismissal of Janet. Lee objected that she was necessary to the show, but when Cooper threatened to withdraw his financial support, Lee reluctantly fired Janet. At home, Mathilda was waiting for Jerry and as she sweetly put her arm through his she explained coyly that her Jerry had been a naughty boy but now that Janet was gone, she would forgive him. "Janet gone!" Jerry exploded and Mathilda angered by his concern took her departure. Jerry found his father and the two were locked in argument for hours. At length Jerry appealed to his father's sporting instinct. Against Cooper's arguments that Mathilda loved him, that she was one of his people, whereas Janet was probably out for his money, Jerry offered to wager his father was wrong. The two agreed that they were to act as though Cooper had disowned his son. Meanwhile Lee burned up the wires and sarcastically informed Cooper that money or no money the show needed the Garden girl and she was re-instated. Meekly Cooper yielded adding that it didn't matter he wanted his son to see more of the girl now to find out what she really wanted. Jerry, moved out of his father's big home, took a single room in a boarding house and got himself a position as a mechanio at a garage. When Mathilda drove her big roadster in to be greased and Jerry emerged smudged and grinning, she blinked. "Jerry! What are you doing!" Jerry explained that he and his father had disagreed. Shrewdly Mathilda hazarded the guess that he was cut off, and as Jerry forbore answering, Mathilda looked at her watch and as she drove off, Jerry heard a faint, "Goodness." It was Mathilda's car that had to be greased the night of the show. Jerry swore softly as he realized he had missed Janet's turn but when, greasy as he was he heard the comments of the theater-goers about the new sensation, he waited happily at the stage door. Janet came out forlornly. At sight of Jerry she flew into his arms, heedless of grease. Jerry drove furiously. "Where did you get that outfit?" Janet asked. "My new job." "Working, Jerry?" "Uh huh." "That's marvellous." Then, "Jerry where are we going?" "I'm kidnapping you. We're going to be married. Happy?" "Oh Jerry," And when Jerry, still greasy, telephoned his father that he had eloped, and his father answered, "Thought you would," Jerry returned to his bride whose face was not a little greasy too, by this time.

DOCTOR, DOCTOR

A. E. Johns Short Subject File No. 9772

TOSSING feverishly in bed, Jim screws up his face as his wife Molly tells him he has a fever and says she's listened to him long enough she's going for a doctor whether he wants one or not. Jim groans and buries his head petulantly in the covers.

Molly seizes Jim firmly by the arm and brings him to a large office building where there is a sign, "Doctor X." Jim protests then claims he'll go alone. Leaving Molly sitting in the lobby Jim asks a porter where Doctor X's office is, and is told to follow. As they proceed up a small flight of stairs, Jim finds it hard going and reaching the top he finds the attendant has disappeared, and only a long flight of steps stretches before him. With a great effort he starts climbing, falling to his knees frequently until, exhausted he reaches the top. Only flights and flights of steps loom upward and he sighs heavily as he makes his way to a chair. As he seats himself the legs give away just as a man and woman in evening clothes pass with a haughty air. Can you please tell me what floor Doctor X is on?" he asks pitifully. "Tenth," the man answers shortly as he disappears with the woman. Jim shakes his head at the prospect but as he turns to go down he finds the stairs up which he has come are gone. All the steps lead upward. As he struggles desperately, people pass him going down but none pays any attention to him. On hands and knees he reaches the third landing and as he sees a faucet and a glass he manages a look of relief only to fall back in dismay as he discovers everything is under glass and out of reach. Parched, he groans as signs read, "Dry Hot Sun Baths." "No Water." "Hot Tamales." "Dry Cleaning." He stumbles toward a narrow staircase but is pushed aside by a succession of fat women entering the Hot Sun Bath room. After they have passed, he drags himself upstairs and sees a fountain. Just as he reaches it the water is shut off and with a cry he pushes on to a room where men are sitting at tables drinking beer. The look of happiness in his eyes is misinterpreted by a woman who calls the bouncer and Jim is lifted high in the air by a kick. He lands on a pedestal which swings back and sends him flying on until he lands at the feet of a lady who hears him ask where Doctor X is and goes into a long sales talk recommending Dr. M. three floors higher up. At length she tells him the elevators are around the corner but when he gets there he gets dizzy at the many corners. Racing wildly around them he finally gets to an elevator. The door opens. The elevator boy hands him a rope and a moment later the bottom of the elevator drops. Suspended in midair, Jim notices all the other ropes are moving up and down but his is stationary. In desperation he begins to climb and loses his hat, his shoes, his socks and in a frantic effort to retain his trousers, loses his hold on the rope. Down, down he goes until he lands—waist deep in a desert of sand. "Water, Water, Water!" he cries but his tongue is so thick he can scarcely make himself audible.

At this point Molly comes back with the doctor who examines the patient and asks, "How does a glass of water appeal to you." The clock on the night table shows only a few moments have passed and the story ends with Jim sleeping peacefully while Molly sits in a rocker, gently watching him.

THE CLAW OF THE BEAST

Cowan Eskie Drama File No. 10024

FOR three long days the Oakmans await the return of their daughter Sally from the university it has taken years of slaving on their farm to send her to. When at last her letter saying she has gone on to New York with friends reaches them, Mrs. (Aunt Jane) Oakman becomes ill from the shock. Desultory letters follow but when, months later, Sally writes she is coming home for a visit, the house is scrubbed from top to bottom for her. But it is a strangely changed, a hardened Sally who drops in with her poker-faced city friends Jack and Stella. Jack and Sally's brother Stan quarrel but when Sally leaves, she has with her six thousand dollars she has wheedled from her indulgent father. That six thousand dollars represents a mortgage on the farm, but Sally is certain her investment in a tea room will bring immediate returns.

It is Stan's staunch friend Nina who discovers the mortgage on the Oakman farm and guesses that Milo Snead, the money lender will spare no trick to gain possession of the land. Snead's first step is to pay the tobacco buyers to pass up the Oakman's unusually fine crop and Dolph, realizing that Sally has duped him, confesses shamefacedly to his wife what he has done. Then one night Sally returns but before she can reach home she faints and receives shelter at the home of the widow Scallin who sends for Nina. Touched by the girl's plight, Nina sends for the doctor and together they keep the secret of Sally's whereabouts and the fact that she gives birth to a child. That same night Jack comes after Sally and Stan sends him packing. A car without lights almost runs Stan down as he returns to his house and the next morning Jack is found murdered and Stan, on the evidence of the quarrels and a gun, is accused. Certainly Stan is innocent but it will require money to prove it and Dolph needs money to meet the mortgage too. Nina, meanwhile, has been braving town gossip for love of Stan and now she sends to New York for detectives who identify the murdered Jack as a gangster. His racket was to send Stella to college towns, pick out victims to introduce to spenders, and then turn the girl's head by the glamour. A supposed marriage at a phoney Justice of the Peace, an unfrocked clergyman, induced the girl to invest money in a "tea room." Sally had escaped the fate of the others—being taken for a ride to make room for the next victim, but some of Jack's men who had been gunning for him for the last trick, had gotten him and Stan is freed. Nina sounds the Oakmans and finds that to them Sally is still the prodigal, and her return brings joy to troubled hearts. Meanwhile Snead, determined to have his way holds the auction but amidst great surprise. Scot Hutter, the village clown bids highest and pays cash. Then Stan reveals that Scot was bidding for him and the money had come as an advance payment on the "weeds" which Stan had always experimented with. The Oakmans, their farm saved, admit two additions to their fold,—Sally's cherub-faced child, and Stan's lovely bride, Nina.

CONFESSION

Lenore Lizotte Melodrama File No. 10571

JACK GIBBENS, owner of a ranch in Oklahoma, informs his daughter that she must marry Ben Morris, the son of an Indian chief, who has inherited many head rights, although she pleads, with tears in her eyes, that the only man she ever loved is Alfred Kent, a jobber. Fearful that his daughter, Sarah, may elope with her sweetheart, Jack rushes preparations for the wedding, and it is held that night at the little country church, while the girl looks longingly toward Alfred's home; as he is away at the time, he knows nothing of the occurrence. Steve Gill, the village storekeeper, attempts to seize Sarah at the wedding, as he, too, loves her, but Jack silences his interruption with a blow of his fist, and the ceremony is at last completed. Molly Wabbaneau, an Indian girl, comes to Steve, requesting money, as she is the mother of his child, and is in desperate need, but she is rudely refused, as the infuriated storekeeper leaves the church. When Alfred discovers that Sarah is married, he hastens to her, and she replies that she feared her father might injure him if she did not acquiesce to his wishes. Although still loving Alfred as deeply as ever, she tells him that she will be true to her husband, as long as he lives. While riding through town one afternoon, Alfred sees Steve beating his natural son, Ned, whose mentality is that of a moron; quickly, he forces Steve to leave the poor fellow alone.

Six months after his marriage, Ben rides to town, and purchases tobacco at Steve's store; the storekeeper signals Ned to follow him on his return home. Anxiously, that night, Sarah awaits her husband, and when she hears a knock at the dood at two in the morning, opens it—to admit Steve. As he is struggling with her, Alfred, attracted by her cries for help, as he is passing, enters, and throws Steve to the ground, ordering him out of the house. Joe Kent, Alfred's brother, comes to Sarah's home with his wife, as they are destitute. A few days later, a baby is born to Joe's wife. Desperately in need, they are forced to accept a few provisions from the midwife, who attends, but the following day, Alfred supplies his brother liberally with funds which he states Steve's son has advanced to him. The body of Ben is found, and a few hours later, Steve is discovered, murdered, in a well. The midwife tells her son, who is the county sheriff, that the Kent brothers suddenly came into money, and as it is known that Alfred is in love with Sarah, the two are arrested, and charged with the double murder. Circumstantial evidence convicts the two, and the sheriff is on his way to officiate at their hanging when he, too, is mysteriously murdered, and found much later. A few hours later, Ned hysterically confesses to the catholic priest that he murdered Ben because he feared his father's wrath if he didn't carry out this order, and later killed Steve in order to help his only friend, Alfred, as he needed money. At last, he murdered the sheriff that he might not kill the two Kent brothers. This triple confession saves the young men, but Ned is taken into custody. When the jailer brings him his meal, he discovers that the unfortunate man has taken his own life, with a pocket knife.

Alfred and his brother discover oil on property they own jointly, and while Joe takes his wife and child to their home, Alfred at last wins Sarah, as his wife.

COUPLED

Joe A. White Short Subject File No. 10425

WHEN John, a farmer boy, tells his friend, Pete, that he wishes to marry but cannot find a girl who will have him, and freckle-faced Mary Jane confides the same desire, he decides to bring them together. Taking John to the farm owned by Mary Jane's father, Pete finds the girl sitting on a hay stack, and, after introducing his friend, leaves them alone. The proposal is soon made and accepted; three weeks later the two are married. Established in her new home, Mary Jane is busily sewing, when she breaks her needle. Calling her husband on the telephone at the store where he spends much of his time, Mary Jane asks him to bring her a needle. As he is on his way home with it he meets his godfather, driving a wagon load of hay, and climbs up to ride with him, absent-mindedly placing the needle in the hay, where he later is unable to find it. Disgusted with him for this carelessness, Mary Jane tells him to stick the needle in his waistcoat next time. As she works in the garden, she breaks her hoe, and tells John to bring home another one, which he attempts to fasten in his waistcoat, causing him to rip and break it. In annoyance, Mary Jane tells him he should have tied it to a rope and fastened it about his shoulders; she then asks him to bring home two live pigs from town, and he follows this procedure with them, but they almost choke to death, as they swing from his shoulder, and finally break loose from the rope and escape.

On market day, Mary Jane sends John to sell the honey, advising him to let prospective customers taste it, if they wish. He tells everyone who approaches his booth just to taste the honey, and soon it is all gone. That evening Mary Jane tells him he has made a mistake, and he must never try to sell to people who talk too much, as they do not wish to buy. She sends him again, this time with two hogs, but he avoids anyone who questions him about them, or asks to buy them, refusing to answer. By nightfall, he starts homeward with them, but a storm comes up and seeks refuge in a church. He sees the figure of a man just outside the building, and asks if he wishes to buy the hogs. When he does not answer, John concludes that this is the customer Mary Jane had in mind, and ties the animals to his outstretched hand, trusting him for the money until later. Next morning he discovers that his "customer" is a wooden saint, and the hogs have escaped.

Despairing of his ability to sell anything, Mary Jane goes to the market herself, leaving John in charge of the farm. She cautions him especially to look after the loaves of bread she has just baked, see that no one steals the wine, and that nothing disturbs the hen who supplies their table with eggs. John goes to the cellar for wine, and loses the cork to the barrel; calling his dog, Lis-tello, he orders him to plug the hole with his tail, while he finds another cork. When he sees the goats escaping through the fence, John forgets and calls Listello, who comes at once, and the cellar is flooded with wine. Using loaves of bread for steps, he finally reaches the barrel, but not before most of its contents are gone. John chases Listello, and frightens the hens away from her eggs, which Mary Jane wishes her to hatch. With the aid of hot water bottles, he attempts to hatch them, and she finds him in the chicken coop, in this attempt. When she takes inventory of the damage, Mary Jane begins hurling the eggs at John, who runs wildly for the barn.

WHAT PRICE LOVE?

Evgeny Telenik True Story File No. 10603

LOOKING up from the cleaning of her humble little Russian home, Sara sees Sol, the peddler outside, but because of the failure of the crops she is unable to buy anything from him. Sara's heart aches as she sets the meager table for her mother and father and sees their dejection over their poverty. However, when she learns that her parents are setting their hearts on her marriage to Israel, the weak and ailing son of a wealthy merchant, Sara despairs. When Israel pays court to her, Sara sees the eyes of her parents lighting up in anticipation of her happiness as Israel's wife, and despite her pleas that she doesn't love him, the marriage takes place. From the first it is doomed to failure. The more love Israel shows her, the more Sara turns from him and the birth of her children fail to lift her from the apathy of her existence as Israel's wife.

Then she meets Basil, a young and handsome Christian. When one day Basil tells her he loves her, Sara weeps because she is bound to her husband. But when Basil finds out that Sara has never loved Israel, he induces her to run away with him and find the happiness that has been denied her. For a long time, Sara struggles with herself, and at last she goes. Israel is deeply wounded by her desertion, realizing how he has failed her as a husband, and Sara and Basil find remorse is their nemesis. Sara can never forget her children despite Basil's kindness to her, and at last, for him, she renounces her own faith and embraces his. Before many years have passed, Basil goes to his rest, and Sara, an outcast, tries to support Basil's children.

Meanwhile, Israel has passed on and his youngest son Moisha unsatisfied with the story that his mother is dead, questions everybody in his efforts to locate her. One day he helps an old beggar who has been attacked by dogs, and as he bathes the old man's forehead and confides to him that he is searching for his mother, Sol tells him of Sara whom he has met in a distant city. Sara had informed Sol that he was mistaken in his recognition of her, but Sol remembers Sara. Fortified with the assurance that his mother still lives, little Moisha determines to find her. Setting off alone, he begins the long journey, aided at intervals by kindly farmers and finding shelter in haystacks and barns along the way. At last he arrives at the city where his mother is. "Sara?" he calls, and Sara turns in wonder at the name she has long since ceased using. At last, however, she realizes that Moisha is her own son, and straining him to her heart, she weeps over him. Her other children resent the little Jewish boy and make him miserable until one day, Moisha bathing in another part of the stream, is caught in the whirlpool and sucked under. The last blow proves too much for Sara, and in despair she takes poison. Kaleidoscopically before her eyes whirls the story of her life, her parents, Israel, Basil, her children, and sighing deeply she sinks into that rest which brings peace at last.

CHILDREN OF DESTINY

Theresa M. Shotthofer Drama File No. 10652

AT a costume party given in honor of the engagement of Suzanne Corday and Richard Bryce, an aged crone, refused alms, shouts a prophecy that the daughter of the union will die upon the guillotine like her great, great aunt before her, The hushed guests try to scoff at the wierd words, but Suzanne becomes hysterical, remembering the portait of that Antoinette Corday who lost her beautiful flighty head upon the dread instrument. However, her bridegroom takes her to England and far away from France their daughter Marie is born. Spoiled from infancy, Marie grows up pampered and petted until her fits of temper make her governesses quail. When Jim Sterling, young Englishman falls in love with Marie, her parents congratulate themselves upon the steadying influence that he will have upon their reckless daughter, and hasten the wedding, Harriet Pierce, who has loved Jim since their childhood is broken hearted when she learns of his hasty marriage, but before the glittering beauty of Marie, her own wholesome prettiness is lost. As Marie's husband, Jim is led a whirl of an existence. Extravagant, wilful, Marie drives Jim mad with her whims and vagaries, and soon, under the strain of her ungoverned fits of temper, his love for her dies. Again and again he tries to save their marriage, but Marie scoffs at everything he holds dear. Once, at an elaborate ball Marie gives, she wears the powdered wig and brocaded gown of that ancestor in the portrait, and her father, seeing her, cries out sharply in remembrance of the prophecy. But during the evening, Marie sees Harriet and Jim dance together and, breaking away from her father's anxious warning, she glares at them balefully. That night Marie accuses Jim of loving Harriet. The thought has never before occurred to him, but as he sees his wife, face livid with rage, he realizes suddenly that Harriet, gentle and understanding means more to him than Marie ever has. Wearily he turns from Marie's outburst, but running after him she shouts that she will never free him, never. Marie's extravagances continue until Jim grows desperate. Then his firm sends him to Paris on an important commission. However, when Marie discovers that Harriet and a group of their mutual friends are bound for Paris too, she is besides herself with jealousy. Her father, learning that she is contemplating a trip to Paris dashes to the airport to stop her, but arrives after she has left. In Paris, Marie maliciously invites the whole party including Harriet to a gay party which is to end up at the Bastille. Jim, sensing some malicious design, tries to prevent Marie, and warns her the excitement may be too much for her, but she throws off his restraining gesture and the party goes on. As they approach the guillotine, Marie inserts her head in the stocks and looking up astounds the party by asking Harriet if she wouldn't like to see her dead so? While the others stare, Marie taunts the hapless Harriet, and turning to the dumbfounded guide asks him to release her. The quaking fellow exclaims he has forgotten for the moment which button releases the stocks and which the knife, and Marie's screams ring out. Suddenly the fellow regains himself, and hastily presses a button. With a gasp Marie, lies still, dead of heart failure, while Harriet buries her head in Jim's shoulder and the others turn softly away.

BEYOND YOUR HAND

Josephine Ryan Drama File No. 10654

"IT is your happiness I am thinking of, and yet you stand there and refuse to see this man who can do so much for you." Outside the colored mammy and the little darkies shuddered as the colonel's voice rose to a shrill note and when at last he fell back exhausted, his daughter Delphine sent for Dr. Peters. Minutes later the doctor came out and as Delphine asked anxiously, "How is he, doctor?" the young physician shook his head gravely, and said he had seen lots of cases like this where people got what they wanted by creating such scenes. But in the end Delphine submitted and permitted her engagement to be announced to the wealthy and dissolute Charlie Winthrop. It was while visiting her fiance, that Delphine stoppned to watch a young man tenderly fondling some puppies. As she stooped to play with the tiny new born dogs, Bob introduced himself as Charlie's brother. For a moment there was constraint between them as Bob looked at his brother's intended wife pityingly, then quickly composed himself. Delphine learned then that Bob was a lovable improvident young man who from his youth up could not be restrained from giving all his money away to the nearest beggar. When the elder Winthrop died, he left his entire fortune to Charlie, but provided that as long as Bob lived he was to have a home and a small income from the estate. As different as day and night, Charlie and Bob had never gotten along together but Charlie dared not put Bob out, and Bob continued, the moment he got his allowance to give it to the first little crippled child he saw. In the days that followed, Bob fell in love with his brother's fiancee, but dared not say anything. Meanwhile the plans for the wedding proceeded, but when Charlie tried to kiss his intended bride, she shuddered and tried to back out of the marriage. Her father raged so that at length she submitted. Then one day Bob prevented his brother from beating up a poor wretch who was unable to pay back the money he had lost to Charlie in cards. The old man shuffled down the road, but when Bob read in the morning paper of the death of the old fellow, he realized his brother was a veritable murderer. In horror he called Delphine and pleaded, "Don't go through with the ceremony. I'll come right over and explain." As he turned from the phone he saw the huge body of his brother looming in the doorway, and slowly the hairy hands choked the life from the weak Bob. Minutes later, Charlie arrived at the house, but Delphine drew away from him in horror and when he explained his brother had been called out of town, she whispered, "What have you done with him?" A search revealed the murdered body of Bob, and Charlie was rapidly convicted for the murder. Brokenly the Colonel confessed that he had insisted on the marriage because Charlie had bankrupted him in cards and threatened to take the Colonel's home and everything he owned from him unless Delphine were given to him in marriage. For weeks Delphine was inconsolable and locked herself in her room seeing nobody but Dr. Peters, who, at length, gently advised her that she was too young to spend the rest of her life as a recluse. Delphine at length consented to go riding daily with the young doctor, and one day as they walked their horses, Peters stopped and told Delphine he loved her, and as he drew her to him, the ugly past was forever obliterated.

MR. SEN

Aynne Shyrle Melodrama File No. 10519

TY YAT SEN waves to his American friends as he embarks in the steamer taking him back to his bethrothed in Japan. Since childhood he has not seen Ming Toy, his promised bride, and now, having won his way in America he is returning to Tokio to claim her and bring her to the land of his adoption. Arriving, Ty Yat Sen observes the elaborate Oriental customs and is directed to the beautiful Japanese garden where Ming Toy, lovelier than he has ever dreamed her to be, awaits him. Under the low hung cherry blossoms the lovers greet each other tenderly and Ty Yat Sen loses his heart utterly to her delicate beauty. Overhead an airplane flies, and frightened, Ming Toy clings to her lover, but reassuring her that she has nothing to fear, he tells her that he will yet teach her to enjoy flying and Ming Toy winces in mock terror as he tells her of an American friend who is now in Japan with his plane. With a warm embrace, the lovers part, Ming Toy promising to wait for Ty Yat Sen's return.

As she wanders among the flowers, Ming starts as she faces a huge, red headed sailor who covers her mouth to shut off her outcry, and carries her to the garden wall. Outside an airplane waits and placing the girl in the back, the huge fellow gives orders to the pilot to take the girl to the shore of a small river where she will be met by some men in a motor boat. Arriving ahead of schedule, Ralph, the pilot see the distress of his passenger and learns that she is not an eloping bride as he had been informed, but a kidnapped heiress. Astounded to learn also that she is the fiancee of his friend, Ty Yat Sen, Ralph promises aid, but before he can start his plane, Red's gang arrive and as he offers resistance beat him up and leave him unconscious upon the ground while Ming is ruthlessly carried aboard the motor boat and delivered into the hands of Captain Rudd aboard the Crescent. Ralph raises himself with difficulty and staggers to the plane and goes to the home of Ming Toy where he confesses his part in the affair to Ty Yat. Dazed, Ty Yat Sen goes searching the waterfront for the drunken Red, finally finding him and wheeding the promise of a job from him. Meanwhile Captain Rudd, seeing Ming, decides to forego his original plans of collecting ransom and use the lovely girl to his own ends.

The boat starts. Ty Yat makes himself known to Ming at first opportunity. Wildly Ming staves off Rudd's repulsive advances, calling desperately for help. Ty Yat who has been watching for this, hears her muffled call and bursting rashly into the room, flings himself on the captain. While Ming watches, the two men exchange blows. At length, Rudd flings the lamp from its hangar. It breaks and the room bursts into flame. Ty Yat staggers to the frightened Ming, and in the glare of the spreading flames, carries her to a life boat and lowers to the sea. From a distance they see the ship blazing to the skies and as they drift for days with three of the crew who die, finally they are picked up by a steamer America bound. There they send a telegram to Ming's father regarding her safety, and then are married by the Captain and look over the rail toward the new land, to a new life and happiness.

LOYALTY

Nino Anto Drama File No. 10697

"HELLO, new here?" Diana looked up into the questioning face of Jimmy R. Wendell, world famous young aviator, and as he flashed his famous grin at her, she knew she was going to enjoy her new position of stenographer at the Dixie Air Service. Jimmy was to drop in more and more frequently and it was to Diana he confided his enthusiasm about the outcome of the Los Angeles Races. When Jimmy returned victorious to the reception that awaited him in his own town, he looked over the heads of the welcoming throngs until he discovered Diana, trembling with excitement for the honors awarded to her Jimmy, and at the dance held in his honor that night, Jimmy took Diana aside and asked an important question. Radiant with happiness, Diana bowed in greeting to her brother Louis' Brazilian friend, Senor Fiorentes, but the look of admiration bestowed on her by the handsome Latin was lost on her as her eyes clung to Jimmy. And at last they were married. Congratulations poured in from all sides to the famous young aviator and his beautiful bride, and upon their return from a glorious honeymoon, Jimmy found an offer awaiting him to back him in a history making tri-continental flight. Diana's heart ached at the thought of the danger, but she dared not interfere with her Jimmy's career. Haggard from long hours at the radio, Diana kept her vigil and smiled faintly as news came in of Jimmy's reception in London, in Africa, and past a mid-ocean ship as he headed for Brazil. Then came a long silence. Storms, darkness, and again silence! Days, weeks, and finally a fisherman picked up a bit of wreckage on which the gallant crescent of the lost plane was plainly discernible. While the ships of Brazil and the United States gave up the long search, Diana at home refused to believe that her Jimmy was no more. Weeks lengthened into months. The gallant Senor Fiorentes, always in love with Diana tried to woo her back to an interest in life, but Diana remained convinced that somewhere her Jimmy still lived. At length Senor Fiorentes induced Diana and her brother to take a cruise on his yacht, offering the inducement that Diana could search the coast where in dreams she saw Jimmy still living. Eyes glued to binoculars, Diana combed the beaches for signs of her beloved bridegroom, while her brother and host tried vainly to make her forget. Then one night while the gaiety was at its height aboard, the yacht struck a submerged rock and rapidly sank. On the rocky beach the three survivors, Senor Fiorentes, Louis, and Diana surveyed the barren scene and philosophically built a shelter and dived for food from the sunken yacht. As days passed without sign of a ship, the three adventurers explored the interior only to fall into the hands of fierce looking cannibals. From their hut, however, they were rescued by another white captive who, unrecognizable under his matted hair and beard, turned out to be——Jimmy! At last the gallant adventurers were picked up by a ship, and as they sailed toward civilization Senor Fiorentes softly congratulated Jimmy on the loyalty of his very beautiful wife.

LOVE'S SACRIFICE

Manila O. Rhea Drama File No. 10704

TO Genevieve who had always loved Ray, his unexpected proposal of marriage during a gay party of their friends came as the realization of all her dreams. But soon after the hurried wedding Genevieve was to discover that Ray's action followed a quarrel with a town woman whom he had been seeing with great frequency. Despite Ray's frequent lapses of moodiness as he considered that he had made a great mistake in rushing into marriage, Genevieve adored him and lavished all her devotion upon him. When her child Junior was born, Genevieve rejoiced in Ray's renewed tenderness but shortly afterwards, she arrived home unexpectedly one night to find a note from Ray telling her he was through trying to make a go of their marriage and was leaving for Europe with the other woman. Swallowing her pride, Genevieve rushed down to the boat and finding Ray she pleaded with him not to break up their marriage. Gently Ray told her he knew what a fine woman she was but he didn't love her and it wasn't fair going on. Brokenly Genevieve realized that she was powerless against the obvious charms of the sophisticated Eleanor who announced that she was bored with the interview and retired to her stateroom. As the gangplank was lifted, Genevieve turned from Ray and walked dejectedly off the boat. Back home she rocked Junior in her arms and stared hopelessly at the blank wall.

Years passed. Junior was grown and Ray had long since returned from Europe and was living openly with the other woman. Then one day Ray's body was carried home, seriously injured in an industrial accident. As the doctor informed Eleanor that Ray might never walk again, she turned and walked into the room where Ray lay in great pain. Explaining that she couldn't afford to tie her remaining years to a disabled man who wasn't even her own husband, Eleanor informed him she had packed her things and was leaving. Unprotestingly Ray watched her go, but Genevieve, learning that Ray was friendless and unhappy, came and without reproaches or explanations, arranged to have him taken back to her home and as if he had never left her, began taking care of him. Junior, seeing his mother sacrificing herself for the man who had deserted her, protested, but Genevieve explained simply that when a person loves nothing makes any difference.

Then one day Junior brought his bride, Lovelace home. As Genevieve looked upon the lovely girl whom her son loved, her heart opened to her and gravely she kissed her forehead. In the happiness of Lovelace and Junior, Genevieve relived the joy that she had thought would be hers with Ray. When Lovelace learned she was to have a child her husband and his mother looked after her as though she were an infant. It seemed inconceivable that the slight delicate little Lovelace should be having a child of her own, but when the day of the ordeal arrived it proved too much for the slender girl. With Ray and Genevieve holding her hands pityingly, Lovelace closed her eyes for the last time. Junior, inconsolable ran from the house and for hours walked in the driving rain while Ray, who had little by little recovered the entire use of his legs, seeing Genevieve's distress, silently went out in search of Junior and persuaded him at last to return home. But the exposure proved fatal to the overstrained lad. Rocking slowly in her chair in the garden, Genevieve saw the shadowy figure of Junior hurry to the bench under the peach tree where Lovelace awaited him with outstretched arms. "Look, they are happy," she cried, but even as Ray peered short sightedly among the trees, the two figures vanished into the dusk and Genevieve was left alone with Ray in the garden.

BRIDE OF IMPULSE

Alma O. Bock Drama File No. 10651

FROM that first ride in the rumble seat with Tommy tall and silent besides her, Bobbie knew she was in love. The weeks that followed at school, she made a fool of herself in classes by pulling honers and then Tommy called her for a date and while his friend Bert and a little baby-faced girl necked in the front seat, Tommy told her of his home and of his plans which didn't include marriage. Then one day he drove up to her house in his new car, and Bobbie sitting beside him felt the world was suddenly standing still. That night, before he took her home, he kissed her for the first time. From then on no party was complete without Tommy and Bobbie, and Bobbie invited Tommy to take her to her senior prom. For hours Bobbie waited, hurt and bewildered and when Mabel found out that Tommy hadn't arrived yet, she insisted that Bobbie come down with them. At the dance Bobbie was immediately taken in tow by Jimmie who had arrived stag. Jimmie had adored Bobbie since he had pulled her out of the pond when she was eleven, and he always would. But Bobbie's feet dragged as she worried about Tommy, and then at last she saw him stagger in, drunk. Reeling over to her, Tommy said, "Dance?" and seeing everybody staring on curiously, Bobbie submitted rather than make a scene. At last some one cut in and when she slipped off to powder her nose and stem the tears that threatened her makeup, she saw Tommy going out into the garden with Corinne, whose reputation was unenviable. It was Jimmie who found her and took her home. For weeks of misery Bobbie didn't see Tommy, then one night when she had gone to a roadhouse with Joe, who loved Corinne and was getting over his hurt over the change in her, Bobbie saw Corinne enter, apparently alone. She told Joe to go over and speak to Corinne, she understtod. But when she came out of the rest room, she found the rest of the crowd had left believing she was with Joe, and Joe had gone off with Corinne, leaving a note asking if she minded going home with the crowd. Despairingly Bobbie realized she was deserted, and then, suddenly, she saw Tommy. Seeing her predicament, he asked if he could take her home, and while she phrased bright meaningless chatter, Bobbie's heart ached for him. With his lips on hers they made up their foolish quarrel, and once more there was a singing inside Bobbie. Then one night when Tommy had taken her to a dance, they had stolen away from everyone else and parked on a seldom used road. There was madness in the clear quiet of the night, and they were alone. Then Tommy was holding her gently in his arms and she was crying. Again and again, Bobbie tried to say goodbye to Tommy who didn't believe in marriage, and when Jimmie told her he loved her, Bobbie's eyes filled with tears and Jimmie, understanding, left for England to be with his aunt.

Then Bobbie heard Corinne, hand on Tommy's arm asking him to forgive her for leaving him in the roadhouse that night. And when Corinne, after numerous attempts to get Tommy, told him he'd have to marry her, Bobbie, seeing Tommy's misery, talked him into marrying her, going to Hawaii on a honeymoon, and then, if he wanted, they could be divorced. But the feeling that she had trapped Tommy, made Bobbie miserable, and when, on their return they were snowbound while on a weekend party at Jim's aunt's home, Tommy went back to work, while the, doctor, called to treat Bobbie's influenza, told Jim his "wife" was going to have a haby. And Bobbie, believing Tommy never loved her vanished, securing a position as singer in a cabaret and scoring a sensational success through the aid of Olive. It was Jimmie who found Bobbie, and convinced at last that she could never love any one but Tommy, told a long suffering husband where he could find his wife, and it was Jimmie who found Olive understanding.

BEYOND SIN

M. M. Williams Drama File No. 10521

SEATED beside her father, Ben Olive, on the porch of their little cottage in the Maine woods, Molly confides that she loves Jim Price, who lives in a neighboring country estate. His kindly features drawn with anxiety, Uncle Ben warns his daughter that this love can never be, but will not explain himself, except for the statement that the past will reveal itself. Unable to renounce her love, even for her father's sake, Molly repeats this conversation to Jim, but he cannot offer any explanation; taking her in his arms, he swears that he will never give her up. At home, he tells his father that he wishes to marry Molly, but is threatened with disinheritance if he weds the penniless girl. He replies that he will marry her in spite of all obstacles. Nancy Green, a New York society debutante, visits her aunt, and Jim is presented to her at a dance at the country club. Her interest awakened, Nancy loses no opportunities to seek Jim's companionship, but when she makes an unkind remark concerning Molly, the young man dislikes her and attempts to avoid her. Determined to have her way, Nancy tells Mr. and Mrs. Price that she is to have a child and that their son is the father of the expected baby. Pleased that Jim will become united by marriage to the daughter of a prominent family, Mr. and Mrs. Price insist upon an immediate wedding, although Jim denies Nancy's charge, and his mother later sympathizes with the boy's desire to marry Molly.

Shortly before the wedding, Nancy's father develops pneumonia, and she hastens to New York as he is at the point of death. Mr. Price is injured in an automobile accident, and, as he is dying, sends for Uncle Ben. He relates that his wife would have married Uncle Ben had he not destroyed their romance by promises of great wealth if she chose to become Mrs. Price. He tells Jim that Uncle Ben is, in reality, his father, and before Mrs. Price can make a statement, he dies, receiving unspoken forgiveness as both his wife and Uncle Ben kneel at his side, in his embrace. Later, Jim hears Uncle Ben and his mother state that Molly is their child, and realizes with a pang of horror that the girl he loves is his sister. He hastens to tell her this, but she first confesses that she is to bear him a child. Nancy finds them together, as she returns from New York, an heiress since her father's death. Threatening to kill Molly if Jim does not marry her at once, Nancy leads him away, and, feeling it is best from every standpoint, Jim becomes her husband.

Heartbroken, Molly runs away before Jim can tell her why their marriage is impossible, and provide her with money to care for herself. While driving recklessly, Nancy is fatally injured, and Jim cannot leave her bedside to search for the girl he truly loves. After several months, Nancy dies, telling Jim to find Molly and marry her; with mixed feelings of joy and grief, he carries out this request. At length he finds her at the home of her friend, Velma North, and sees his little son, only a few days old. Telling her the whole story, he says that he will never leave her, no matter what the relationship, but his mother later confesses that Uncle Ben is not Jim's father, as she lied to her husband in revenge for his many cruelties to her. Uncle Ben and Mrs. Price are married at the same time that Jim and Molly face the future joyously, as man and wife.

DEBT OF HONOR

V. David Lindsley Drama File No. 10765

CONFRONTED with the I.O.U's of his younger brother, Walter, John Brent paid them without protest, but back home in a stormy denunciation he withdrew all further responsibility. Shamed, Walter left home and John, only too well aware that gambling was a hereditary weakness of the Brents, exercised the more precaution in protecting his only son Clark from the taint. Grown to manhood, Clark was sent to a fine college, and one day with a party of friends was inveigled into a gambling house seoretly operated by Walter. Taunted into playing, Clark emerged winner by a thousand dollars and Walter, informed that a lad bearing the same surname as himself had won a large sum, grew faint as he realized his brother's son had gotton the taste. After a terrific internal conflict, Walter decided to inform John of the truth, and John sank back weakly in his chair as he realized that in spite of his efforts, Clark was prey to the Brent weakness. It was Walter who suggested a daring plan to cure Clark. Employing his adopted daughter, Jean, a beautiful blonde girl, as a supposed entertainer in the gambling casino, Walter had Clark return again and again, sometimes winning, sometimes losing. But one night, giddy with the nearness of Jean who had long since fallen in love with him and was party to the plot only in the hope of curing Clark, Clark gambled again and again for tremendous stakes until, dazedly he realized he had lost twenty-six thousand dollars. In desperation, Clark considered his plight and when the manager of the place suggested a way out, Clark, assured that he was not to be party to a murder, agreed to follow the directions contained in a sealed envelope and to ask no questions. Accordingly, puzzled by the simplicity of driving a sedan to an airplane, Clark returned home only to discover the next day, to his overwhelming distress, that he had been made party to the kidnapping of his own sister. His mother fainted at receiving the ransom note, his father, heeding the threats, refused to call in the police, but the climax was to come when a note came from Walter telling the whole plan had miscarried. The tools he had employed to hold the girl had doubled crossed him and were actually holding her for ransom, knowing that the Brents dared not call in the police now. To Clark was explained that the whole thing had started out as a farce to cure him of gambling by frightening him with the supposed consequences. His mother's faint had been faked as had the ransom notes. But now the play had gotten out of bounds. Remorseful at the damage he had caused, Clark took the ransom money and arranged to meet the kidnappers at the place where the plane had taken off. As he handed over the money and received his sister and Jean in return, the siren of an approaching police car was heard. The kidnappers, having the money, took off instantly in the plane. Back home there was a joyous reunion and as the details of the story were unfolded, Clark handed back the ransom money. In response to the questions asked him, Clark explained that he had handed over a fake package and that the siren had been faked too. Fervently Clark assured his happy family that he was forever cured of gambling and in this he was seconded by Walter. Then, as the others chatted together, Clark and Jean walked together into the garden where an age old scene, tender now as when first two lips came together, was enacted.

PART TIME SINNERS

Joseph Kral Krowasky Drama File No. 10730

WHEN Peggy Harpman rebels against having to act the lady——she rebels! In her low slinky roadster she speeds down the streets of the town, only to stop in astonishment as she recognizes a wanderer returned to town, Jerry Crosley, erstwhile captain of the high school football team. With unaccustomed boldness, she invites Jerry to drive with her, and after a few preliminaries startles him hy stating that she is taking a one month's holiday from respectability and is inviting Jerry to accompany her. Jerry suppresses a gasp, but finally backs out sadly on the grounds that he hasn't the necessary funds. Peggy offers to finance them both, but Jerry resents the gigolo implications, and leaves. The next day on a crooked automobile race, Jerry runs a borrowed sum up to five hundred dollars and calls for Peggy.

The first night at a hotel they get drunk, and are arrested. Fined, Jerry offers to match the burly police officer for double the fines or nothing and wins with a double tailed quarter. Although the fat cop discovers the quarter after Jerry has left, rather than make a fuss, he pockets it and the next day makes good his losses in a game with his fellow cops. Meanwhile Jerry and Peggy are off on the second round of their trip. At a masquerade Jerry dresses as a two gun westerner while Peggy, in an effort to get Jerry's goat, flirts outragcously. She pretends she is unescorted and is dancing with Fred Sterner, brawny stranger, when she winks at Jerry. However, he asks loudly, "Do you know me, Miss?" and Peggy's embarrassment is painful. In retaliation, she whirls from one pair of arms to another while Jerry repairs to the bar. However, returning, he sees a crowd about while two men carry Peggy to a divan. Knocking down a fellow who tries to bar his way, Jerry takes one look at Peggy and yells, "Who did this to her?" The doctor reports severe shock, and Jerry noticing that Fred Sterner is missing dashes out and catches the big fellow just as he is about to get into a cab. "Start that car and I'll shoot to kill," Jerry snaps and Fred, arms in the air, allows Jerry to prod him back to the ballroom. The police arrive and taking Jerry's gun from him, shoot off caps, while Fred with a sickly grin tries to escape. A police bullet gets him and the police explain to Jerry he has prevented the escape of a much wanted criminal.

During Peggy's convalescence, Jerry hovers in constant attendance, but once, when he has stepped out to renew her prescription, the doctor asks her what the idea is of acting the invalid. Peggy explains that she is in love with Jerry. Jerry enters and as the doctor discreetly withdraws, Jerry explains he has been offered a job as a reporter, will she marry him? A boy and girl, passing the window, sigh, "Ain't love grand?" and in emulation of their elders fall into a burlesque embrace.

THE OTHER SIDE LIVES

Mrs. R. M. Young Drama File No. 10632

"LET ME GO," Phyllis pleaded as the boss' son seized her in his arms. Then as his lips crushed down on hers, she struggled free and with all her strength slapped the grinning boy. Two spots of rage colored his cheeks. "You're fired!" he shouted.

Weeks of fruitless searching for work made Phyllis desperate. As she cooled her heels for hours in the employment agency, Phyllis heard the call for a domestic servant. Summoning her resolution, she pleaded for the job, and applying to Mrs. Winston, a haughty dowager, Phyllis was hired. From the beginning Mrs. Winston's two daughters, Jane and Marion made Pbyllis' life miserable. Long hours after she had finished the cleaning of the large house she was forced to bend over the washing of the girl's clothes and frequently after staying up until long after midnight with her work, she would be called in the morning to have a chemise thrown at her because it wasn't pressed well enough. Hour after hour while she worked, she heard the two girls discuss parties and men and once Jane came home all excited about a Doctor Howard she had met. Unable to get him any other way, Jane pretended to have gotten a severe headache and called the young physician professionally. Meanwhile, Phyllis, called out of bed at three in the morning when Jane came in from a party, was ordered to wash and press Jane's fluffiest negligee. The next morning, called early to clean the house, Phyllis could scarcely keep her eyes open and when the doctor arrived Jane rang for Phyllis and sending her for breakfast, insisted that the young doctor stay for a bite. Carrying in the heavy tray. Phyllis suddenly felt her knees buckle under and as she swayed, the doctor caught her. Concerned he lifted her onto the bed and took her pulse while Jane, enraged by the sudden distraction of the doctor's attention, shouted that Phyllis was only pretending. The look of utter contempt Dr. Howard turned on her silenced Jane, and when he had left, prescribing rest and decent food for Phyllis, Jane fired the weary little maid. Packing, Phyllis walked down the street. Dreading the long search for employment again, she wandered down toward the bridge and stared fascinated by the cold waters below. Suddenly a blind beggar tap-tapped cautiously along, and as Phyllis helped him across the bridge and saw how even he, sightless and ragged clung to life, she took new hope. Starving, she stared at a sign, "Dishwasher wanted" and entering the restaurant got the job. Interminable plates stacked before her and it was dark before she finished. Suddenly she shivered as she felt the beady eyes of the greasy foreign proprietor upon her and as he pulled her into his arms, she screamed and struggled. Grimly he held on and with a cry of despair, Phyllis retreated backwards until she lost footing and falling down the steep stairs lay crumpled at the bottom. When she opened her eyes in the white hospital room, Phyllis looked into the concerned face of Dr. Howard. And in the weeks that followed for her in the hospital Dr. Howard was to grow more and more interested in little Phyllis and one day was to ask a very important question of a very happy girl.

GOLDEN ARROW

Katharine Blastorah Drama File No. 10755

AT a house party on Long Island, Frances Ware is urged by her friends to sing for them. As her lovely voice sings traditional Indian melodies, Henry Keller, young guest seeks out his hostess and urges her to introduce him to Frances. He learns that she is the granddaughter of an Indian Chief, Golden Arrow, and that she makes frequent visits to the reservation where the ancient Indian customs are still observed. In the days that follow Henry falls deeply in love with Frances and one night as they sit together in the moonlight, harmonizing their rich voices in a song of love, Frances promises to marry Henry on his return from a business trip to Paris. Unable to endure the separation while everything about reminds her of Henry, Frances at length decides to visit Golden Arrow, and writes to Henry of her intention.

When she arrives at the edge of the forest, Frances finds Golden Arrow, dressed in full ceremonial regalia, and surrounded by his braves awaiting her. Once again her voice rings out in the tribal call, and the whole tribe gathers in tribute to her. The following day Indian canoes cut through the waters and Red Eagle, Chief of a neighboring tribe, arrives in full panoply, and as he smokes the pipe of peace extended to him by Golden Arrow his eyes search for Frances whom he has met and fallen in love with on a previous visit. Red Eagle tries to court Frances' favor but she will have none of him. Meanwhile Henry hurries through his business and returns to the United States. With all possible dispatch he proceeds to the West, and as the song of love only he and Frances know drifts over the waters, Frances, runs fleetly to the river and extends her arms to her lover. Golden Arrow greets Henry with all respect and for several days the two young lovers have the freedom of the forest for their own. One day Red Eagle, coming to win Frances, sees her with Henry and a fierce jealousy courses through his veins. Pretending courtesy to Golden Arrow's guest, he invites his fellow chieftan's tribe to a great feast. Frances alone distrusts his intentions and pleads her disinclination to go. The wily Red Eagle dispatches two of his braves to capture Frances, and while he entertains his guests with exhibitions of tribal dances and songs, his men kidnap the unprotected Frances and carry her off, bound and gagged to a far distant cave. Night falls and at last Frances manages to work loose her bonds and to push from the mouth of her cave the huge rock placed there. Terrified, she finds herself in the depths of a forest, but seeing gleaming eyes watching her movements, she climbs a tree and hidden in the branches spends a nerve-wracking night. The next day following the trail blazed by Red Eagle's men, she wanders through the forest, subsisting on berries. Meanwhile Golden Arrow, thinking his granddaughter has been drowned, drags the lake, but Henry, remembering Frances' fear follows Red Eagle to the cave. As he sees Red Eagle's expression of dismay at finding the cave empty, Henry's suspicions are confirmed and he leaps at the powerful Indian. In the silence of the forest the two men fight for life, and only Henry emerges alive. Dispiritedly he returns to the camp of Golden Arrow, only to find on a bramble a bit of Frances' sleeve, torn as she ran. With hope renewed he pushes on and at last finds her where she has fallen exhausted. Lifting her in his strong arms, he carries her home, and while the braves utter their cries of thanksgiving, Frances clings to her lover.

BORN TOO SOON

Evelyn Goodwyn Drama File No. 10753

TO the staid and old fashioned people of Great Oak, Nita was an outsider. Unable to undertsand her fun loving nature, her gaiety of spirit, they branded her as an incorrigible, wilful child, and predicted that she'd come to no good end. Therefore when huge, sombre Dan, a nearby farmer, fell madly in love with the Murphy girl as they called her, every one said that she was getting more than she deserved. It never occurred to any of them, least of all to Nita's father that she might refuse Dan because she didn't love him. But years of constant criticism, of grim objection to her whimsies had broken somewhat Nita's spirit, and when her father accepted Dan for her, Nita, feeling that for once she'd do what was expected of her, tried to receive him with the proper decorum. Only when Dan's huge arms drew her to him and his mouth crushed down on hers, did Nita know she couldn't go through with it. Accordingly when a traveling troupe came to town and the manager, looking over the trembling girl, admitted that he might find a place for her in his show, Nita planned to run away. But that night Dan came and remained on stolidly until the troupe had folded its tents and moved on. In despair, next morning, Nita packed her things and planned to follow only to learn soon enough the conditions attached to her remaining on with the troupe were unbearable. Tearing herself from the manager's grasp, she fled sobbing into the night. With her last few dollars, Nita bought a suit of men's clothing, a slouch hat, and ruthlessly cutting off her hair, trudged until she arrived at a farm which could use a new employee. All day she worked in the burning sun, and as she sat at the supper table winced at the close scrutiny of the farmer's son, a country lout. But, when she learned that she'd have to share the bedroom with him, Nita crept silently from the house and at length collapsed. When she recovered, she found that the police had brought her home. Her father regarded her with distaste, but when Dan came, and in his tight lipped way asserted that he was still willing to marry Nita in spite of what she had done, the marriage ceremony was hastily performed.

Soon enough Nita was to learn that Dan was to remind her at every turn of her unladylike conduct. Again and again he was to tell her he took her when nobody else wanted her, but Nita bore everything witb fortitude until Dan learned how to drink, and reeling in drunk each night beat her until once she became insensible. Fearing he had killed her, Dan ran out and a neighbor, finding Nita had her sent to the hospital. But Nita was never to go back to Dan again, and on her recovery she was to remain on as a nurse in training. Soon she was to learn that Dan had divorced her and remarried, and free at last, she sighed in relief. Three years of hard work at the hospital followed. And then one day among the victims of a terrible train wreck, Richard was to be brought in. And through Nita's care of him, Richard was to fall in love with her, and she with him, and after all those years, Nita was to come at last, into her own.

In her attempt to cover her confusion, the woman begins talking rapidly and Betty is astounded by the accuracy with which the woman tells her of her early life. Clayton offers ber a large gratuity, but the woman refuses it and retires to an inner tent. There Wilfred Holt finds her and questions her brutally about why she is turning away cash customers. Brokenly Sally tells him she has just seen her daughter. Instantly she knows she has made a mistake, for Holt sees in the admission a chance to extort money from Stanford. Sally refuses to be party to any such plan and Holt strikes her. As she bites her lip to keep from crying out, she realizes once again how miserably she has ruined her life. However, when Sally learns that Holt has kidnapped her daughter with tbe ruse that Clayton needs her, and is holding Betty for ransom, Sally is besides herself with grief and anger. Holt's hands circle her throat and he warns her if she dares to give him away he will kill her, but Sally, thinking only of Betty, calls Stanford and tells him where Betty is being held. The police come with Clayton, and as Betty rushes into her lover's arms, Holt, at bay turns on the police and tries to shoot his way out, but wounded, he topples over into the river and is drowned. Betty, restored to her loved ones goes on with her plans for her marriage, and the day before the wedding, Sally comes to beg Stanford to allow her to witness the ceremony, but he reviles her and sends her away, telling her he never wants Betty to know the secret of her mother' identity. Feeling that pleas will be useless, Sally leaves, only to drop exbausted to the ground. Betty, seeing the crumpled figure, hurries to her and recognizing the carnival lady, has Clayton carry her inside. Stanford revives Sally, but as she starts to go, Stanford relents, and softly he tells Betty this woman is her mother. And with Betty's arms about her, Sally comes into happiness again.

THE AVENGER

McCoy Thompson Drama File No. 10728

THE quiet of a Harlem afternoon is shattered by the staccatto of gangster bullets and as a black sedan pulls rapidly away from the curb, Richard Roller, wealthy jeweler, is left dead upon the floor of his rifled shop. The news breaks up Jane Roller, daughter of the deceased, but tensing herself in the arms of Larry Brent, who loves her, Jane sends him away so that she can be alone with her grief. The newspapers cry for the conviction of the bandits but the gang that is held for the murder and robbery, produces alibis and escapes. Bitterly, Jane swears revenge and when a school friend of hers, Rosa Tuscani, calls to tell Jane that she is leaving the cabaret where she has been working as an entertainer, Jane asks for the position. The first night, Jane is admired by Pedro, notorious racketeer who has thus far managed to evade the law. Jane shudders as his eyes measure her slim body, but when, later, in her dressing room, Pedro offers her big money to act as a blind in his stick-ups, Jane accepts. Sparring against the time when Pedro will take her for his own, Jane waits in an automobile below, her innocent appearance throwing off suspicion from the car the holdup men are to flee in. But, the day of a big holdup, Jane drives the car hurriedly to Pedro's quarters and rifles the safe for the jewels she can identify as coming from her father's store. As she is about to escape, she looks into the grinning face of one of Pedro's yeggs who offers her silence—at a price. As his leering face comes near her own, Jane desperately strikes him, and Pedro entering with his mob takes in the situation. "Stool pigeon," he mutters and pushes Jane violently into a chair. Suddenly the lights are extinguished. In the welter of sound, Jane is spirited away, down the steps, and pushed into a stolen car, ordered to returned home and stay there. Meanwhile upstairs the bandits have discovered their prey has eluded them, but before they can act, they are held up by a disguised fellow who finishes Jane's job of robbing the safe and vanishes while bullets spatter ineffectually after him.

The Skeleton delivers his evidence to the police who, however, on searching the premises find their prey has eluded them. Proceeding to Jane's house, the Skeleton gets no response and in despair repairs in evening clothes and whitened hair to the night club where Jane has worked. However, inadvertently his disguise is penetrated and he is recognized as the Skeleton. To his dismay, Jane is brought in, hands bound behind her, by her kidnappers and as she cries out, "Larry!" Pedro orders them hustled into his car where he can mete out a proper punishment. However, a policeman observes the suspicious movements and calls radio patrol cars to follow. The black sedan speeds along the highway, followed by patrol cars, sirens blowing. Shots ring out. The cars speed on through the night. The warning whistle of a train is heard. The gangsters speed on, on, missing by a hairbreadth the crushing wheels, while with a shrieking of brakes, the police car halts this side the speeding train. Again the pursuit is picked up. The wheels scream at curves. The police car gains inexorably. The gangster's guns are empty. Suddenly the driver of the sedan swerves too sharply and the black car turns round and round as it falls heavily over an embankment into the water. Larry seizes the sinking Jane and eager hands pull him ashore. The others never come to the surface. While the police chief congratulates Larry on his detective work and assures him there will be a promotion, Larry finds his reward on Jane's uplifted lips.

LOVE'S VICTORY

Paule Fraker Drama File No. 10732

AS they replace their foils, Francis Calvert, young American educated abroad, and Dupuis Armand, Frenchman, join arms and walk down the campus of the Berlin University. The term being almost over, Armand invites his friend to visit with him in the Armand ancestral chateau in France. There Francis falls in love with Armand's gracious and charming sister Jerrine, and when Armand and his sister go to Nuremberg on their annual visit to their grandmother, Francis is invited to come too. While in the beautiful old city, Armand with characteristic impulsiveness falls madly in love with a beautiful Countess, and goes about in a rapturous haze. One day, however, while Jerrine and Francis are sitting together in a corner of the grotto, they are dismayed at hearing through the bushes that screen them from view, the Countess', voice assuring a man that she is just amusing herself with Armand, and will cast him aside before their marriage becomes a reality. Pale and silent, Francis and Jerrine listen to the mocking laugh of the Countess growing fainter as she passes out of earshot. That evening, Jerrine informs her brother of his loved one's duplicity, but Armand refuses to believe and declares if it is true he will kill himself.

Young, inexperienced, Jerrine allows herself to doubt that it was really the Countess whose conversation she overheard, and in her ingenuousness she informs the older woman of the incident and begs her to alibi herself. With a little laugh, the Countess assures Jerrine that she was at a royal party and far from the scene. Francis alone doubts the Countess' glib assurance but receiving a note from home telling him his mother has died of diphtheria, the young American makes immediate preparations to return home. Armand accompanies him to the boat, but before the ship sails, Francis receives a note from Jerrine telling him she knows now that she is not the only object of his adoration and that she hates him for his baseness. Armand, reading the letter addressed to him and learning from his sister that Francis had trumped up the evidence against the Countess as just another link in his despicable plan, loses his head utterly and challenges his erstwhile friend to a duel, giving him no recourse but to accept. Although Francis strives desperately to keep from harming the brother of the woman he loves, accidentally he runs the impetuous Frenchman through, and with a last letter defending himself against each of Jerrine's charges, he returns to the United States only to learn that his father has died of the same malady that killed his mother. Francis, finding memories besetting him, entrusts his business to his father's secretary, and leaves immediately for the mines of Brazil where for seven years he toils in a vain effort to forget the past. On his return to New York, he is one day astounded at the visit of Dupuis Armand, who explains that the wound had not proved fatal, and that Jerrine had never written the damning letters which were, indeed, a forgery of the Countess. The Countess herself had married a sadistic marquis many years older than herself, while Armand and his sister had conducted a long, and hitherto unsuccessful search after Francis. In the chateau in France the three, Francis, Armand, and Jerrine, are reunited and their happiness is the more poignant for being so long deferred.

NIGHT CLUB HOUR

Jim Moore Drama File No. 10727

"O. K. YOU'LL DO," Tony Rose says. Mary Andrews draws her coat about her and proceeding into the dressing room of Tony's Gotham Club, New York nightclub, reports as the new dancer. The maid regards her sympathetically as Mary tries to eat her food without showing how starved she is. That night as she finishes her routine a tall young man in evening clothes sends for Mary. Trembling, she remembers her directions that she is to be sociable to the patrons and as Jack Sloan introduces himself, Mary urges him to buy more and more of Tony's liquor. That night Jack escorts Mary home and the next day he takes her riding into the country while she tells him how hard up she has been and how as a last resort she had taken the job in Tony's club. Jack warns her to get out before she gets too deeply involved, but Mary resents his possessiveness and tells him that she couldn't make such a salary anywhere else and that nobody disturbs her. That night, however, as she finishes her dance, Tony grabs her as she is hurrying into her dressing room. Mary struggles and as Tony's mouth comes down hard on hers, she screams. Instantly Jack Sloan pushes his way backstage and knocks Tony down. The next day Mary doesn't go back to Tony's place and Jack says he will try to get a job for her, but as he is hurrying to meet Mary, a car speeds by and a succession of bullets are fired at Jack. He falls to the ground and is subsequently carried to a hospital. Mary is beside herself with grief, but Jack assures her he will be all right. As Mary smoothes Jack's forehead, he captures her hand, and pressing it to his lips he tells her he loves her. Mary kisses him and leaves promising to be back the next day. However, when she fails to come, Jack becomes worried and despite the commands of his doctor that he stay in bed, Jack gets into his clothes and his face drawn with pain, watches opposite the Gotham club until Tony finishes for the night. Hours later, Jack's vigil is rewarded when Tony comes out with his yeggs and moves off in a long black sedan. Hailing a cab, Jack orders the driver to follow the black car and lands many miles out in a deserted section of New Jersey. Trying his gun, he sends the cab driver back to get some police, and staggering from loss of blood, Jack enters the disreputable looking roadhouse. The waiter eyes him curiously as the white faced man orders gin in a desperate stall for time. Then when the waiter brings out a bill, Jack explains he has only a check and can explain to the manager. The waiter insists the manager cannot be disturbed, but Jack claims he is a personal friend of Tony's and at last, puzzled, the waiter calls out Tony, who is furious at his inability to break down Mary's resistance. Jack crowds close behind the waiter and reaching the door where Mary is being held hurls himself on Tony. The waiter comes to his Chief's defence, but Mary picks up the gun that Jack has knocked out of Tony's hand, and holds off the gang. The sirens of police cars are heard, and the police break in. Tony and his gang are captured, and Jack embraces Mary and tells her from now on she is going to be his wife.

HEARTS DON'T CHANGE

Emma Upton Vaughn Drama File No. 10574

"SOME DAY," little John Raynor was saying, "I'll come back for you, Kitty." And as the covered wagon carrying the Raynors to Kansas rounded the bend of the timber, Katherine Curtis turned with a little sob, and flinging herself on the ground in the shade of the old Sycamore tree, wept that her first friend was gone. But soon, other cares were to relegate John to the background. One day Captain Curtis, Katherine's beloved father was to complain of a severe pain, and Katherine, frightened by his pallor was to saddle her horse and gallop six miles through the Missouri woods to get the doctor. Meanwhile, her mother, brooding before the fire, discovered an old photograph hidden behind a brick in the mantle, and believing the woman to have been some love of her husband's rarely discussed youth, had thrown the picture impulsively into the fire. How bitterly she was to rue that action when the Captain, before dying, gasped that he had provided handsomely for his family, the whereabouts of his hidden box of gold being detailed on the back of the picture hidden over the fireplace. But while the shallow Mrs. Curtis was to search frantically for the gold, Katherine was to grieve over her father and over his delirious murmurings of the disgrace that his older sister Eleanor had brought on the Virginian Curtises. Then, claiming that her husband's death was due to an injury received in the recent Civil War, Mrs. Curtis began collecting a pension which she was to continue fraudulently to receive even after she married again. Then a strange, beautifully dressed lady was to arrive, calling herself Ann Curtis, and seeing Katherine, offered to put her lovely young niece through school in Boston. Urged by her mother whose interest was now centered on Eloise, child of her second marriage, Katherine accompanied her aunt to her Eastern home. At school Katherine was immediately to distinguish herself by her talent for writing and she was to make two close friends, her room mate Pearl and a young professor of German, Herr Steinberg, the first to recognize and be awed by Katherine's creative gifts. However, when Katherine informed her aunt that she was determined to earn her own living, Ann, denouncing her as an ungrateful and wilful girl, had given way to a fury that had appalled Katherine, and withdrawn all further friendship. Continuing a long and warm correspondence with her two school friends, Katherine looked forward across the years to the return of Herr Steinberg from Heidelberg University, the while her stories were being received warmly by the press. Again and again Katherine wrote offering to have Eloise properly educated, but her mother, lavishing her affections upon the spoiled younger daughter made excuses until Eloise, after a long practice of deceit, eloped with Marvin, and discovering in a cheap hotel that he was already married, killed her betrayer and herself. Katherine was to learn that her aunt Ann was really her father's sister Eleanor, and that the terrible disgrace had been the result of an illegitmate child born to her through a mulatto slave, Pierre, whom Eleanor had wildly loved. Broken by the news of Eloise's tragedy, Mrs. Curtis was to die of heart failure before the disgrace attending the discovery of the pension fraud could affect her, while Katherine's own sorrow was intensified by the disillusion of learning that Herr Steinberg and Pearl had eloped together. Meanwhile John Raynor, now a Kansas Judge, returned and seeking shelter from a cyclone, discovered in the hollow of a fallen sycamore, the gold left by Captain Curtis for Katherine, and through one of Katherine's recently published stories, John and Katherine were to find each other and learn that whatever the years between had brought them they still loved each other.

THREAD OF SCARLET

J. K. Ellwood Drama File No. 10738

SET apart from the other students by his gravity and application to his books, Bartholomew is taking one of his solitary walks through the woods, when he sees a beautiful woman dash by on horseback. His eye follows her until she is out of sight and thereafter he is unable to rid his mind of thoughts of her. Several times in the space of the next few days he catches glimpses of her and he thinks himself deeply in love. Unable to sleep nights, he composes verses and one day as he sees her waiting in a carriage, on an impulse he cannot restrain, he gives her a sheaf of his poems. As she puts forth her hand, a heavy set, beetle-browed man appears and gruffly seating himself beside the woman, slams the carriage door in the face of the young student and orders the coach to drive on. That is the last Bartholomew sees of the beautiful lady and her possessive middle aged husband, but the thought of her married to the brutal gouty millionaire so disturbs him that for several weeks he is unable to compose himself. At last, putting her firmly from his mind he returns to his studies and in the succeeding years distinguishes himself and taking the orders of an abbe, becomes the ascetic and opinionated dictator of his parish. His goodness, his sincere belief in what he preaches, no one can doubt, but although he is respected and honored, only one truly loves him, his young niece, Agatha. Through the years the one soft spot in the heart of the Abbe is for the gay lovely young girl who makes moues at his moralizings and even listens thoughtfully while Bartholomew extols the virtues of a cloistered life for her. One night, however, walking home through the dusk, the Abbe fancies he sees two lovers, arm in arm walking down the lane. He returns to his study, but that night his studies are disturbed by a restlessness, and at length he steps out into the fragrant Spring night. Near the river he sees again the two lovers, lips wedded, but even as he looks on indulgently, he is stunned at the recognition of —Agatha. She starts at sight of him and shortly after the Abbe has retired to his room, he hears the patter of Agatha's steps after him. Her face is radiant as she begins to speak, but one glance at the solemn tortured face of the Abbe halts her words and she returns with lagging steps to her own room. The next day she withdraws gently from Francis' eager embrace, and with averted face explains that she cannot go on as they had planned. In vain he exhorts, entreats, but to all she explains that they are young, life is before them, but the disappointment would crush the Abbe. At length Francis goes. Dinner that night is served in silence but the Abbe's eyes approve his white faced niece. Then comes a knocking and the Abbe stares transfixed at the face of the girl of his youth. Stepping back he allows her to enter and as Agatha leaves, Joan Latour pleads for her son's happiness. The Abbe regards her with tight lips, but Joan cries, "Do not sentence these two to a life without love," and sinking deep into a chair she tells him of her own life married to a man her parents chose for her. Only three years ago was she freed by his death. Exhausted Joan stops and as she sees her words prevail and Agatha and Francis are married with the blessing of the Abbe, Joan smiles at him mistily. Back in his room, the Abbe opens his Bible, but as his eyes read "The Song of Songs," his mind reverts to Joan, and slowly shutting his book, the Abbe knows he is in love.

ALIAS THE GROOM

Anna Zahara Drama File No. 10767

"MY DEARS," exclaimed Mrs. Diekson excitedly, "I met a real French Vicompte. And what's more," here her face wrinkled in triumph, "he has promised to come right here to Highland Manor as my guest." But if the Ladies' Aid Society buzzed in envy at Mrs. Dickson's coup, her daughter Virginia was less pleased. For one thing, although the Vicompte was handsome and suave, she disliked him. Virginia was frankly annoyed with his attentions and even more so with her mother and father for being so smugly pleased when the Vicompte made it known that he was seriously considering making Virginia his bride. "I must tell you about my ancestral castle," the Vicompte whispered in Virginia's ear as they walked together from the dining room, and in her anxiety to elude him, Virginia murmured something about an appointment and running to her roadster, stepped on the accelerator. Miles out of town, the car broke down. Impatient, furious, Virginia hiked to the nearest house and put in a call for a mechanic from the service station. Twenty minutes later a tall, handsome chap appeared and after a few minutes pronounced her car ready to be driven home. But Virginia was so overwrought that she asked the young man, Ward Bowler, he said his name was, to chauffeur her. "New, aren't you?" she asked after a while, and so their friendship had started. In the succeeding days Virginia was to meet Ward frequently, and to fall deeply in love with him, while her mother congratulated herself on the progress the Vicompte was making. Then the Vicompte formally proposed. Before Virginia could refuse him her mother had joyously consented and when Virginia sullenly objected, the Vicompte remarked all young girls were like that, but she'd grow to think very highly of him. Shortly afterwards, the Vicompte saw Virginia meeting Ward and an adroit remark to Mrs. Dickson resulted in a scene between Virginia and her parents. After a stormy interview during which Virginia explained she loved Ward and didn't care what he was, the Dicksons forbade Virginia ever to see the garage mechanic again. Tearfully Virginia asked Ward what to do and added that her engagement to the Vicompte was to be announced on New Years Eve. A few days before one of the wealthiest women in town was robbed of her jewels. Ward who had come to the party to see Virginia, was accused and arrested and the dancing went on. Then came New Years Eve. At midnight the engagement was to be announced, and Virginia evading her fiance-to-be was thoroughly miserable. However, a few minutes before festivities reached their height, the police chief entered with a warrant for the arrest of the Vicompte. The startled guests turned for an explanation, but the Vicompte, covering them all with a gun fled only to be brought back minutes later, tied and disarmed by Ward. The police chief shook Ward's hand and as the Dicksons gasped, Ward explained that he really was a New York lawyer who was handling the prosecution of The Duke, an underworld character who had successfully posed as a nobleman and slipped the police. His trail had led here to the Vicompte, a new alias, and Ward had rather enjoyed the detective disguise as garage mechanic, especially, he concluded, since it had led him to Virginia. That night an engagement was announced by the chastened Dicksons, the engagement of their daughter to the hero of the hour, Ward Bowler.

MONEY! MONEY!

Esther Greisdoff Drama File No. 10770

HER head bent to the "Want ad" she is holding, Patricia Rogers bumps headlong into a tall young man coming out of the office building. He apologizes profusely, but she hurries on and with fast-beating heart applies for the secretarial position. After an exhaustive interview, she is hired and the next morning as she comes in to take dictation, she is astonished to discover behind the desk, Larry Wayne the young man with whom she collided. With a smile of pleasure he greets her and explains he is the son of the big boss. In the days that follow, Larry falls deeply in love with Pat, and learning that she is the only support of her mother and brother since her selfish father, John Rogers has cut them off, Larry introduces Pat to his young artist friend, Don. It is Don who offers Pat a large sum of money for her advertising copy, and with this spare time work, Pat is soon able to buy electric trains for her brother and fashionable clothes for her mother. One night, as they sit together in the Cocoanut Grove, a fashionable night club, Larry asks Pat to marry him, and when she points out that his father will certainly object, Larry assures her he can square everything with the old man. So Larry and Pat leave on a short but glorious honeymoon trip, and on their return Larry discovers somewhat shamefacedly that they are heavily in debt. Pat worries, but not until Larry has placed the whole truth before his father and learned that he is disowned, utterly and completely, does Larry begin to face the facts. Pat assures him at least she has her job with Don, but Larry is bitterly jealous of Don, and after a long search for work, he finds a waiter's position that offers him twelve dollars a week. To the carefree, handsome young Larry Wayne, the fact that his wife earns more than himself is a severe blow but meanwhile their creditors present bills, bills, until both Larry and Pat are frantic. Don, taking advantage of Pat's desperation offers to take all worries off her hands—for a price. Pat refuses, but Larry, misunderstanding Don's purely physical interest in Pat and thinking if not for him Pat could have everything she wants, decides to make Pat hate him so that she will leave. The situation becomes unbearable, and as the creditors threaten to throw Larry into prison unless he pays every cent he owes, Pat throws her pride to the winds, and goes to her father to appeal for money. John Rogers, selfish, brutal, tells his daughter when he divorced her mother he cut himself off utterly from her and their children. In her rebellion against John's heartlessness, Pat tells him what she thinks of him and the servants cower. Exhausted, Pat returns home only to be arrested a few hours later for the murder of her father. Protesting her innocence she is led to prison and grilled. It is Larry who fights tooth and nail to save Pat, and Larry who finally discovers that John Rogers was murdered by his second wife, who finding herself about to be cast aside as Pat's mother had been, killed the heartless John. Pat, freed, learns she has inherited a large part of John's fortune, and with a clean slate she and Larry start life again, secure in each other's love.

THE HIGHER JUSTICE

May Lopez Drama File No. 10687

LEON SYLVESTER, lying on his hard prison cot, opened his eyes to the dawn of his last day on earth. Presently the jailer entered carrying the condemned man's breakfast. In despairing tones Leon cried, "But I tell you I am innocent." Then, as the man shrugged his shoulders and replied, "The chaplain is outside," Leon groaned and lowered his head in his arms. The jailer withdrew and a few moments later the door opened again. The silence grew oppressive. Then as though some magnetic influence drew them together, two pairs of eyes gazed into each other and Pietro Orsini and Leon Sylvester had met again after six years.

Orsini pulled out his watch. "It is seven o'clock," he said, "we have just one hour." Driven beyond endurance Leon shouted, "You killed her!" "Yes," Orsini answered calmly. "I stabbed her once through the heart. She suffered no pain." A torrent of abuse swept from the prisoner's lips. Orsini laughed mirthlessly. "How," he mocked, "do you propose to establish my guilt? Was not your intimacy with the woman proved? Did not the neighbors hear you quarrel and threaten her? Was it not your knife that bore the blood stains?" Then as the prisoner sank back weakly, Orsini relentlessly recounted the events leading up to the crime.

Beginning with the time when they were both friends, Orsini reminded the condemned man how many times he had steered him from pitfalls and shielded him from the consequences of his missteps. Then Orsini had removed from the neighborhood and had met and married Vivian. How he had loved her, and how happy they had been until one day Leon joined them. Powerless to interfere, Orsini had watched his wife drift under the spell of Leon's fascination. When Orsini was called away on business, Leon had wished him Godspeed. On his return, Orsini's stricken eyes had looked upon a deserted home and a letter from Vivian saying she had gone with Leon, who understood her better.

A broken-hearted man, Orsini had schooled himself to bear anything so long Vivian was happy. But, having followed them, he soon saw that Leon was already tiring of the girl. Vivian's eyes lost their luster, while Leon reverted to his old vices until he became a thing to be despised. Meanwhile Orsini was building a reputation for respectability. At last, when he could no longer bear to look upon the poor wreck that had been the woman he loved, Orsini struck—with Leon's own dagger. True, he, Orsini, had killed his wife, but Sylvester was a threefold murderer—of their friendship, of their happiness, and lastly of Vivian's honor.

Leon cowered before his accuser, then, in a last desperate effort shouted, "All you say may be true, but the law recognizes no such arbitrary distinctions. It is you who are the murderer." Far off a clock struck eight and the prison bell took up the chime. Leon looked into the unflinching eyes of the other and realized the utter hopelessness of his case. What was the use of talking of delivering Orsini up to justice when his own soul was shouting aloud his guilt! A sound of feet was heard along the corridor. Again the door was swung to, and the condemned man with head bowed low was led between two lines of guards while the chaplain followed murmuring the prayers for the dying from his beloved Book.

THE SENOR'S DAUGHTER

Hazel A. Hendricks Drama File No. 10625

THE bells of the mission rang out. There was gladness in the heart of Dona Ortega for had not Manuel Estradas, son of their good friend and neighbor, asked today for the hand of her daughter Sara in marriage! As the Senora busied herself with plans for the great fiesta, she saw the bronzed figure of the Indian Rafael stride into view. Petulantly she turned to her husband and for the hundredth time complained that she didn't see why they had to learn planting from an Indian. And for the hundredth time Senor Ortega impatiently explained that only Rafael could teach him about the new methods of planting as tried so successfully by Joaquin Sanchez in the North. Besides Rafael was no ordinary Indian. His father had been a Spanish soldier who had been married to Rafael's Indian mother by Father Sierra himself.

Meanwhile, proceeding directly from the formal betrothal ceremony to her own room, Sara irritably accepted Louisa's help in discarding her dress. Although bearing the relationship of mistress and maid, when alone Sara and Louisa shared every confidence and now Sara burst forth in a diatribe against her betrothed. Lousa could scarcely believe her ears. Manuel, who to her was romance, adventure incarnate, was to Sara a burro, an oso. She hated his clumsiness. "Do you think I want a husband who prostrates himself at my feet?" Sara raged. But later, when she tried to confide her unwillingness to marry Manuel, her mother silenced her with harsh words and her father assured her indulgently she would learn to love Manuel. The days that followed were full with preparations for the wedding. At last the time of the fiesta arrived. All afternoon the guests arrived. While the dancers twinkled their intricate steps, Rafael, his face an inscrutable mask, leaned against a great oak. Only when Manuel stooped from his saddle and lifted the slim Sara in his arms at the conclusion of her whirling dance, did Rafael abruptly leave his place. At last the guests left. In the silence of the fragrant night, Rafael watched tensely while Manuel crept to Sara's window and softly played a serenade, but Sara's window remained dark and at last Manuel slipped away.

One day soon after the fiesta, as Sara and Louisa wandered down to the spring, Sara came up behind Rafael busily engaged in carving a leather bridle. So absorbed was he that he did not hear her approach, then springing to his feet, he stood looking at her with bated breath. For a moment neither spoke. Then as their hesitancy lifted, Rafael told Sara of his people, of the swift strong boats of the Indians. At last Sara left. Thereafter she would frequently suggest that they go to watch Rafael at work, and once Louisa, tiring, wandered off to seek ferns. With a sudden burst of passion, Rafael spoke of his oppressed people, and finishing drew Sara into his arms. Again and again Sara tried to stay the wedding plans while Louisa stared incomprehensively. At last, Sara to the grim satisfaction of her voluble mother, wearily submitted asking only that she be given a few hours before the wedding. In her heavy mantilla, the bride met Manuel at the altar, but as the final words were pronounced and he lifted the obscuring veil, he murmured, "You!" as the bride whispered, "It is I, Louisa. You may kill me Manuel. I love you. She did not." Through the gathering confusion, Manuel said, "Louisa, you are my wedded wife. I will try to make you happy." And while Dona Ortega raged, Don Ortega shrugged his massive shoulders and Manuel led his bride to his ranch. The mission bells rang clear. Far off Rafael crossed the desert, carrying in his arms his happy bride, Sara.

WIVES TO LOVE

Norma Eckhoff Drama File No. 10766

FROM childhood, Susan has been forced by her stepfather to work on his farm and those advantages of education and social contacts have been denied her. But when, one day she is thrown by a refractory horse and recovers consciousness to find Olsen, her mother's husband, holding her tightly to him in a loathesome embrace, she sinks her teeth into his shoulder and escapes. Her mother, suspecting something is wrong, learns the whole story and gives Susan all her savings to get away. Shy, fearing to meet people, Sue proceeds to the boarding house of Mrs. Lucas, with whom her mother had lived before her marriage, and it is Mrs. Lucas who takes the unhappy girl under her aegis. It is Mrs. Lucas who finds a position for Sue as a waitress, and as the weeks pass Sue begins to lose some of her timidity. Then one day two handsome boys come into town. From the moment Sue sees Larry Wayne, her heart begins to thump violently, but when Larry smiles at her she returns a severe look. That evening as she is leaving, Larry honks his horn, and when she refuses to ride in his car, he walks her home, cajoling her all the time. At last, with Mrs. Lucas approving, Sue agrees to go out with Larry and within two months Larry has told her of his love. He returns to school but on his first vacation returns begging her to marry him immediately, and telling her he can square it with his folks. However, it is a disillusioned Larry who returns a few days later, to tell her that his folks have disowned him until he has his marriage annulled. Larry gets a job but soon is laid off, and unable to bear the thought of Sue working for him, capitulates when the Waynes invite him and his wife home. From the first Sue is treated as an outsider and her mistakes are all made capital of. Larry fights valiantly for her, but as the days pass, he begins to yield to the renewed campaign of Maryln Bates, whom he had known before his marriage. Unable to stand it longer, Sue, knowing she is going to have a baby, accepts the money Larry's father sneeringly offers, and with a scathing note, leaves. Unwilling to let her mother and stepfather know of the failure of her marriage, Sue returns to Mrs. Lucas who together with her sister, Aunt Mary, cares for Sue through the months that follow. Baby Larry is born, adorable with the black eyes of his mother and the auburn thatch of his father, but it is Aunt Mary, herself once a piano teacher, who hears Sue crooning lullabies and insists that Sue have her voice trained. Making remarkable progress, Sue is soon offered a radio contract on the strength of her first recital, and billed as Black-eyed Susan, and managed by the energetic and handsome Jack Kelly, Sue is soon a sensation. She sends the $15,000 back to Mr. Wayne and in a few years, having studied and improved herself, she is triumphing in her personal appearances and at last appears in Summit, the home of the Waynes. Larry, recognizing her begins a touching campaign to win back his wife, but Sue, under the advice of Jack, thinks she can play with him and hurt him as he had hurt her. Father Wayne, himself, comes to beg Sue to come back, but Sue is to have more moments when she flirts with Maryln's politician husband, and diffidently considers the Waynes. But at last, knowing that she can never love anybody but Larry, Sue relents, and after that blinding moment when Larry is to learn for the first time of Larry Junior, Sue is to be held forever in Larry's eager arms.

PREJUDICE

James F. Adair Drama File No. 10756

DOWN to his last few dollars, Paul Fremont, fine young colored lad, meets Henry Dale, who has been a waiter with him in a hotel at one time. Henry immediately recommends Paul, and although there are no waiter's positions available, through his friend, Paul is given employment as a night porter in a southern hotel. His first day on duty, Paul meets Lila Smith, one of the chambermaids, and knows at once he is going to like working here. However, when he has finished duty the first night, Paul finds Henry's wife, a beautiful octoroon waiting for him, and as she asks softly if there is anything she can do for him, Paul reminds her that he has gotten the position through the kindness of her husband. Furious at the rebuff, Alice turns from him and Paul, sighing unhappily as he remembers how Henry had spoken trustfully of Alice, goes to his room. The next day at one in the morning, a Mr. Paduka, a fat travelling man arrives, and raps importantly on the desk for service. Realizing that the man is very drunk, Paul helps him to a room, but as he is about to enter, he notices Alice and Fritz, the steward, a white man, entering the adjoining room. Alice looks at him balefully, but Paul turns away with a sick feeling at the pit of his stomach. In the hotel room, Mr. Paduka brings forth a thick wad of bills peels off one from the top, and demands change. Still affected by the scene he has just witnessed, Paul does not respond instantly and the drunkard immediately begins accusing him of trying to keep the change. Paul manages to pacify him and goes downstairs. Meanwhile Henry passes him, and Paul, realizing he may see Alice, tries to stop him. Henry, however, brushes aside Paul's excuses, and goes on. As he passes the door, he catches a glimpse of his wife in the steward's arms. He realizes now what Paul wanted to spare him and he returns dully to his room. When Alice comes in and attempts to make love to him, he pushes her from him roughly, and she immediately jumps at the conclusion that Paul has betrayed her. Swearing revenge, Alice goes out. Meanwhile, the drunken Paduka hides his money under his mattress, and promptly forgetting, looks for his roll of bills and sets up a cry that he has been robbed. Alice, hearing, quickly testifies she saw Paul entering Paduka's room. The white man immediately becomes excited and claims it must be true because Paul looked at his money queerly. Given no chance to defend himself, Paul realizes that according to the Southern administration of justice to colored people, he will most certainly be convicted. Alice grins at him triumphantly, satisfied at her retaliation. However, when she goes to town to arrange for transporation, Lila is sent to clean Paduka's room and under the mattress she finds the roll of bills. Although she has heard nothing about suspicion for its theft being cast on Paul, she brings it to the desk, and the white man shamefacedly admits he remembers now that he put it there. Paul is completely absolved. Alice leaves town, and offered a position elsewhere, Paul asks Lila, with whom he has been falling in love to accompany him—as his wife.

THE BIG CATCH

V. Gordon Lecesne Short Subject File No. 10709

BLUSTERING about, Tolan Wilson, huge darky demanded his handsome prices for his ganja and after some discussion got it. Some day, his victim warned him, the police would get him, but Tolan threw back his head and laughed. The police would never get him, he boasted. He was too smart. Mounting his donkey, Tolan rode majestically back to his little white washed cottage. Carefully counting his gains and congratulating himself upon his perspicuity, Tolan hid his money and was in the process of carefully hiding the remains of his ganja, when looking out of the window, Tolan's eyes popped as he beheld two mulatto gentlemen coming up the hill. Detectives! Tolan thought and despairing he hid his two bags of ganja under the bed. It was the first time he had ever kept any evidence about and this had to be the time the detectives were coming. The donkey, grazing in the front yard raised its head and stood motionless looking at the two men. The afternoon was oppressively hot and Tolan mopped his head. Maybe they weren't detectives. Despite himself his teeth began to chatter. A cutlass lay on the table. Cautiously he picked it up, then realizing he was only damaging his own case he threw it hastily from him. He looked out at the two men strolling interestedly about his yard. His knees quaked. They were detectives all right for one of them had a pair of handcuffs dangling from his right wrist. "Me's only sellin' cowpeas," Tolan shouted. The two men glanced at each other, smiled, and ignored him. Tolan's eyes bulged as after looking about curiously, the two men squatted on the trunk of a large cedar log lying against the trunk of a manga tree. Having made themselves comfortable, each one lit a cigarette. "Look yah," Tolan broke in, "Whey di Dickens you is doin' in mi yard, ee?" Blandly the two ignored him. Tolans eyes rolled to the ganja sacks. They were just waiting to catch him. Suddenly his face brightened. Perhaps they were visitors from Haiti and didn't understand the language. Haltingly he spoke in different tongues, but his visitors continued to disregard his presence while the anxious Tolan more and more panicky watched them as a half hour slowly rolled by. Why didn't they arrest him? Then he could swear he was innocent. Why didn't they do something? Furiously he went out determined to shoo them off his premises, but as he approached he saw one of them open a ten-chambered revolver. Startled he fled back inside, trembling violently. The shades of evening began to fall. Tolan's eyes were fixed on the two damning bags of ganja. If only they weren't there accusing him. He noticed the backs of the two watchers toward him. Quickly he stepped into his bedroom, dumped the ganja into two pillow cases, then stepped quietly out the back way. Expecting a bullet through his back any minute, he hurried up the path and broke into a desperate run. A bright crescent moon smiled at his haste. The two men rose. One of them seized the donkey while the other horse thief grinned and looked after the rapidly retreating figure of their host. Then, with a deep bow for Tolan's unwitting hospitality, the two mounted his donkey and jolted happily down the hill.

FIVE FLOORS OF HELL

Harry Weinreb Drama File No. 10796

HIS idealism slowly being crushed by his environment, Harry walks discouragedly down the East Side street, having failed once again to find a decent position. As he starts the five floor climb up the rickety stairway to his own apartment, he sees Lillian, the girl he loves. Securing her promise that she will meet him at eight on the roof to watch the stars together, he flies up the remaining stairs. Inside there is poverty but extreme neatness. As he sits down to the meal his mother has cooked, a call comes for the janitor and as his mother sighs deeply, Harry begins answering the calls of the many tenants. Mice, heat, the complaints are endless, but only by giving janitor's service can Harry remain on with his mother and two younger brothers in the house. The jargon of many languages is heard. Dumbwaiters screech. The heat is terrific. Slowly he reclimbs the stairs.

Then that night on the roof with his arms about Lillian, Harry shuts his eyes in rebellion against his poverty. He loves Lillian with all his heart and soul, but he will not condemn her to a life like this as his wife, a life that would be made more unbearable if children were born to them in this squallor. Day after day he continues his search for work, meanwhile forced to beat up ruffians who resent Lillian's choice. Opposed to the occasional flashes of comedy supplied by one drunken tenant and several dumbwaiter gossips, there are such tragedies as that of the Postalskies. Sent up with the Marshall to dispossess the Postalskies, Harry finds the aged disheartened man caring for his dying wife. Out of his own pocket, Harry pays their rent and learning they have a wealthy son, Alexander Post (nee Postalsky) Harry looks him up and finding him entertaining aristocratic gentile guests, Harry, about to be forcibly ejected, summons courage and tells the heartless son what he thinks of him. The other guests are shocked, but Alexander accompanies the young boy to his parents' home, arriving just as a sheet is being drawn over the dead woman's body.

Meanwhile, Harry is getting into arguments with the landlord for condemning the tenement as a firetrap. His need for Lillian becomes more acute, and utterly discouraged, he comes home one night to remember it is his mother's birthday. Taking Lillian and his mother to the movies in celebration, he leaves his two younger brothers contentedly playing with a ten cent game he has bought them. As they return in gay spirits, however, the birthday trio see crowds running after the fire engines and to their horror discover their house is burning. Shouting to Lillian to run to the adjoining roof, Harry makes his way up the burning stairs and finds his two younger brothers already overcome on the fifth floor. Racing to the window he throws a rope across to Lillian who fastens it to the roof. With one child slung in front and one in back he climbs cautiously across. The rope breaks. The crowds scream. But Harry is swung toward the adjoining building and with his precious burden is saved. The crowds cheer. Recovering in the hospital, Harry learns that Alexander Post has a job for him and as Lillian kisses him, Harry smiles in complete happiness.

THE TURNING TIDE

David I. Paisner Drama File No. 10795

THAT Phil Crandall was a likeable chap Vera Fleming's two older sisters were ready to grant. But that Vera should prefer him to Frank Seaton, who had money, was unthinkable. Anna and Julia had both married well and since they had both contributed toward Vera's support, they felt they had a right to dictate how she was to run her life. At length, because they loved each other so very much, and because money problems seemed trivial beside their deep feelings, Vera and Phil eloped. Vera's sisters were horrified, and in spite of everything the newlyweds could do to reconcile them, remained obstinately unfriendly. So life began for the Crandalls. Soon Vera found she was going to have a baby. Nor did Phil's sudden loss of his job because of the Depression, help matters. But Phil had ideas. He had always felt he could manage a factory of his own, and if he only had capital sufficient to start him off, he knew he could make good. It hurt his pride to go about borrowing money from his friends and many of them gave him excuses. Phil could hardly blame them. Even Tom McCue whom Phil had helped out of innumerable difficulties had no money to lend. He was only a newspaper reporter, he reminded Phil, and pretty broke, but if there were anything else he could do, he'd be glad to. But in the end, with Vera's brothers-in-law acting as comakers, Phil was able to borrow enough money from a loan society, to open a factory. He didn't expect miracles immediately, but expenses mounted appallingly. The baby was born and seemed to need doctors and special diets all the time. Vera hadn't a new dress since she was married, and it hurt Phil to see how drawn her face had become. But, working long hours each night, Phil finally had things going well. Frank Seaton was surprisingly nice considering he had wanted Vera. He supplied Phil with machinery and gave him more credit than Phil had dared hope for. Already, before the machines had started working, Phil had drummed up orders from concerns he had dealt with before. Everyone liked Phil, and returning to the spare supper that Vera had prepared, Phil took her in his arms and told her things would soon be bright. Once he saw Frank's car outside and came up to find Frank hastily leaving. He became more thoughtful. If Vera had married Frank she wouldn't have to worry about money. Holding her tightly to him, he promised fervently that as soon as he made money he'd make up to Vera for her present privations. And then the strike broke out. With all his notes falling due, with orders already in, Phil couldn't get workers to turn his machines. Desperately he pleaded with the men to come to work. Meanwhile his creditors became more insistent. Led by Frank, they started to hold meetings and grill him. For the first time Phil realized that this was what Frank had been planning all along. If only they would wait! Then, Tom, always happy go-lucky came in to urge Phil to buy a ticket on the Irish Derby. Suddenly galvanized, Phil begged Tom to print his name among the large winners. Tom hesitated, made excuses and finally on the announcement day, Phil's name was third. The creditors became miraculously polite. Frank stopped coming around, and while Phil got his factories going, Vera's sister came around to tell her how they always knew Phil would make good. And with the factories going, Phil did.

NO OTHER MAN

M. Brennan Drama File No. 10669

CLASSMATES in college, Bob and Ted smile ruefully at one another as they march in line during commencement exercises. Later, while packing their bags in the room they have shared together at their fraternity house, the two boys wonder when they will meet again, and under what circumstances, as they bid one another a sad farewell. Bob, whose father is a successful engineer, joins him in his work, and soon attains success as a constructor of skyscrapers. Ted, an orphan, does not find his chosen field easily. Thrown entirely upon his own resources, the attractive young man wins a small place with a travelling stock company, and by virtue of his charm and appearance, is soon elevated to a leading role. Tiring of the tinsel glamour and continual wandering attendant upon this means of existence, Ted eventually quits the stage, seeking an occupation more to his liking. The depression has already made its fatal mark by this time, and Ted is confronted on all sides with "No Help Wanted," signs. In spite of his youth and ability, he is almost penniless when he answers an advertisement for a young man to lecture on life's problems. Again, he wins success. A member of his audience challenges him at the close of the lecture, asking him for his definition of spiritual values, and why he believes there is another life. Genuinely interested, he takes up the study of spiritualism, and is recognized as an authority on this occult science in a short time.

Accidentally, Ted and Bob meet while buying papers at a stand. The two enthusiastically exchange reminiscenses of school days, and that evening Ted dines at Bob's home, where he is presented to the latter's wife and charming sister-in-law, Sue. Alone in the parlor together, Sue and Ted talk; the girl explains her desire to paint, but says that she has never been able to develop this talent, although confident that it is latent within her. Receiving permission to call, Ted spends many evenings in Sue's company. and one night tells her that he loves her; she, too, cares for him, she replies, as she goes to his arms. The following evening, Ted invites Bob to spend the night at his home, desiring to explain his wish to marry Sue, and plan for the future. When all arrangements have been made, Bob retires, but is soon awakened by a gliding, white figure, moving noiselessly in his bedroom. Nervously, Bob reaches for a match, but as soon as he strikes it, it is immediately put out. When he attempts to turn on the electric light, the figure silently hands him a lighted candle and disappears. Unable to sleep, he listens to sounds of organ music and singing. The next morning at the breakfast table, he recounts these experiences to Ted, who replies that he has been so preoccupied with his love for Sue he has forgotten to explain his work; he is founder of a spiritualist church, and his friends from the other world often visit him here.

Believing his friend to be suffering from delusions, Ted influences his wife to refuse to give her consent to Sue's marriage, unless he will renounce his practice, which Ted refuses to do, feeling that it is his mission in life. A few months later, Sue becomes ill; when physicians despair of her life, Ted prevails upon the family to allow his friends from the spirit world to help. Slowly she is raised, then lowered to her bed. Within a short time, she regains both her health and the ability to paint. Objections withdrawn, Sue becomes Ted's wife, and aids him in his work.

THE ARTISTIC INTERLUDE

Wallace MacAlpine Comedy Drama File No. 10638

A SMALL army of servants are busily engaged in painting, sweeping and decorating The Model Apartments since Mrs. Clarine King, dynamic and dictatorial owner, has sent word that they must be ready for occupancy tomorrow. Directing the proceedings with the energy of a Mussolini, Mrs. King takes time away from her duties to call up the Pet Hospital to inquire after the health of Laetitia, her dog, telephone the offices of the eleven charity associations of which she is a board member, reprimand her young daughter, Daphne, who is an enthusiatic patron of night clubs, and explain the purpose of the apartments to a friend: Alexander, Mrs. King's late husband was of a temperament not suited to business. When he died, she took over his apartment houses, and made an outstanding financial success of them all. No longer in need of money, her dream of having a place where true artistic talent can flourish may now be fulfilled, and the Model Apartments will offer a home to those possessing genuine creative talent, regardless of their ability to pay rent. Proudly Mrs. King displays the platinum trimmed desk set and severely reproves her meek secretary, Roanld Carson, when he trips over the maid's broom, spilling Clarine's correspondence.

William Broad, her first tenant, is given a room where he can keep his salamanders, on whom he is writing a treatise. Paul Coronoff, introducing himself as a Russian violin player, is regarded with suspicion because of his Irish brogue, but is admitted, and Augusta, once an operatic star, demands Clarine's own Louis XIV couch but slides wildly down the stairs on it when her weight causes the couch to slip out of the hands of Carson. She orders a grand piano for her room. Professor Bland, retired from Comden University, throws away a picture belonging to Mrs. King, and Leandre, a futuristic caricaturist, draws a doubtful interpretation of his landlady's head on her botter. Dimitri Lenko, president of the Communist Artists of Soviet Russia, finishes the sketch by emphasizing Clarine's bulbous legs, but both are given apartments. Abdul Ben Mystic, an Arabian mystic, is also admitted, although his only qualification is the fact that he guesses Clarine's birthday was in 1905, and Mary Dugan O'Kelly, a former washerwoman, but now a devotee of music, forces her way into the place, with her nine children. Reginald Shore, a music critic and journalist, is Mrs. King's only paying guest.

Lenko and Coronoff come to blows over their differences of opinion in regard to the Soviet Union while Ben Mystic and Schramm, Augusta's chauffeur, quarrel when the Arabian tries to hypnotize the German. In Broad's room, Lenko, attempting to win another convert to communism becomes annoyed when one of the Salamanders crawls on his hand, and attempts to throw them all out, but the scientist orders his exit at the point of a gun, and he takes refuge with Mary O'Kelly, until she seizes him by the scruff of the neck, pitching him into the hall. Lenko persuades Mrs. King to give up her elaborate furniture and find happiness in life's simplicities, in accordance with the doctrine of communism. Afterwards appropriating the furniture for himself.

Daphne is impressed with this group of free thinkers—and lovers—until she finds a salamander in her soup at dinner, which is passed around the table; another one appears with the fish course. The guests decorate Carat's portrait of Empress Eugenie, recently acquired by Mrs. King, with their lipsticks and pencils. During an impromptu performance of Aida, Augusta and Mary O'Kelly come to blows on the interpretation of the role, and Mary's daughter, Bridget entertains passersby with more modern songs and dances. Coronoff appears, and the children claim him as their father. Lenko, meanwhile, attempts to steal Augusta's jewels, including the famous Whittlesback Emerald after that lady has been mesmerized by Ben Mystic. As Lenko is leaving with Daphne he is apprehended by Reginald Shore. After a wild chase, both girl and jewels are recovered, and while Mrs. King advertises for boarders with no artistic temperment, Daphne rewards Reginald with a kiss.

THE ACE OF HEARTS

Caroline Austin Melodrama File No. 10593

TED INGRAM and Julian Cooper, cadets at the Military Academy near London observe Arthur Trent, their mutual enemy, dancing with Amorosa, a demi-mond. She is a secretly invited guest at the annual dance. Avoiding a scandal, Ted quickly escorts Amorosa to her automobile. Although angry, she flashes an admiring glance at Ted. Arthur plans to take revenge, arranging a card party in his room the following evening; Ted is Arthur's partner. Although gambling is forbidden, Ted and Julian play for high stakes.

Throwing a card in his face Ted accuses Arthur of cheating. Retaliating he accuses Ted of having spent the previous night with Amorosa. A melee ensues. Ted's blow sends Arthur, unconscious, to the floor. His life is in danger. He recovers. Ted and Julian are expelled from the academy. Craving adventure, they receive the King's Shilling. Their regiment sails for India returning later for the appointment of military instructors of the gard-du-corps of the Sultan of Morocco under the command of Colonel James Mackey. Arthur is his aide-de-camp. Ted sails to New York on his furlough. On Broadway, slightly intoxicated, his carefree tenor voice draws a crowd. The unusual excites their sympathy. Lovely Eve West's wistful eyes awaken love in Ted's heart as she watches a scene with him and her brother Robert. A constable is about to arrest Ted for disorderly conduct when Peter Hope, a young missionary, approaches and pleads for his release from his present dilemma. Peter takes Ted to his theological seminary until his return to England. Eve's wonderful eyes haunt Ted. Later he follows Eve and Peter to Morocco where Eve lives with her brother, a reckless gambler. One evening Eve's troubled face is pressed against the trellis of the iron door. After an ardent love scene with Ted she flees through the arch when two men ride into the courtyard. Arthur meets them. Ted hides to watch and soon hears angry voices disputing over cards. Abdul Hamid wins the stake and intends to offer Eve to the Sultan. Abdul stabs Robert to death when he opposes. Ted withdraws from his ambush to rescue Eve when a blow from the Berber sends him, senseless, to the ground. Eve is rushed to the palace by Abdul.

Ted regains consciousness in the cellar of Amorosa's house—there by Arthur's request. Peter seeks his friend. Ted questions Amorosa about Eve. For a riis, he learns that Eve is with the Sultan .Ted asks an audience with his monarch. The Sultan is trying to win Eve; she is his first love. Ted refuses to believe he can, stating brusquely he will take her from him during a banquet the Sultan hears the cause of Peter's death while trying to convert a Moor. His favour toward the Christians brings the rebellion to a climax; they must leave the country as he cannot protect them. Meanwhile, Ted secretly enters the palace gardens to take Eve and is wounded by the guards. The Sultan approaches and commands his court physician, with Eve, to attend Ted's wound. Arthur is recalled by his government. Colonel Mackey commissions Ted to escort the Europeans to Tangier. Eve rides by his side through the mountains, French soldiers guarding the rear of the procession.

THE FLESH IS WEAK

Phyllis Leith Drama File No. 10799

PEDRO Dumetz lives in a Fool's Paradise believing and loving his wife Rosita, a radiant Spanish beauty. However, one night he is to return home late to find Rosita hysterical and he is to learn from her own lips that she has shot his best friend, Jose Bonito, whose body even now lies in the next room. "But why?" Pedro asks. And as Rosita admits that Jose was her lover and had spoken of leaving her, Pedro buries his face in his hands. At last, instead of turning Rosita over to the police or killing her for her faithlessness, he tells her he will call the police and say he shot his friend for attacking his wife. No Spanish jury, Pedro asserts, will convict him for murder under those circumstances. However, on the witness stand. Pedro, in an attempt to spare his wife and dead friend as much as possible, leads the jury to believe that he has killed his best friend for merely insulting and not actually wronging Rosita. Consequently Pedro is sentenced to seven years in prison. In the belief that Rosita is patiently waiting for his release, Pedro accepts his conviction with fortitude, but when at last he is pardoned by the Governor, he returns to find that Rosita has taken a succession of lovers and has finally disappeared. Some time later, disease ridden, Rosita dies and in her last moments confesses, absolving Pedro of all guilt.

When at last Pedro is to find a girl he can trust, it is an ironic twist of Fate that he is to choose Blanchette Lopez who has been about to elope with a man her father disapproved of. On his way to call for her, Blanchette's lover has been killed and she fainted knowing she was to have a child. Her father had told her her baby had died at birth and turned the child over to an asylum. When she had met Pedro who wanted to marry her, Senor Lopez had forbidden his daughter to reveal her past. Accordingly against her will Blanchette keeps her secret and marries Pedro. They live happily together. Meanwhile Blanchette's sister Maria, unable to have children of her own adopts one. The little one's brother slips out of the asylum and comes to see his sister and Maria and her husband are so touched, they adopt both. Mindful now of her own child whom she has never ceased grieving for, Blanchette begins to visit the asylum regularly bringing toys and fruit. One youngster, Juan, particularly captivates her, and one day when Blanchette has cried out at the discovery that many mothers abandon their children, the good Sister informs her that Juan is Blanchette's own child, placed there by Senor Lopez. Overcome with excitement, Blanchette brings Juan home and explains all to Pedro, who turns from her in utter dismay. However, Pedro's mother informs him that he is himself an adopted child, and after hours of walking dazedly, Pedro returns to forgive Blanchette. And this time there is only happiness ahead, for their marriage is built on understanding and faith.

THE NAVAJO KID

L. R. Caulfield Western File No. 10708

HER dark eyes widening with interest, Madge, hired entertainer at the Shamrock Dance Hall in Alder Gulch mining camp regards her partner with a professional scrutiny. Here is a different type of man from the usual devotee of this pleasure hall of the early west. Cool, nonchalant, his handsome features relaxed and indifferent, the stranger is apparently unmoved by the extremely low cut of her cheap gown and the heavy paint almost concealing the true delicacy of her features. Afterwards, as they drink together in the private room upstairs, he tells her confidentially that he is the Navajo Kid, a notorious outlaw. When he kisses her, Madge responds to his embrace, then weeps passionately. He looks at her a moment in amazement, then gently disengaging himself, turns away and leaves. When they are again alone together at the Shamrock, the Navajo Kid tells Madge that he loves her, and trembling with happiness, she replies that she, too, cares for him. Before he leaves her that night, he plans to marry her as soon as he can find an honest means of supporting her. Entering the dance hall later, Madge is confronted by Tim, a member of the Montana Vigilantes, brutal guardians of their own unwritten code in those territorial days. Roughly seizing her by the shoulder, he reminds her that she is his girl, and warns her to stay away from the stranger, whose identity she will not reveal. Tim forces his embraces upon her until she breaks away.

After the Kid leaves Madge, a series of robberies occur, including an attack on the stage coach, When a posse of miners discover the Kid riding the stolen stage coach horse, Tim, their leader, urges them to hang him. Impressed by his calm dignity and nonchalance, the townspeople agree to grant him a fair trial, the first Montana has ever known. He is arraigned before Judge Jim Coffin, chosen at a mass meeting to enforce local justice, and charged with horse stealing, the most serious offence of those frontier days, punishable by death according to the Vigilantes' code. In desperation, Madge sends for Patrick H. Doran, one of the most brilliant legal minds of the day, and drawing one hundred dollars from her stocking, she offers him all she has in the world if he will save her lover. At first Doran refuses, but when Madge tells him of her plans to marry the Kid, he relents, believing both will lead a better life in the future. Doran's fiancee seeing him leave the Shamrock with Madge, refuses to listen to his explanations, deeply wounded by this erroneous bit of circumstantial evidence.

Miners from miles around turn out for the first trial ever held in the territory of Montana, while the women of the community are well represented by Madge's sisterhood. Judge Coffin states that he has no choice but to sentence the Kid, after hearing the evidence, when Doran, in a flash of eloquence, ridicules his legal efficiency, charging him with fear of the vigilantes as his reason for not waiting for the creation of "real courts" by Congress, and for imposing his sentence. Indignantly, Coffin replies: "Then, by God, young feller, I'll fool ye! The prisoner's discharged! Turn him loose!" Madge hastens to the arms of the Navajo Kid, and Doran's fiancee approves, when he tells her the story. Cheering the victor the crowd nicknames him "Sure-Fire Doran," a name which later becomes of the greatest significance in legal circles.

TIN-HORN

Marie C. Bainbridge Drama File No. 10600

OVER Richard's shoulder, Claire watched her Jimmy dancing with Pearl Graves. "You know I love you," Richard was saying. "And I like you better than any man in the world, Richard, except ———" "Except Jimmy," Richard supplied bitterly. Later, dancing with Jimmy, Claire's heart sank as she realized he had been drinking. With that crooked little smile of his that always melted her anger, Jimmy promised he wouldn't touch another drop, but before the evening was out Jimmy had broken up the party by flooring a fellow who kissed Pearl. On the way home Claire sat woodenly in a corner of the car while Jimmy tried to explain he hadn't meant to knock him out, just distract him a little. But a few days later, Claire learned that Jimmy's father had died and it soon appeared that all the family resources were heavily mortgaged. Claire stroked Jimmy's head as he informed her whimsically that he was broke, he guessed, but he'd get a job and make good. "I know you will, Jimmy," Claire said, and wondering what he had ever done besides having a handsome face to win the love of a girl like Claire, Jimmy held her close and told her he loved her. Weeks went by. Jimmy was still looking for that position. Then Claire met Richard, and learning that Claire was going to get married as soon as Jimmy got a job, Richard dropped his eyes and murmured thickly there was a vacancy in his office. "I want you to be happy," Richard said, cutting off Claire's expressions of gratitude. But when Claire came to call for Jimmy, she found Pearl in earnest conversation about a summer home she was going to buy. Claire saw her skirt lifted high over slender legs. Seeing Claire, Pearl said, "Well, I'll be in again about that business." "Strictly business," Jimmy explained, but as they came perilously close to another quarrel, Claire warned him if he let Pearl make a fool of him she was through. And with Jimmy's kisses warm on her lips, the marriage was set for June Fourth.

It was four in the morning when Claire was called to the hospital. Jimmy had been gravely injured in an automobile accident. The girl, Pearl Graves, had been a little shaken up but she had been anxious to leave the hospital and had gone home. All night Claire waited in the ante room. A week later, pale and worn out, Claire listened to Richard as he informed her that Jimmy's estate had been settled and there was $5,000 after all. For a moment Claire closed her eyes, then shook her head. Jimmy was scarred, had lost the use of one hand, and one foot was shorter than the other. She couldn't leave him now. But in the end the doctor informed her that plastic surgery and time would make Jimmy good as new. The doctor hadn't told Jimmy yet. He thought Claire might like to break it to him. "It seems a shabby trick to marry a girl like you when I'm going to be disfigured for life," Jimmy said as Claire set at his bedside. Little by little Claire told him the good news. But when she told him about the money, Jimmy seized her hand. "$5,000 cash. We can go to New York. Celebrate." "I'm sorry Jimmy, I can't go." "Well," petulantly, "It'll be one one last fling for me. We can postpone the wedding for a few weeks.' "No, Jimmy, no postponements." Jimmy looked sullen. "You might at least give me a few weeks freedom before being jailed for life." "I won't hold you back," Claire answered, "But before you go, I'd like your opinion on this engaving." Speechlessly Jimmy stared, " . . . . the honor of your presence at the marriage of Claire Lee Jenks to Richard Walton Crandall." "Claire . . . . " he called weakly.
